With II K 24 12 we have the beginning of dating events by the regnal of the great kings whose sway was supreme over SW. Asia, thus connecting the Biblical chronology directly with that of the larger world of events outside of Palestine. From the Exile on most of the O T dates are of this character (except in Ezekiel).

Fortunately, connection can be made between many events of the O T history and the exact chronological records of Assyria. The correctness of the Assyrian figures, at least for c. 900-625 B.C., can not be doubted, as they are well substantiated and present a practically unbroken record. Thus the earliest fixed date of O T history is given us by the inscription of Shalmaneser III of Assyria (860-824) to the effect that in 854 Ahab of Israel was one of the confederates defeated by him at Karkar. The same monarch records that Jehu of Israel paid him tribute in 842. Since the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, sons and successors of Ahab, are given as 2 and 12 years respectively, it is evident the date 842 must belong very near the beginning of the reign of Jehu (Jehoram's successor) and 854 very near the end of Ahab's reign. Since the 2 years of Ahaziah may mean really but parts of two successive years and the 12 of Jehoram but 10 full years plus part of two others, the figures  $2 + 12$  may represent no more than  $\pm 1 + 10 \pm 1 = 12$ . 854 B.C., then, may be taken as the date of the close of Ahab's reign and 842 as that of the accession of Jehu. On the basis of these dates, using the figures for the regnal years of the kings as substantially correct (only subtracting about one year from each reign for the overlapping period which otherwise would be counted twice), we can get approximately correct dates back to Saul's reign.

For the period beyond Saul no exact dates can be given. The Exodus and the conquest of Canaan can be given general dates in view of the ascertained facts that Egypt was supreme in Palestine from Thotmes III to the end of the Reign of Rameses II (except during one short interval) or, in round numbers, from 1500-1225 B.C. The conquest of Canaan by Israel must have taken place after this supremacy came to an end, especially since there is no trace, in Israel's tradition of the conquest, of any conflict with Egyptian forces in Canaan.

For the Patriarchal Age dates are impossible, as the early traditions were entirely without figures. Only in the case of Abram (contemporary with Amraphel=Hammurabi?) can a possible but very problematic date be suggested.

The table on pages 640 and 641 presents either generally accepted results or, where no general agreement has been reached, results that appear to commend themselves as reliable. E. E. N.

OLD TESTAMENT LANGUAGE. See HEBREW LANGUAGE, and ARAMAIC LANGUAGE.

OLD TESTAMENT TEXT: 1. Precanonical Period. 1. Oral Beginnings of Heb. Literature. The earliest Heb. literature, like the oldest Arab. poetry, was transmitted by word of mouth. The Book of Genesis never represents the patriarchs as writing. In all their communications with one another they depend upon the spoken word (Gn 23 16, 24 34 ff., 32 3 ff., 38 18). The Pentateuch assumes that writing was known in the time of Moses (Ex 32 32 ff.; Nu 5 23; Dt 17 18), and five fragments are said to have been written by Moses (Ex 17 14, 24 4, 7, 34 27 ff.; Nu 33 1 ff.; Dt 31 9, 10, 24, 30, 32 44); but from an archeological and historical point of view this is improbable. The Bab. and Eg. systems of writing were, of course, in existence long before Moses, but these were not adapted to the Heb. language. No archeological evidence of the existence of the Heb. alphabet before 1200 B.C. has been found in Canaan. The probability is that it was introduced from Crete by the Philistines, who first entered Palestine about 1200 B.C. (See ALPHABET.) About 1400 B.C. the Canaanites had no writing of their own, but used the Bab. language and the Bab. script in the Tell el-Amarna letters and in letters to one another. If any Heb. records were written before 1000 B.C., they must have been written in Bab., and subsequently have been translated after the introduction of the alphabet. Most of the earliest Heb. literature was transmitted orally until after 900 B.C. It included the poetry that is found in the historical books Gn-I S, stories of the forefathers, and ancient laws that were grouped in decalogs in order that they might be remembered by counting on the fingers. In transmission of this sort verbal accuracy of text was, of course, impossible, so that the primitive form of the compositions must have been extensively modified before they were fixed in writing.

2. Earliest Written Literature. The first books to be mentioned by the O T are the Book of Jasher, which contained David's lament (II S 1 18), and Solomon's prayer (I K 8 53, in Gr.), and the Book of the Wars of Yahweh (Nu 21 14), which must be later than the conquest of Canaan. These were followed in the period between 931 and 806 by the Judean (J) documents in the Hexateuch, Judges, Samuel and Kings. Between 806 and Amos (760) the Ephraimite (E) documents of the same historical books were composed. These earliest histories were followed by the prophets of the Assyrian period (760-626 B.C.), then by Deuteronomy and the prophets of the Bab. period (626-538 B.C.). During these periods the original autographs of these works were written in the old Heb. character, which is the same as that found in the Siloam inscription, the Mesha inscription, and the Phœnician inscriptions. In this character only the consonants were written, the vocalization being left to oral tradition. The original autographs have long since perished, and all that have come to us are late copies of MSS. that have passed through the hands of many generations of scribes.

3. Early Corruption of Text. During the period from 900 B.C. to the formation of the Canon the text was exposed to many vicissitudes in consequence of the Assyrian, Babylonian, and Persian wars, the fall of Samaria and of Jerusalem, and other national catastrophes. Internal evidence shows that it underwent extensive corruption, e.g.: (1) A number of passages are given twice in the O T (see Girdlestone, Deuterographs, 1894). In all these cases we find wide variation in the readings of the two recensions. (2) A number of poems of the O T are partly alphabetic. The object of the alphabetic arrangement is to assist memory, hence when we find it only partly carried out, we must assume that something has been lost out of the text. (3) Many passages of the O T demand the assumption of textual corruption from the fact that they yield no clear meaning. Thus I S 13 1 in Heb. reads: 'Saul was a year old when he began to reign and he reigned two years.' (4) Some evident mistakes in the text are found also in the earliest versions, so that they must have originated at a very early date. Many of them are explainable only on the hypothesis of the use of the old Phœnician character (see ALPHABET).

4. Adoption of Square Character. During the period between the 5th and the 3d cent. B.C. the so called 'square character,' used by the Aramaic-speaking peoples, drove the old Phœnician character out of general use, altho it still appeared on coins of the Maccabean period. As a result of this change the books of the O T were gradually transcribed from the old into the new letters, and in this process many new errors unavoidably came into the text. Some errors (found also in the most ancient versions) are explainable only through the use of the square character, and therefore must have originated in this period. The recension that then became current in Palestine and that was there regarded as authoritative we may for convenience call the text of the Canon, inasmuch as this was the period during which the Canons of the Law and of the Prophets received their final form, and most of the Writings also came to be regarded as canonical (see O T CANON). No MSS. of the period of the Canon have survived. The descendants of this recension through comparison of whose readings its text must be restored, are the text of the Sopherim (Scribes), the Samaritan Pentateuch, the early Targums, and the LXX. These four texts and their descendants must now be examined in turn.

2. Text of the Sopherim and Its Descendants.

1. Text of the Sopherim. The most important line of transmission of the Hebrew text of the O T was in the MSS. prepared by the religious authorities in Palestine. Here in the 2d cent. of the Christian era a standard text was adopted that is the parent of all existing MSS. and of most of the versions of the O T. This is the so called text of the Sopherim. The extraordinary similarity of the MSS., both of the Palestinian and of the Babylonian type—a similarity which extends even to the reproduction of errors and exceptional letters—and the close agreement of all the versions made since the beginning of the Christian era, prove the thesis of Lagarde to be correct, that all these recensions are descendants from a single prototype, the so called text of the Sopherim (cf. Anmerkungen zur griechischen Uebersetzung der Proverbien, 1863, pp. 1-2). At some time in the 2d cent. the exigencies of controversy with Christians, and the desire to have a fixed basis of discussion between the Rabbis, led to the adoption by the Jewish authorities of an official standard of the O T. Since that time all copies have been made directly or indirectly from this codex, and variant codices have been destroyed. The result is that no ancient differences of reading have come down to us in this family, but only variants that have arisen since the standard codex was adopted. A memory of the adoption of this standard codex is preserved in various forms in Jewish tradition. In the Babylonian Talmud (Sopherim 6 4) it is recorded that three Temple MSS. were the basis of our present text, and that the principle followed was to regard that reading as correct in which two MSS. agreed. According to a tradition reported by Lagarde (Materialien zur Kritik und Geschichte des Pentateuchs, 1868, i, 230 f.), all existing MSS. of the O T are copies of a single codex that was rescued in the fall of Bithher, the last refuge of the Jews in the war of independence.

2. Palestinian Massoretic Text. Having adopted a standard text, the Jewish authorities provided for its accurate transmission by raising up a body of professional scribes to whom they entrusted the copying, pronunciation, and interpretation of the sacred records. These scribes are known as the Massorites (Massora = 'tradition'). Such elaborate rules were laid down for their guidance in copying that it became almost impossible for them to make mistakes. From that time to this the consonantal text of the Hebrew Bible has remained practically unchanged. In the 7th cent. A.D., the vowel-points and accents were inserted in the text. Another standard codex was then prepared, which reproduced not only the consonantal text of the Sopherim, but also the traditional pronunciation of the Tiberian school of scribes. By the 10th cent. so many errors had come into this text that the famous scribe Ben Asher was moved to attempt the construction of a Massoretically correct edition. He prepared a standard codex of the O T in which the Palestinian, or Occidental, textual tradition received its final form. This codex has perished, but direct copies from it are preserved in the synagogues of Aleppo and Cairo. All Western MSS. are descendants of this codex.

3. Babylonian Massoretic Text. Elias Levita (Massoreth ham-Massoreth) says: 'The Occidentals in every land follow Ben Asher, but the Orientals follow the recension of Ben Naphtali.' (Cf. Ginsburg, Introduction, p. 247.) In regard to the latter recension the following facts are known: While the Palestinian scribes at Tiberias were elaborating and fixing in writing their tradition concerning the correct pronunciation of the Scriptures, the Babylonian scribes at Nehardea and Sura were engaged in the same occupation. Their tradition differed somewhat from that of the Palestinians, as numerous early statements prove. Their labors culminated in the 10th cent. in the standard codex of Ben Naphtali, which, according to the statement of Levita, quoted above, was regarded as authoritative by the Babylonian Jews in the same way in which the codex of Ben Asher was regarded as authoritative by the Palestinian Jews. This codex has perished, and no immediate descendants of it are known. About the middle of the last century, however, codices, with supralinear punctuation and other characteristics reported of the Babylonian Massoretic text, began to find their way into Europe from the Crimea and from Yemen in southern Arabia. Since that time a considerable number of these have been acquired by the Library of the British Museum and other great libraries of Europe, so that now it is possible to say something definite about the Babylonian Massoretic recension. The MSS. date from the 12th to the 17th cent., and exhibit three slightly variant systems of punctuation, all of which differ from the Tiberian system in the signs used for the vowels and accents, and in being mainly supralinear. But in spite of these differences, the Massoretic tradition represented by them is practically identical with that found in Palestinian MSS. Nearly all have been conformed to Palestinian models, and do not represent the genuine Babylonian traditions. These codices, accordingly, are of small text-critical value. Only occasionally have they retained by accident a genuine Babylonian reading.

For centuries the Jews have maintained the curious custom of taking MSS. of the O T that have become stained or worn to a graveyard, and burying them with appropriate ceremonies beside some distinguished Rabbi. The result is that no ancient codices of the O T have come down to us, at least none older than the 10th cent. A.D. are known to exist. The earliest known copy of any extended portion of the Hebrew Bible is the codex of the Prophets preserved in the former Royal Library at St. Petersburg (now Leningrad). It belongs to the Babylonian recension, and was written in 916 A.D. The earliest complete MS. of the O T is another Babylonian codex at St. Petersburg, written in 1009 A.D.

4. The Massora. The Massora ('Tradition') is a sort of text-critical commentary written in the margin of most of the codices. It contains the observations and discussions of the Tiberian scribes during the period from the 2d to the 10th cent. of our era. It counts the number of sections, sentences, and words in books; it notes their middle sentences and middle words; it enumerates passages in which unusual forms occur; it calls attention to abnormal letters, spelling, vocalization, or accentuation, and warns the scribe against changing these. Words that it regards as incorrect it marks with a small circle, and inserts in the margin the Qere, or supposedly correct reading, the vowels of which are placed under the Kethibh, or form in the text. Similar in character are the Sbhira ('opinions') that suggest an alternate reading to the one in the text. Variant readings of MSS. and of other rabbinical schools are also recorded. The Massora has been the means by which the extraordinary uniformity that now exists in the MSS. has been secured, and its authority must be final in deciding between variant readings of the Tiberian recension.

The Massora is printed in connection with the Bible text, as in the MSS., in the great rabbinic Bible of Jacob ben Hayyim (Venice, 1524-25), and in Buxtorf's rabbinic Bible (Basel, 1618-19). There are also a large number of treatises which contain the Massora classified in various systematic ways, either topical or alphabetic. The most important of these are the following: from the 10th cent., Aaron ben Moses ben Asher, Diqduqe ha-Te'amim (ed. Baer and Strack, Leipzig, 1879); from an anonymous author of the same century, Okhla we-Okhla (ed. Frensdorff, Hanover, 1864); Moses the Punctuator, Darke han-Niqqud wehan-Neginoth (ed. Frensdorff, Hanover, 1847); Jekuthiel the Punctuator, En haq-Qore (ed. Heidenheim in Méor 'Enayim, Rödelheim, 1812-21, and in Seder Yeme hap-Purim, Rödelheim, 1826); Elias Levita, Sefer Massoreth ham-Massoreth, Venice, 1538 (German transl. with notes by Semler, Halle, 1772; text, English transl., and notes by Ginsburg, London, 1867); Frensdorff, Die Massora Magna, Hanover, 1876; Ginsburg, The Massorah Compiled from Manuscripts, Lexically and Alphabetically Arranged (London, 1880-85, 3 vols. fol.).

5. Printed Editions. All printed editions of the Hebrew Bible are based upon MSS. with the Tiberian system of vocalization. The earlier editions rest upon a direct collation of MSS. and, therefore, have text-critical value. The most important of these is the great rabbinic Bible of Jacob ben Hayyim ibn Adonijah, published by Bomberg at Venice in 1524-25, 4 vols. fol. This edition is based upon a careful collation of MSS. and presents for the first time an accurate printed reproduction of the standard text of the Tiberian school. So well did Jacob ben Hayyim do this work that this edition has become the Textus Receptus of the Hebrew Bible down to the present day. All later printed editions are based upon this, either alone or in combination with the earlier editions. None of these later editions, accordingly, has independent text-critical value. Arias Montanus in his Hebrew Bible, with interlinear Latin translation (Antwerp, Plantin, 1571, one vol. fol.), first divided the Hebrew text into chapters, and inserted the Hebrew numeral letters in the text. He also added the Arabic verse numbers in the margin. From this edition and from the polyglots the practise of inserting chapter and verse numbers spread to all the later editions. Athias in his standard edition (1659-61) went so far as to invent enumerations in Massoretic style of the number of chapters, and inserted these among the genuine Massoretic summaries at the ends of the books. From him these notes have been copied by Jablonski, van der Hooght, and all the ordinary editions. The Massoretico-critical editions of Baer (Quinque Volumina, Leipsic, 1836) and of Ginsburg (London, 1894) are revisions of the standard text of Jacob ben Hayyim, 1524-25, designed to conform it more closely to the teachings of the Massora. They differ from Jacob ben Hayyim and from one another only in trivial matters of accentuation and vocalization, and they represent substantially the standard codex of Ben Asher of the 10th cent. The edition of Kittel (Leipsic, 1906) reproduces the text of Jacob ben Hayyim and gives in foot-notes the more important variants of the MSS. and versions.

6. Versions of the Text of the Sopherim. Besides these two families of MSS. all post-Christian versions of the O T are based upon the text of the Sopherim and, therefore, are of some value in restoring the prototype of this recension. Here belong the Peshitto, or Syriac version, the Greek versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion in the 2d cent., the fragments of the versions known as Quinta, Sexta, and Septima in the Hexapla of Origen, the asterisked passages in Origen's edition of the LXX. in the 3d cent., the Vulgate Latin version of Jerome in the 4th cent., the late Targums on Esther and some of the other Hagiographa in the 8th and 9th cents., and the Arabic version of Sa'adia in the 9th cent. (See VERSIONS.) Here also belong citations of the Hebrew text in the Talmud, Midrashim, and other Jewish writings.

3. Other Independent Texts. Parallel with the text of the Sopherim, as a direct descendant of the text of the Canon, is the codex written in a modified form of the Phœnician character that is preserved by the Samaritans in their temple at Nâblûs. Its text is independent of that of the Sopherim, but unfortunately contains only the Pentateuch. It is printed in the Paris and the London Polyglots, and a new edition with critical apparatus has lately been issued by von Gall.

Other representatives of a text earlier than the official edition of the Sopherim are the Targums, or Aramaic versions of the O T (see TARGUM). At first transmitted orally, they were later committed to writing. But since they were made from a text earlier than the official codex of the Sopherim, their readings often have critical value. The difficulties with them are, that they are free paraphrases with extensive explanatory interpolations, and that they themselves have suffered much in textual transmission. The different Targums vary greatly in their value as critical apparatus, those on the Pentateuch and that on the Prophets being the best, whereas those on the Hagiographa are of later origin, and were never regarded as of equal authority with those on the Law and the Prophets. Most of them are too late to be of any great text-critical value, but it is possible, altho they did not assume their present form until a late date, that they may contain reminiscences of a pre-Massoretic form of the text.

The fourth main descendant of the text of the Canon is the Greek version, with all its numerous recensions and secondary versions. The text of the Greek Version has come down to us in several recensions, and only through comparison of these can one hope to restore its primitive form. These are: (1) The unrevised text, represented by the great uncials MAB and the kindred uncials and cursives. They show in the main the common text as it existed before the revision undertaken by Origen. (2) The revised text of Origen in the Hexapla, completed about 240 A.D. From this are derived the secondary versions of the Syro-Hexapla, the Latin Hexapla, the Palestinian Syriac, and the Armenian in part. (3) The revised text of Hesychius made at Alexandria in the 3d cent. From this are drawn the citations of the Alexandrian Fathers, and the secondary Coptic and Ethiopic versions. (4) The Lucianic recension made at Antioch in the 4th cent. On this depend the citations of the Antiochian Fathers, and the secondary Philoxenian, Gothic and Slavonic versions. (5) That underlying the Vetus Itala, or Old Latin Version, which was a secondary translation from the Greek made in the middle of the 2d cent. It is an important witness to the original form of the Greek text before it underwent the revisions of Origen, Hesychius, and Lucian. (See VERSIONS.) To this list we should perhaps add (6) Josephus, who bases his history upon a Greek text that stands midway between that of the uncials and that of Lucian. (See genealogical table on page 643.)

4. The Process of Text Reconstruction. Because of the lack of ancient MSS., the restoration of the original text is possible only through comparison of existing MSS. Here the method must be a reversal of the genealogical process by which errors were produced. A comparison must be made of the characteristics of a group of closely related MSS. in order to determine the characteristics of their common ancestor; and by a comparison of other groups, the characteristics of other ancestors. These ancestors may again be compared, in their turn, to discover a still earlier prototype, and this, once more, may be compared with other prototypes discovered in the same manner. Thus, beginning with MSS. and printed editions, one may work backward along converging lines toward the original record from which all extant textual material is descended. This process implies that we are able to arrange our documents in genealogical order.

In accordance with these principles, the process by which the text of the O T is to be reconstructed is as follows: (1) All extant Palestinian MSS. and printed editions, with their Massora and the remarks of medieval Jewish commentators, should be compared in order to discover the Tiberian prototype of the 7th cent. This work has practically been done in the massoretico-critical editions of Baer, and Ginsburg. (See 2, 5.) (2) All Babylonian MSS., with their Massora, should be compared in order to discover the Babylonian prototype of the 7th cent. (3) The Palestinian prototype and the Babylonian prototype should be compared with the restored originals of the Peshitto, Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion, Quinta, Sexta, Septima, Origen, Jerome, Sa'adia, Grecus Venetus, the later Targums, and citations in the Talmud, Midrashim, and other Jewish writings in order to determine the text of the standard codex of the Sopherim in the 2d cent. (4) The text of the Sopherim, being thus restored, it should be compared with the Samaritan, the Targums, and the original text of the Greek version, restored by a similar genealogical study of all their recensions and secondary versions, in order to discover the text of the Canon. (5) The final step in the process should be the restoration of the text of the original autographs. Where passages are duplicated in the O T, criticism has a basis for comparison; but where this is not the case, documentary evidence fails us, and we are compelled to resort to conjectural emendation of doubtful passages. Such criticism is always precarious; still conjectures that rest upon exact knowledge of the Hebrew language and thorough acquaintance with Hebrew literature are often extremely probable. It is needless to say that the elaborate process here sketched has never yet been thoroughly carried out for a single book of the O T. Many years must elapse before the criticism of the versions shall be so complete that they can be used in the proper way for the emendation of the Hebrew text. Meanwhile textual criticism follows as far as possible the lines of research just indicated, but is compelled to be more or less eclectic and tentative. For genealogy of O T text see table p. 643. No critical edition of the O T text exists as yet, and even the RV of the O T is made from an unrevised text. The separate volumes of Haupt's Sacred Books of the O T, so far as they have appeared, give a revised text. Kittel's Heb. Bible is the Textus Receptus with critical apparatus. Commentaries suggest textual emendations in individual books.

OLIVE, OLIVE-TREE. See PALESTINE, §§ 21 and 23; and FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 5.

OLIVES, MOUNT OF: 1. Names and Biblical References. The prominent hill to the E. of Jerusalem (q.v.), also referred to as 'the ascent of the Olives' (II S 15 30), 'the mount that is before [E. of] Jerusalem' (I K 11 7), 'the mountain which is on the east side of the city' (Ezk 11 23), 'the mount of corruption' (II K 23 13), 'the mount that is called Olivet' (Lk 19 29, 21 37; cf. Ac 1 12), or simply 'the mount' (Neh 8 15). The modern Arabic name is Jebel et-Târ. The Mount of Olives is referred to but seldom in the O T. David passed over it on his flight from Absalom (II S 15 30, 32, 16 1); Solomon built high places here (I K 11 7; cf. II S 15 32), which were overthrown by Josiah (II K 23 13 f.). In Nehemiah's time there were many trees upon the mount (Neh 8 15; cf. also Zec 14 4; Ezk 11 23). Its connection with the life of our Lord, however, is too well known to need detailed mention here (Mt 21 1, 24 3, 26 30; Lk 21 37 and ||s; Ac 1 12).

2. Description. The Mount of Olives is a hill, or rather a range of rounded hills of cretaceous limestone, lying roughly parallel to the E. wall of Jerusalem, and separated from the city only by the narrow valley of the Kidron (see map with art. Jerusalem). The ridge shows a slight concavity toward the city. It is continued to the NW. by Mount Scopus, and at the SW. is separated from the Hill of Evil Counsel by the Kidron gorge. Eastward the slopes of Olivet drop quickly to the wilderness. The central summit is half a mile E. of the Temple hill, 400 ft. above the bed of the Kidron and 100 ft. above the highest part of Jerusalem. It therefore affords a magnificent panorama of the Holy City (see plate, JERUSALEM FROM SCOPUS, NE. OF THE CITY), as well as of the surrounding country, including the wilderness, the Jordan Valley, the N. end of the Dead Sea, and the mountains of Gilead and Moab. The slopes of Olivet are cultivated and olive orchards are still fairly numerous, but the vegetation is by no means luxuriant. During late years a large number of buildings have been erected on the mount.

3. Summits and Traditional Sites. The range of Olivet is about a mile long, and it is usually considered as having four summits, which are named as follows, going from S. to N.: (1) The Mount of Offense is so called from a late tradition identifying it with the scene of Solomon's idolatry. This is the lowest summit (2,411 ft.), being of about the same level as the Temple site. Upon the steep W. slope of the hill cling the miserable hovels of the village of Siloam. (2) The Prophets is really a spur of (3), but has received a distinctive traditional name on account of the small labyrinth of rock-cut sepulchers which are known as 'The Tombs of the Prophets.' (3) The principal summit, that of The Ascension (2,641 ft.), lies directly opposite the Temple hill.

The site is hallowed by very ancient traditions, which, however, are hard to reconcile with the statement of Lk 24 50, or with the fact that, in the time of Christ, the summit of the mount was covered with buildings. The small, octagonal Chapel of the Ascension is now in the possession of the Moslems, but Christians are allowed to celebrate mass there on certain days. Upon this summit is the native village of Kefr et-Tur; here also are the extensive buildings and conspicuous view-tower of the Russian monastery, besides a number of other edifices belonging to various religious orders and preserving doubtful traditions. (4) The Viri Galilei is the most northerly and highest (2,723 ft.) of the four summits. It receives its name from a curious and impossible medieval tradition that the 'men of Galilee' stood here when addressed by the two men in white apparel (Ac 1 10 f.). On the W. slope of the central hill, near the bottom of the Kidron Valley, is the traditional Gethsemane (q.v.). The different roads past Olivet to Bethany and Jericho should be carefully noted upon the map.

OLYMPAS, o-lim'pas (Ὀλυμπᾶς): A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent a salutation (Ro 16 15).

OMAR, ō'mār (ʿOmār): A clan chieftain—probably also a clan—of Edom (Gn 36 11, 15; I Ch 1 36).

OMEGA, o-mī'ga. See ALPHA AND OMEGA.

OMER. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

OMRI, em'rai (ʿOmri): 1. The founder of the dynasty of which his son Ahab is the best-known member. Omri himself, however, was equal, if not superior to his son, both in ability and achievement. At the time when Zimri assassinated Elah and usurped the throne, Omri happened to be in charge of the king's army at Gibbethon (I K 16 16 f.). He hastened to the capital, Tirzah, besieged it, and compelled Zimri to take refuge in the citadel, where Zimri perished in a fire incident to the siege. Omri was then recognized by the army as king in his stead. Some opposition was made to him by Tibni, but he evidently soon put this down. Omri's power to grasp the needs of the realm is illustrated among other things by his removing the seat of government from Tirzah and building a new and strongly fortified capital city at Samaria, a site much more suitable from both the administrative and strategic points of view. His reign of twelve years (c. 885-874 B.C.) was signalized by a strong foreign policy. Toward Syria he maintained an effective resistance, at least checking the aggressive movements of that kingdom against Israel. Moab, which had shaken off the yoke of Israel during the years immediately following the disruption, was again subjugated (STONE OF MESHA, lines 5 ff., under MESHA). Ō. was thus the first king of N. Israel to organize and establish the royal government on a firm basis; consequently, his name became known abroad as that of a great king, for even on the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser II he is named as the ancestor (officially speaking) of Jehu (cf. Schrader, COT, I, 179). 2. A Benjamite of the house of Becher (I Ch 7 8). 3. A Judahite of the house of Perez (I Ch 9 4). 4. Son of Michael of the tribe of Issachar, a ruler (II Ch 27 18). A. C. Z.

ON, on (יֹנָתָן, 'ōn, Egn. 'anu ['anu], also Pa-Ra, 'house of Ra' [the sun-god], whence the Heb. Beth-shemesh, Jer 43 13, and the Gr. Heliopolis): A city situated near the S. end of the Delta on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile. It is reputed to be the oldest and the holiest city in Egypt. It was the site of a temple built by Amenophis I of the 12th dynasty and dedicated to the sun. In connection with the cult of the sun there was here a school of priests, reputed among the Greeks as the most learned in the world (Herod. II, 3). From the name of the high priest ('greatest in seeing,' i.e., observing the stars) and from his sacrificial costume, which was decorated with stars, it would appear that the cult was more than sun-worship, and involved the adoration of the heavenly hosts in general. Politically, On was not of great importance. From its situation on the highway between Egypt proper and Arabia, the home of the Semites, it contained a Semitic population, which at times must have been quite large. The Potiphra named as Joseph's father-in-law belonged to the priests of the Sun Temple of On (Gn 41 45, 46 20). In the intertestamental period the city was made the site of a Jewish Temple by Onias (q.v.). The modern site is the village El-Matariye, where an obelisk erected by Usertesen of the 12th dynasty stands to the present day. A. C. Z.

ONAM, ō'nam (אֹנָם, 'ōnām): 1. The ancestral head of a Horite (Edomite?) clan (Gn 36 23; I Ch 1 40). 2. The ancestral head of a Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 26, 28). See ONAN.

ONAN, ō'nan (אֹנָן, 'ōnān): Probably a clan, of Canaanite origin, that lost its identity in the amalgamation of clans incidental to the growth of the tribe of Judah (Gn 38 4 ff., 46 12; Nu 26 19; I Ch 2 3). Possibly the same as ONAM, 2. E. E. N.

ONESIMUS, o-nes'i-mus ('Ονήσιμος), 'profitable'; cf. Phm ver. 11 for a play upon the meaning of the word: A slave (Phm ver. 10) belonging to the household of Philemon, a Christian living in Colossæ (cf. Phm ver. 1; Col 4 9). After having stolen some of his master's property (vs. 11, 18) O. fled to either Cæsarea or Rome (see PHILEMON, Ep. to), where coming in contact with Paul he was converted, and sent back by Paul to his master, evidently in company with Tychicus, the bearer of the Colossian letter. O. probably carried the Ep. to Philemon with him when he returned to his master. For later legends concerning him, cf. Acta Sanctorum, II, 858-859. J. M. T.

ONESIPHORUS, on-'i-sif'o-rus ('Ονήσιφορος): An Ephesian friend of Paul's who, according to II Ti 1 16 ff., sought and found the Apostle in Rome, and ministered to his bodily needs (the probable meaning of ἀνεψύχεν, lit. 'refreshed'), even at the risk of becoming implicated in the charges against him. Since only the household of O. is prayed for and saluted in II Ti 1 16, 4 19, it is possible that at the time when this Epistle was written he was already dead. J. M. T.

ONIAS, o-nai'as ('Ουίας): The name of three (or four?) high priests of the postexilic period (Jos. Ant. XI, 8 7; XXII, 2 5, 4 1-10, 5 1; III, 3 1-3). It may be derived either from 'ōnā (the same as 'ōnō, Neh 7 37), or from n'honyāh by abbreviation. 1. Onias I, the son of Jaddua, who entered into correspondence and alliance with Areus, King of the Spartans (I Mac 12 7, 8, 19; the text, however, reads 'Darius'), who reigned 309-265 B.C. Onias I must therefore have held office about 300-280 B.C. 2. Onias II (c. 252 B.C.), the grandson of the preceding. It is probable that he is the Onias named in Sir 50 1 (cf. Jos. Ant. XII, 4 1-3) as a father of the high priest Simeon. 3. Onias III, the grandson of Onias II. He was the champion of conservatism against the Hellenizing party during the reign of Seleucus IV (187-175 B.C.). In consequence of this conduct he was accused by his enemies. He went to Antioch to plead his cause in person before the king. He was compelled to remain in Antioch, and finally was murdered (171 B.C.) by the agents of his rival Menelaus (II Mac 3 1-4 38; I Mac 4 1-17; Jos. Ant. XII, 4 10, 5 11). According to most modern scholars it is he who is referred to in Dn 9 25 f. as 'the anointed one' who is to be 'cut off' (i.e., assassinated) at the beginning of the 70th year-week (171-164 B.C.). See Camb. Bible or New Cent. Bible on Dn. 4. Onias IV, according to some the same as the preceding, who escaped death at Jerusalem, fled to Egypt (Jos. BJ, I, 1 1), and there (at Leontopolis) built a temple in fulfilment of Is 19 19. Others, however, tho believing that there were only three of the name, maintain that 2 and 3 above were the same (cf. Guthe in EB, s.v.). A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

ONION. See PALESTINE, § 23.

ONLY BEGOTTEN (μονογενής): This phrase expresses the conception of the unique relationship of Jesus Christ to God as given in the Johannine writings (Jn 1 14, 18, 3 16, 18; I Jn 4 9). The O T basis of the expression is to be found in Ps 2 7, where J' addresses the Messiah in the words, 'Thou art my son, this day have I begotten thee.' The filial relation of the Messiah to God is always in the background in later Judaism (Dn 3 25; see also MESSIAH); but it only assumes the aspect of uniqueness with the clearer and profounder insight into its nature secured by the author of the Fourth Gospel and I Jn. In other portions of the Scriptures, the words 'beget,' 'begotten' are used in their literal senses. The term first-begotten (πρωτότοκος, He 1 6 AV, first-born RV) presents the thought of the uniqueness, not in its transcendent aspect, but in its association with spiritual sonship as typified in Christ. (Cf. the same word in Rev 1 5). A. C. Z.

ONO, ō'no (יֹנָתָן, 'ōnō), 'vigorous': A Benjamite town of seemingly early date (I Ch 8 12, and mentioned in the lists of Thotmes III, c. 1600 B.C.), tho noticed in the O T only in postexilic writings. It was inhabited by members of the postexilic Jewish community (Ezr 2 33=Neh 7 37). It was in 'the plain of Ono' that the enemies of Nehemiah wished him to meet them (Neh 6 2). The place is mentioned with Lod (Lydda) and is probably the village Kefr 'Ana, NW. of Lydda. Map III, D 4. C. S. T.

ONYCHA, on'i-ka. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2.

ONYX. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2.

OPHEL, o-fel. See JERUSALEM, § 17.

OPHIR, o'far (אֹפִיר, אֹפִיר, 'ōphīr, 'ōphīr): A place or country from which gold was brought by the navies of Solomon and Hiram to Ezion-geber, Solomon's harbor at the head of the Gulf of Akabah (I K 9 26 ff., 10 11; II Ch 8 18, 9 10). Jehoshaphat later failed in an attempt to send vessels thither for gold (I K 22 48 f.). It was a land famed for the quality of its gold (I Ch 29 4; Is 13 12; Job 28 16; Ps 45 9 [10]; cf. Jer 10 9; Dn 10 5 'gold of Uphaz,' and I K 10 18 'fine [mūphāz] gold,' should probably be emended to read 'gold of [from] Ophir') and 'Ophir' (Job 22 24) by itself means fine gold. Its location has always been under discussion, and has been found in many countries. We know that it produced fine gold, was accessible by sea, therefore on or near the coast, that the voyage to O. and back to Ezion-geber required three years, if I K 10 22 refers to the same ships; and that 'almug' (II Ch 2 8, 9 10, 11 'algum'), wood and precious stones (I K 10 11), also silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks were brought back with the gold. It has been located in (1) Africa, on the eastern coast, as far north as the Red Sea (Carl Peters, Das Goldene Ophir Salomos, 1895), or in East Africa, in Mashonaland, opposite Madagascar. Mauch (a traveler in E. Africa) discovered in 1871, at Zimbaye, about 200 m. inland from Sofala (cf. Sophir of LXX.) remarkable ruins, with which are connected reports of gold-mining as early as 1500 A.D. (2) In the farther East, where all the articles named are found in: (a) the old city of Supara or Upara on the Malabar coast in the region of Goa. This identification has been made on the basis of the LXX. reading (Σωφηνά, Sophir) of I K 9 26-28. (b) The Malacca peninsula, where a Mt. Ophir, near Johore, is known as producing gold. (c) The east side of the Indus delta, where a nomadic people, Abhira, were settled. Gold is found in Kashmir, farther inland; precious stones, sandalwood (almug wood?), apes, and peacocks are also found in India. (3) In Arabia: (a) On the SW. coast (so Sprenger, Guthe) along the Red Sea, which was a gold-producing country and might furnish precious stones and almug-wood. The products mentioned in I K 10 22 could have been secured elsewhere, or, as many claim, the verse is a late insertion and its writer was confused as to the location of O. (b) The SE. coast of Arabia, along the Persian Gulf, for which E. Glaser (Skizze der Geschichte u. Geog. Arabiens, 1890, II, 353-387) makes a strong argument. Gn 10 29, 30 connects Ophir with Havilah (q.v.) and Sheba (q.v.), called 'sons' of Joktan, who settled in Arabia. Many early authorities identify O. with S. Arabia, which was noted for its fine gold, called 'apyron' (ἀπύρον) by the Greeks. This may be connected with the Elamite name (1000-800 B.C.) Apīria (Apīi) = Ophir (?) for the territory between Susa and the Persian Gulf. Glaser claims that on account of the winds the voyage might easily have required three years. The ships would have gone down the Red Sea, eastward along the Somali coast, then along the Arabian coast and into the Persian Gulf. Gold, silver, almug-wood, and precious stones would have been secured at O., the other products at ports on the E. of the gulf, or even elsewhere. This view seems, on the whole, the most probable. C. S. T.

OPHNI, of'nai (אֹפְנִי, 'ophnī): One of the cities of Benjamin (Jos 18 24). Map III, F 5 (but this identification is doubtful).

OPHRAH, of'ra (אֹפְרָה, 'ophrāh): I. A Jewish family name (I Ch 4 14). II. 1. A town on the NE. border of Benjamin (Jos 18 23). Jerome states it was Ephrem, 5 m. E. of Bethel. A company of Philistines from Michmash, S. of this place, set out on the Ophrah road (I S 13 17); other companies went to the W. and E. and Saul commanded the S.; therefore the road to O. probably led to the N. and the O. of Jos 18 23 would be intended. It is identified with Taiyebah, 5 m. NE. of Bethel. Map III, F 5. See also EPHRAIM, 3. 2. A town in Manasseh (Jg 6 11, 15), belonging to the family of Abiezer, the home of Gideon (Jg chs. 6-8). It had the altar 'Jehovah-shalom' ('J' is peace') (6 24), and an ephod set up by Gideon (8 27). Gideon was buried there (8 32) and there his family was slain by his son Abimelech (9 5). It was W. of the Jordan, and not far S. (7 1) of the Plain of Jezreel (6 33-35, 8 18 f.), and probably N. of Shechem. The site has not been discovered, tho identified by some with Fer'ata, 6 m. W. of Shechem. C. S. T.

ORACLE: (1) The rendering of dābhār, 'word,' i.e., the Divine word, as given through some appointed means, such as, in earlier times, the sacred lot, or a seer or 'man of God,' or in later times, a prophet (II S 16 23; here the earlier usage is meant). (2) The (incorrect) rendering of d'bhār, a term used in the description of Solomon's Temple (q.v.), meaning the 'inner' or 'rear' part or chamber, and applied to the most holy place where the Ark was kept (I K 6 5, 16 f., etc.; II Ch 3 16, etc.). (3) In Pr 31 1 the Heb. text contains the word massā ('burden'), which is often used of prophetic oracles (cf. La 2 14), and is here rendered 'oracle' ('prophecy' AV). While it can not mean 'oracle' in this passage, it may mean 'utterance' in the sense of a wisdom-poem. Some scholars think a proper name is intended and render 'Lemuel, King of Massa' (cf. Gn 25 14). (4) The rendering of λόγιον, 'a little word,' and hence used of a brief utterance, and so of pagan oracles, since these were usually brief. In the N T this term is used of the O T as a Divine revelation (Ac 7 38, of the Mosaic Law; Ro 3 2; He 5 12; I P 4 11, where 'oracles' is the subject of 'speak' understood, and the meaning is that the Christian teacher is to speak in the spirit and manner of, and in harmony with, the Scriptures, i.e., the O T. E. E. N.

ORATOR: In the O T this word is used once (Is 3 3 AV) to translate the Heb. lāhash, more correctly rendered in RV by 'enchanter.' In the N T it renders the term ῥήτωρ, applied to one Tertullus (Ac 24 1) in the technical sense of 'advocate,' or 'pleader.' J. M. T.

ORCHARD: The rendering (Ec 2 5 [AV]; Song 4 13) of pardēs, a Persian word meaning an 'enclosure,' i.e., a royal preserve, whether of forest (cf.

Neh 2:8 RVmg.), or for hunting, or pleasure-grounds. Ec 2:5 RV reads 'park.' E. E. N.

ORDAIN: This is the rendering of words meaning (1) 'to will into being,' 'command,' 'decide,' 'fix,' or 'make,' and, therefore, bring about that which is ordained (kūn, Ps 8:2, 'established' RV; m'nāh, Dn 2:24, 'appointed' RV; yāṣadh, I Ch 9:22; pā'al, Ps 7:13, 'prepared' RV; qūm, Est 9:27; poiein, Mk 3:14, 'appointed' RV). (2) 'To set in order,' or 'arrange,' 'prepare' (āmadh, II Ch 11:15; nāthan, II K 23:5; κατασκευάζειν, He 9:6; διατάσσειν, I Co 7:17; προετοιμάζειν, Eph 2:10). (3) 'To set apart,' 'designate,' for a special function or office, 'to appoint' (šūm, sum, Ps 81:5; Hab 1:12; shāphath, Is 26:12; κρίνειν, Ac 16:4; ὀρίζειν, Ac 10:42; χειροτονεῖν, Ac 14:23; προορίζειν, I Co 2:7; τάσσειν, Ac 13:48; προγράφειν Jude ver. 4). (4) 'To install' in office, or 'consecrate,' when the office is viewed as sacred (καθίστημι, He 5:1). The term 'ordination' does not occur in the Bible. Ordination in the sense of setting apart officers of the Church to their peculiar work by the ceremony of the laying on of hands (I Ti 4:14; II Ti 1:6) has the sanction of Apostolic usage, but is nowhere defined or enjoined. There is no evidence that the act was more than the recognition of the call of the ministrant by the Christian community in which he was to serve, and the concurrence of the ordinands in the call. The call itself came from the Holy Spirit (Ac 13:2), but sometimes through election by the people, or appointment by the Apostles (Ac 6:5, 14:23). See also CHURCH LIFE, §§ 3, 8. A. C. Z.

ORDER: In Ps 110:4 the Heb. dibhrāh has no technical significance. It means simply after the 'manner' of Melchizedek. In Lk 1:3 'in order' (καθεξής) is not a conjunction, but an adverb, meaning 'in succession,' 'one after another' (cf. also Ac 11:4, 18:23). E. E. N.

ORDINANCE: A statutory prescription as distinguished from consuetudinary law. The principal Heb. and Gr. words thus rendered are hugqāh, mishpāt, and δικταγή (Ex 12:14; Ps 119:13; He 9:1). See also, in general, LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE. A. C. Z.

OREB, ō'reb (עֹרֵב, עֹרֵב, 'ōrēbh), 'raven': I. A Midianite prince slain by the Ephraimites, who at the command of Gideon had gone down into the Jordan Valley to cut off the retreat of the Midianites (Jg 7:25, 8:3; Ps 83:11). II. A place named after the Midianite prince (Jg 7:25; Is 10:26), located perhaps in the Wādy Fār'ah (see Moore, ad loc. in Int. Crit. Com. on Judges). C. S. T.

OREN, ō'ren (עֹרֵן, 'ōren), 'cedar': The ancestral head of a Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2:25).

ORGAN. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (2).

ORION, ō-rui'an. See ASTRONOMY, § 4.

ORNAMENT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II.

ORNAMENT FOR THE LEGS. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, 2.

ORNAN. See ARAUNAH.

ORPAH, ōr'pa (עֹרְפָּה, 'orpāh): A Moabite, one of Naomi's daughters-in-law (Ru 1:4, 14).

OSEE, ō'zī. See HOSEA, § 1.

OSHEA, ō-shī'a. See JOSHUA.

OSNAPPER, es'nap-ar (עֲשַׁנְפָּר, 'osnappar; LXX 'Ἀσενναφάρ; Lucian, Σαλμανασσάρης): A king who transported peoples to Samaria (Ezr 4:9 f.); probably the Assyrian king Asshurbanipal (𐎶𐎶𐎶𐎶𐎶𐎶, 668-626 B.C.) is meant. Sargon (722-705 B.C.) seems to have been the first Assyrian king to transport men from the East to Samaria in 721 B.C. and 715 B.C. (II K 17:24; cf. COT, 276 f.). Esarhaddon (681-668 B.C.) also sent colonists to Samaria (Ezr 4:2). Altho no other mention is made of Asshurbanipal than in Ezr 4:10, he was the only Assyrian king who could have transplanted the inhabitants of Susa and Elam. Esarhaddon had brought to subjection the whole of Syria and Egypt, and his empire extended from Babylon to Egypt. Asshurbanipal, his son, received the Assyrian throne with the western dependencies; his brother Shamas-shum-ukin having been set over Babylon. A. quelled an uprising in Egypt, conquered the Elamite kingdom, and putting down the rebellion of his brother in Babylon became king of both Assyria and Babylonia (648 B.C.?). There seems to have been an uprising in Syria and Palestine at the same time, and according to II Ch 33:11 Manasseh was carried in chains to Babylon. The inscriptions mention Manasseh as a vassal of A., and the incident as recorded in Ch may well have been true, as A. probably resided at Babylon part of the time. He erected notable buildings, both palaces and temples, in various cities of his empire; but his greatest service to posterity was in collecting the very rich and valuable library of Babyl.-Assyr. literature, which was discovered at Nineveh by Layard and Rassam (1845-50, and later). See ASSYRIA; and NINEVEH. C. S. T.

OSPREY. See PALESTINE, § 25.

OSSIFRAGE. See PALESTINE, § 25.

OSTRICH (Heb. yā'en, ya'ānāh, wrongly rendered 'owl' in AV [except in La 4:3]; in Job 39:13 the present word r'nānīm is probably a textual mistake for y'e'nīm. Etymology uncertain). This bird of the desert was well-known to the people of Palestine, and its chief characteristics are noted in the following references: Lv 11:16 (here listed as 'unclean' and not to be eaten); Is 13:21, 34:13, 43:20; Jer 50:39; La 4:3; Mi 1:8; and especially in the extended description in Job 39:13-18. See PALESTINE, § 25. E. E. N.

OTHNI, ōth'nai (עֹתְנִי, 'othnī): A Levite gatekeeper (I Ch 26:7).

OTHNIEL, ōth'ni-el (עֹתְנִיֵּל, 'othnī'ēl): The son of Kenaz, a younger brother of Caleb (Jos 15:17). The first of the so called judges of Israel. His courage had been tested, even before he assumed the judgeship, when at the invitation of Caleb he attacked and captured Kiriath-sepher, and received as a reward the hand of Caleb's daughter Achsah in marriage (Jg 1:11-15). Othniel's judgeship was occasioned by his success in repelling the invasion of Cushan-rishathaim of Mesopotamia (Jg 3:7 ff.). See JUDGES, BOOK OF. A. C. Z.

OUCHES, auch'es (Settings RV): (1) The settings for the precious stones on the shoulder-pieces of the high-priestly ephod (Ex 28 11, 39 6). (2) Pieces of gold work that served as fastenings for the golden cords of the breastplate (Ex 28 13 f., 25, 39 16, 18). The Heb. term mishb'tsōth means something 'mixed' or woven together (cf. Ps 45 13 'inwrought'), indicative of open or filigree work. Driver (Camb. Bible on Ex ad loc.) suggests 'rosettes' (of strips of beaten gold) as a suitable rendering. E. E. N.

OUTGOINGS: This term is the translation of two Heb. words: (1) mōtsā, the place of the sun's going forth, the east (cf. Ps 75 6 [7]), and by zeugma (Ps 65 8 [9]), 'the goings forth of the morning and evening' = 'the east and the west.' (2) tōtsā'ōth (fem. pl.), 'the point at which a boundary terminates.' Altho the noun is a fem. pl., the Heb. verb is singular (Q'rē pl.), and in the original text the noun may have been singular. It is used in Jos (17 9, 18, etc.) in giving the boundaries of the tribal divisions in Canaan, where RV renders 'goings out,' while elsewhere, in Nu and Jos, it is rendered 'goings forth,' 'goings out.' C. S. T.

OUTLANDISH: This term is the old Eng. translation for nokhrī in Neh 13 26 AV, where RV has 'foreign.' Elsewhere AV usually renders this word by 'strange,' 'stranger' where RV has 'foreign,' 'foreigner.' C. S. T.

OVEN. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 2.

OVERSEER: (1) In most instances in the O T this is a correct translation of the Heb. terms pāqadh (noun and verb) and pāqīdh, as the root idea signifies 'to seek out,' 'to care for,' 'to inspect.' (2) In II Ch 2 18, 34 13 the Heb. m'nats'ts'hūm might be rendered 'foremen.' (3) In Pr 6 7 the Heb. term shōtēr is one which occurs many times in the O T, and always (in RV) rendered 'officer,' except in this place. On Nos. (1)-(3) see also OFFICER. (4) On Ac 20 28 see CHURCH, § 8. E. E. N.

OWL. See OSTRICH; and PALESTINE, § 25.

OWNER OF A SHIP. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

OX: Several Heb. words of different root-significance are rendered 'ox' in the Eng. Bible. (1) shōr (apparently cognate with the Lat. taurus, Ger. stier, Engl. steer), the most generic word used irrespective of age or sex. (2) bāqār ('to break through'), the term thus meaning the 'plow-animal.' In addition to these two terms, which represent nearly all the O T instances, there are two others: par, 'bullock'; but in Ex 24 5 and Nu 23 1 (AV) 'oxen,' and 'alkūph, 'eleph,' meaning the 'tamed,' 'domesticated,' or 'taught' animal (Is 30 24; Ps 87, 144 14). For the uses to which oxen were put see AGRICULTURE, § 4; SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5; and PALESTINE, § 24. E. E. N.

OZEM, ō'zem (𐤌𐤆𐤌, 'ōtsem): 1. A brother of David (I Ch 2 15). 2. The ancestral head of a Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 25).

OZIAS, o-zai'as. See UZZIAH.

OZNI, ōz'nai (𐤌𐤆𐤌, 'oznī): The ancestral head of the Oznites, a clan of Gad (Nu 26 16), called Ezbon in Gn 46 16.

P

PAARAI, pē'a-rai or -rē (𐤑𐤏𐤕𐤓, pa'ārī): One of David's heroes (II S 23 35), an Arbite (see ARAB, II). In I Ch 11 37 called 'Naarai son of Ezbai.'

PADAN-ARAM, pē'dan-ē'ram. See PADDAN-ARAM.

PADDAN-ARAM, pad'dan-ē'ram (𐤑𐤏𐤕𐤓 𐤓𐤕𐤕, pad-dan 'ārām, Padan-aram AV; 'Paddan' alone in Gn 48 7 is doubtless due to a copyist's omission; Μεσοποταμία Συρίας, LXX.): See ARAM, § 2.

L. G. L.—E. C. L.

PADDLE: A term found only in Dt 23 13, for which RVmg. substitutes 'shovel.' The Heb. term so rendered, yāthēdh, is the common term for a peg, or 'tent-pin,' and here denotes that the butt end of the spear should be shaped so as to be used conveniently for the purpose indicated. E. E. N.

PADON, pē'den (𐤑𐤏𐤕𐤓, pādhōn): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47).

PAGIEL, pē'gi-el (𐤑𐤏𐤕𐤓, pagh'i'ēl). The 'prince' of the tribe of Asher (Nu 1 13, etc.).

PAHATH-MOAB, pē'hath-mō'ab (𐤑𐤏𐤕𐤓 𐤓𐤕𐤕, pa-hath mō'ābh): A family from which 2,812 (Ezr 2 6) or 2,818 (Neh 7 11) men, in two branches, Jeshua and Joab, returned with Zerubbabel, and, later, 200 with Ezra (Ezr 8 4) and perhaps 218 more of the Joab branch (Ezr 8 9). Hasshub, 'son' of P.-M., helped in repairing the wall (Neh 3 11), and the head of the family sealed the covenant (Neh 10 14 [15]). Eight of the family had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 30). C. S. T.

PAI, pē'ai. See PAU.

PAINT, PAINTING. See EYE-PAINT.

PALACE: This term is used in the AV as the translation of eight Heb. and two Gr. words: (1) 'appēdhen, from the Persian apadāna, 'treasury,' 'armory.' In Dn 11 45 it means 'palatial tents.' (2) 'armōn, 'citadel'; not used before the establishment of the Kingdom of Israel, and means both 'citadel' (I K 16 18; II K 15 25, 'castle' RV) of the king's house, and more generally 'castles,' 'palaces,' especially in passages of the Prophets, which speak of conquest (Jer 6 5; Am 1 4, etc.). (3) birāh, 'castle,' 'palace,' a late word from Assy. biru, 'fortress,' only in postexilic lit., used for the Temple (I Ch 29 1, 19); for the fortress near the Temple (Neh 2 8, 7 2, 'castle' RV), and for the fortress in (or which is) Shushan, the winter residence of the king of Babylon (Neh 1 1; Est 1 2, etc.; Dn 8 2). (4) bayith, 'house' (II Ch 9 11 RV); 'king's house,' the usual term for a royal palace. (5) bithān, 'house,' 'palace' in Est only (1 5, 7 7, 8). (6) hēkhāl, a loan-word from the Accadian e-gal, 'great house,' used for a royal palace (I K 21 1; Dn

1 4, etc.; Hos 8 14, 'temple' AV); but also for the Temple, the palace of God, the supreme King (Is 6 1; I K 6 1, etc.). (7) harmôn, a word of uncertain meaning (Am 4 3 AV; cf. RV). (8) ṭirāh, 'encampment,' 'settlement' (Song 8 9, 'turret' RV; Ezk 25 4, 'encampments' RV). (9) αὐλή, a 'court' and the house itself, 'palace' AV (Mt 26 3 f.; Mk 14 54 f.; Lk 11 21; Jn 18 15). (10) πραιτώριον, 'the camp of pretorian soldiers,' 'the pretorian guard' (so Ph 1 13 RV). Their quarters in Rome did not include the royal palace, altho when absent from Rome the emperor was 'in praetorio.' See also PRETORIUM.

C. S. T.

PALAL, pē'lāl (פָּלָל, pālāl): One who helped on the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 25).

PALANQUIN, pal'ōn-kīn': The RV rendering of the Heb. 'appiryōn' (Song 3 9; 'chariot' AV), a word of foreign origin and of somewhat uncertain meaning.

I. NAMES, BOUNDARIES, AND AREA.

1. Names. Palestine did not receive its present designation from the people of Israel, through whose occupation of its soil it has become famous, but was so named from the Philistines, the enemies of Israel. It is in Herodotus that we first find the expression Συρία ἡ Παλαιστίνη. He meant thereby either only the coast of the Mediterranean between Phenicia and the Arabian Desert in the S. (I, 105; IV, 39; VII, 89), or also the interior country lying back of this coast (II, 109; III, 91). As time passed, the reference of the name to the interior became more usual. It is true that Josephus only rarely uses Παλαιστίνη (Palestine) for the land of the Israelites or of the Jews (Ant. I, 6 4 [§ 145]; XX, 12 1 [§ 259]). But Philo puts Παλαιστίνη for Canaan, and similarly upon coins issued under the authority of Vespasian (70 A.D.) we read: Palestina (Palæstina) in potestatem P. R. redacta. For the terminology of Christian writers the usage of Jerome (Com. on Ezk 27) was influential. By Palestine was understood the land inhabited by the Israelites, or Jews, with no definite determination of its boundaries. This territory belonged, according to the O T, to the land of Canaan, but was not the whole of it. The Israelites well-knew that they had not gained possession of all Canaan, for in Jos 11 17, 12 7, a distinction is made between the territory Israel had taken from Canaan and that which had not been conquered (Jos 13 2-6), and the well-known expression 'all Israel from Dan even to Beersheba' (I S 3 20; II S 24 2, 15; I K 4 25 [5 5 in Heb.]) designated only the N. and S. limits of the territory actually possessed by Israel. In the O T Canaan does not represent a political unit but a geographical idea (like the term Germany), and never had fixed boundaries. This is the reason why the attempts in the O T to draw the boundaries of Canaan, especially on the N., differ so widely, as a comparison of Gn 10 15-19 with Dt 11 24; Gn 15 18 and Ex 23 31 with Ezk 47 15-20, 48 1 ff. and Nu 34 1-12 (cf. 13 21) will show. The E. Jordan land ('ēbher hayyarden) was never explicitly reckoned as belonging to Canaan, and later (from Ezekiel's time) was definitely distinguished from it. Canaan was called 'the land of promise' (He 11 9; cf. Ac 7 5) or 'the promised land' after such passages as Gn 15 17; Dt 6 10; Ezk 20 42. On the contrary, other designations of the O T have a narrower sense. For example, such terms as 'the land of Israel' (I S 13 9); 'the land of the Hebrews' (Gn 40 15; Jos. Ant. VII, 9 4 [§ 219]; Pausanias, VI, 24); 'Jehovah's house' (Hos 9 15; Jer 12 7); the 'holy mountain' of J' (Is 11 9); 'the holy land' (Zec 2 12 [16 in Heb.]; II Mac 1 7)—all mean only the land inhabited by Israel. It was 'holy' for Israel, because it belonged to J' and He or His name dwelt therein; for Christians, because it was the theater of Jesus' activity or of sacred history in general.

The Egyptian inscriptions show acquaintance with the name Canaan, tho they generally use the term Haru (cf. in O T, the 'Horites') for southern Syria. The term commonly employed by the Babylonians, Amurru (whence Amorites), signified generally Phenicia and the Phenicians. The Amarna letters limit this term to the Lebanon region and N. Phenicia, and for the S. part of Syria use the term Canaan (Kināhni, Kināhhi). Among the Assyrians, from the 8th cent. on, the term mat Ḫatti, 'land of the Hittites,' meant not only N. but also S. Syria. Later for this expression another is used, ebir nāri (Heb. 'ēbher hannāhār, Aram. 'ābhar nahāra'), i.e., the land W. of ('beyond') the Euphrates, which term, from the time of Darius, was exactly the term used for the Persian satrapy of Syria (Neh 2 7, 9, 3 7; Ezr 5 3, 6, 6 6 ff.; cf. also II S 10 16; I K 4 24 [He 5 4]). To this correspond the expressions in I Mac 7 8, τὸ πέραν τοῦ ποταμοῦ, and I Es 2 17, 24 f. ἡ κοίτη Συρίας καὶ Φοινίκης (cf. Strabo, 16). Finally, Greek and Roman writers use the name Ιουδαία, Judea, in the sense of Palestine. Originally, this meant only the district about Jerusalem occupied by the postexilic Jews; later, the kingdom of the Hasmonaeans was so named (Jos. Ant. XIV, 11 2), then the kingdom of Herod (XVI, 2 1), then the Roman province under Vespasian (Bell. Jud. III, 7 3; VII, 6 1; cf. Ptol. V, 16 1, 15 6-8).

2. Boundaries. If one understands by the term Palestine the land of Biblical history, i.e., of Israel's history, from Joshua to Herod, it will not be possible to think of fixed boundaries. At the same time, the name indicates fairly well what might be spoken of as southern Syria, the natural boundaries of which are easy to determine. As on the W. it is limited by the sea, so it is on the S. and E. by the desert. But sea and desert, tho often compared, have as boundaries very different meanings. The coast-line along the Mediterranean sea is sharp and changes little, but the transition from the cultivated land to the desert is gradual and the boundary-line changed according to the political conditions. Altho deserts separated peoples from one another in those times, yet caravan routes were in existence still earlier as avenues of commerce to the open sea. Therefore it is more likely that foreign influences entered Palestine via the desert much earlier than they did from over the sea. On the N. the coast-plain comes to an end about 13 m. N. of 'Akkā; Rās en-Nākūra and Rās el-Abyaḍ (6 m. farther N.), spurs of Jebel el-Mushakkaḥ (1,190 ft. high), rise abruptly from the sea and extend eastward to the W. mountain boundary of Upper Galilee, which is united to Jebel ed-Dahr (c. 2,000 ft. high) by Jebel Hūnīn (3,000 ft.). Jebel ed-Dahr forms the watershed between the Nahr el-Litānī (the Litany) and the Jordan and leads on to the foot of Hermon, which, situated above the sources of the Jordan, stands out distinctly as a natural boundary for the land from the S. To the SE. begins the level territory of ancient Bashan, the most northern portion of the E. Jordan land with which the history of Israel was concerned.

3. Area. The area enclosed by these natural boundaries is not large. The sources of the Jordan at the foot of Hermon (at Tell el-Kāḍī) are distant in a straight line from Beersheba 143 m., from Kadesh-barnea, 187 m. The breadth narrows continually from S. to N. Through Tell Rifāḥ—Beersheba—el-Kerak it is 112 m.; through Nebi Yūnus—Jerusalem—Meshetta 81 m.; through Carmel—Tiberias 62 m.; through Rās el-'Ain—Bānyās 47 m.—if 36° E. long. from Greenwich be taken as the E. limit toward the desert. Taking the breadth at Tell el-Kāḍī as the northern boundary and that at Beersheba as the southern, we have a total area of c. 10,000 sq. m. (26,108 sq. km.). Of this, according to the English survey (1872-77), c. 5,940 sq. m. (15,643 sq. km.) belong to W. Palestine, leaving a little over 4,000 sq. m. for E. Palestine.

II. TOPOGRAPHY.

4. Horizontal and Vertical Lines of Division.

Palestine, like the rest of Syria, is primarily the western coast-frontier of the Syro-Arabian Desert, which extends as a plateau, with an average elevation of 2,400-3,000 ft., as far as the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf. The coast-line is remarkably unbroken. Only in one place does it show any deviation worth mentioning, namely, between Carmel and the cliffs of Acco ('Akkā) lying opposite. Here it bends to the E., forming a circular bay 6 m. long and 2 m. wide. On the S. side of the old city Acco there was an excellent natural harbor which was of greatest importance during the period from the Persian supremacy down to and beyond the time of the crusades. It is now neglected and filled up with sand brought by the Mediterranean current from Gibraltar and the Nile delta. The Turkish Government, before the war, was attempting to construct an artificial harbor at Haifa, opposite Acco to the S., in order to give the railway to Mecca a secure connection with the sea. The attitude of the present government of Pal. in this matter is as yet uncertain. The rocky islands also that lie off the coast, under whose shelter the Phœnician harbors arose, appear on the S. coast only in the form of small rocky reefs which make the shore dangerous, e.g., at Joppa (Yāfā). The coast is mainly flat and sandy; in only a few places does it rise in cliffs from the sea (at Askalon, Yāfā, Tantūra, 'Atlūt, and Acco).

The vertical division of Palestine is more complicated. It arises from the great natural cleft or fault which begins at el-'Akkaba, is widest and deepest in the Dead Sea and extends beyond Hermon through the Orontes Valley to the north of Antioch. The deepest portion, i.e., the Jordan Valley and the Dead Sea, separates the general frontier of the Arabian Desert into two parts, usually termed the E. and W. Jordan land. This fact has been of greatest significance for the history of the W. Jordan land, as it was thereby released from its immediate connection with the desert and given the opportunity for its own historical development.

The same fundamental topographical lines running from S. to N. show themselves also on the W. slope of the highlands and in the course of the coast-line, to a lesser extent also within the highland region itself (cf. § 7, below). In only one place are these lines apparently broken, viz., by the low-lying Plain of Jezreel (Esdraelon), which broadens out from the northern foot of Carmel toward the sea and also issues on the E. into the upper Jordan Valley through easily traversed passes on both sides of the isolated Jebel ed-Daḥī. Here, from remote antiquity, important trade-routes have traversed the land from E. and W.; here also has often been the battleground for the control of Palestine.

To the S. of this plain the mountain system is very simple: in the interior the central ridge, on which most of the main road runs naturally from N. to S., frequently widened out into smaller plains or valleys which are of great importance for the settlement and cultivation of the land, at the same time the watershed, which descends rapidly toward the Jordan, on the W., slopes much more gradually toward the sea. N. of the Plain of Jezreel the watershed draws nearer the western side of the Jordan Valley and makes possible a somewhat isolated highland region toward the sea, which may be taken as the transition to the Lebanon and Antilebanon ranges.

The surface of the E. Jordan territory is of a much more simple character. To the E. it extends to the desert highland, in a gradual rise or in rounded hills, furrowed by broad and deep watercourses. To the W. it breaks itself into countless spurs between which brooks and rivers have cut deep ravines. The descent to the Jordan is often very abrupt. While the average height of the E. Jordan plateau is somewhat higher than that of the W. Jordan land, still they run parallel to each other. Both are highest in the N. (in Galilee and Iōlān, i.e., Golan). In the central region (Samaria and Gilead) there is a depression, and in the S. (in Judah and Moab) again an elevation.

These topographical differences find mention also in the O T, where the different parts of the land are enumerated according to their natural characteristics: hōph hayyām, 'the seacoast'; hashsh'phēlāh (in I Mac 12 38 Σερῶς), 'the underland,' ('the lowland' EV), i.e., the hilly region between the coast-plain and the mountains proper (often used to include the coast-plain also); hāhār, 'the mountain-land'; hā'ārābhāh, the Jordan Valley; hammāshōr, 'the plateau' (of Moab) (cf. Dt 17; Jos 9 1; Jg 19; Dt 3 10; II Ch 26 10).

5. The Accessibility and Isolation of Palestine. In connection with the consideration of the topography of Palestine, questions arise as to the relative accessibility and isolation of the land and its suitability for the intercourse of its people with other lands. What the great geographer Carl Ritter wrote in 1852 (cf. Ritter, Ein Blick auf Pal. u. seine christl. Bevölkerung, 1852; Allgemeine Erdkunde, Bd. XV, i., p. 8 f.) concerning the general situation of Palestine, viz., that it was distinguished by its isolation from the rest of the civilized world and, at the same time, by its central position in the midst of that world, can be maintained to-day only with great reservations. It is true that Palestine lay midway between Babylonia and Egypt, the two most important seats of ancient civilization (cf. Ezk 5 8, 38 12 'navel of the earth'). But its natural relation to both was different. Palestine is most closely connected with the Euphrates and Tigris region through N. Syria, while it is separated from the delta of the Nile by a broad stretch of desert. In accordance with this the Amarna letters show the country to have been primarily under the cultural influence of Babylon, while the Egyptian influence at all times has been of lesser import.

The very ancient trade-route from the Euphrates (at Carchemish) to the Nile traversed the land from N. to S. It reached the Sea of Gennesaret either from the Orontes Valley over the Jebel ed-Dahr and the highland of Galilee, or it drew near the upper course of the Jordan via Damascus, crossed this and united itself with the former branch on the W. shore of the Sea of G. Thence the road ascended the ridge of Tabor and then descended into the Plain of Esdraelon. At Megiddo, the mod. Tell el-Mutesellim, it left this to find its way to the coast-plain between the hills S. of Carmel through the Wādy 'Ara. Here it skirted the foot of the hills, drawing near the coast at Lydda (Heb. Lōdh), Ekron, and Ashdod, and passed on by Gaza and Raphia through the desert to the Nile delta. Even to-day this road is much used by caravans and for the herds which are driven to Egypt for sale, altho nothing is done for its maintenance. Its tributaries will be mentioned later. A land traversed by such an ancient trade-route is not isolated; it is open to travel and constantly under the influence of outside civilization.

This old trade-route shows that Palestine in the N. and S. offered no serious hindrances to commerce, while at other places it presented attractive openings (cf. Jer 15 7). The Bedawin of the eastern desert, the 'children of the east' (b'nē qedhem) of the O T, could without difficulty press forward to the W. Indeed, the Jordan Valley and River, S. of the Sea of Gennesaret as far as the Jabbok, can be crossed in many places without danger. In its southern portion, between the Jabbok and the Dead Sea, it is deeper and broader and the fords are much fewer, so that here intercourse between the two sides is relatively restricted. In the S. the ascent from Beersheba is at first easy, but the mountains themselves offer difficulties to passage. Here is the region to which Ritter's term 'isolation' is in truth applicable, viz., the southern part of the mountain range of W. Palestine. As far as the neighborhood of Nābulus (Shechem) we can travel from N., W., and E. through open roads furnished by Nature herself; but the entire southern mountain-land is like a natural fortress. The heights have, in places, an elevation of nearly 3,600 ft. Only narrow, tortuous valleys shut in by steep, overhanging cliffs form the watercourses. The country as a whole is much more poorly supplied with water than is its northern part; consequently it is less fertile. The inhabitants of this mountain region were little affected by either the warlike or peaceful movements on the roads to the west. Large cities which depend on commerce for their prosperity were never found here, as the land has no commercial possibilities. It is certainly no accident that the most important history of the land took place in this southern part. The single open door to the sea (at Carmel) has been mentioned (§ 4). But this was of consequence only for the later history of the land, after seamen had learned to venture on the open sea instead of clinging to the coasts.

In concluding this sketch we shall speak of the natural characteristics of each section of the land.

6. The Negeb or 'the South.' The Negeb or 'the South' was the most southern part of Canaan according to the O T (Jg 1 8; Dt 1 7; Jos 10 40, 15 1 ff.; Ezk 47 18 f.). The name (generally in the O T with the article) denoted (according to the Aramaic) probably 'the dry, barren land.' Since the LXX. in some places rendered the word by νότος and λίψ ('South'), and the Vulgate followed it by using meridies or terra australis (and austrum), so the misleading expressions 'South,' 'south-land' passed over into many modern versions. The Negeb comprised a territory which began at Beersheba, where the mountainous region ends, and stretched southward for about 55-60 m. On the E. and SE. it was bounded by the Wādy el-Fikra<sup>1</sup> and its upper branch the Wādy el-Marra. On the W. and SW. it falls away to the lower level portion of the Wādy el-'Arīsh. Its form was, therefore, that of a triangle with the apex turned toward the S. The Wādy el-Fikra (with el-Marra) was the natural boundary toward Edom (Jos 15 1, 21-32), and by the Wādy el-'Arīsh, the O T 'brook of Egypt,' the S. border of Israel (and Canaan) was extended to the Mediterranean (Jos 15 3 f.; Ezk 47 10; Nu 34 5). It is true that in this flat waste region no fixed boundary-line can be drawn, yet the lower Wādy el-'Arīsh does mark a definite line between the Egyptian desert to the W. and the arable region of Palestine to the S., as has been stated by Th. Kotschy and W. Barbey. On the African side the formation is that of a gravel bed overlaid with sand, while on the Asiatic side it is that of a hard clay subsoil under a thin covering of sand (cf. ZDPV, 1882, p. 220 f.). A more detailed analysis may be found in P. Range, Geologische Karte der Isthmuswüste, in ZDPV, 1922, plate I.

The Negeb is a plateau, with its greatest elevation in the S. (3,000-3,500 ft.), seamed with countless wādys that carry off the waters of the winter rains; on the SE. and E. through the Araba into the Dead

Sea; on the SW. and W. through the Wādy el-'Arīsh into the Mediterranean; on the N. and NW. through the Wādy Bīr es-Seba' into the same S. of Gaza. Only on the W. slope are any springs to be found, viz., 'Ain Kudēs, 'Ain el-Kadērāt, 'Ain el-Kuṣṣeme, and 'Ain el-Muwēliḥ. These constitute the most valuable asset in the whole region. The southernmost, 'Ain Kudēs, is the 'Kadesh-barnea' of the O T, where the Israelites under Moses sojourned for a long period (Dt 1 19, 40; Jg 11 16 f.). It is on this side of the plateau that the traces of civilization are most abundant, such as terraced hills, wells, and other structures for water, ruins of cities and castles, tho the land has always been more a land of shepherds than of farmers and cities. To the N. the mountain-land ends in a well-formed low-lying plain (800-1,200 ft. above the sea) toward which the waters from S., E., and N. descend, and at Tell el-Fāri' pass on to the sea. In this lowland lie the ruins Khīrbet el-Milḥ (or Meleḥ) and Khīrbet Bīr es-Seba'. The former corresponds to the city of Salt (II S 8 13; II K 14 7), the latter to Beer-sheba, famous as a shrine, and for its wells (Am 5 5, 8 14; Gn 21 33, 26 23-33, 46 1). About twenty wells are known to be extant as a result of the investigations made in 1915.

The watershed of the mountain region at first runs from S. to N., then from SW. to NE., to the Mt. Rās ez-Zuwēra, near the Dead Sea. Its ridge crossed an important road toward Elath on the Arabian Gulf of the Red Sea. Here we are to look for the 'ascent of Akraḥbīm' (Nu 34 4; Jos 15 3), also Tamar, the fortress built by Solomon (I K 9 13 [Kithūbh]; cf. Ezk 47 19, 48 28 and Thamaro on the Peutinger Tables), the ruins of which have been sought in the vicinity of modern Kornūb (= Mampsis?) in the upper Wādy el-Jemen. The explorations of recent years have made it clear that the oldest settlements, in all probability, are to be ascribed to the Nabataeans and that, on the other hand, most of the cities were built in Byzantine time, from the 4th cent. B.C. onward. Cf. Woolley and Laurence, 'The Wilderness of Zin,' PEF Annual, 1914-15; Th. Wiegand, Sinait (1920).

7. The Mountain Range from the Negeb to Shechem. Because of the general sameness in the natural character of this whole region (to which attention has been called, § 5, above) we should avoid dividing it, on the basis of merely historical considerations, into districts such as the hill-country of Judea, Samaria, etc. The 'natural fortress' of the hill-country comprises, as has been said in § 5, the territory northward to Shechem. In this sketch it is divided in two parts: (A) from the Negeb to el-Bire, and (B) from el-Bire to Shechem. Under (A) we treat, first, of the watershed, secondly, of the western, and thirdly, of the eastern slope.

A. (1) The mountain range of Pal. is connected with the hills of Negeb (§ 6) through the watershed. This watershed extends westward from Rās ez-Zuwēra (§ 6, above) about 8 m. to Tell 'Arād and thence follows a northern direction parallel to the lines of the great cleft (of the Jordan Valley). Its southern part is cut up into three successive terraces, forming acute angles with the main line of watershed, by three chains of hills which lift themselves out of the lowland near Khīrbet el-Milḥ and Beer-sheba. These run from SW. to NE., in the general direction of the watershed of the Negeb. The result is that between these hills the land slopes to the S., e.g., in the case of the tortuous Wādy el-Khalīl, from Hebron to the neighborhood of Beer-sheba. Furthermore, where these lines of hills cross the watershed, they form upland plains of different size which are remarkable for their fertility. Consequently, the slope from the crest of the range to the E. is broken into three great terraces. The southernmost of these plains is that of Hebron (Gn 37 14), which is shut in on the E. and N. by the crest of the range (here c. 3,300 ft. high). Hebron was considered a very old city (Nu 13 22; cf. Jos. BJ, IV, 9 7), which is quite credible when we consider its situation; for its upland plain is the point where four old roads unite, viz., from the N. (Shechem), from the W. (Gaza), from the SW. (Egypt via Beer-sheba), and from the SE. (Edom via Tamar). It furnished also the last resting-place before a long desert journey, or the first after such. The second upland plain lay, not on the W., but on the E. side of the watershed, between Halhul (Jos 15 58), Khīrbet Tekū'a (Tekoa, Am 1 1), el-Khaḍr and Bethlehem, and is famous for the abundant waters of the Wādy el-'Arrūb, which were brought probably by Herod's engineers through the (still extant and used) conduit to the so called Solomon's Pools (in the springy region S. of Bethlehem), and thence to Jerusalem. The third upland plain is also situated mainly to the W. of the watershed. In reality, it consists of a number of small plains that extend from Bethlehem as far as el-Bīre and Rāmallāh, c. 10 m. N. of Jerusalem. The portion SW. of Jerusalem is called el-Bak'a or el-Bukē'a, probably identical with the Valley of Rephaim of the O T (Is 17 6; Jos 15 8; II S 5 18, 22). These plains have their outlet to the W. through the Wādy Bēt Ḥanānā (N. of Jerusalem) or through the Wādy el-Werd (S. of Jerusalem) into the Wādy es-Šarār, i.e., the Valley of Sorek (Jg 16 4). Through this alteration in the surface the main line of the watershed becomes less marked, is in the main somewhat flattened, so that one often crosses it without noticing it. Consequently, for purposes of cultivation and for residence, this part of the crest of the ridge possesses great advantages over the lofty chains of the Lebans. While in the S., at Tell Zīf, SE. of Hebron, the elevation reaches 2,700 ft. and 3,340 ft. at Sīrat el-Bellā' (N. of Hebron), at Jerusalem it sinks to c. 2,650 ft., but rises again at Bethel to c. 2,890 ft.

(2) The main western slope is separated distinctly from the Shephelah range of hills (see § 4, above) by a depression running N. and S. A number of side valleys lead almost at right angles into the main valleys that run toward the W., and these taken together form a depression parallel to the great line of cleavage (N. and S.) which determines the formation of the present surface of the land. On the E. side of this depression the hills slope toward it quite gradually; the W. side is mostly shut in by barren heights. This depression begins at the Wādy Malāḳe about 5 m. NW. of the village Bēt 'Ūr el-

Tahtā (Beth-horon the lower), where the Wādy el-Muṣlib empties from the S. It is continued southward in the Wādy el-Miktēl, and then broadens out at the Wādy Selmān into the Plain of Yālō (Aijalon, Jg 1 35; Jos 10 10 ff.; II Ch 11 10). This has an elevation of 650-800 ft., and is called to-day Merj ibn 'Omēr. In its midst lay the village Bēt Nūbā. The places Ashuwa' (Eshtaol) and 'Artūf indicate the line of the depression to the Wādy es-Sarār. It continues southward thence in the Wādy en-Najīl and, S. of the Wādy es-Sanī (cf. I S 17 2, 19), in the Wādy es-Sūr (near Adullam and Keilah). This brings us to the large Wādy el-Afranj, which leads from Hebron to Bēt Jibrīn, the ancient Eleutheropolis. From this point, in the direction of Beer-sheba, only a few traces of this elevated eastern edge of the Shephelah can be detected.

From the northern part of the crest of the mountains some spurs run out toward the W. which were used in olden times, especially by the Romans, as main routes of travel; since the valleys, owing to their narrowness, their many windings, and the numerous boulders in their upper courses, are unsuitable for roads. Thus, from el-Khaḍr, near Bethlehem, a spur branches out, on which the road runs that leads down to 'Ain Shems, the Bethshemesh of Jos 15 10; I S 6 12. Another, from Nebi Samwīl (2,900 ft. high), NW. of Jerusalem—probably the Mt. Ephron of Jos 15 9—connects the villages Biddā, Karjet el-'Ineb, and Sāris, from which a road leads down into the plain and comes out finally at Joppa. A third spur extends from el-Jīb, the ancient Gibeon (Jos 9 8; II S 21 2; I K 3 4 ff.) to the upper and lower Beth-horon, along which in ancient times the most important road from the neighborhood of Jerusalem led down into the plain, and which was therefore the scene of many conflicts (Jos 10 10-14; I S 13 8; I Mac 3 15 ff.).

(3) The E. slope descends, as has been said, in three terraces (in two near Bethel), and is, in general, very steep. This makes necessary a brief notice of the differences of elevation. The crest of the central ridge is, on the average, about 3,000 ft. above the sea. The surface of the Dead Sea is 1,292 ft. below sea-level. Since these two are distant from each other in a straight line only about 15½ m., the descent averages about 286 ft. to a mile. Except in the case of the few sharply sloping plains near the watershed, the rains contribute nothing to the fertilizing of the soil. The water simply rushes on from stone to stone in its unchecked descent. This region is, therefore, generally speaking, uncultivable and desolate; its better parts only are visited in the spring by shepherds with their flocks. There was indeed a time when this wilderness from Tekoa to Bethel was inhabited by many thousands of men. From the 4th to the 7th cent. A.D., it was the favorite abode of recluses and monks who here, either in caves in complete isolation from others or under a communal leadership in the so called lauras, or, later, in separate buildings, cænobia or monasteries, dedicated themselves to prayer, meditation, and labor. We know the names of 50-60 lauras and cænobia which stood some on the almost inaccessible cliffs of the deep valleys and others on the small level places of the steep slopes. The Mughārat Kharētūn near Tekoa, once identified with the Cave of Adullam, has preserved the name of the earliest founder of such establishments, Chariton (320-350). Of all these foundations, which have faded away since the conquest by the Arabs, but one remains, the monastery Mār Sābā, founded by Sabas in 478, in the awful solitude of the barren slope of the middle Kedron (Wādy en-Nār).

This whole region is called in the O T the Wilderness of Judah (Wilderness of Judea in the N T)—a comprehensive expression indicative of many different things: pasture-land (I S 17 28, 25 1 ff.) for the protection of which towns and cisterns were constructed; also caves which served as hiding-places for fugitives and marauders (I S ch. 24; I Mac 2 28 ff., 9 33, 62 ff.); cities, also, in the wilderness are mentioned in Jos 15 61 f., among them En-gedi, 'the goats' spring,' the modern 'Ain Jidī, 400 ft. above the Dead Sea N. of the mouth of the Wādy el-'Arēje; finally, absolutely barren mountains, valleys, and level surfaces. The different parts were named after near-by places, as the Wilderness of Maon (I S 23 24 f.), of Tekoa (II Ch 20 20), etc. For the northern part toward Bethel we know only the names of specific localities, as the Wilderness of Gibeah (Jg 20 42 ff.), of Michmash (I S 13 8), of Ai (Jos 8 15), etc.

B. We come back now to the highland which we have followed northward as far as el-Bīre. The upland plain now becomes smaller and completely disappears N. of Bethel between the heights which are crowded close together and surrounded by steep and deep valleys. We have here the most broken and consequently the most intricate part of the highland. The watershed verges in a somewhat tortuous way toward the E., approaching to within 9-12 m. of the Jordan Valley, as far as the height of el-Tuwānīk, 2,847 ft. (SE. of Shechem). Consequently, the old road toward Shechem leaves the crest of the ridge, and making use of several valleys running N. to S., especially the Wādy el-Jīb, finds its way along the western slope. Its course northward takes it by Sinjil and Lebonah, leaving the old town of Shiloh (the mod. Khīrbet Seilān), in its quiet seclusion, about 3 m. to the E. The short distance between the watershed and the Jordan Valley makes the descent to the E. very abrupt. There are declivities from 2,000 to 2,400 ft. in depth. Among the tangled areas of mountains and valleys to the W. a long ridge is prominent that stretches westward from 'Ain Sinyā (the Jeshanah of II Ch 13 19) and Jifnā (the Gophnah of Jos. BJ, III, 3 3). On this lay the Roman road from Jerusalem to Cæsarea. Six m. N., near the village Sinjil, another long ridge appears. Between these two ridges the deep Wādy Der Ballūl winds its way to the lowland. In its upper course, where the Wādy el-Jīb joins it from the N., it is flanked by precipitous hills, Burj Bardawīl, i.e., Baldwin (2,570 ft.), and Burj el-Lisāne (3,130 ft.). These, with the crowning hill to the E., Dahr el-'Aṣūr (3,318 ft.), lend a picturesque aspect to the region which is only enhanced by the fact that the slopes are often covered with olivegroves and other green trees. The road to Shechem again strikes the watershed, because this bends to the W. at almost a right angle from the peak of Tuwānik, but in a deep low-lying saddle (1,800 ft.) offers an open way to travel from S. to N. The same phenomenon repeats itself some miles farther N. between Mts. Gerizim (Jg 9 7; Dt 11 29 f.) and Ebal (Dt 27 12 f.; Jos 8 33). There the watershed ascends to the peak of Gerizim (2,849 ft.), then sinks into the little valley in which Nābulus (1,660 ft.) lies, thence ascends again to the top of Ebal (3,077 ft.)—plain indications that a more open and less bold type of mountain is at hand. The city Nābulus (Neapolis) is the successor of the more ancient Shechem, which lay, according to Eus. (Onom.), some distance farther E., near the modern village Balaṭa, where, in fact, we find the actual 'back' (sh'khem), i.e., the watershed, of the land. This trough between Gerizim and Ebal is remarkable for its abundance of springs, and was certainly one of the earliest centers of population in the land. It widens out to the E. in a fruitful plain (1,800-2,000 ft. above the sea), famed for its wheat, which extends S. along the E. side of Gerizim about 6 m. and to the E. about 5 m. It is named in different ways, after the names of adjoining villages, as, e.g., sahl sālīm, sahl 'askar, sahl el-makhna. Two important roads lead hence westward to the sea, one of which, to Joppa, begins on the heights, but later makes use of the Wādī 'Azzūn, the other, to Caesarea and Dor through the well-watered Wādī Nābulus. The N. foot of Gerizim is well covered with vegetation, but the peak is bare. Ebal has practically no vegetation. These facts serve to explain Dt 27 12 f., where Gerizim is designated as the mount of blessing and Ebal as the mount of cursing.

Shechem, Shiloh, and Bethel, which are mentioned in the oldest narratives of the O T, remind us that this region came into the permanent possession of Israel very early. It is frequently mentioned under the name 'Mt Ephraim.' To what part of the land did this designation originally apply? Ephraim is, strictly speaking, the name of the district occupied by that part of the tribe of Joseph which from it received its particular name. As this tribe expanded, the name 'Mt Ephraim' also went southward, so that even places in Benjamin were reckoned to 'Mt Ephraim' (Jg 4 5; I S 14 22; II S 20 21). But the most ancient sense of the term must not be determined by this later usage. Since Ephraim means 'fruitful land,' the name could not have referred originally to the rough and quite stony region near Bethel and Dahr el-'Aṣūr, and since, in later times, the southern part of the territory of Joseph was called Ephraim, it is not probable that the name originally designated the northern part, i.e., that which bordered on the Plain of Esdraelon. This region also is not such that the designation 'mount' would be applied to it throughout. Consequently, it is likely that by 'Mount Ephraim' was meant originally the less rough and stony region extending from Lebonah (el-Lubban) to Yāšid (4 m. N. of Mt. Ebal). On this supposition the old account in Jos 17 14-18 becomes intelligible; Joseph enlarged his original possession, Mt. Ephraim (ver. 15), by first clearing away the forest on the hill (ver. 17 f.) and then settling there. The lay of the land shows that the higher-situated wood can be thought of only as S. of the territory already possessed, that is, in the wilder part of the hill-country.

8. The Highland N. of Shechem. To the N. and NW. of Ebal the above-mentioned breaking up of the mountain range becomes very perceptible. The hills are lower, the slopes more gentle, and the valleys broader. Indeed, the openings between the chains of hills are often so broad that fairly large plains spread out, e.g., the plain (sahl) near the village 'Arrābe with Tell Dōtān, which corresponds to the place Dothan or Dothaim (Gn 37 14-17). To-day a road still leads from Jenin, at the S. angle of the Plain of Esdraelon to the great highway along the foot of the hill region. The rain-water runs more slowly over the less precipitous slopes and sinks deeper into the soil. On the watershed N. of Yāšid there is a basin surrounded by hills, the bed of which in the spring after heavy rains becomes a lake, the Merj el-Gharak. The highest elevation of the W. slope is at Shēkh Beyāzid (2,375 ft.), on the range extending W. of Yāšid. The hilly region Bilād er-Rōḥa (in some places c. 1,600 ft.) makes the connection with the Carmel range, which extends almost to the water's edge, with a height of 1,600 to 1,800 ft. In ancient times Carmel was famed for its caves (Am 9 3) and for the beauty of its verdure (Is 35 2; Song 7 5). To-day it is but sparsely wooded.

The watershed holds its course N. from Ebal to Yāšid (2,225 ft.), and then draws nearer the Jordan. The heights of Ibzīk (2,404 ft.) and Fuḳā'a (1,502 ft.) are distant from it only a little over 9 m. in a straight line. The E. slope of the hill region toward the Jordan is here of a very different character from what we find farther S. Between the valleys which run from NW. to SE. there are a number of ridges, all having the same general direction and about 12 m. long, which approach near the Jordan in single peaks, e.g., Ḳarn Sarṭabe (1,244 ft.), Rās Umm el-Kharrābe (690 ft.), and Rās Umm Zōka (830 ft.). The valleys between these ridges are quite broad and open, in part also the southernmost, the Wādī Fār'a, the upper arms of which extend far up near the watershed, from the plain near Nābulus to Tābās (Thebez) to the N. The road from Shechem to Bethshan on the Jordan runs past Thebez; another leads down the Wādī Fār'a to the Jordan at the ford of ed-Dāmiye and thence into the E. Jordan land.

9. The Plain of Esdraelon. Between the mountain region to the N. and S. in form like a right-angled triangle, lies the Plain of Esdraelon at present called Merj ibn 'Amir. The right angle touches the foot of Mt. Tabor (1,843 ft.), which with Jebel ed-Daḥī (1,700 ft.) and Jebel Fuḳā'a (1,710 ft.) forms the E. side as far as En-gannim (Jenin). The latter mountain forms the continuation of the watershed between the Jordan and the Mediterranean. It is the Mt. of Gilboa (mod. Jelbōn), famed as the place of the defeat and death of Saul (II S 1 21). Jebel ed-Daḥī is a small isolated mountain with several peaks, among which Nebi ed-Daḥī (1,700 ft.) is the highest. Through the broad, fertile valley to the S. runs the Nahr Jālūd, which has its origin near the village Zer'in, near the ancient Jezreel (I K ch. 21), and flows on to the Jordan near Bethshan (Beisan). Along its short course there runs an ancient and important road to the E. Jordan land. The northern narrower valley is drained by the Wādī el-Bīre, which descends from Tabor to the Jordan. The long side of the triangle corresponds to a line drawn from Jenin on the S. to the N. slope of Carmel. The plain lies 200-300 ft. above sea-level, with its slope to the W. in the direction of the bay between Haifa and Acco. It has always been inhabited only on the edges, since the central part is marshy and in winter impassable. The volcanic deposit which was poured into this plain for thousands of years from the volcano Jebel ed-Daḥī, together with the basaltic subsoil, which appears on the surface here and there on the edges of the plain, has, through its decomposition, given the plain its marvelous fertility. Through the western outlet flows the Nahr el-Muḥaṭṭā', the Kishon of the O T (Jg 5 19-21; I K 18 40), in the spring often raging and dangerous, in the summer a sluggish brook.

10. The Highlands of Galilee. The mountainous region N. of the Plain of Esdraelon divided itself naturally into two parts: Lower Galilee and Upper Galilee. The boundary between these is formed by a range of hills that begins some little distance from Acco and extends N. from Ramah (er-Rāme), including Nebi Heider (3,410 ft.), Jebel el-'Arūs (3,480 ft.), and Şafed (2,790 ft.). Lower Galilee is divided by three parallel chains of hills, running from W. to E., between which lie small plains. The heights along the N. edge of the Plain of Esdraelon form the first chain. Among them are the hills near Nazareth and Tabor (1,843 ft.). Its crest is isolated on all sides and is noticeable, especially from the E. Jordan land, because of its well-rounded summit. Only on the NE. is the mountain, here covered with basalt, connected with the main highland. The second chain is of smaller extent. To it belong Jebel Tur'an (1,770 ft.) and the basaltic Karn Haḥḥīn (1,038 ft.), which overlooks the Sea of Galilee. To the S. lies the small Plain of Tur'an, to the N. the larger Sahl Baṭṭōf, called by Josephus (Vita, 45) Asochis, and in the O T (probably) Yiphtah-el, ('Iptah-el,' Jos 19 14, 27). The third chain is the longest. It begins at the village Shefā 'Amr to the W., grows higher and broader toward the E. (Jebel ed-Dēdebe [1,790 ft.], Ras Krūmān [1,900 ft.]), and ends in the steep hills overlooking the Wādī el-Hammām at the Sea of Gennesaret. Its caves, difficult of access, were the hiding-places of the 'robbers' against whom Herod had to wage a hard struggle (Jos. BJ, I, 16 2, 4). The fastnesses (I Mac 9 2; read מִצְדָּוֹת = Heb. mīṣādḥōth) against which the Syrian general Bacchides operated in 145 B.C. are found here. To the N. of the chain extends the Plain of er-Rāme.

The watershed continues N. from Tabor with many turnings to W. and E. On the whole, it gradually draws near to the Jordan Valley, and at Hūnīn (2,950 ft.), not far from the sources of the Jordan, identifies itself with the bordering range of Upper Galilee. It ends in the Jebel ed-Dahr, which separates the Liṭānī on the W. from the Nahr el-Hāshbānī to the E. To the W. of the watershed stretches the highland of Upper Galilee, an irregular quadrangle, wider in the S. than in the N. Jebel el-'Arūs, W. of Şafed, forms the SE. corner. The western edge runs from the village Kisrā (2,520 ft.), over Tell Belāṭ (2,020 ft.) and Khīrbet Belāṭ (2,467 ft.) to Jebel Jamle (2,624 ft.), N. of the medieval fortress Tibnīn (2,412 ft.). The eastern line is somewhat broad in the S., viz., from Jebel Jermaḥ (3,922 ft.), the highest mountain of Galilee, to the heights of Şafed, known also as Jebel Şafed, and famous for its abundance of water (here lies the Mērōn [Merom] of Jos 11 5, 7), as also for its fertile upland plains. Several old roads lead from this place in different directions—one through the Wādī el-'Amūd S. to the Sea of Gennesaret, another through the Wādī el-Karn W. to the coast at ez-Zīb (Achzib, Jg 1 31), and another through the Wādī Dubāy and the Wādī Selūkiye N. to Nahr el-Kāsimiye and the region of Sidon. The inner part of the quadrangle is traversed by two chains of mountains. One extends from Jebel el-Ghābiye, SW. of Kades (the Kadesh of Jos 20 7) to the NW. to Khīrbet el-Yādhūn, near Tibnīn; the other from Jebel Jermaḥ also toward the NW. to Khīrbet Belāṭ. Between both these lie several fertile, well-cultivated, also wooded, upland plains. SW. of the second range the land is barren and waste, except the small depression el-Buk'e'a, near the village of the same name.

11. The Plains Between the Mountains and the Coast. It is characteristic of Pal. that plains, smaller or larger in size, extend between the mountains and the coast. Due to the convergence of the coastline from W. to E. toward the mountains, they are of triangular shape, with the apex toward the N. The Plain of Acco extends from the promontory Rās en-Nākūra (see § 2, above) to the N. foot of Carmel, 12 m. long from N. to S., and 4 m. broad at the S. end. The northern part is fertile and occupied by peaceful villages. The middle part is crossed by the Nahr Na'amān (the Belus of antiquity) and is marshy, because the sand-dunes at the shore choke the outlet of the stream. The southern part, near the lower Kishon, is also marshy, yet covered with a richer growth of grass, and on the coast near Haifa a small grove of palms beautifies the landscape. The second plain consists of the narrow strip between Carmel and the coast, about 18 m. long and not more than 2-3 m. wide. Its S. boundary is formed by the Nahr ez-Zerkā (the Crocodile river of Pliny, HN, V, 17), in the marshes of which, not far from its mouth, crocodiles are still to be found. The heights of Bilād er-Rōha (see § 8) extend in a spur, el-Khashm (554 ft.) to the plain. It is to these heights, perhaps, that the expression nāphath, or nāphōth dōr, refers—a region which in Jos 11 2, 12 23 is distinguished from the Shephelah and the other parts of Pal., and is probably the same as the 'heights of Dor' (mod. Tanṭūra on the sea-coast). S. of the Nahr ez-Zerkā the level landscape becomes much broader. This region is known in the O T as Sharon (Heb. hashshārōn), which probably means 'the plain,' and was famed for its abundance of water and luxuriant vegetation (Is 33 9, 35 2, 65 10 [here the text is corrupt]; Song 2 1). It was consequently well-known for its excellent pasturage (I Ch 27 29). The water that drains down from the mountains is checked near the coast by a line of sandy or rocky hills, so that, in addition to the streams, there are a number of marshes and pools; water is, therefore, easily reached. In some places these natural dikes have been opened by man to take away the excess of water. In this way, e.g., the Nahr el-Falik, N. of Arsūf, arose. The landscape is not destitute of isolated hills or chains of hills; e.g., near Kerkūr E. of Cæsarea, and again SW. of Kalansawe and to the NE. of Joppa. In Israel's time these were probably covered with forests, since as late as the crusades mention is made of woods in the Plain of Sharon. To-day only insignificant remnants remain. On the average the plain is about 230 ft. higher in the E. than in the W. At Cæsarea it is about 7½ m. wide, at Joppa about 12½ m. Its S. boundary runs from the mouth of Nahr Rūbīn (Map III, C 5), past the hill near er-Ramle (3 m. SE. of Lydda), to Laḡrūn (near 'Amwās [Emmaus, Map III, D 5]). During the past forty years the cultivation of this plain has made great progress. Near Joppa the beautiful orange-groves have become very extensive. The German Templars, the Syrian Orphan-house at Jerusalem, and Jewish societies have settled agricultural colonies near Joppa and Lydda, and these have made a decided impression on the native farmers.

S. of er-Ramle the Shephelah begins, regarding the E. border of which, near the central mountain range, mention has already been made (§ 7, above). The Heb. hashsh-phēlāl is generally rendered in the LXX. by ἡ (γῆ) πεδινή, more rarely by τὸ πεδῖον, or transliterated by ἡ πεπηλά. The Vulgate renders it planities or campestris, 'lowland' ARV. One must not think of the Shephelah as one great plain. On the contrary, this region, once the home of the Philistines, is divided into several plains separated by chains of hills. One is near 'Ākīr (Ekron) and Yebnā (Jabneh), on the lower course of the Wādī es-Šarār, called at its mouth Nahr Rūbīn. Another is near Esdūd (Ashdod) and 'Arāk el-Menshīye, on the lower course of the Wādī el-Afranj, which unites with the Wādī es-Sanṭ (the 'Valley of Elah,' I S 17 2), and is called, at its mouth, Nahr Sukrēr. The chains of hills generally run E. and W., e.g., the one from Bēt Nettīf (1,515 ft.) past Shēkh Dā'ūd (590 ft.), el-Khēme (298 ft.), and Beshūt (197 ft.) to Jabneh (83 ft.). Or the second one from Bēt 'Auwā (1,495 ft.) 8 m. W. of Hebron, near ed-Dawā'ime and past Shēkh 'Alī (1,367 ft.), Tell Idīs (452 ft.), Khīrbet 'Ejjis er-Rās (331 ft.) to Khīrbet Yāsīn (114 ft.) near Ashdod. Another line of hills runs from Ashdod parallel to the coast to Sumsum and Der Esnād, near Gaza. In the vicinity of the Wādī el-Hesī the hills extend W. for about 12 m. The most important are Tell en-Nejīle (541 ft.) and Tell el-Hesī (341 ft.). Near the Wādī esh-Sherī'a the Shephelah gradually blends with the level plain of the Western Negeb (see § 6, above). From this brief description it follows that the expression 'plain of the Philistines' which is often used to-day, does not correspond to the character of the Shephelah. The O T understands by the term 'Shephelah' the whole hilly region as far as the sand-dunes and the rocky heights of the coast; so also the Onomasticon of Eusebius and of Jerome (296, 154; ed. De Lagarde). In Is 11 14 'shoulder (kāthēph) of the Philistines' stands for the Shephelah. In Jos 10 40, 12 8, 'āshēdhōth, 'slopes,' means not the hills of the Shephelah, but the lower slopes at the foot of the mountain region. The expression in Jos 11 16, 'the Shephelah of the hill-country of Israel,' as tho in contrast to a Shephelah of the Judean hill-country, has no basis in the natural characteristics of the land. There is no Shephelah N. of Wādī Mālāke (§ 7, above).

12. The Jordan Valley and The Dead Sea. (a)

Here the Jordan cleft will be discussed only in general and mainly from the point of view of its relation to the surrounding country. The depression begins on the W. side of Mt. Hermon in the Wādī et-Teim, through which the most northern of the sources of the Jordan, the Nahr el-Hasbānī (so named from the city Ḥāshbēyā, on Mt. Hermon, near which the largest spring breaks forth from a basalt cliff, 705 ft. above the sea), flows in a southerly direction. After traversing the high Plain of Merj 'Ayūn (Ijon; cf. I K 15 20; II K 15 29) E. of the watershed, it rushes with rapid descent into the ravine of the Jordan, which takes its rise on the southern foot of Hermon, near the largest springs of the river. At Tell el-Kādī (elevation 508 ft.) (Dan, Jg 18 28 ff.), an extinct crater, there are two springs whose waters flow into the Nahr el-Leddān, the 'little Jordan' of Josephus (BJ, IV, 11). Further to the E., overlooking the village Bāniyās (Paneas, Jos. BJ, II, 9 1), several springs unite to form the third source of the Jordan, the Nahr Bāniyās. Here is to be found the deep grotto (elevation 1,079 ft.), sacred to Pan, from which, according to Josephus, the visible course of the Jordan has its beginning (Ant. XV, 10 3; BJ, I, 21 3; III, 10 7). The condition of the cave is much altered now, since, in all probability, an earthquake has broken the rocks of the roof and filled the cave to a large extent with the fallen blocks of stone. The three streams above mentioned unite about 5 m. S. of Tell el-Kādī at an elevation of 141 ft. above the sea. The descent of the Nahr el-Leddān averages 74 ft. to a mile, that of the Nahr Bāniyās 240 ft. The small plain through which the Jordan now rushes is called Ard el-Hūle (Οὐλάθρα, Jos. Ant. XV, 10 3; XVII, 21; Hūl-tā in the Talmud; cf. Neubauer, La Géographie du Talmud, p. 27). This name originated before the beginning of the Christian Era. It is found also in other parts of Syria, e.g., between the Nuṣairier Mts. and the Orontes, W. of Hamā, and probably signifies 'a depression' or 'basin' (cf. Eli Smith in Robinson, Bibl. Researches, III, Append., pp. 139-179). This basin is about 15 m. long and 6 m. wide, is well watered, since many small streams empty into it from both E. and W., and consequently is very fertile, altho partly covered with impenetrable thickets of reeds and papyrus. The S. end of this marshy tract is covered with water, forming a small lake, the Bahrat el-Hūle, in shape like a pear, as the S. end is narrow owing to the encroaching hills. English scholars speak of its elevation as being 7 ft. above the sea, but this figure is somewhat uncertain (cf. Survey of W.

Pal. Memoirs, I, 195). Its depth is from 10 to 17 ft., varying with the time of the year. On the whole, it is gradually growing less, as a comparison of its present circumference (from 3.6 to 3.2 m.) with the statements of Josephus (BJ, IV, 11) clearly shows. This author calls it the Sea of the Semechonites (the inhabitants of Semecho). Among the different names current in later Jewish tradition, one (סמכון) agrees with this name. (Cf. Monatsschrift für Gesch. u. Wissenschaft d. Judenthums, 1860, iii.) To-day the whole region is too swampy to be inhabited and is not traversed by any road. In the N. part of its course, the Jordan is crossed by only two old roads: near its source by one that comes from Tyre through northern Galilee and goes on by the S. foot of Hermon to Damascus, by the second, between the Bahrat el-Hüle and the Sea of Gennesaret which, coming from Damascus, crossed the Jordan near the present bridge, Jisr Benät Ja'kub, descended into the Plain of Gennesaret, and thence led up from the seashore through the Wādy el-Hammām to the Horn of Hāṭṭīn, and reached the sea, either via the Plain of Baṭṭōf or over Tur'ān, at Acco. This was called 'the way of the sea' (Is 91; by the Crusaders via maris). The Bahrat el-Hüle is 9 m. distant from the Sea of Gennesaret, and, as the latter lies 692 ft. below sea-level, the fall of the Jordan between the two seas averages about 75 ft. to a mile. Its bed is narrow and shut in by basalt cliffs. There are but five fords between Bahrat el-Hüle and the Sea of Gennesaret.

(b) Both the course of the Jordan and the surrounding country S. of the Sea of Gennesaret take on an altogether different character. The banks of the river consist mainly of loose marl or clay, through which, in the spring, the stream often makes for itself new channels. Consequently, the river water becomes an increasingly dirty yellow as it flows on its course. On both sides the river-bottom is quite wide and correctly described in the common Arabic speech as consisting of two parts: (α) That immediately near the Jordan is called ez-Zōr. It includes the bed of the river, but applies chiefly to the rank growth of trees, shrubs, and reeds along the banks, inhabited by wild beasts, and called 'the pride of the Jordan' (Zec 11 3; Jer 12 50, 49 19, 50 44). The stream is usually hidden from the view even of one close at hand by this dense growth, also by its high banks. But after the rainy season it rises so high that even the trees along its banks are under water. On the E. side, this green strip along the river-bank is often broader and more level than it is on the W. side. (β) The broader region making up the whole river-bottom, together with the deep depression below sea level, the immense cleft extending from the Sea of Gennesaret to the Dead Sea and beyond is called el-Ghōr, i.e., 'the depression.' In the O T there is no similar name for this general region. The common term hā'ārābhāh (Jos 18 18, etc.) denotes the dry, mostly barren tracts that prevail near the Dead Sea and about the lower course of the Jordan. The level, low-lying districts receive the name hā'āneq (Jos 13 27) and biq'āh (Dt 34 3). Greek writers were the first to use the term αὐλὼν, 'ravine,' 'valley,' 'hollow,' corresponding to the common Arabic term (Diodor. II, 48 9; XIX, 98 4; Jos. Ant. XVI, 5 2; BJ, I, 21 9; Eus. Onom. 214 f.).

The low-land on either side of the Jordan is now accurately known, the W. side through the map published by the P. E. F., and the E. side through the map of the German Pal. Verein; with the only exception of the stretch from Nahr ez-Zerkā to the Wādy Nimrīn, opposite Jericho, of which a map is not yet at hand. S. of the Sea of Gennesaret the region around the Jordan is very well-watered and cultivated, especially on the E. side. Here the Yarmūk (so named as early as the Mishna [Para 8 9], the Hieromices of Pliny, V, 18) carries into the valley as large a volume of water as the Jordan itself. There is an important passage of the Jordan 6 m. S. of the Sea of Gennesaret (823 ft. below the sea), the 'bridge of the junctions,' Jisr el-Mejāmi', so called because here the roads from Tiberias, Bēsān (Bethshan), and from the E. Jordan land come together. Near the old bridge a new one has been built over which the railroad from Haifā to Damascus crosses the Jordan. The width of the Ghōr, on the E. side, changes; it is about two-thirds of a mile S. of the Wādy el-Yābis and reaches up to four miles at the mouths of the rivers Yarmuk and Nahr ez-Zerkā. The waters coming down from the highland have cut their bed into the body of the mountain range in almost the same direction from E. to W., and the E. wall of the Ghōr impresses the spectator with its great regularity. In some places the soil is not unfertile and is being cultivated, provided the water supply is not lacking; but marl and rubble cover wide areas in consequence of the breaking of the clods. Here and there a natural hill rises out of the plain. Artificial hills, i.e., ruins, are found between the Wādy el-Yābis and the Nahr ez-Zerkā. At the foot of the mountains lie some inhabited villages. On the W. side there is a very fertile and well-watered region in the neighborhood of Bēsān (303 ft. below sea-level). It consists of a plain, part of which slopes down to the Jordan, which is traversed by the Nahr Jālūd (§ 9), and by many small brooks that flow down from Jebel Fukū'a, which lies to the W. It is in the form of a triangle, its N. side being 12-15 m. long, its E. side, as far as the mouth of the Wādy el-Māleh, 11 m. In I Mac 5 22 and Jos. Ant. XII, 8 5, it is called 'the great Plain,' a name elsewhere applied to the Plain of Esdraelon (§ 9, above). E. of Bēsān a new bridge now spans the Jordan river.

From the mouth of the Nahr Jālūd downward the river-bed is shut in by steep cliffs of marl, the layers of which are easily undermined and fall into the river, at times damming it up and stopping its flow. It is due to this that the course of the river changes so often and is so tortuous. Between the Wādy el-Māleh and the Wādy Abū Sidre the spurs of the western mountains approach so near to the Jordan that there is no room for a level bottom and, of course, no cultivation of the barren soil. Also from the E. the mountains in this part approach the Jordan river to a distance of two-thirds of a mile (see above). The broad valleys on both sides of Karn Sarṭabe, especially the Wādy Fār'a (§ 8), had in ancient times well-watered settlements. On the E. side the second important tributary stream of the Jordan is the Nahr ez-Zerkā. It is the Jabbok of the O T (Dt 2 37, 3 16) and brings down a large quantity of water from the heights of the E. Jordan land, but only its edges are covered with a thick growth of vegetation. From Karn Sarfabe the bed of the valley widens considerably, but only in the vicinity of the ancient Jericho does its character become less rough. Six miles N. of Jericho, at the Nahr el-'Aujā, Archelais was situated, famous of old for its palm-trees (Jos. Ant. XVII, 13 1), and near the beautiful spring 'Ain es-Sulfān' are the ruins of the ancient city of Jericho, mod. Erihā (820 ft. below the sea), far behind in its cultivation, however, from what it was in the time of Herod (cf. Jos. Ant. XV, 4 2; BJ, I, 18 5). The E. side, opposite Jericho, is now covered with vegetation and well cultivated. It corresponds to the 'Abel-shittim' of the O T (Nu 33 49), the 'Abila of Perea' of Josephus (BJ, II, 13 2). Here are to be found the ruins Tell Kefrēn (Shittim, Nu 25 1) and Tell Rāme (Beth-haram). But these green spots are really oases, surrounded by barren country. Consequently, the all-inclusive name for this region in the O T is 'ar-bhōth, i.e., 'steppes'; 'steppes ('plains' RV) of Jericho' for the western part (Jos 5 10), and 'steppes of Moab' for the eastern part (Nu 22 1). The nearer the Dead Sea, the more salty and barren the soil becomes, due to the alkali of the sea, which has an effect some distance inland. In the O T, therefore, the name of the most southern district W. of the Jordan, the 'Valley of Achor,' is the proverbial expression for a cheerless waste (Hos 2 15; Is 65 10). About 4 m. from the mouth of the Jordan the marl cliffs recede from its banks toward the base of the mountains, so that the N. end of the Dead Sea is surrounded by a level shore.

If we now raise the question whether the Jordan Valley is conducive to or hinders intercourse between the two sides of the country through which it runs, the answer must be different for different parts of the long stretch from the Sea of Gennesaret to the Dead Sea, which is about 68 m., with a descent from 682 below the sea at Gennesaret to 1,292 ft. at the Dead Sea. The upper part of the course, near Bethshan, offers no serious hindrance to such intercourse. The fords are here very numerous. It is otherwise, however, with the lower part of the course. At the mouth of the Nahr ez-Zerkā there is the important old ford ed-Dāmiye, the O T ma'ābhar hā'ādāmāh (I K 7 46; II Ch 4 17 f.; corrected text), in the place of which, during and after the rainy season, a ferry-boat is used. The bridge Jisr ed-Dāmiye, built in the 13th cent., is no longer used, as both the Jordan and Nahr ez-Zerkā have changed their courses. Here the depth of the valley (1,144 ft. below the sea) and its width (8-9 m.) make the crossing a somewhat laborious undertaking. This is even more the case below the Zerkā; for the valley grows continually lower and wider, and, in addition, there are no fords except near Jericho, where there are five. Thirty years ago the Turkish Government built here a small bridge, which has made the crossing easier for riders and for beasts of burden. During the war it was made practicable for wheel traffic also.

(c) The Dead Sea is but the continuation of the Jordan cleft, in fact, its deepest part. The water of this solitary inland sea is deep blue and its surface lies 1,292 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. Its depth varies greatly. N. of the low peninsula, el-Lisān, it reaches 1,308 ft. (2,600 ft. below the surface of the Mediterranean), but in the smaller southern part it is only from 3 to 20 ft. The level of the water in the sea varies, not only during the year (to the extent of 6-7 ft. according to the rainfall), but also during longer periods. To-day it seems to be rising, since in 1820 the southern extremity could be crossed on foot, which is now impossible, and a small island not far off the NW. shore has become invisible within the last 20 years. The shore of both the N. and S. ends is low and level. In the S. it is a briny marsh (es-Sabkha), only passable in midsummer. On the E. and W. shores, however, high and steep mountains reach close to the water. These must be considered as the fragments of the original surface, which stood on the edges of the cleft. What was between them sank and now lies under the sea.

Here we touch upon the question of the origin of the Dead Sea, to which scientific investigation gives an answer altogether different from that furnished by the hints we find in the O T. According to Gn 13 10, 19 25, the Dead Sea originated simultaneously with the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah. In fact, in Gn 14 3 the plain, which is now covered by the water of the salt sea, is called 'Siddim'. These stories are remains of old Canaanite legends which were taken over by Israel and survived until a late period (Wis 10 6 f.; Jos. BJ, IV, 8 4). The theory has been advanced that the Dead Sea is an isolated remnant of the ocean that once rolled its waves into the Jordan Valley from the S. and after its subsidence left this salt sea in the midst of the mainland. But this theory is contrary to the fact that across the 'Araba, the southern extension of the Jordan cleft, as far as the Red Sea, there lies a watershed (er-Rīshe) composed of chalkstone, 820 ft. above the sea-level, which has never been crossed by ocean waves. As a matter of fact, the Dead Sea originated simultaneously with the fault that formed the Jordan depression, and is to be viewed as the deepest part of this cleft.

The geologist who has investigated this question most thoroughly, Dr. M. Blanckenhorn, puts the disturbance that formed the Jordan Valley at the close of the Tertiary period. According to him, there was originally, on the site of the Dead Sea, a deep basin into which the water from all the surrounding country flowed. This somewhat shallow body of water became strongly impregnated with mineral salts from the hot springs which broke forth when the Jordan cleft was formed. At that time this sea covered the whole region from the height of er-Rīshe, in the 'Araba, to near the Sea of Gennesaret. The basis of this theory is the fact that deposits from water much fresher than that of the present sea are found on the slopes of the 'Araba, about 1,400 ft. above the present surface of the Dead Sea. Dr. Blanckenhorn distinguishes three rainy periods and three dry periods in the formation of the Dead Sea, which have left their traces in the deposits at different elevations around the edge of the sea. Through successive geological disturbances the basin gradually sank to its present depth. During the sixth period (the third dry period) the sea came to its present condition. This took place at the beginning of the alluvial period, as is evident from the disintegration of the diluvial material in the southern part of the old sea-bed, which came about when the crust that formed the bottom of the valley gave way under the force of earthquakes. In this way, it is thought, the shallow southern part of the sea was formed, while at the same time there was cut, in the Jordan cleft, the present river-channel with its surrounding territory, called ez-Zōr by the Arabs (see above). In this later period of the history of the Dead Sea Dr. Blanckenhorn places the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah. That these lay, not at the N., but at the S. end of the sea is certain, since Zoar (Gn 19 20 ff.) was near Sodom, and was situated to the SE. of the Dead Sea (cf. Jos. BJ, IV, 8 4; Onom. ed. De Lagarde, 261, 139; Mukaddasi, in ZDPV, 1884, VII, 171; Fulcherius, in Bongars, Gesta Dei, I, 405), so that the old legend agrees with the conclusion of geology to this extent, that both indicate that the S. end of the sea was the scene of violent physical disturbances which might have deeply impressed themselves on the memory of early generations. The petrified wife of Lot, the 'pillar of salt' of Gn 19 26, Wis 10 6 f., belongs to the formations which are continually making and disappearing in the neighborhood of Jebel Usdum ('Mt. Sodom'), the salt mountain at the SW. corner of the sea, 590 ft. above the surface. From the mass of the mountain sections break off, in form-like prisms, which, after being worn away, become isolated pillars of salt, and easily take on the appearance of human beings, especially that of women. Similar rock pillars, tho existent for a much longer time, are to be found in the dolomite and sandstone formations near the Dead Sea. One sandstone rock on the E. shore S. of the mouth of the Wādī el-Mōjib is to-day called by the Arabs Bint Shēkh Lūt ('daughter of Sheikh Lot'). Cf. M. Blanckenhorn, Entstehung und Geschichte des Toten Meeres (1896), and Naturwissenschaftliche Studien am Toten Meer und im Jordantal (1912), p. 114 ff.

13. The E. Jordan Land. The E. Jordan plateau, which extends to the border of the desert (§ 4, above), is divided, in its W. part, into four main regions. (a) The district N. of the Yarmūk. This extends much farther E. than the other divisions of the E. Jordan land, namely, from 18 to 30 m. E. of 36° E. long., which (§ 3, above) has been accepted as the E. boundary of Palestine. It has never received an all-inclusive name, because its individual districts show too distinctive characteristics and have never been firmly united politically.

Above the upper course of the Jordan and the Sea of Gennesaret rises the plateau of Jōlān, which has received its name from the city called in the O T Golan (Jos 20 8, 21 27). In the N. the foot of Hermon gives a fixed boundary, but there is none to the NE. and E. The valleys are broad and shallow; the watersheds, one N. towards the Wādī el-'Ajām, and E. towards the region known as Jādēr, are low. If one should follow the line of extinct volcanoes which extend in a wide circle from the foot of Hermon to the SE., he would come to the Nahr el-'Allān, which is considered to-day as the E. boundary of the Jōlān. In fact, it indicates a significant change in the surface of the country, since E. of it the volcanic hills and great blocks of lava disappear and a broad, stoneless, level plain begins. The S. and W. boundaries of the Jōlān are fixed—the Yarmūk, the Sea of Gennesaret, and, above this, the Jordan. In the O T the names given to this country are (Beth) Maacha and Geshur (Dt 3 14; Jos 13 11-13). To-day it is customary to distinguish between the rocky and the level Jōlān. The former is the N. half, a plateau with numerous craters in the NE. part, and covered with huge blocks and fragments of lava, abounding in springs and highly valued for its excellent pasture. The craters attain a height of 4,000 ft. or more (Tell esh-Shēkha, 4,243 ft.; Tell Abu en-Nedā, 4,123 ft.), and are still partly covered with oaks or scrub-oaks. Formerly, the region was heavily wooded, and a century ago was called Tubāl el-Hīsh, 'forest heights.' The level Jōlān, the southern half, begins with an elevation of about 2,300 ft., is less rich in springs, but is covered with a dark-brown volcanic soil of great productivity, altho little used for agriculture. The ground slopes rapidly toward the Sea of Gennesaret on one side and toward the Yarmūk on the other. The territory in the angle formed by the Nahr el-'Allān, the Yarmūk, and the Sea of Gennesaret is called to-day ez-Zāwiye, 'the corner,' which corresponds to the Gr. name γωνία τῆς Βαρυπλάτης, given to it by Eusebius (Onom. 242). Cf. G. Schumacher, Der Dschōlān (1887, Eng. trans. 1888).

E. of Nahr el-'Allān there begins a stoneless plain in which there are a few small artificial mounds and volcanic hills, where are found villages or ruins of earlier habitations. The soil is reddish-brown, composed of disintegrated lava from the craters of the mountains to the E., Jebel Hawrān or Jebel ed-Drūz, mixed with volcanic ashes and sand. It is easily worked and holds the moisture of the rainfalls tenaciously—a fact of great importance for its cultivation, since the country is destitute of springs. The wheat produced here, with its translucent kernels, is a choice article of commerce. Trees are rare. In view of the fact that the plain is somewhat lower in the center than on the edges, it is called by the Bedawin en-Nukra, 'depression' (a word used of the hearth which the Bedawin dig in the center of the guest-tent). The name Hawrān is also common. From N. to S. this plain has an average elevation of 2,130 ft. It slopes to the W. and the wādys ed-Dahab and ez-Zēdi carry the water in the rainy season to the Yarmūk. To the NE. the Nukra borders on the Lejā, a remarkably rough and impassable region (see TRACHONITIS) and to the E. on the Jebel Hawrān, which in modern times, because of its occupancy by the Druses, is also called Jebel ed-Drūz, 'Mt of the Druses.' Here is the source of the lava-beds of the Nukra; for the cone- or gable-shaped heights of the mountain are all extinct volcanoes and rise to a height of 5,900 ft., while the plain at their feet begins with an elevation of but 2,624 ft. This mountain, rising gradually from the W. to E., is probably mentioned in the Bible, as J from N. to S. This ridge sends its brooks to the Jordan, partly through the Wādy Shu'eb, which leads down from Jebel Ōsha', and partly through the Wādy Šir, which unites with the Wādy Hesbān (Heshbon) and enters the Jordan plain at Tell Kefrēn, opposite Jericho. The ridge continues S. to Ma'in (Baal Meon, Nu 32 38) and then, sinking to a level of 2,853 ft., it divides between the short valleys, which run directly W. with a steep incline to the Jordan, and the longer valleys, which at first begin in broad troughs leading southward, and then unite in the Wādy Zerka Ma'in, which cuts through the plateau with a deep gorge and breaks down into the Dead Sea at the hot springs Hammām ez-Zerkā (the Callirhoë of Jos. BJ, I, 33 5). S. of Wādy Zerka Ma'in we lose trace of the ridge which we have followed in its tortuous course between the Jordan and the desert to the E., and to which the landscape owes its peculiar character. The plateau now has a different and much simpler aspect. It rises to the E. and forms a watershed on the other side of which the Arabian Desert begins—about 6 m. E. of the 36th parallel. It is cut up by a large number of small wādys that soon unite to form larger valleys and finally meet in one main valley which leads through a deep gorge to the Dead Sea. The first of these main valleys in the Belka, like the Yarmūk and Jabbok in the N., is the Wādy el-Mojib, the Arnon of the O. T. With its large northern tributary, the Wādy Heidān, or el-Wāle, it gathers the waters of the plateau W. of the desert from a region extending 50 m. along the edge of the desert.

The slope of the highlands toward the Dead Sea is extraordinarily steep along the northern half of the eastern shore. Between the rocks and the water there is not room for even a small foot-path. Since the crest of the range attains an elevation of from 2,600 to 3,300 ft., the difference between it and the surface of the sea is anywhere from 3,900 to 4,600 ft. Near the low peninsula el-Lisān the shore is wider. A road descends from the heights through a valley and leads along the beach, thence southward into the 'Araba. The character of the plateau remains the same.

Of the valleys which cut across it on their way to the salt sea, the most important are the Wādy el-Kerak, the Wādy Numēra, and the Wādy el-Hasā, or Ahsā, which in its lower course is called Wādy el-Kurāhī. The last-named is to-day the boundary between the administrative district el-Kerak and Jibāl to the S. It was probably in ancient times the boundary between Moab to the N. and Edom to the S., and so identical with the 'brook Zered' (in its upper course, Dt 2 13 f.) and with the 'brook of the willows' (in its lower course, cf. Is 15 7). Cf. Al. Musil, Arabia Petrea, I, Moab, 1907).

III. GEOLOGY.

14. The Rocks. The rocks visible to-day belong generally to the upper chalk deposits, which are usually named Cenoman, Turon, and Senon. Some marbles are found, as the soft Rudist marble (Arab. malake) and harder Nerinean marble (Arab. mizzi helu, the Santa Croce marble). The formation of this mountain region took place, therefore, in the chalk period in the Tertiary Era. Older strata are met with E. of the Dead Sea, where the original break of the Jordan cleft is visible. Here is found the so called Nubian sandstone, and under it the permocarbonic chalk and sandstone, and under this the crystalline old volcanic mountain-base, with streaks of porphyry and diorite. The flinty strata of the chalk were decomposed through the action of the water as early as the Tertiary Period, and cemented with a chalky shale. In this way the flinty breccia originated, which is frequently found as a surface formation near Jerusalem, in the Wilderness of Judah and in the 'Ajlūn, and is called nārī by the Arabs, because of its fireproof qualities. It was in the Tertiary Period also that those outpourings of basalt took place which spread themselves over the higher parts of the chalky plateau and on the many isolated table-mountains. This was the origin of the basalt strata on the plateau E. of the Dead Sea, near Dibon and at Jebel Shihān, and of similar formations in the Plain of Esdraelon, and in Galilee, N. and NE. of Tabor, and in the neighborhood of Šafed. Of later origin were the lava streams which flowed down toward the Jordan and Dead Sea in the furrow-like valleys, and have become to-day partly eroded by the water, as, for example, in the bed of the Yarmūk. Now these furrow-like valleys did not come into existence prior to the origin of the Dead Sea (cf. § 12, above); if they have become the channels for lava streams, then these must have occurred at a later date than that of the formation of the Dead Sea. Such eruptions took place in the later part of the Diluvian Era, and therefore probably after the beginning of the human epoch. It is likely that some of the extinct volcanoes of the E. Jordan land were still active in historical times, in the narrower sense. The earthquakes of which we hear in the history of the land were not the result of volcanic eruptions, but were due to structural changes—that is, to vibrations which originated in the displacement of sections of the crust of the earth near faults. Several earthquakes are mentioned in the Bible (I S 14 15; Am 1 1; cf. Zec 14 5; Mt 27 51), and the prophets frequently made use of such occurrences in their representations of the Divine manifestations (Mic 1 3 f.; Is 13 13, 24 19 f.; cf. further C. Diener, Libanon, 1886, pp. 258 ff.).

15. Minerals. The old iron-works at Rājīb in the E. Jordan land (cf. § 13, above) show that iron was taken from this region in the early days. That mining was not unknown in Pal. is also evident from Dt 8 9 and Job 28 1-11, but that these passages have that specific locality in mind can not be proved. Whether it would be profitable at the present day to mine iron in this spot has not been investigated. In recent years attention has been drawn to the mineral treasures of the Dead Sea and its neighborhood, and it has been questioned whether it might not be profitable to develop these. The water of the sea contains, besides common salt, chlorid of potash, chlorid of magnesia, magnesium bromid, and iodid of potash. Occasionally, large quantities of asphalt appear on the surface. In the immediate neighborhood of the sea there are also found rock salt, chrome oxid, and pure sulfur; at some distance away, petroleum, pure asphalt, and asphalt-lime. The 'slime pits' mentioned in Gn 14 10 are probably an indication that in early times, through the action of subterranean forces, the diluvian deposits were broken through and petroleum and asphalt springs, or wells, appeared in the neighborhood.

16. The Soil. The surface formation of limestone has long been subject to decomposition through the action of moisture and the atmosphere. The result is a red loamy soil, very rich and heavy. This is the specific virgin soil of the mountain-land. When it is adequately saturated with moisture, it gives a good yield in return for cultivation. In addition, there are a number of places (cf. §§ 9, 10, and 13, above) where the much richer volcanic soil occurs. Through the intense heat of midsummer the soil becomes very hard and cracked, and can be worked only after a thorough wetting. In the coast plain and the Jordan Valley there is considerable marl and sand. At the same time, the level districts of the coast are much more favorable for the production of humus than are the mountains. In the mountain region there is no great deposit of vegetable and animal material, which might be changed into humus through decomposition, and even if, in the autumn, some such material remains left upon the rocky surface, it is almost certain to be washed down in the winter by the heavy rains, to be deposited in part in the hollow places in the mountains, and in part in the deep valleys and low-lying plains. So it happens that in each year, with the wash from the mountain-sides, a great deal of fertile soil is brought down. In the E. Jordan land, in many places, conditions are more favorable for the formation of humus, as extensive wooded places still remain, and the surface rock is protected from erosion by the thick growth of the trees (cf. § 13 (b), above).

IV. THE CLIMATE.

Since Pal. is situated between 31° and 33° N. lat., it belongs in general to the N. subtropic zone. The year divides itself naturally into a rainless, hot half and a rainy, cold half. The climate differs greatly in the different parts of the land. Along the coast it is milder and more uniform; in the mountain-land it is more severe and changeable. In the Jordan Valley it is nearly tropical, while in the E. Jordan land the greater distance from the sea and the nearness of the desert are important factors. Since we possess satisfactory meteorological observations for Jerusalem alone, we can apply the results of these only provisionally to the whole land.

17. The Temperature. The mean annual temperature on the coast is 20.5° C. (68.9° F.), in Jerusalem only 17.1° C. (62.8° F.). The temperature rises in the mountain region from April to May very rapidly from 14.7° C. (58.5° F.) to 20.7° C. (69.3° F.). It attains its greatest height in August, at 24.5° C. (76.1° F.). It falls in November to 15.5° C. (59.9° F.) and is lowest in February at 8.8° C. (47.8° F.). The hottest days, usually in May, June, and September, reach a temperature in the shade of 37° C. (98.6° F.) to 44° C. (101.2° F.). The coldest, in January, have a temperature of -4° C. (24.8° F.). Frost and ice are seen every year in Jerusalem. The latter, however, rarely lasts the day through. The differences of temperature within a day are often considerable, greatest in the months May-October, 12.8° C. (55° F.) to 13.1° C. (55.6° F.); smallest in December-February, 7.7° C. (46° F.) to 7.4° C. (45.3° F.). The monthly mean is 22.2° C. (71.9° F.). The dangers arising from these changes are somewhat lessened by the fact that in the hottest months there is the least amount of moisture.

18. The Winds. In the summer, especially in July and August, the so called passat wind (a northerly, sometimes NW., sometimes NE. wind) blows over Pal. It is a dry wind, as it comes from a cooler into a warmer latitude and tempers the heat. In September and October, also in the spring until May, heavy E. and SE. winds are frequent, which make the heat almost unbearable because of their lack of moisture. In October and November the so called antipassat wind comes up from the S., usually bringing with it, in Pal., as well as in other Mediterranean lands, abundant rains (§ 19, below), as it comes from a warmer into a cooler region. It continues until April and May, when it retreats once more to the S. The antipassat is generally a W. or a SW. wind (cf. Lk 12 54). Of greatest importance for the W. Jordan land is the somewhat regular interchange between land and sea winds, which shows itself both in the yearly period and also in the course of each day. In the summer the hot air over the heated rocky land rises and flows into the upper regions of the atmosphere, toward the sea, while in its place comes the cooler air of the lower strata of the atmosphere from the sea to the land. In the winter, on the other hand, the sea sends to the land warm currents of air, the land sending its cooler air seaward. During each day also a similar exchange of atmospheric currents takes place. During the day warm currents flow seaward, while the cooler air of the sea comes over the land. In the night the reverse process takes place. In consequence of the meeting and interaction of these currents of air, at times violent whirlwinds arise. The E. and SE. winds are the ones most feared, since through their excessive dryness not only health is endangered and all growing things threatened (Ezk 17 10, 19 12), but also because of their violence, and in consequence of the dust and sand which they bring with them, they are actually destructive (Jer 18 17; Ezk 27 26; Job 1 19, 15 2; Heb. rūah qādhīm, 'east wind'; the word shirocco [sirocco] is derived from the Arab. esh-sharkī, 'easterly').

19. The Rainfall. The cooler rainy period of the year is that in which the antipassat wind prevails (§ 18). According to Biblical terminology, it is subdivided into three periods: (1) The 'early rain,' Heb. yōreh and mōreh, Gr. πρόριος (Ja 5 7), which, during October and November (December at the latest), makes the land moist, and thereby makes possible the beginning of the plowing. (2) The winter rain, Heb. geshem, heavy continuous rains, which soak the soil and fill the wells, cisterns, and pools. (3) The 'latter rain,' Heb. malqōsh, which falls during the latter half of March until the middle of May, fertilizes the summer crops, and causes the grain to ear. The average yearly rainfall in Jerusalem is 581.9 mm. (22.93 in.). On the other hand, at Nazareth, about 60 m. farther N. and nearer the sea, it is 611.7 mm. (24.10 in.). The rainy period is broken up by long seasons of drier weather, when, under the influence of the warm rays of the sun, everything starts to grow. The words in Song 2 11 have reference to the cessation of the winter rain. In Jerusalem the entire rainfall takes place in 52.4 days, 67.5 per cent. being in the months of December and January alone, while from May to September no rain falls at all. Consequently, after May the dry and the hot season coincide, which is so unfavorable for the growth of vegetation that in midsummer all the smaller plants wither away. Some compensation is afforded by the dew. The sea wind (cf. § 18, above) contains so much moisture that not only in the spring but also even in September and October a heavy dew falls each night (Song 5 2; Job 29 19). There is no dew, however, when the shirocco wind blows from the desert, as it dries up all the moisture in the atmosphere (I K 17 1; Hag 1 10). Thunder-storms do not occur when the passat winds blow, that is, in the summer-time. Thunder and rain during the wheat harvest, therefore, cause great terror (I S 12 17 f.). In the other months thunder-storms are not rare, frequently occurring in April and May. Snow (Heb. shelegh) is usual in winter among the mountains (II S 23 20). In the neighborhood of Jericho it is unknown. Hail (Heb. bārādh) (Job 38 22; Hag 2 17 f.) not unfrequently falls in the winter.

Whether the climate of Pal. has altered during historical times is a much-discussed question. E. Huntington (Palestine and its transformation, 1911) holds that the climate of Pal. was subject to 'pulsatory changes' within the period of known history, with a general tendency towards increasing dryness. It appears doubtful, however, whether the reasons given for this view can be maintained. The statements of the Bible, taken as a whole, harmonize with the climatic conditions that obtain at the present day. In one respect, however, a change has taken place. The forests in the W. Jordan land have about completely disappeared. In the earliest times, however, they were present here, as they are now in the E. Jordan land (cf. Jos 17 15; Jer 4 7, 29; Is 9 18; Ezk 20 46 f.; cf. also § 13, above). It is therefore probable that the periodic changes, from one season to the other, have suffered an alteration in the sense of greater contrasts than was the case formerly.

20. Water-Supply. The one large river of Pal., the Jordan, because of the depth of its river-bed (see § 12, above), is of no significance for the irrigation of the land. This, however, is not the case with the waters of its tributaries, where they come down from the mountains into the lower and more level parts of the Jordan Valley, e.g., E. of Jordan, the Yarmūk, the Nahr ez-Zerkā, and the Wādy Kefrēn (or Hesbān); and W. of the Jordan, the Nahr Jālūd, Wādy Fār'a and others. This was the case in ancient times to a much higher degree than it is at present, as is evidenced by the ruins of extensive water-works in Bethshan, in the Wādy Fār'a, and at Jericho. The practise of constructing dams and using the water for irrigation purposes is presupposed as well-known even in the O T (Is 7 3; Ezk 17 7, 31 4; Ps 1 3, 65 10, 104 10; Ec 2 6; Sir 24 42). The remaining rivers of Pal. traverse the coast-plain, the subsoil of which is filled with water and needs drainage rather than irrigation (cf. § 11, above). The highland is almost exclusively dependent upon the rainfall (cf. § 19, above), and on springs. The latter are not found distributed evenly over the mountain region. They are numerous in Upper Galilee, on the S. and SE. edges of the Plain of Esdraelon and near Shechem. The southern part of the mountain country is poor in springs of any size. Not until we reach Hebron do we find them becoming more general, whence they flow northward into the Wādy el-'Arrāb and into the Wādy ed-Dilbe to the SW. It is seldom that a spring is well walled up, e.g., the one at Nazareth, altho remains of old structures are frequently found near springs. At the present day they are also furnished with few conveniences, sometimes an old sarcophagus being used as a drinking-trough. Throughout the history of the land, both in peace and war, the springs have played an important rôle. Whoever had possession of them was master of the land. It is evident from what has been said that the water-supply from springs—that is to say, from the rainfall stored in underground recesses—is quite insufficient. Since at the present day practically no provision at all is made for collecting the rain-water on the surface, either by dams or in pools, the water for the most part runs away uncared for. Consequently, droughts and failures of the harvests are not rare in Pal., and if rain is delayed for a long period, many springs become dry. This explains why in the O T so much is said of drought and famine in the land of Israel (II S 21 1; I K 17 1 f.; Am 4 7 f.; Jer 14 2-6; Hag 1 6, 9, 2 16 f.). The praise of the land as abundantly watered (Dt 8 7) is justified, when it is contrasted with the desert; nevertheless the characterization of it as entirely dependent on the rainfall (Dt 11 10-12) is altogether more correct. The well-known expression 'a land flowing with milk and honey' (Ex 3 8, 17, 13 5; Nu 13 27, 14 8, etc.) does not signify the abundant return a land yields for its cultivation, for the honey spoken of is the honey of the wild bees (I S 14 25 f.; Dt 32 13; Mk 1 6), and milk is more closely connected with the pastoral pursuits. The expression probably refers to certain natural characteristics of the land, not to results brought about by the cultivation of the soil. It seems to have been used also of other lands (Nu 16 13), and probably was derived originally from a mythological source (cf. H. Usener in Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, 1902, Bd. 57, pp. 177-195).

V. FLORA.

The great variations in the character of the soil, in the distribution of water, and in temperature result in a correspondingly great variety in the forms and kinds of flora. In the lower Jordan Valley and by the Dead Sea, along with the subtropical flora, tropical plants are also found, as well as plants that belong to the steppe and desert. The fact that the greater part of the rainfall is limited to a few months, mainly December and January, and that in the following period, from May to December, there is little rain and the heat is intense, is not at all favorable to the flourishing growth of vegetation. The variegated verdure which covers the land in the spring months of February and March lasts but a little while. For months the landscape is a monotonous gray, especially in the southern hill region of the W. Jordan land.

Terebinth-Tree.

21. Trees and Shrubs. The small forests that exist to-day W. of the Jordan, on Carmel and Tabor, and in Upper Galilee, give no sure ground for conclusions concerning the appearance and condition of the wooded regions in earlier times in this part of Pal. (see § 19, above). The wooded regions of the E. Jordan land (see § 13, above) are evidence of what the condition once was throughout the land. The individual trees of these forests are not very high or large, nor do they stand very close together. The leaf-bearing trees show little of their stems, since the leafy branches begin generally but a little way from the ground. Where lofty trees are found, there is almost no low-growing copse or undergrowth. This is found most frequently on the edges of the forest, or in places where the trees are fewer and on the sides of ravines. The coniferous trees have a visible stem with almost no lower branches. A forest of leaf-bearing trees consists of several kinds of oak, the Prickly Evergreen, or Scarlet Oak (Quercus pseudococcifera), Arab. Sindjān, and the Valonia-oak (Quercus Aegilops), Arab. Mellūl, also Ballūt (or Afš); also of the Terebinth (Pistacia Terebinthus), Arab. Buṭm; the Mastic-tree (Pistacia Lentiscus); the Strawberry-tree (Arbutus Unedo and Arbutus andrachne), Arab. Kēkab; the Wild Locust-tree (St. John's-Bread) (Ceratonia Siliqua), Arab. Kharrūb; the Nettle- or Lotus-tree (Celtis australis [and Lotus Zisypus, Job 40 21 f.]), Arab. Mēs; the Wild Oil-tree—not the Olive, but the Oleaster—and the Oil-willow (Elæagnus angustifolia; cf. I K 6 23; Neh 8 16; Is 41 9). The coniferous trees are represented by several varieties of Fir, Arab. Šnōbar (Pinus Halepensis), especially the Carica. More rare is the Cypress (Cupressus sempervirens, or horizontalis). The leafy trees mentioned above are found frequently as shrubs, and often, as brushwood, cover wide stretches of territory, e.g., on the upper Wādy el-'Arrūb N. of Hebron, and on Mounts Tabor and Carmel. It is not improbable that this brushwood is the survival of earlier forests. There are also found the Phillyrea media, the Storax (Styrax officinalis), the Blackthorn and Whitethorn, the Judas-tree (Cercis Siliquastrum), the Rock-rose (Cistus Creticus), the Furze (Genista), the Laurel, the Myrtle, the Caper-bush (Capparis spinosa), and many kinds of Willow, Arab. Šafšāf. Along the brooks the Oleander and the Vitex Agnus-castus—the Abraham-tree—are frequently found.

Of these trees and shrubs not many find mention in the O T. The names for oaks and terebinths occur frequently, but it is difficult to distinguish closely between them. Perhaps the words 'ēlāh and 'allāh generally signify Terebinth, while 'ēlōn and 'allōn mean the Oak. By berōsh the Cypress was meant. By 'ēls shemen is meant the Oil-willow (see above). It is remarkable that we can not certainly identify the old names for the Fir or Pine. Probably the tidhār or t'ashshūr (Is 41 19), signifies these varieties. From this example it is evident how little we can learn from the O T itself of many things once existing in ancient Pal. Libhneh signifies the Poplar; 'armōn the Plane-tree (or Maple?). Of shrubs, the resinous varieties are mentioned in the O T. The Balsam, tsōrī (Gn 37 25), is either to be identified with the Pistacia Lentiscus or the Styrax Officinalis. The Tragacanth (Heb. nēkōth) was the exudate of the many Astragalus varieties, and the Ladanum (Heb. lōṭ) the fragrant resin of the Rock-rose (Cistus). In the Lebanon and Antilebanon regions there are found several varieties of Juniper, while in the E. Jordan land and in Galilee the Juniperus excelsa and Oxycedrus are found. Of Thorns the O T gives us so many names that it is impossible to identify them certainly with any of the many varieties which are now found in the land.

The Jordan depression contains few trees, but shrubs are more numerous. The low thorny Acacia is represented by two varieties, the Acacia tortilis, Arab. Es-Sant, and the Ac. Seyal, Arab. Seyāl. Thorn-shrubs, which grow as large as trees, are represented by the Zizyphus Spina-Christi, the Zizyphus Lotus, Arab. Sidr, and by the Crataegus Monogyna, Arab. Sarūr. Both bear edible fruit. Another spiny shrub is the Balanites Egyptiaca, Arab. zakḳūm, from the walnut-like fruit of which the Arabs prepare the so called Zacchæus-Oil, which they sell to travelers as Balsam of Jericho, hence the name False Balsam-tree. On the eastern side of the lower Jordan and near En-gedi, the Apple of Sodom grows—the Calotropis procera, Arab. ʿOshr—whose beautiful fruit breaks with slight pressure and, to one's surprise, is found to be entirely hollow (cf. Wis 10 6 and Jos. BJ, IV, 8 4). The Juniper-bush (I K 19 4) (Retama Rætam) attains a height of more than 10 ft. In the neighborhood of water one meets with beautiful Tamarisks, and the banks of the Jordan (ez-Zōr; cf. § 12, above) have a thick growth of Poplar (Populus Euphratica), Arab. Gharab, which grows only in a tropical climate, of Tamarisks, of the willow-like Vitex Agnus-castus, Arab. Rish-rāsh, and of many varieties of Reeds (Juncus and Arundo). The vegetation of the steppes is found not only in the Jordan Valley, but also in the Negeb (cf. § 6, above) and in the Desert of Judah (cf. § 7, above).

[The following list contains the names, Hebrew or Greek, and English, of all the trees and shrubs mentioned in the Bible. The botanical identifications are taken mainly from Tristram, The Natural History of the Bible (1880<sup>6</sup>).

Acacia, shittāh (Ex 25 5, etc., shittim AV), Acacia Seyal (in the Arab. desert); A. farnesiana, A. serissa, and A. tortilis (in Palestine).

Almond: (1) lūz (Gn 30 37, 'hazel' AV). Meaning uncertain. (2) shāgēdh. See ALMOND.

Almug and Algum, alḡūmīm (I K 10 11 f.; II Ch 2 8, 9 10 f.). Uncertain, Sandalwood?

Aloes. See ALOES.

Apple, tappūah, probably the Apricot.

Ash, ʾōren (Is 44 14, 'fir' RV), species uncertain.

Balm, tsōrī (Gn 37 25, etc.). The fragrant gum of perhaps several different trees.

Bay-tree. See BAY-TREE.

Box, ʾashshūr (Is 41 19, 60 13; Ezk 27 6). Some variety of Cedar or Cypress is probably meant, but the Box is possible.

Broom. See JUNIPER (below).

Camphire. See HENNA (below).

Cassia: (1) qiddāh. See ointments and perfumes, § 1. (2) qītsi'āh (Ps 45 8). The Arab. Cassia (Laurus cassia).

Cedar, ʾerez. See CEDAR.

Chestnut. See PLANE-TREE (below).

Cinnamon, qinnāmōn. See ointments and perfumes, § 1.

Cypress: (1) brōsh. See FIR (below). (2) tirzāh (Is 44 14, 'holm-tree' RV), meaning uncertain.

Ebony, hobhnīm (Ezk 27 10).

Elm. See OAK (below).

Fig, ʿēnāh, σῦζον, Ficus carica.

Fir: (1) brōth and brōsh. Probably the Cypress is meant. (2) ʾōren (Is 44 14, 'ash' AV), meaning uncertain.

Frankincense, lbbhōnāh. See ointments and perfumes, § 2.

Gopher-wood, gōpher (Gn 6 19). Probably some variety of Pine or Fir.

Grape. See VINES and VINTAGE.

Hazel, lūz (Gn 30 37 AV); cf. ALMOND (above).

Heath, ʾar'ār (Jer 17 6, 'tamarisk' RVmg. 48 9). See JUNIPER (below); also see HEATH.

Henna, kōpher (Song 1 14, 4 13; 'camphire' AV), Lawsonia inermis.

Holm. See CYPRESS (above).

Husks, the pods of the Locust- or Carob-tree.

Juniper: (1) rōthem (I K 19 4, etc., 'broom,' Job 30 4 RV). (2) ʾar'ār. See HEATH.

Mulberry, bākhā' (bēkhā'im, pl. II S 5 23), meaning uncertain, perhaps the Trembling Poplar or Aspen.

Myrrh, mōr (Ps 45 8; Pr 7 17; Song 1 13, etc.), Balsamodendron Myrrha. See ointments and perfumes, § 2.

Myrtle, hadhas (Neh 8 15, etc.), Myrtus communis.

Nut: (1) ʾēphōz (Song 6 11). The Walnut (Juglans regia). (2) botmīm (Gn 43 11). The Pistachio-nut.

Oak: (1) ʾallāh, ʾēlāh, ʾēlōn, and ʾallōn. Various species of Oak or Terebinth. (2) ʾēlāh (Is 6 13, 'teal-tree' AV; Hos 4 13, 'elm' AV). The word may be used generically, but the Teal or Terebinth is probably meant.

Oil-tree, ʾēz shemen (Is 41 19, etc.; cf. Neh 8 15 AV). Probably the Oleaster.

Olive, zayīth, Olea Europaea.

Olive, Wild, ἀγριέλαιος (Ro 11 17). The ungrafted Olive-tree.

Palm-Tree, tāmār, φοίνιξ, Phoenix dactylifera.

Pine, tidhār (Is 41 19, 60 13), meaning uncertain. Perhaps the Elm.

Plane-tree, ʾarmōn (Gn 30 37; Ezk 31 8, 'chestnut' AV), Platanus orientalis.

Pomegranate, rimmōn, Punica granatum.

Poplar, libhneh (Gn 30 37; Hos 4 13), Styrax officinalis (?).

Shittah-tree, shittīm. See ACACIA.

Spice, Spicery: (1) bāsām, besem, bōsem. See ointments and perfumes, § 1. (2) šammin. See ointments and perfumes, § 1. (3) nekho'sh (Gn 37 25, etc.). The gum of the Astragalus tragacantha and perhaps of other varieties of Astragalus.

Stacte, nāṭāph (Ex 30 34). The gum of the Storax. See ointments and perfumes, § 2.

Sycamine, συνάμινος (Lk 17 9), the Black Mulberry (Morus nigra).

Sycamore, shiqmāh, συκομορέα (Lk 19 4). Ficus Sycomorus.

Tamarisk, ʾēshel Gn 21 33, 'grove' AV; I S 22 9, 31 13, 'tree' AV). Tamarix gallica and T. pallasii.

Teal-tree. See OAK (above).

Terebinth (or Oak), ʾēlāh (SEE OAK, above).

Thick trees, ʾēz ʾābhōth (Lv 23 40, etc.), i.e., 'trees with thick or abundant foliage.'

Thyine, θύινος (Rev 18 13), called Citrus (Citrinus) by the Romans (used for incense on account of its odor, and also for inlaying).

Vine. See VINES and VINTAGE.

Walnut. See NUT (above).

Willow: (1) ʾarābhāh (Lv 23 40, etc.), not the Willow, but a species of White Poplar (Populus euphratica) is meant. (2) tsaphisāphāh (Ezk 17 9), generic term. E. E. N.]

22. Grasses and Smaller Plants. Meadows in the narrower sense of the word—that is, well-defined districts covered with grasses such as are found in more northern latitudes—are not met with in Pal. The nearest to anything of this kind is the district along the middle Kishon, at the western end of the Plain of Esdraelon (cf. § 9, above). Here in former times every year grass was mowed for the use of the Turkish cavalry, but, on account of the marshy soil, the hay is of little worth. Smaller patches of meadow are given over to grazing, so that the grass does not attain its full growth. Many places of this sort are found in the Plain of Sharon. Near brooks, rivers, and marshes many varieties of Cane and Reeds are found. Particularly interesting is the Papyrus antiquorum, which still grows in Pal. near the Sea of Gennesaret and Lake Hūle, and in the Plain of Sharon, while it has completely disappeared from Egypt. Large areas of land, both in the plain as well as on the mountains W. and E. of the Jordan, are clothed in the spring with the beautiful green verdure of the perennial grasses. Many different varieties mingle together and are interwoven everywhere with the variegated colors of a large number of herbs and flowers. This is the glorious spring beauty of the land, which unfortunately lasts but a little while. In June, or in July at the latest, it fades away under the rays of the sun, or because of the hot desert winds. Liliaceæ, Umbellifereæ, Leguminosæ, and Labiataæ are represented by many varieties. Hyacinths, Ranunculi, Tulips, Anemones (Anemone coronaria), and Adonis Roses (Adonis palestinae), Sword Lilies, Geraniums, and the Orchis mingle their various flowers in striking colors. The 'rose' of Song 2:1, Heb. hābatstseleth, is probably the Colchicum autumnale (according to some the Narcissus Tazetta). By the term shōshannāh we should hardly understand the White Lily (Lilium candidum), rather the Iris, so common in Pal. (cf. ZDPV, xxi, 1 sq.). The Rose of Jericho (Sir 24:18 [14]) may possibly be the real rose, which was first introduced in Pal. probably during the Persian or Greek Era, but the Syriac translation reads instead the Oleander. What is called to-day 'Rose of Jericho' is a very homely crucifer, an Anastatica hierochuntina, which, with moisture prevailing, opens, and, with dryness, closes the petals of its corona. In the Middle Ages the Asteriscus pygmaeus was probably considered the Rose of Jericho.

[The following list contains the names, Hebrew or Greek, and English, of all the smaller wild or uncultivated herbs and plants mentioned in the Bible. The botanical identifications are taken mainly from Tristram, op. cit.

Bramble. See THORNS AND THISTLES (1), below.

Brier. See THORNS AND THISTLES (8)-(10), below.

Bulrush, gōme'. See REED (2), below.

Calamus, qāneh (q. bāsem or hāṭṭōbh), Acorus calamus. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 1.

Caper-berry, 'ābhiyōnāh (Ec 12:5 RVmg.). See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3.

Cockle, bā'shāh (Job 31:40), generic term for weeds (so RVmg.).

Coriander, qadh (Ex 16:31), Coriandrum sativum.

Flag. See REED (4), (5), below.

Galbanum, ḥelbenāh (Ex 30:34). See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2.

The Mandrake.

Nettles: (1) qimmōsh (Pr 24:30 f., 'thorns'; Is 34:13; Hos 9:9). The Sting-nettle (Urtica pilulifera). (2) hārūl (Pr 24:31; Job 30:7; Zeph 2:9) The Prickly Acanthus (?). Wild Vetches (RVmg.).

Papyrus, gōme'. See REED (2), below.

Reed: (1) qāneh ('stalk'), καλαμος (I K 14:15 etc.). Generic term. (2) gōme' (Ex 2:3, 'bulrushes'; Job 8:11 and Is 35:7, 'rush'; Is 18:2, 'papyrus' RV, 'bulrush' AV). The papyrus. (3) drāh (Is 19:7, meadow[s], RV correctly). (4) āhā (Gn 41:2, 14, 'reed-grass' RV, 'meadow' AV; Job 8:11, 'flag'). The Edible Rush or the Flowering Rush. (5) gūph (Ex 2:3, etc., 'flags'; Jon 2:3, 'weeds,' i.e., Sea-weed). A generic term for marsh and sea vegetation. (6) aqmōn (Job 41:20; Is 9:14, 19:15, all 'rush'; Is 58:5, 'rush' RV, 'bulrush' AV Jn 51:32). Arundo Donax.

The Papyrus Plant. See REED (2), above.

Rose, hābatstseleth (Song 2:1; Is 35:1), meaning uncertain; perhaps the Sweet-scented Narcissus.

Rue, ῥήγανον (Lk 11:42). Generic term (Rutaceæ).

Rush. See REED (2), (4), (6).

Saltwort, mallūah (Job 30:4, 'mallows' AV). Atriplex halimus. Sodom, Vine of (Dt 32:12). Perhaps the Wild Gourd (see above) is meant.

Sweet Cane. See CALAMUS.

Tare(s), ζιζάνιον. Bearded Darnel.

Thorns and Thistles: (1) āfādāh (Jg 9:14 f., 'bramble'; Ps 58:3, 'thorn'). Rhamnus Europæum. (2) hōah (II K 14:9, etc., 'thorn,' or 'thistle'; Is 34:13, 'bramble' AV). Generic term for Thistle. (3) dardar (Gn 3:18; Hos 10:8, 'thistle') τρίβολος in Mt 7:15. Probably the Star-thistle. (4) hēdheq (Pr 15:19, 'thorns'; Mic 7:4, 'brier'), meaning uncertain; perhaps the Solanum Sanctum. (5) qōts (Gn 3:18, etc., 'thorns'), ἄκανθα in N.T. Generic term for Thorn-plants. (6) shāmīr (Is 5:4, etc., 'brier'). A generic term for Thorn-plants. (7) na'disūts (Is 7:19, 55:13, 'thorn-hedge'). The Thorn-tree or Sidra. (8) baqānīm (Jg 8:7, 15, 'briers'), meaning uncertain. (9) šillōn (Ezk 2:4, 28:24, 'briers'), meaning uncertain. (10) širpadh (Is 55:13, 'brier'), meaning uncertain. (11) šīr, 'thorn' (Ec 7:2, etc.). (12) tsūn, 'thorn' (Job 5:5; Pr 22:5).

Wormwood, la'ānāh, ἄψινθος. Generic term (Artemisia). See WORMWOOD.

23. Fruits and Garden Products. In almost all localities of Pal., whether in the mountains or on the coast-plain, one meets with gardens and groves of fruit-trees, altho there is a great difference in the varieties of plants and the general appearance between those on the coast and those on the mountains. The famous gardens of Joppa are mostly devoted to Oranges, Citrons, Bitter- and Mandarin-oranges. More rarely does one see Almonds, Peaches, Bananas, and Dates. Of the numerous varieties of Agrumi which are met with to-day, even in the gardens of the mountain-land, none are mentioned in the Bible. It is only in the late Jewish tradition that the expression 'the fruit of goodly trees' (Lv 23 40) is applied to the citron (Citrus medica, Heb. 'etrōgh, Arab. trunj). The date attains its fullest maturity and beauty in the region of Gaza. It ripens indeed near Joppa and Haifā, but the quality is somewhat inferior. Josephus extols the dates of Jericho (BJ, IV, 8 2 f.). At present only a few comparatively young trees are found there, which were planted about forty years ago by the Russians in the garden of their hospice. On the other hand, palms are frequently met with along the E. bank of the Dead Sea at the mouths of streams. On the mountains the Palm is only for ornamental purposes, as its fruit does not ripen, altho Josephus speaks of palms as common in the Plain of Gennesaret (BJ, III, 10 8). Of late years the interior of the country E. of Haifā on the road to Nazareth has been largely planted with Mulberry-trees (Morus alba) for the purposes of silk culture. The blood-red juice of the fruit of the Morus nigra is mentioned in I Mac 6 34; this tree is now represented by individual specimens throughout the land. The Mulberry Fig—the Sycamore—was common in ancient Israel, not only in the Shephelah (I K 10 27), but also among the mountains (Am 7 14; Is 9 10). To-day it is more rare, tho not entirely absent in the mountain region. Its wood rather than its fruit is prized, as is the case also with the St. John's-tree (Lk 15 16).

In the mountains the Olive-tree is the prevailing tree (e.g., the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem). Exceptionally extensive groves are found near Hebron, Bet Jālā and Bethlehem, in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, near 'Ain Kārīm and Bēl Hanīna, near Jifnā and Sinjil, near Nābulus, and in the region of Haifā. The most beautiful olive-trees to be seen are in the E. Jordan land near 'Ajlūn. In Pal. the cultivation of this tree is very remunerative, and Syria is probably the home of the olive. The Fig-tree is also found more frequently in the mountains than in the plains. It is not usually found in great numbers in any one place, tho this is the case between Bethel and Nābulus, also near Bethlehem and Siloah. Usually single trees of this variety are found in the garden or near the house (cf. I K 4 25 [5 5]). It is remarkable for its vitality. With these trees it is usual also to find Pomegranates (Heb. rimmōn, Arab. rummān), the fruit of which attains in Syria an extraordinary size. Near Kefr Kennā, N.E. of Nazareth, there is a beautiful orchard consisting entirely of pomegranate-trees. The Walnut-tree is found particularly near Hebron and Nābulus, the Quince near Hebron, Jerusalem, and Nazareth. The Apricot is not common, and our more common fruits, Apples, Pears, Cherries, and Plums, are also rare, tho the pear is found near Arṭās and Mount Carmel.

A characteristic of the borders of the gardens, especially in the plains, is the Cactus Fig (Cactus opuntia), a native of America. This plant forms an impenetrable hedge with its broad, prickly leaves and branches, and from July to September it bears a quantity of sweet and nourishing fruit. Vegetables can be grown in gardens only in case they are constantly watered during the hot summer. This has been the custom in Pal. from earliest times (cf. § 20, above) not only with gardens, but also with fields. The most common garden vegetables are the following: Watermelons (Arab. baṭṭikh; cf. Nu 11 5), which are profitably cultivated in the German colony at Sorona and to the N. at El-Mukhālīd; Cucumbers, both the larger and smaller varieties, are grown in great quantities. The smaller ones (Arab. khiyār), eaten raw, are great favorites with the Arabs. Paradise Apples (Arab. bandōra), Mallows (Arab. bāmiye, Hibiscus esculentus), the Eggplant (Melongena, Arab. bādinjān), Onions, and Garlic are very common. Cauliflower, Lettuce, and Radishes do well. More rare are Turnips (Arab. lift), Carrots (jezar), Rutabagas (shamander), Kohlrabi, and Spinach. The green Wild Asparagus receives only slight attention. Anise, Mustard, Flax, Hemp, Sumach (Rhus Coriaria), and Cotton, as well as various grains, which belong properly to the subject of agriculture, need not be discussed here. Cf. F. E. Dinsmore and G. Dalman, Die Pflanzen Palästinas (1912).

[The following list contains the names, Hebrew or Greek, and English, of all the cultivated plants, including grains mentioned in the Bible. The botanical identifications are taken mainly from Tristram, op. cit. Cf. also the two preceding §§.]

Anise, ἄνησον (Mt 23 23). The Dill or Anethum graveolens.
Barley, se'orim. The most common grain in Palestine.
Beans, pōl. Vicia Faba.
Bitter Herbs, m'rōrim. See BITTER HERBS.
Corn. The Eng. rendering of a number of words meaning 'grain,' i.e., wheat, rye, or barley.
Cucumber: (1) qishshū'āh (Nu 11 5). Cucumis Chate and C. sativus. (2) miqshāh (Is 1 8, 'garden of cucumbers').

Flax, pesheth (pl. pishim). See LINEN.
Garlic, shūm (Nu 11 5). Allium sativum.
Gourd, qāqayōn (Jon 4 2; cf. RVmg.). Ricinus communis, or perhaps the Bottle-gourd (Cucurbita pepo).
Herb(s). See HERB.
Herbs, Green, yereq. See HERB.
Leeks, hālsir (Nu 11 5). Allium porrum.
Lentil, shāshāh (Gn 25 34, etc.). Ervum lens.
Melon(s), shbatṭikhim (Nu 11 5). The Watermelon probably; perhaps also the Flesh or Musk Melon.
Millet, dōhan (Ezk 4 9). Panicum miliaceum and the Sorghum vulgare.
Mint, hēdōsqmōn (Mt 23 23). Mentha sylvestris.
Mustard, siyapī (Mt 13 21). Sinapis nigra.
Onion, bātsāl (Nu 11 5). Allium Cepa.
Pannag, pannag (Ezk 27 17), meaning uncertain. See PANNAG.
Rye, hūqemeth. See SPILT (below).
Saffron, karḥōm (Song 4 14). Crocus sativus.
Spelt, kuqemeth (Ex 9 62; Is 28 26, 'rie' AV; Ezk 4 9, 'fitches' AV). Triticum Spelta.
Spikenard. See NARD.
Wheat, hittāh several species, Triticum compositum, T. Spelta, T. hybernum. E. E. N.]

VI. FAUNA.

In ancient Israel the animal world was more closely observed than the plant world. Evidence of this is found in the attempts to classify the animals, which was done more carefully than was the case with the subdivision of the plant world, as found in Gn 1 11 f. and Ps 104 14-17. In Gn 1 20-25 we have the classification into aquatic animals, birds, and land animals. The last are subdivided into wild beasts, domestic animals, and creeping creatures. Similar groups are found in Dt 4 17 f.; Ps 104 11-26; Ac 11 6, 10 12. In Gn ch. 2, the wild beasts and birds are viewed as the creatures standing in most intimate relations with man. In Gn 1 22 the aquatic animals and birds are distinguished especially as receiving the Divine blessing, while in Gn 1 24 ff. the land animals are represented as created on the same day with man. From the food law (Lv ch. 11; Dt ch. 14), as well as from the many exhortations to have compassion upon the animals, it may be inferred that the animal world was the object of close observation. An important difference between the fauna of modern Pal. and that of Biblical times is found in the fact that to-day wild animals are very much more rare than in early times, as might be inferred from passages like II K 17 25. The lion, the hart, and the larger varieties of antelopes have completely disappeared. Bears are found only in the mountain-fastnesses of Hermon and Lebanon. Panthers (leopards) are seen but seldom near the Dead Sea and in the E. Jordan land, while their smaller cousins, the Felis jubata (Ger. 'Gepard,' the 'hunting leopard' of India) are found, e.g., on Mt. Carmel. The wild animals have been destroyed, partly through hunting, partly because, with the destruction of the forests (§ 21, above), they have lost their hiding-places. Lions have not been found in Pal. since the crusades.

24. Mammals. Recent investigations have made it certain that in the little land of Pal. several zoological regions overlap. N. Pal., together with Syria, belongs in reality to the Palearctic region, while S. Pal., especially the district around the Dead Sea, must be counted nearly altogether with the so called Ethiopic region, to which also the Peninsula of Sinai, Egypt, and Nubia show affinity. In addition, there are some varieties of mammals in Pal. which belong to Arabia, Mesopotamia, or India. The boundary between the representatives of the two above-named regions is to be drawn, generally speaking, from the southern foot of Carmel across to the southern end of the Sea of Gennesaret. There is hardly another land on the earth of so small a compass as Pal. in which the Mammalia are so varied. The following mammals belong to the Palearctic region: The Roe, Fallow Deer, Field-mouse (Arvicola), Dwarf Hamster, Dormouse, Squirrel, Zizel (Spermophilus), Mole, Hare (Lepus syriacus), Polecat, Stoat, Stonemarten, Fox (Vulpes syriacus), Wildcat (Felis chaus), Badger, and Bear. The Ethiopic fauna are represented by the Porcupine (Acomys), Jerboa, Fat Sand-rat (Psammomys obesus), Black-tailed Garden Sleeper (Eliomys melanurus), Hare (Lepus Judaea, and also sinaiticus and egypticus), Hedgehog, Rock-badger (as in RVmg. Coney, EV) Hyrax syriacus, Heb. shāphān), Wild Goat (Capra bedou, Heb. 'aqqō or yā'el), Gazelle (Gazella dorcas and arabica), Wildcat (Felis bubastis), the Desert Cat (Felis maniculata), Lynx (Felis cara- cal), Panther (Felis pardus), Nile Fox, Ichneumon, Genet (Genetta vulgaris), and Wild Boar. Some of the mammals of Pal. must be reckoned perhaps as migrants from the eastern regions, namely, from India and Mesopotamia. Among these Nehring counts one of the varieties of the Field-mouse (Nesokia); the Wolf, since it is smaller than the European variety and is more like the slim wolf of W. India; the Hyena and the Jackal, of which one variety with small ears seems related to the Indian, while the other with larger ears is like the Egyptian Jackal. Of Bats there are in Pal. several varieties.

For the breeding of animals the conditions in Pal. vary greatly. The reason is mainly that in the rainless period—about one-half of each year—there is a lack of green herbage throughout most of the country. On this account the breeder must be careful to arrange it so that the young are born in the spring, when throughout the land there is an abundance of green fodder. Since the climatic conditions were essentially the same in early times as they are now (cf. §§ 19-20, above), the care of animals then, as to-day was regulated by these conditions. For a correct understanding of many of the cultus regulations, e.g., in reference to the offering of firstlings, it is of great importance to have clearly in mind this limitation, which the nature of the land lays upon the breeding of animals. These conditions affect especially the breeding of those animals such as cattle, sheep, and goats whose well-being depends upon the consumption of green fodder. Horses, mules, asses, and camels can more easily dispense with green food, and their care is consequently less difficult and attended with more success. The horse belongs either to the native breed or to that of Erzerum in Asia Minor. Full-blooded horses are not raised in Pal. Mules are used generally as the beasts of burden. The Ass, especially in the poorer parts of the country, is everywhere used and is indispensable for agricultural purposes. The Camel, sometimes of the Arabian variety, sometimes that of Asia Minor, is superior to the mule in its ability to carry heavy burdens, and is highly esteemed because of its very moderate wants, in spite of its ugly form and its surly disposition. Conditions for the breeding of neatcattle in Pal. are of the poorest. Buffaloes, whose milk and butter are noted, are found only in the well-watered regions, e.g., in the Jordan Valley. The native breed of cattle is small and unattractive in appearance. In the spring-time the quantity of milk produced is fairly large, but it is for the most part given to the calves, which are left with the cows a long time, frequently as long as eight months. After August the cows give but little milk. The breed found in the Lebanon region is better, and often used for cross-breeding with the native variety. The Mohammedans keep cattle for agricultural work, as well as for the sake of the milk. Christians and Jews reckon also on the sale of the flesh. The breeding of sheep and goats stands on a much higher plane in Pal. than does that of cattle, and results in much larger production. The Sheep found generally in S. Pal. are those of the large fat-tailed variety. In the northern districts there are other breeds which are somewhat smaller and more like the merino. The Fat-tailed Sheep is a good milk-producer, but its wool is not of great value. The Goats are generally black and remarkable for their long ears. There is also a variety with short ears. Their skin is of the greatest importance for the natives, especially near Hebron, since they make from it the vessels in which water, milk, wine, and oil are kept. Sheep and goats furnish the natives their supply of flesh, besides milk and cheese, also clothing—so far as foreign manufacture is not preferred—and shoes. These animals always find some pasturage, even in the dry months, and therefore give milk for a longer time and in proportionately larger quantities than do the cows. In the spring-time the surplus quantity of milk is converted by the peasants into melted butter and cheese, which serve as nourishment during the dry months of the year.

Antelope, ṣ'ō and ṣ'ō (Dt 14 5, 'wild ox' AV; Is 51 20, 'wild bull' AV). Possibly the Oryx.

Ape, qōph. See APE.

Ferret, ānāgāh. See GECKO, § 26, (II) below.

Fox, shū'al (Jg 15 4, etc.). Means both Fox and Jackal.

Gazelle, ṣ'bhī (Dt 12 16, 22, 14 5, 15 22; II S 2 18; I K 4 23, 'roe,' 'roebuck' AV). Gazella dorcas.

Goat (and kid): (1) zē (Gn 27 9, etc.). Generic term. (2) ā'ūdāh (Nu 7 17, etc.). (3) sā'ir (Lv 4 24, etc.). (4) layish, 'he-goat' (Gn 30 35, etc.). (5) Kid, g'dhī (Gn 27 9, etc.).

Goat, Wild: (1) yā'al (I S 24 2, etc.). The Ibex, Capra bedu. (2) aqgō (Dt 14 5). Species unknown.

Greyhound, zazīr math'nayim (Pr 30 31). Meaning uncertain.

Hare, arneheth (Lv 11 5; Dt 14 7). Lepus syriacus and L. Judae.

Hart, ayyāl (Dt 12 15, etc.). Generic term for Deer (?).

Heifer. See CATTLE (6), above.

Herd. See CATTLE (3), above.

Hind, ayyālāh, ayyeleth. Fem. of Hart (see above).

Horse (q.v.): (1) šūq (Gn 47 17, etc.). Generally a chariot-horse. (2) pārāsh (Gn 50 9, etc.). Usually for a riding-horse.

(3) rekhes. A high-bred and swift horse. See SWIFT STEEDS (below). (4) rammah. A mare (?). See DROMEDARY (above).

Hyena. The 'Valley of Zeboim' (I S 13 18) means probably the 'valley of hyenas.' See also SPECKLED BIRD OF PREY (§ 25, below).

Jackal: (1) tan (pl. tannīm) (Job 30 29, etc.). See also DRAGON. (2) shū'al, means also Fox. (3) ayyīm (Is 13 22, 34 14; Jn 50 39), 'wild beasts' AV, 'wolves' RV. See WOLF (below).

Kid. See GOAT (above).

Lamb. See SHEEP (below) and LAMB.

Leopard, nāmēr (Song 4 8, etc.), πάρδαλις (Rev 13 2). Felis leopardus and F. jubata. Also the Panther.

Lion: (1) ā'ir, aryeh (Gn 49 9, etc.). Generic. (2) k'phār (Ps 35 17, etc.). Young Lion. (3) lābhī (Dt 33 20, etc.). Generic. (4) layish (Pr 30 30). Generic. (5) λέων (Ps 5 4, etc.). Generic.

Mole: (1) hāpharpārāh (Is 2 20). Meaning uncertain. (2) tinshemeth. See CHAMELEON (§ 26, below).

Mouse, akhbār (Lv 11 29, etc.). Generic term.

Mule: (1) peredh, pidāh. See MULE. (2) rekhes. See DROMEDARY and HORSE (above), and SWIFT STEEDS (below).

Ox. See CATTLE (3), (7), above.

Ox, Wild. See ANTELOPE (above).

Porcupine, qippōdh (Is 14 23, 34 11; Zeph 2 14, 'bittern' AV). The meaning of the term is not certain. Perhaps Hedgehog.

Pygarg, dishōn (Dt 14 5). Specific species uncertain.

Ram. See SHEEP (below).

Roe, Roebuck: (1) ṣ'bhī. See GAZELLE (above). (2) yahmūr (Dt 14 5; I K 4 23, 'fallow deer' AV). Alcephalus bubalis. (3) yā'dāh. See DOE (above).

Satyr, the rendering of sā'ir in Is 13 21, 34 14. See GOAT (above), and SATYR.

Seal. See SEALSKIN.

Sheep (also Ewe, Goat, Lamb): (1) seh, individual term. (Goats, etc., small). (2) tsō'n, collective term, small cattle. (3) rāhēl, 'ewe.' (q.v.) (4) kebhes. (5) kesebh. 'Lamb,' general terms. (q.v.) (6) kar, a lamb in the pasture or 'stall.' (7) ṭaleh (I S 7 9; Is 65 25), a 'sucking' lamb. (8) ayil, 'ram.' (9) tsāphīr, 'ram.'

Swift Steeds, rekhes (I K 4 28, 'dromedary' AV; Est 8 10, 'mule' AV). Swift horses.

Swine, hāzīr (Lv 11 7, etc.), χοίρος (Mt 7 6, etc.). The Wild Boar.

Unicorn, re'em. See WILD OX (below).

Weasel, hōledh (Lv 11 29). Some think the Blind Mole (Spalax typhlus) is meant.

Whales, tannīn (Gn 1 21, 'sea-monster' RV). See MONSTER.

Wild Goat. See GOAT (above).

Wild Ox, re'em (Nu 23 22; Dt 33 17, etc.; 'unicorn' AV). Bos primigenius, now extinct. The German Auerochs. It was still extant in Assyrian times and is represented on the inscriptions as once inhabiting the Mediterranean coast region. (Cf. Driver on Dt 33 17 in Int. Crit. Com.)

Wolf, zē'ebh (Gn 29 27, etc.), λύκος (Mt 7 15, etc.). Canis lupus. See JACKAL (above). E. E. N.]

25. Birds. The birds of Pal., as the mammals, represent several zoological regions, altho the exact classification of the varieties is attended with greater difficulties, and the results are more uncertain. The Palestinian birds mentioned in the Bible, apart from some names of doubtful significance, are found to be the same as those of to-day. Birds of prey are: the Eagle, Vulture, Falcon, Sparrow-hawk, Kite, and Owl. The Raven family is well represented. Of marsh- and water-fowl there are the Heron, White and Black Stork, the Pelican, Cormorant, Flamingo, Wild Goose, Swan, Marsh-hen, Snipe, Sandpiper, Crane, Bustard, Sea-gull, Storm-Petrel and Grebe.

On the E. borders of the district el-Belkā there appears once in a while an Ostrich from the Arabian Desert. Of the hen family there are, besides the Domestic Fowl, the Partridge (the Caccabis chukar, which ranges from Asia Minor to India, the Ammoperdix heyti, and the Frankolinus vulgaris), the Quail, and the Sandgrouse. Wild Pigeons are found in great numbers; altho most of these visit the land only in course of their migration, yet many remain through the winter. In regard to the Turtledove whose appearance to-day, just as in the times of Song 2 12, is a sign of the beginning of the warmer period of the year, it may be remarked that, besides the European variety (Turtur communis), which is referred to in Song 2 12, there are two other varieties, the Ethiopic (T. senegalensis), and the Collared Turtle-dove (T. risorius), which is a native of India. Night-hawks, Woodpeckers (Picus syriacus), Kingfishers, Hoopoes, and Cuckoos are not wanting, nor are varieties of Starlings, including the Pastor roseus and the Amydrus tristrami. Besides the common varieties of Lark there are also found the Alauda isabellina near the Dead Sea, and the Desert Lark, the Ammomanes deserti, and the Amm. fraterculus. Some varieties of Swallow remain in the land through the winter, particularly the Oriental Swallow (Hirundo savignii), also the Cotyle rupestris and obsoleta, and of Swifts the variety Cypselus affinis, while other varieties appear in the period from February to April, the Cypselus apus, probably the qūs of Jer 8 7, and the Common Swallow (Hirundo rustica). Garden warblers are present in great numbers, also the Finch and our House-sparrow, whose beautiful variety, Passer moabiticus, deserves special mention. With these may be mentioned the Titmouse, the Blue Woodpecker, the Wren, the Wagtail, the Oriole, the Butcher-bird, and the Palestinian Nightingale, or Bulbul. The common Nightingale also visits Pal. and nests in April near the Jordan. The beautiful tropical bird Cinnyris osea, which is found on the Dead Sea, is also a representative of the fauna of India and Nubia. Of Thrushes there are several native varieties, and others which visit the land only in course of their migration. Cf. G. Dalman, 'Arabische Vogelnamen von Palästina und Syria' in ZDPN 1913, 165-179, with the recent literature.

The breeding of birds receives little attention For water-fowls such as Geese and Ducks there is a lack of the necessary fresh water. Hens are common, but the variety is small. Turkeys are found among the Circassians and Christians. The breeding of Doves is carried on only in a moderate way.

[The following list contains the names, Hebrew or Greek, and English, of all the birds mentioned in the Bible. The identifications are taken mainly from Tristram, op. cit.

Bird of Prey, 'ayit (Jer 12 9). Generic term.
Birds, Fowl(s), 'oph, tsippor. Generic terms.
Bittern, qippodh (Is 34 11; Zeph 2 13 f. AV). See PORCUPINE, § 24 (above). But Bittern is probably right.
Cock, 'alektoφ (Mt 26 34, etc.).
Cormorant: (1) shalakh (Lv 11 17; Dt 14 17). Exact meaning uncertain. (2) qd'ath (Is 34 11; Zeph 2 14 AV). See PELICAN (below).
Crane: (1) 'agur (Jer 8 7, 'swallow' AV). Grus cinerea. (2) qū. See SWALLOW (below).
Cuckoo, shahaph (Lv 11 16; Dt 14 15, 'sea-mew' RV). Meaning uncertain.
Dove, yonah, πεποτα (Gn 8 8; Mt 3 16, etc.). Generic term, including both wild and domesticated pigeons. See TURTLE-DOVE (below).
Eagle, nesher. Also means Vulture, probably the Griffin-Vulture. See EAGLE.
Falcon, 'ayyah (Lv 11 14; Dt 14 13; Job 28 7; 'kite' AV). Generic term, probably meaning Kite.

Gier-eagle: (1) pereq (Lv 11 13; Dt 14 12; 'ossifrage' AV). Uncertain; the Sea-eagle, according to some. (2) raham (Lv 11 13, 'vulture' RV). The Egyptian Vulture.
Glede, ra'ah (Dt 14 13). Meaning uncertain.
Hawk, nōis (Lv 11 13, etc.). Generic term or possibly the Falcon.
Hen, 'pviφ (Mt 23 37; Lk 13 34). A general term for 'bird,' 'fowl,' etc.
Heron, 'anaphah (Lv 11 19; Dt 14 18). Generic term.
Hoopoe, dukhiphath (Lv 11 19; Dt 14 18, 'lapwing' AV).
Kite: (1) dayyah (Dt 14 13; Is 34 15, 'vulture' AV). Generic term. (2) da'ah, a variant form of (1) (Lv 11 14 AV). (3) 'ayyah (Lv 11 14; Dt 14 13 AV). See FALCON.
Lapwing, dukhiphath. See HOOPOE (above).
Night-hawk, tahmaq (Lv 11 16; Dt 14 16). Perhaps a variety of Owl.
Osprey, 'ozniyyah (Lv 11 13; Dt 14 12). Meaning uncertain.
Ossifrage, pereq (Lv 11 13; Dt 14 12, 'gier-eagle' RV). Lammergeier or Bearded Vulture (Gypaetus barbatus). The largest of the Vultures.
Ostrich: (1) ya'anah (Lv 11 16, etc., 'owl' AV). (2) y'ēn (La 4 9). (3) ranan (rnanim, pl.) (Job 39 13, 'peacocks' AV).
Owl, ya'andh. See OSTRICH (above).
Owl, Great: (1) yanshoph, yanshuph (Lv 11 17; Dt 14 16; Is 34 11). Probably the Bubo ascalaphus. (2) qippoz (Is 34 15). See DART-SNAKE (§ 26, below).
Owl, Horned, tinshemeth (Lv 11 18; Dt 14 16, 'swan' AV). Meaning uncertain.
Owl, Little, kōq (Lv 11 16, etc.). Generic term.
Owl, Screech-. See NIGHT MONSTER.
Partridge, qorē (I S 26 20; Jer 17 11). The Greek Partridge (Caccabis saxatilis).
Peacock(s): (1) tukkiyyim (pl.) (I K 10 22). An Indian (Malabar) word. See PEACOCKS. (2) ranan. See OSTRICH (above).
Pelican, qd'ath (Lv 11 18; Dt 14 17; in Is 34 11; Zeph 2 14, 'cormorant' AV). Pelecanus onocrotalus and P. crispus.
Pigeon. See DOVE (above).
Quail, slaw (Ex 16 13; Nu 11 31 f.). Coturnix vulgaris.
Raven, 'orebh. Generic term. Eight species are found in Palestine.
Screech-owl. See NIGHT MONSTER.
Sea-mew, shahaph (Lv 11 16; Dt 14 15, 'cuckoo' AV).
Sparrow, tsippor (Ps 84 3, 102 7). Birds in general, and especially of small birds (Swallow, Lark, etc.).
Speckled Bird of Prey, tsabhu. Meaning uncertain. See also HYENA, § 24 (above).
Stork, hāqidhah (Lv 11 18, etc.). Ciconia alba.
Swallow: (1) dror (Ps 84 3, etc.). Generic term. (2) qū and qūs (Jer 8 7, 'crane' AV). The Swift (Cypselus). (3) 'agur. See CRANE (above).
Swan, tinshemeth (Lv 11 18; Dt 14 16, 'horned owl' RV). Meaning uncertain.
Turtle-dove, tur, τρυών (Gn 15 9; Song 2 12 turtle AV, etc.; Lk 2 24). Turtur auritus.
Vulture: (1) raham (Lv 11 13, 'gier-eagle' AV). Vultur percnopterus. (2) dayyah. See KITE (above).

26. Fishes, Reptiles, and Insects. The waters in and near the Jordan Valley, with the exception of the Dead Sea, abound in fish. This is especially true of the Sea of Gennesaret. Josephus' statement that the Nile fish Coracinus was found in the spring at Capernaum (BJ, III, 10 8) finds support in the fact that to-day the Sea of Gennesaret, and also the neighboring warm springs and Lake Hule, contain fish which are also found in the Nile, partly in the upper Nile (Clarias macracanthus, of the variety silurus, Chromis niloticus and C. tiberiadis, etc.). The streams and brooks emptying into the Mediterranean are less abundant in fish. Tristram in his Fauna and Flora of Palestine (1884) counts forty-three varieties of fish for southern and middle Syria, among which are the Carp, Tench, Barb, Shote or Sheat-fish, and Blenny. Eels are found in the Kishon but apparently not in the Jordan region. Of Serpents and Lizards there are in Pal. a very large number, since the extensive uninhabited stretches of country and numberless clefts and holes in the rocks offer them welcome places of refuge. Tristram counts thirty-three varieties of serpents, among which are many poisonous ones, such as the Egyptian Naja haje (Cobra), the Vipera euphratica, the Daboia xanthina, the Echis arenicola (also found in Egypt), and the Cerastes Hasselquistii. Among the lizards, of which, according to Tristram, there are forty-four species, mention may be made of the African Crocodile, which is found even to-day in the marshes of the Nahr ez-Zerkā, S. of Carmel, which as early as Pliny (V, 17) was called the Crocodile river. Near the Dead Sea there is also the Land-Crocodile, which Herodotus (IV, 192) mentions in Libya (Arab. Waran, or Waral), two species, Psammosaurus scincus and Monitor niloticus. The most Common Lizard is the Hirḡaun of the Arabs, the Horned Lizard (Stellio vulgaris), of which there are several species. Turtles are found everywhere on land and in the water. Insects are extraordinarily numerous, as is the case in all warm regions. It is sufficient here to mention Spiders, Scorpions, Wasps, Wild Bees, Flies, Gnats, Fleas, and Locusts. Of the sixty species many are harmless and hence little noticed. Greatly feared to-day, as in Bible times, is the migratory Locust (Edipoda migratoria), which comes out from the interior of Arabia, and because of its voracity inflicts fearful destruction. The peasants of Pal. do not eat the locust, as the Bedawin do in case of hunger, and John the Baptist did out of voluntary asceticism (Mk 1 6). Pal. is well suited to the culture of Bees. For hives, the peasants make use of jars of baked or sun-dried brick, about 18 in. long and 6-9 in. in diameter. The German colonists cultivate bees after European methods. Cf. Fr. Bodenheimer, Die Tierwelt Pal. (1920). Concerning Mollusks, cf. Tristram, The Fauna and Flora of Palestine (Survey of Western Palestine, 1884).

VII. HISTORICAL GEOGRAPHY.

27. Earlier Civilization of Canaan. While it is possible to-day to trace the history of civilization in Egypt and Babylonia—at least in general outline—as far back as the fourth millennium B.C., as to the state of affairs in Syria during the third and fourth millenniums we are almost entirely ignorant. To only a small extent has the darkness been illuminated through the investigations by geologists and archeologists during the past few decades. We know now that Pal., as well as all Syria, like other parts of the earth, had its Stone Age, on which followed a Bronze Age and an Iron Age. The monuments of the Stone Age consist of numerous articles made of flint, bone implements, polished axes and chisels, rude pottery shaped without the use of the wheel, caves which served both as dwelling-places and as places of burial, the first attempts at stone structures, pillars, dolmens and cairns (megolithic monuments), and cup-shaped depressions hollowed out of the rock. To what peoples these belonged it is impossible to say. From certain indications it would seem that they should not be counted as Semites. Whether the O T statements regarding the legendary Rephaim and Anakim (Dt 2 11) have reference to these people is uncertain. Proofs of a Bronze Age in Pal. have been brought to light chiefly through the excavations of the past thirty years. Implements have been found made of bronze, copper, bone, and stone, red pottery with the surface scraped with a comb and in some cases painted, and pillars set up in rows. The cultivation of the olive and the vine was known. Human sacrifices were common. Plain indications of the influence of the Egyptian, Babylonian, and Aegean civilizations are evident. The population of the land during this period—which can be fixed as from 2500 to 1300 B.C.—was Semitic; there were, however, certain Aryan peoples, coming in from the N. (Hittites, Mitanni), which invaded Pal. at times. The use of iron was known at the time of the incoming of the Philistines and of the Israelitic tribes, yet at the beginning of this period the use of bronze and flint was more common. The Iron Age is synchronous with the beginning of the historical period of the land. Our knowledge of the events of the Bronze Age is limited mainly to the notices that we find in the so called Amarna letters, which are related to the Egyptian control of Canaan.

28. The Period of the Egyptian Supremacy. The Egyptian supremacy which Thothmes III established about 1500 B.C. seems to have been on the wane about 1400, the time of the Amarna letters. The Hittites had pressed forward from the northern limits of Syria toward the S. and were ruling over a mighty kingdom, which extended from the Euphrates to the middle Orontes. In central and southern Syria there were only small kingdoms and federations of cities. The 'kings' ruled over their own city, and the territory immediately adjacent (cf. Jg 1 5-7; Jos 12 7-24). According to Jos 9 17, 10 2, Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kiriath-jearim were not under kings, but formed a sort of confederation. Without doubt, the natural characteristics of the land conditioned the historical circumstances of the inhabitants. The small stretch of territory between the desert and the sea was unfavorable to the development of a united national life, because of the great variation in the character of the soil (cf. § 4 f., above), because of the numerous mountains, small plains, and deep-cut watercourses. Larger kingdoms had only a very limited duration. The inhabitants always found it convenient to break up again into smaller groups.

The O T calls the pre-Israelitic inhabitants of the mountains partly Canaanites (so J), partly Amorites (so E). Since, according to the Amarna letters, the Amorites were still located in the Lebanon region, it is fair to infer that after about 1400 B.C. they advanced southward both into the W. Jordan as well as into the E. Jordan region, where they were found at the time of the Israelitic invasion. The name 'Canaanite' is derived from the name of the land, and means the 'inhabitant of the land of Canaan.' Consequently, it has no ethnographical significance, altho such is the impression produced by the orderly lists of the people of the land which the Israelites were said to have conquered or driven out. The formal list reckons six peoples (Ex 3 8, 17, etc.—eleven times in all), the secondary forms of the same list, seven (Jos 3 10), or ten (Gn 15 19-21), or only five or less (Ex 9 1, 13 5, 23 8). We see in this list not the traces of an old tradition, but rather the work of the learned historian. We do not know when these Semitic peoples came into Pal. It was probably a gradual process of immigration, which took place during the period from 2800 to 1600 B.C.

The advance of the Israelitic tribes against Canaan was prepared for and made more easy through a series of historical events. The Egyptian control continued to weaken after 1250, until finally it was only nominal. The native princes carried on wars and marauding expeditions against one another. The Hittite kingdom broke up about 1200 into a number of smaller dominions. After 1400 the Chabiri, whose name is probably to be identified with that of the Hebrews, made their appearance in the W. Jordan land, partly as soldiers in the service of the native princes, partly because they were seeking in a cultivated land better circumstances than the desert afforded them. They were not only the predecessors of the Israelitic tribes, but served to weaken the unity and resistance power of the native population.

29. Invasion by the Israelites. The occupation of the W. Jordan land by the tribes which later were united under the name 'people of Israel' did not take place by means of one great victorious campaign, as is represented in the Book of Joshua, but gradually (see JOSHUA, BOOK OF). From the South there was an open way of entrance into the land (cf. § 6 f., above), which was made use of by the powerful clans of Caleb and Othniel, or the Kenizzites, which took possession of the cities Hebron, Debir, or Kiriath-sepher, Kiriath-sanna (mod. ed-Dahariye, Jg 1 12-15; Jos 15 13-19), and thereby became masters of the most southern portion of the mountain-land. For the Calebite cities cf. I Ch 2 42-49; I S 30 28-31; also ch. 25; and for 'the South' (the Negeb), cf. I S 30 14, 27 10. All the tribes, or clans, of this region remained independent down to the times of David. Probably at intervals they were compelled to pay tribute to the Philistines. Even at a much later period they still formed a special group in Judah (Jos 15 13). They occupied themselves mainly with the breeding of sheep and goats (I S 25 2).

The Israelitic (in the narrow sense) tribes entered the W. Jordan land from the E. by means of the fords of the Jordan (cf. § 12, above). The invasion took place in successive stages, two of which we can distinguish with some certainty. Simeon, Levi (and Judah?), according to Gn ch. 34, made an advance on the territory near Shechem, where, in the later history, we find only the tribe of Joseph. But Levi and Simeon were defeated and scattered (Gn 49 5-7). Judah was then forced toward the southern mountain-land, where it united itself with the Canaanite clan of Tamar near Timnah (mod. Tibne), about 8 m. W. of Bethlehem, and at Adullam (Gn ch. 38). Some remnants of Simeon were found later in the neighborhood of Beer-sheba (Jos 19 2-8; I Ch 4 28-33).

The most important step in the conquest was taken by the Rachel tribe Joseph. It crossed the Jordan near Gilgal (Tell el-Jāl), captured Jericho (Erīhā), Ai (probably Tell el-Hajar), and Bethel (Bēlān; Jos chs. 2-8; Jg 1 22-26). The cities of Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth (which probably lay to the W. of Gibeon and is not to be identified with el-Bire, near Bethel), and Kiriath-jearim (which probably corresponds to the mod. el-Kubēbe) procured freedom and independence by means of a formal treaty with Israel (Jos ch. 9; II S 4 2 f., 21 2). By means of the victory at Beth-horon (Bēṭ'ūr), between Gibeon and the Plain of Aijalon (cf. § 7, above), the tribe of Joseph became master of important parts of the crest of the range in the S. and of its western slopes. Its sacred symbol, the holy Ark, was placed in Shiloh (Seilūn, I S chs. 1-3). From Mt. Ephraim, in the original sense of the term, they spread to the S. and SW. into the forest-covered heights, which they cleared of wood and brought under cultivation (Jos 17 14-18; cf. § 7, above). In consequence of the growing extension of the territory belonging to the tribe, a division took place. The clans which inherited the more southern portion, that had as neighbors the Jebusites of Jerusalem, received the name Benjamin. The middle clans were known as the people of Ephraim, or simply Ephraim, while the Northern clans at first were known as Machir (Jg 5 14), later as Manasseh.

In the Plain of Esdraelon (cf. § 9, above) the power of the Canaanites was broken through the victory which the Israelite tribes won at Taanach (Jg ch. 5). The leader of the Canaanites was King Sisera of Harosheth, which has been identified with the small village el-Hārithiye. This victory strengthened the position of the Israelite tribes near the Plain of Esdraelon, namely, Issachar, Zebulun, and Machir; altho the well-known Canaanite cities Bethshan, Ibleam, Taanach, Megiddo, and Dor (on the sea-coast) remained independent for a considerable time after (Jg 1 27; Jos 17 11-13). Regarding the settlement of the Northern tribes Issachar and Zebulun, as well as the formation of the mixed tribes Naphtali and Asher, we know nothing. Of great importance was the victory over King Jabin of Hazor (cf. the mod. Jebel- and Merj el-Haḍire) near the 'waters of Merom' (Jg ch. 4; Jos 11 1-15). The genuine Israelite population of that country remained somewhat small. Consequently, it received the designation g'āl haggōyīm, 'district of the nations' (Is 9 1; I K 9 11; II K 15 29). A portion of the tribe of Dan which did not succeed in locating on the western slope of the highland gained possession of the city of Laish, near the middle source of the Jordan, which then received the name Dan (cf. Tell el-Kāḍi, § 12, above). The neighboring places Abel-beth-maachah (mod. 'Ābil el-Kāḥ) and Ijon (cf. Merj 'Ayn, § 10), in the course of time identified themselves with this tribe.

30. Union of the Tribes into One People. The place where the Israelite occupation first became most securely established was doubtless the territory N. and S. of Shechem. Here we find the beginnings of an Israelite dominion something after the form of a tribal kingdom founded by Gideon, or Jerubbaal, whose home, Ophrah, must have been situated between Shechem and the Plain of Esdraelon (Tell el-Far'a?). Through his sudden and victorious attack on the Midianites at the spring of Harod (probably the mod. 'Ain Jāḥūd, SE. of Zer'in), he drove back these invaders into the E. Jordan land. His son Abimelech, who finally united Shechem with Israel, lost his life in the siege of the Canaanite city Thebez (the mod. Tūbās), on the road from Shechem to Bethshan. It was the foreign control of the Philistines that first united the Israelite tribes more closely. Their attempt to take possession of the interior, lying back of their own coast-plain, brought the Philistines into conflict with the Israelite tribes near the mod. Wādy Dēr Ballūt, since Aphek is to be identified with the mod. Mejdel Yābā, near Antipatris. After repeated victories, about 1100 B.C. the people of the middle highland region, and somewhat later the territory of Judah, were compelled to pay tribute. In this extremity, Samuel succeeded in inspiring the distinguished Benjamite Saul to make the attempt to unify the Israelite tribes in a common war against their despotic masters. The home of Samuel is given as Ramah, or Ramathaim, in the land of Zuph, on Mount Ephraim (I S 1 1), which in the Onomasticon (ed. De Lagarde, 225 f. 96, 288.146) is identified with Ρεαφίς (the mod. Rentīs), NE. of Lydda. After his fortunate deliverance of the city of Jabesh, probably the ruin el-Maklūb near the mod. Wādy Yabīs, E. of the Jordan, Saul was proclaimed king by his army at Gilgal (I S ch. 11). From Gibeah (Jeba?) on the S. side of Wādy es-Suwēnīt, Jonathan passed over and surprised the camp of the Philistines at Michmash (Makhmās), on the N. side of the same ravine, and Saul completed the victory by pursuing the Philistines down through the Wādy Selmān as far as Aijalon (I S ch. 13 f.).

Saul's kingdom became the magnet which drew to itself the remaining Israelite tribes to the S., N., and E. His campaign against the Amalekites (I S ch. 15) shows that even in the territory of the Calebites people began to place their hope in him. With David, the son of Jesse of Bethlehem in Judah, the Judean clans appear for the first time in close relationship to the Israelite kingdom. In the E. Saul warred successfully with the Moabites, Ammonites, and Arameans (I S 14 47 f.; read 'Arām instead of 'Edhōm). But his defeat at the foot of Mt. Gilboa (mod. Jebel Fuḳū'a, § 8, above) rendered all his previous successes against the Philistines of no account. The latter now took possession of the cities of the Plain of Esdraelon, and therewith the control of the trade-route as far as Tabor (§ 10, above).

The work of Saul, which had apparently been in vain, was brought to a successful issue by David. The Kingdom of Judah which he founded at Hebron marked the beginning of a new stage in the history of the tribe of Judah, which had been pursuing its own fameless way upon its isolated mountains throughout the previous 200 years. David brought into union with this tribe a territory three or four times as large as its original possession, and gradually extended it to the SE. as far as the territory of the Edomites, to the S. as far as Kadesh in the Negeb (cf. § 6, above), and to the SW. as far as the territory of the Philistines. This whole region became known as Judah (e.g., Jos 15 1), but it included tribes which up to that time had always been distinguished from Judah, such as the Kenizzites, Kenites, and Jerahmeelites. Therewith David laid the foundation for the rivalry between Judah and Israel, which took the place of the old rivalry between Leah and Rachel, altho his real purpose was to unite the tribes about his own person. He attained his end through the death of Ishbosheth at Mahanaim, E. of the Jordan, and through the capture of the Jebusite stronghold Zion, together with his decisive victories over the Philistines. The general character of the mountain-land, its narrow valleys and numberless hiding-places, made it possible for David to take the offensive against the Philistines, who had once more advanced into the highlands. Of the numerous conflicts (cf. II S 21 15-22, 23 9-17) only two are recounted with any exactness, namely, that at Baal-perazim and at Gibeon (II S 5 17-25). The first-mentioned place must be sought for in the upper Wādy es-Sarār not far from the Valley of Rephaim (§ 7, above). The second is the well-known el-Jīb.

This union of the Israelite tribes lasted about two generations. The same general course of events was taking place throughout the whole land. Israel received into her political community those Canaanite clans which had not been simply absorbed, and gave them equal rights with her own people. So it happened with the Jebusites in Jerusalem (II S 24 16 ff.; Zee 9 7), likewise with the Arameans in the E. Jordan land, as we learn from the case of Barzillai (II S 17 27, 19 31 ff.). In Solomon's time there still remained some independent Canaanites in Israel (I K 9 20 f.). In this period we should probably place the return on the part of certain clans of the tribe of Manasseh to the E. Jordan region, where Machir settled in Gilead (§ 13, above); Jair occupied the so called 'villages' of Jair, more exactly 'encampments' of Jair, and Nobah occupied the city of Kenath (Nu 32 39, 41 f.). The 'encampments' of Jair (which were nomadic) should not be confused with the thirty cities of Jair mentioned in Jg 10 4—which should be located, in view of the mention of Kamon, mod. Kamm and Kumēm (Jg 10 5), W. of Irbid in N. Gilead—but are to be placed probably E. of this place toward the desert. The city Kenath is probably the mod. Kerak in the Nukra, the ancient Bashan (§ 13, above). The Aramean districts Geshur and Maachah, N. of the Yarmūk, remained independent altho the city of Golan with its vicinity seems to have belonged to Israel (Jos 13 13; Dt 4 43). The Israelite territory—not identical with the kingdom of David—was usually designated by the brief formula 'Israel from Dan to Beer-sheba' (II S 24 2). The account of the census of Israel and Judah which Joab undertook for David (II S 24 1-8) mentions the most important points on the border: Aroer on the Arnon (mod. 'Arā'ir, on the Wādy el-Mōjīb); the territory of Gad, which is here the most southern part of the Israelite territory E. of the Jordan; the region of the city Jazer (mod. Khīrbet Šār on the Wādy Šīr); the region of Gilead, which is here the northern part of the Israelite E. Jordan territory; then the territory of Naphtali, W. of the Jordan, with its city Kadesh (mod. Kedes above Lake Hūle); the city of Dan (mod. Tell el-Kāḏī); the city of Ijon (cf. the mod. Merj 'Ayūn, § 10, above); then to the W. the boundary toward the territory of Sidon and Tyre; and finally, in a southerly direction, the cities of the Hivites and Canaanites as far as the Negeb of Judah to Beer-sheba. The boundary-line toward the W. is presupposed as well-known. The Davidic kingdom included but one small portion of the Mediterranean coast, namely, that from Carmel (cf.

I K 18 30) to the city of Dor (Jos 17 11; Jg 1 27 f.). In other places the territory of Israel ended with the western slope of the mountain-land, and the Shephelah was divided between Israel and the Philistines. These limits of the kingdom remained on the whole unchanged during the reign of Solomon.

31. The Boundary Between the Kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The disruption of the kingdom brought about no change in the boundary between the Israelite territory and that belonging to other peoples, but it drew a new one between the two kingdoms which was not identical with the old tribal boundary. The Southern Kingdom included the whole tribe of Judah, with all its dependents, which we have already noted (§ 30, above), and in addition, the southern part of the tribe of Benjamin, not the whole tribe as was the view in later times (cf. I K 11 32, 36, 12 17, with 12 21, 23 = II Ch 11 1, 3). The portion of the tribe of Benjamin which was reckoned to the Kingdom of Judah did not always remain the same. King Abijah of Judah is said to have defeated Jeroboam I at Mt. Zemaraim, probably in the neighborhood of Bethel, and then united the district including Bethel, Jeshanah (mod. 'Ain Sinjā, 3½ m. N. of Bethel), and Ephron (cf. mod. el-Taijibe, 4½ m. N. of Bethel), with Judah (II Ch 13 3-20). He had some agreement with the Arameans of Damascus, to the disadvantage of Israel (I K 15 19). But King Baasha of Israel came to such an understanding with the Arameans that he was able undisturbed by them to push back the Judeans as far as the neighborhood of Jerusalem and to fortify Ramah (mod. er-Rām, 5 m. N. of Jerusalem), as a frontier fortress on the main thoroughfare upon the crest of the highland. King Asa of Judah, son of Abijah, felt himself too weak to put an end to this oppressive situation. Only after he had hired Ben-hadad I of Damascus for a large sum to again attack Israel was he able to dismantle Ramah. He then built up and fortified Gibeah (mod. Dscheba') and also Mizpah (mod. Nebi Samu'īl or Tell en-Nasbe') as frontier fortresses of his kingdom (I K 15 16-23). This boundary-line continued unchanged until the 7th cent. From the crest of the highland it ran eastward, probably through the precipitous Wādy es-Suwēnāl, while to the W. it touched upon the territory of the city of Aijalon, which had been fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 10), probably not including Beth-horon. In the second half of the 7th cent. the boundary-line was again pushed northward. Such passages as Is 10 28, II K 23 4, 15 can be understood only on the supposition that the boundary of the Judean kingdom was near Aiath or Bethel. Such a change seems possible only in the time when the authority of the Assyrian kingdom on its frontiers had weakened; that is, after 645 B.C. It is this boundary-line that the author of Jos 18 12 f. has in mind when he places the northern limit of the tribe of Benjamin at Bethel, and to this same time belong the expressions which speak of the house of David as ruling over two tribes, namely, over Judah and Benjamin (I K 12 21, 23; II Ch 11 1, 3, 34 32). It is true that after 722 there was no such thing as a boundary between the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, but between the Kingdom of Judah and the Assyrian provinces to the N. These same observations hold true for the extension of the dominion of King Josiah as far as the Plain of Esdraelon, which is to be inferred from II K 23 19 f., 29 ff.

32. The Tribal Boundaries in Jos chs. 13-19. The description of the tribal boundaries which we find in Jos chs. 13-19 gives rise to many discussions of Israel's preexilic period. The multitude of details which here come in view can not be discussed in this place. Only some general observations concerning the age, the value, and practical use of these notices can be offered. These notices belong to different times and different documentary sources, from JE to PC, and have been worked over to a great extent, in some cases supplemented, in others abbreviated. The material which they contain is preexilic, and the authors down to the last redactor were conscious that they were dealing with preexilic conditions. But the traditional materials which they brought together were neither contemporaneous nor similar in character. The redactors also have here and there united theoretical considerations along with the material which they found at hand concerning the boundaries of Israel or of the individual tribes. The most instructive as well as most lucid notices are those concerning the territory of Judah and Benjamin, as they are also most complete. The northern limit of Judah (Jos 15 5-11; cf. the S. boundary of Benjamin, Jos 18 15-19) can be understood only as the boundary of the tribe of Judah in the preexilic time. The southern limit, on the other hand (Jos 15 1-4), is not the boundary of the tribe, but of the Kingdom of Judah, to which the inhabitants of the Negeb were frequently compelled to pay tribute. The tribe of Judah extended southward only as far as the neighborhood of Beth-zur, where the territory of the Calebites began (cf. § 29, above), which after David's time belonged actually to the Kingdom of Judah. Therefore, the notices here brought together vary greatly in character. The localities Zorah and Esh-taol are reckoned to the tribe of Dan in Jos 19 41, but in 15 33 to Judah, altho, according to Jg 13 2 f. and 18 11, they are closely connected with the history of the Danites. The same thing is found in connection with Ir-shemesh (that is Bethshemesh Jos 15 10; II K 14 11, 13; II Ch 28 18) and Aijalon (Jg 1 35; II Ch 11 10, 28 18). Each statement represented correctly the conditions of the time to which it originally belonged, but it is clear that they come severally from different periods. The W. boundary of Judah in Jos 15 11 f. is the Mediterranean (cf. Dt 34 2, 11 24); consequently, the well-known Philistine cities of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza are listed as belonging to Judah (Jos 15 45-47). The writer knew nothing of the fact that under Alexander Jannaeus (104-78 B.C.) and Herod the Great a small strip of the coast belonged to the Jewish kingdom. He probably based his statements on the fact that David had conquered the Philistines and reduced them to subjection, and consequently counted all their territory as belonging to the Kingdom of Judah; that is, he claimed it for Judah. Here the author did not deal in facts, as we might expect from the whole context, but represented the case according to his theory of what ought to have taken place (cf. Am 9 12). The same peculiarities are found in the notices of the boundary of the tribe of Benjamin (Jos 18 11-20). The northern limit is determined with reference to the conditions that held after the dissolution of the Northern Kingdom (cf. § 31, above). The assignment of the city of Jerusalem to Benjamin is correct only in so far as it did not belong to Judah, but in fact still less did it actually belong to Benjamin. Here also apparently theoretical considerations influenced the writer. When we test these most exact statements of the tribal boundaries we see that they have been brought together through learned efforts indeed, altho from our point of view in a very unscientific way, since materials varying greatly in character have been used indiscriminately. We by no means get from them those holy inviolable bounds and limits which were supposed to have been set by Joshua in the olden time, and which sharply divided the territory of one tribe from that of another. It would be only a false appreciation of these notices to assign them any high historical value. Besides, we are unable, even with the help of the good modern maps which we now possess, to draw these boundary-lines according to the points noted. We find, for example, for the northern boundary of Judah (Jos 15 5 ff.) twelve localities which can be identified are given, yet it is clear that a boundary-line drawn according to these places would rest only upon supposition. Further, the northern limit of the tribe of Dan coincides with the western part of the southern limit of the tribe of Ephraim. For this we have the points (Jos 16 3) lower Beth-horon, Gezer, and the sea, but how could any one draw a boundary-line on the basis of such information? For most of the other tribes we have fewer notices than for Judah and Benjamin. The tribal boundaries of Dan and Simeon are missing altogether. The text of the notices touching Asher and Zebulun is very corrupt, and the majority of the places mentioned are unknown. The notices regarding the boundaries of Issachar, Gad, Reuben, and Naphtali are very incomplete, probably abbreviated. The dividing-line between Issachar, Manasseh, and Ephraim is not definite, and the same was the case regarding Reuben and Gad; so that if any one should, in spite of all these difficulties, represent the territory of the tribes of Israel upon a map, he sets forth things that were never actual historical conditions, but only creations of the imagination.

33. The Jewish Territory About Jerusalem After the Exile. From Neh ch. 3 we learn what the territory was which the families of Judah and Benjamin inhabited once more after the Exile, and which was therefore administered by the governor Nehemiah. It included six larger places: Jerusalem, Jericho, Tekoah, Zanoah (mod. Tell Zānū'a), Gibeon, and Mizpah, and nine administrative divisions: the double districts of Jerusalem, Beth-zur, and Keilah (probably Kh. Kila near Zorah), together with the single districts Beth-haccherem (mod. 'Ain Kārim), Mizpah, and the Plain of the Jordan. The list is not entirely complete, altho it includes most of the Jewish territory of the year 445 B.C. It is in a measure confirmed by the catalog of Neh ch. 7 (=Ezr ch. 2), which originally was a list of the families and communities that, about 430, identified themselves with the religious community founded by Nehemiah and Ezra. Its territory was, as a whole, somewhat smaller than that indicated in Neh ch. 3, since all the families dwelling in the neighborhood of Jerusalem did not at first identify themselves with the covenant community. To the W. it extended somewhat further, as we find mention of the localities Lod (Lydda), Hadid (Ḥadīthe), and Ono (Kafr 'Anā). Probably, these places lay outside of the territory occupied exclusively by the Jews, which is intended by the statements in Neh ch. 3. This difference, however, soon passed away through the growing power of the Jewish Church-state. We discover this from the notices in I and II Mac. Here the limits of Jewish territory—that is, of the Jewish Church-state—are, in the S., Beth-zur (I Mac 4 29, 61), in the N., Beth-horon (I Mac 3 16), and in the W., Emmaus, i.e., 'Amwās (I Mac 3 40, 42). Corresponding to such boundaries we have the fortifications which Bacchides, c. 160 B.C., erected 'in Judea': Jericho in the E., Beth-zur in the S., Emmaus and Gazara (Gezer) in the W., and Beth-horon and Bethel in the N. (I Mac 9 50 ff.). The remaining three places, Thimnath, Pharathon, and Tephon, can not be identified.

This small region was not inhabited throughout its territory exclusively by genuine Judeans or Benjamites. During the Exile, certainly before the time of Nehemiah, the Edomites had pushed northward into the territory of the Calebites (cf. § 29, above), and had driven the latter, at least in part, from their possessions. The Calebites moved northward into the region of Ephrath, as we actually learn from I Ch 2 18 f., 50-55, and filled the district depopulated by Nebuchadrezzar with fresh immigrants. Kiriath-jearim, Bethlehem, Tekoah, Zorah, Eshtaol, Netopha (between Bethlehem and Anathoth), and other places are given in I Ch 2 24, 50 ff. as Calebite. When these identified themselves with the Jewish Church-state, the distinction between Caleb and Judah completely disappeared. The territory occupied by the Edomites was later known under the Greek name Idumaea, Hebron remaining the central city. The hate existing between the Jews and the Idumaeans led to open hostilities as early as the time of Judas Maccabeus (I Mac 4 61, 5 65).

34. Judea. Under the term 'Ιουδα, or 'Ιουδαία, in I Mac, the territory described in § 33, above, as belonging to the Jewish Church-state is meant, but with the growing power of the Maccabees the name took on a wider sense. Jonathan obtained (147 B.C.) the city of Ekron with its surrounding territory (I Mac 10 89), and in 145 from Demetrius II three districts touching on the Jewish territory in the N. and W., which previously had belonged to Samaria (I Mac 11 28, 34; cf. § 35, below), so that now altogether four new Jewish districts were counted (I Mac 11 57). The three districts ceded by Demetrius II were named from their chief cities, Apherima, Lydda, and Ramathaim, Apherima can be compared with the large village 'Εφρατα, Efrāa which, according to Onom. ed. De Lagarde, 254, 118; 257, 121, was 20 Rom. m. N. of Jerusalem, consequently in the region of Sinjil and el-Lubban. Lydda corresponds to the O T Lod (§ 33, above), and Ramathaim (Arimathea, Mk 15 43) is the mod. Rentis 7½ m. N. of Lydda, which in Onom. 225, 96; 288, 146 is called Ρεμφθίς, Remphthis. After Beth-zur on the S. boundary had been captured from the Seleucids (I Mac 11 66), Joppa was taken possession of and Judaized about 142 B.C. (I Mac 12 33, 13 11), likewise Gazara, or Gezer (I Mac 13 43 ff.). The three districts just mentioned remained even in later times politically united to Jerusalem, since the majority of their inhabitants were Jews. According to these facts, the boundaries of Judea, over against Samaria, were determined after the beginning of the last century B.C. For the extent of Judea in later times, the list of toparchies, or administration districts, which Josephus gives (BJ, III, 3 5) is instructive, namely: (1) Jerusalem, (2) Gophna (Jifnā, NW. of Bethel), (3) Akrabata ('Akrabe, N. of Shiloh), (4) Thamnia (Tibne, N. of Beth-horon), (5) Lydda, (6) Ammaus ('Amwās), (7) Bethlethepha (Bēl-nellīf), (8) Engaddai (Engedi), (9) Herodium (Jebel el-Furēdis), (10) Jericho (Erīthā). To these as (11) Idumaea (§ 33, above), S. of Beth-zur, is to be added, which was conquered and Judaized by John Hyrcanus (135-105 B.C.), and is not seldom mentioned by itself along with Judea (e.g., Mk 3 7 f.). With the foregoing agree the boundaries which are found, partly in Josephus, and partly in the Talmud. In Ant. XIV, 3 4, Korea (Ḳarāwā, in the lower Wādī Fār'a) is given as the most northern city of Judah, and in BJ, III, 3 5, Anuath Borkaios is named as the outpost against Samaria, with which we may compare 'Ain Berkūl, 2 m. NE. of el-Lubban. Further to the W. the Talmud (cf. Neubauer, p. 86) mentions Antipatris (Kal'at Rās el-'Ain, N. of Lydda), which was built by Herod the Great as the boundary in that direction. Accordingly, the northern limit seems to have followed the modern Wādī Ish'ār and Wādī Dēr Ballūt. The boundary toward the W. varied. The Jewish population was in the majority, but the land was not old Jewish territory. For Joppa and Samaria, cf. Jos. BJ, III, 3 5; for Casarea, cf. Ac 12 19, 21 10. Ekron and Ashdod were controlled by the Hasmonaeans, Gaza also by Herod. On the other hand, Ashkelon was never under the control of the Jews.

The term 'Judea' was also used in a wider sense to mean a larger extent of territory, the ground of which usage is to be found in the conquests of the Maccabees. The meaning of the term varied at different times. It was used for the kingdom of the Maccabees under Alexander Jannaeus (Jos. Ant. XIV, 5 2), for the territory of the high priest Hyrcanus (Ant. XIV, 11 2), for the kingdom of Herod (XVI, 2 1), for the territory ruled over by the Roman procurators (XVIII, 1 1; Lk 3 1), for the Roman province of Judea (BJ, VII, 6 1), and for the portion of Syria inhabited by Jews (Ac 1 8, 2 9). It is therefore not surprising that Josephus occasionally uses 'Judea' in the sense of the old Canaan (Ant. I, 6 2, 7 2).

35. Samaria. In spite of the fact that the last remnant of the Kingdom of Israel was inhabited by a mixed population with a mixed religion (II K 17 24 ff.), the haughty attitude toward Judah remained the same as in the earlier time, especially as the territory of the latter was continually decreasing (cf. § 33, above, and Neh 3 33-37). Beth-horon was the home of the powerful Sanballat, who gave Nehemiah so much trouble. It was the Maccabees who brought about a change in the external conditions, since the gaining of the three territories Apherima, Lydda, and Ramathaim, 145 B.C., advanced the territory of Judah a considerable distance northward (cf. § 34, above). In 128 B.C. John Hyrcanus conquered Shechem together with the whole of Samaria, and united it to the Judean kingdom. Pompey, on the other hand, freed the city of Samaria and the territory belonging to it between Judea (§ 34, above) and the Plain of Esdraelon from the dominion of the Jews, and allowed it to manage its own internal affairs (63 B.C.); nevertheless it had to pay tribute to the province of Syria and furnish its contingent of soldiers to the governor of the same. Seythopolis, as Bethshan was now called, was united with the Decapolis (§ 38, below), while Carmel (cf. § 8, above) had probably belonged to the city of Tyre since the fall of the Kingdom of Israel (BJ, III, 31 and I, 27). Somewhere between these two points, according to Josephus (BJ, III, 34), lay the northern boundary of Samaria, namely, near the village of Ginaia (mod. Jenin), on the edge of the Plain of Esdraelon. The southern boundary has already been described in § 34, above. To the E. the Jordan Valley was the limit, and on the W. indefinitely the foothills of the highland. The city of Samaria attained to new prosperity through Herod, who rebuilt it (27 B.C.) and named it Sebaste. In 72 A.D. the old Shechem was replaced by Flavia Neapolis (mod. Nābulus), founded by Vespasian. On the coast, in 22 B.C., Herod the Great founded the famous seaport Cæsarea Palestina, or ad Mare, which was later the headquarters of the Roman procurator of Judea.

36. Galilee. After 734 B.C., the old Gālil (§ 29, above) was altogether under the dominion of foreigners. From II Ch 30 10 f. it may be inferred that about 300 B.C. a number of families in Galilee felt themselves to be in some relationship to Jerusalem. But their position among the heathen was not secure. Consequently, about 165 B.C. Simon the Maccabee was ordered to remove them with their property to Judea (I Mac 5 14-23). Through the victories of Aristobulus I (104-103 B.C.) the whole population was compelled to accept Judaism, a population that consisted of remnants of Canaanites and Israelites, with additions of Arameans, Itureans (from the Lebanon), and Greeks. It was due to this fact that the Galileans were somewhat despised by the Judeans (Jn 1 46, 7 52). Nevertheless, Josephus praises their bravery and love of freedom, which showed itself just before and after the beginning of the Christian era in their frequent revolutions, partly in favor of the fallen Maccabee house, and partly against the Romans. The boundaries of the territory Galilee (Γαλιλαία, the Gr. form of the Heb. gālil) we learn in general through Josephus (BJ, III, 31 ff.). They began N. of Seythopolis and the Plain of Esdraelon, extended eastward as far as the Jordan and to the Sea of Gennesaret, and, on the N., bordered on a district belonging to the old city Kadesh (mod. Kedes, in Jos. Kedasa, or Kydyssa), which belonged to Tyre (Ant. XIII, 5 6; BJ, II, 181; IV, 2 3). The western boundary can not be defined exactly. A distinction was made between Lower and Upper Galilee, the dividing-line being fixed by the Mishna as near Kephar-Hananja (mod. Kafr 'Anān), by Jos. as at Bersabe (perhaps the same as Heptapegon, between Khān Mīnje and el-Tābigha). Quite remarkably, a place like Gamala (Jos. BJ, II, 20 4; cf. Ac 5 37) was reckoned to Galilee, tho it really belonged to Gaulanitis (Jōlān), E. of the Sea of Gennesaret. The region near the sources of the Jordan, Ullatha and Paneas (§ 12, above), were not added to the kingdom of Herod until 20 B.C., when he was presented with the tetrarchy of Zenodorus by Augustus. The capital of Galilee was Sepphoris (Ṣeffūrīje). Under Herod Antipas (4 B.C. to 39 A.D.) for a long time the capital was at Tiberias, a city founded by him (cf. § 10, above).

37. Perea. The name 'Perea' represents the Hebrew expression 'ēbher hayyarden, meaning 'the E. Jordan land.' The connection of Perea with Jerusalem came about in the same way as did that of Galilee (§ 36, above). At first, Judas Maccabeus removed the Jewish population living there to Jerusalem (I Mac 5 9-54), but fifty years later, John Hyrcanus (134-104 B.C.) began the conquest of the E. Jordan land, which was completed by Alexander Jannæus (102-76 B.C.). Philadelphia alone, the old Rabbath-Ammon, resisted him. Since the conquered people were compelled to accept the Jewish religion, it is not surprising if, from the time of Pompey (cf. § 38, below), we find mention of a Jewish territory Perea E. of the Jordan. This territory, according to Jos. BJ, III, 3 3, was S. of the district of the city Pella, somewhere near the Wādī Yābis, and included, to the S., the district of the city Machærus (Kh. Mukāwer). Its western boundary was the Jordan, while to the E. it extended as far as the territory of the Arabian Nabatæans at Heshbon and the cities of Philadelphia and Gerasa. Its eastern boundary would have been represented by a line drawn a little E. of es-Salt. Its capital was Gedor (the Γεδώρα of Ptolemy, V, 14), of which name we have a trace in the mod. 'Ain Jādūr, S. of es-Salt. The rest of the E. Jordan land belonged to the territory of those cities which were united in the league of the Decapolis (q.v.). Cf. Guthe, Die griechisch-römischen Städte der Ost-Jordan Land (1913).

38. The Roman Administration. When Pompey organized the Roman province of Syria, 63 B.C., he left the specific Jewish region—that is, Judea (with Idumæa), Galilee, and Perea—under the control of the Maccabean high priest Hyrcanus, who, however, was subject to the Roman governor of Syria. The non-Jewish cities on the coast and in the E. Jordan land were 'freed' from the dominion of the Jews. The latter formed themselves into the league of the Decapolis, which in the time of its greatest prosperity included Philadelphia on the S. and Damascus on the N., and for a long time formed an efficient bulwark for the well-populated and civilized E. Jordan region against the Bedawin, who were continually pressing in from the desert. In consequence of a revolt against the Romans, Gabinius, the Roman governor (57 B.C.), divided up the Jewish territory into five districts, Jerusalem, Jericho, Gazara, Amathus, and Sepphoris, exclusive of Idumaea, which remained in the control of the wily Antipater. The first three of these territories constituted Judea proper. Amathus (Tell 'Amate) was made the capital of Perea, as Sepphoris was of Galilee. But in 55 B.C. Gabinius restored the old conditions, and in 47 B.C. Caesar enlarged the territory of Hyrcanus by the addition of the Plain of Esdraelon and the seaport Joppa. Altho after a long struggle the Maccabean Antigonius with the help of the Parthians again became King of the Jews (40-37 B.C.), Herod the son of Antipater succeeded in having himself named by the Roman senate as king (40 B.C.), and having defeated Antigonius ruled from 37 to 4 B.C. He rendered the land a great service in that he subdued the Arabian Bedawin in the Trachonitis (el-Lejā), and brought this region, together with the adjacent districts Batanea and Auranitis, to a state of settled, peaceful civilization (23 and 7 B.C.). He succeeded in adding Gaulanitis also, together with the district about the sources of the Jordan, to his kingdom. After his death, Augustus decided that Archelaus as ethnarch should have Idumaea, Judea, and Samaria, that Antipas should have Galilee and Perea, and Philip receive Batanea (with Gaulanitis), Trachonitis, and Auranitis, the two latter with the title tetrarch. But as early as 6 A.D. the territory of Archelaus was united with the province of Syria, altho under special administration of a procurator (6-41 A.D.). Philip, who built the city of Caesarea Philippi near the old Paneion at the sources of the Jordan (§ 12, above), and Julius on the site of Bethsaida, ruled until 33-34 A.D. His territory was united with the province of Syria until 37, then was given to King Agrippa I, who, in 39-40, also received the territory of Antipas, and in 41, Judea and Samaria. After his death (44 A.D.) the Emperor Claudius placed the whole region under procurators (44-66). For the suppression of the Jewish revolt (66-70 Nero appointed Flavius Vespasianus to the Jewish territory as a special province. It remained as the private property of the Emperor Vespasian after his son Titus had put down the revolt. The province of Judea was administered from Caesarea Palestina through imperial governors; that is, pretorian legates. After the suppression of the last revolt of the Jews (132-135 A.D.) by Hadrian, the province was named Syria Palestina, with a consular legate at its head. After the time of Septimius Severus (193-211 A.D.), the simple name 'Palestine' was the usual designation (cf. § 1, above).

PALLU, pal'lū (פָּלְלִי, pallū): The ancestral head of the Palluites (Nu 26 5), one of the clans of Reuben (Gn 46 9, Phallu AV; Ex 6 14, etc.).

PALM-TREE. See PALESTINE, §§ 21, 23.

PALTI, pal'tai (פָּלְטִי, paltī): 1. One of the spies (Nu 13 9). 2. The person to whom Saul gave his daughter Michal, David's wife, in marriage, after David had fled from the court (I S 25 44, Phalti AV; II S 3 15, Phaltiel, AV, Paltiel RV).

PALTIEL, pal'ti-el (פָּלְטִי־עֵל, paltī'el), 'God delivers': 1. A 'prince' of Issachar (Nu 34 26). 2. See PALT, 2.

PALTITE, pal'tait (פָּלְטִיָּת, happaltī), 'the man of Beth-palet' (q.v.): The designation of Helez, one of David's heroes (II S 23 26). Pelonite (I Ch 11 27) is probably a textual corruption of 'Paltite.'

PAMPHYLIA, pam-fil'i-a. See ASIA MINOR, III, 10.

PAN: (1) hābhāthim (I Ch 9 31), from hābhath, 'to broil' or 'roast,' is of uncertain meaning, tho probably it indicates some sort of a baking-dish. (2) maḥābhath (Lv 2 5, 6 21, 7 9, all 'baking-pan' RV; I Ch 23 29), from the same root as (1), must be some kind of a flat broiling- or baking-dish, but exactly what is intended is uncertain (cf. the same word in Ezk 4 3). (3) masrēth (II S 13 9); as the Jewish-Aramaic equivalent of this word means 'pan,' the same meaning is probably to be assigned to the Heb. word. On other terms rendered 'pan' (kīyyōr, šīr, pārūr, and tsallahath) see FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 11, and Plate I of HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS, Fig. 4.

PANNAG, pan'nag (פַּנָּג, pannagh): An otherwise unknown word, which AV gives as a place, RV as some kind of confection (Ezk 27 17). Cornill and others emend to dhōnagh, 'wax' (of bees), which goes well with 'honey' that follows.

PAPER. See BOOKS AND WRITING, § 1.

PAPHOS, pe'fes (Πάφος): A town on the promontory of Zephyrium near the SW. corner of Cyprus, founded by the Phenicians under Cinyras. Old Paphos lay near the sea with its harbor at the mouth of the Bocarus. New Paphos lay 10 m. inland in a fertile plain. P. was noted for the sensuous cult of the local Nature-goddess, identified with the Greek Aphrodite, who sprang from the sea here (the Paphian Aphrodite), where she was worshipped in the shape of a conical meteoric stone (baetylus); an oracle was connected with her famous, wealthy temple, the priest of which exercised spiritual supremacy over Cyprus. P. was destroyed by an earthquake in 14 B.C.; when rebuilt, it was named Augusta in honor of Augustus, but this name failed to persist. In imperial times it was the residence of the proconsul of Cyprus (cf. Ac 13 6 ff., and see PAULUS, SERGIUS). Many ruins dating from Roman period remain. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

PAPYRUS, pə-pai'rus or -pī'rus. See PALESTINE, § 22; BOOKS AND WRITING, § 1; and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

PARABLE: 1. Nature of Parables. The essence of the parable (Heb. māshāl, Gr. παραβολή, from παράβαλλειν, 'to set side by side') is the idea of comparison. It aims to make use of the underlying analogies or resemblances between the natural and spiritual spheres. The Biblical usage of the term is not exact. In particular, in the O T māshāl stands for a wide variety of figurative forms of expression. (See PROVERB.) Occasionally, the nearest English equivalent would be 'argument,' used in a very general sense (Job 27 1, 29 1). Again, the word means a poetic oracle (Nu 23 7, 18; Hab 2 6) or an obscure and enigmatic utterance, perhaps because couched in symbolic terms (Ezk 20 49). In the N T παράβολα is applied to certain proverbial or metaphorical expressions which are not in the form of a narrative, e.g., 'If the blind lead the blind, both shall fall into the ditch' (cf. also Mt 15 14-16; Lk 4 23, 39). In the Fourth Gospel 'parable' is used to render παροιμία (10 6), which is more strictly 'proverb' (so RVmg.). But the post-Biblical and modern usage of the term has tended to narrow its meaning and, in general, to limit it to similitudes cast into narrative form. Such simpler figurative speech is now called proverb or metaphor. More extended forms of conveying truth symbolically are the fable, the myth, and the allegory. Parable is thus to be distinguished from myth, which is also in the form of fictitious narrative capable of conveying moral and spiritual instruction, and occurs in two forms. The first of these results from the unconscious clustering of imagined events about imaginary persons in the course of the formation of folk-lore. When folk-lore contains a kernel of historical fact, it becomes legend; when it embodies some truth of natural religion, it is called myth. The second type of myth is that of a story artificially constructed. In either case myth embodies and expresses truth, not as a matter of practical life, but of speculative thought. In its first form, it lacks the element of exact parallelism between the narrative and the truth conveyed through it. In its second form (cf. Plato, Gorg. 523a; Phaed. 61a), while it approaches most nearly to the Biblical parable, it is not limited to the expression of spiritual or moral lessons; it is concerned with intellectual truth oftener than with ethical principles. The fable differs from the parable, first, in not aiming to represent action possible in nature. It draws its characters from the lower brute creation and even from the inanimate world. It represents these as possessing and using faculties of mind and heart just like the human. Foxes and wolves, eagles and tortoises, trees and flowers, pots and pans, converse with one another like men and women. But a more important difference between fable and parable is that the former is associated with instruction of a type lower than the spiritual. At the highest, its object is the cultivation of mere worldly wisdom or prudence. Quite often a fable is constructed for no other end than to entertain or amuse the reader. While a parable is always meant to teach some truth of the spiritual or eternal order. Finally, parable differs from allegory in that the latter is more elaborate. It involves the possibility of being lengthened out indefinitely. It parallelizes the developments and sinuities of an inner or ideal transaction by corresponding terms in the figure. The former is characterized by brevity and simplicity. Figure and idea touch each other at one principal point. In form, also, parable and allegory differ as simile and metaphor (cf. 'The kingdom of heaven is like unto,' etc., Mt 13 24, 31, 33, etc., with 'I am the true vine,' Jn 15 1 or 'I am the door,' Jn ch. 10).

2. Parables in the O T. Of parables in the strictest sense, the O T contains only two. The first of these is the story through which the prophet Nathan awakened in the consciousness of David a sense of his guilt in the matter of Bath-sheba (II S 12 1 ff.), and the second, the similitude of the vineyard used by Isaiah (5 1 ff.) to arouse loyalty to Jehovah on the part of Israel. Other stories, such as that of the trees assembled to elect a king (Jg 9 8) and of the thistle and cedar (II K 14 9), are more strictly fables. Still others, such as Ezekiel's account of the two eagles and the vine (17 2 ff.) and of the caldron (24 3 ff.), are allegories. The small number of parabolic narratives to be found in the O T must not, however, be taken as an indication of indifference toward this literary form as suitable for moral instruction. The number is only apparently small. In reality, similitudes, which, tho not explicitly couched in the terms of fictitious narrative, suggest and furnish the materials for such narrative, are abundant.

3. Rabbinical Use of Parables. The parable has been a favorite method of teaching with the sages of Oriental countries in general. Especially did eminent rabbis (Gamaliel, Hillel) before and in the time of Jesus Christ use it freely. Some of the productions of these men possess much beauty and point. One, for instance, aims to impress on the mind the Divine origin and value of the Law in the following story: A certain king had an only daughter. A certain prince from a far land asked and obtained her in marriage. As he was about to take his bride to his own country her father said to him: 'She whom I have given to thee is my only daughter. I can not bear to part from her; yet I can not say unto thee, Take her not, for she is thy wife. But show me this kindness; wherever thou goest prepare me a chamber that I may dwell with you, for I can not bear to be separated from my daughter.' Thus where the Law is, God is. (Weber, Jüd. Theol. 21897, p. 17) But, as a general thing, the parables of rabbinical literature are artificial, unnatural, and fantastic (cf. Trench, Notes on Parables).

4. The Parables of Jesus. Jesus used the parable form so often and with such effect as to raise it to preeminence among literary vehicles of truth. At the same time He identified it with His own personality as a teacher, tho it is not true to say, as Steinmeyer does, that it is a form peculiar to Jesus. In all probability, the evangelic records do not contain all the parables which He formulated. As to those which they do bring down to us, their exact number will vary according as one adopts a broader or a narrower definition of the term 'parable.' Some limit the number to twenty-seven, while others make out as many as fifty-nine. It is enough to say that these numbers, far apart as they are, still convey an idea of the relative frequency of this mode of instruction in the teaching of Jesus. In remarkable contrast to this is the fact that the Epistles of the N T contain nothing resembling the parables. This is also true of the apocryphal gospels. The Fourth Gospel stands midway between the Synoptics and the Epistles. While it records no parables in the strict sense of the word, it does contain figurative teaching of Jesus falling under the general name of allegory (Jn 10 7 ff., 15 1 ff.). Within the smaller group constituted by the Synoptics the distribution of parables is again closely connected with the main characteristics peculiar to the separate documents. Mk, whose obvious aim is to tell of the works of Jesus, contains the smallest number, giving only one not paralleled in the other two Synoptics. Lk, who aims to be full and complete, gives the largest number. Mt stands between these two, with a collection fairly representative of all Jesus' parables. One striking characteristic of Jesus' handling of parables is His use of them in pairs. The similitude of the Mustard-seed and that of the Leaven (Mt 13 33; Lk 13 20) convey essentially the same teaching. This is true also of the parables of the Hidden Treasure, and the Pearl of Great Price (Mt 13 44 f.; Mk 4 30; Mt 13 44 f.), and of those of the Talents and Pounds. In one case, three parables appear to contain the same general lesson: the Lost Coin, the Lost Sheep, and the Lost Son (Lk ch. 15). The design of this repetition was evidently to present more clearly and forcibly truth already once expressed by showing it from other points of view. But both the grouping and the verbal form in which the parables are now extant have been to some degree influenced by the medium of the personalities through which they have been transmitted, i.e., the consciousness of the evangelists. In respect to the literary form, according to Jülicher, a tendency to develop the parables into allegories is to be discerned in the Synoptic records (Gleichnissreden, I, pp. 183-202). But it is quite possible to exaggerate this.

5. Interpretation of Parables. The object of parabolic teaching was undoubtedly to set forth clearly and impressively the inner realities of the kingdom of God. Yet in the very nature of things, to many minds unprepared for this type of teaching they incidentally proved a source of mystification and apparent concealment of the meaning of the teacher (cf. Mt 13 10 ff.). With the lapse of time and the change of conditions and forms of thought, and more especially of forms of expression, the tendency to misconstrue and misinterpret the parables grew. In modern times this tendency has often assumed the proportions of complete allegorization. The interpreters of the Tübingen school, for instance, found in the parables allegories of the contests between the Judaizing and Pauline parties in the Apostolic Church. In more recent days, a group of writers including such men as Tolstoy (Teaching of Jesus), Kirchbach (Was lehrte Jesus? 1903), and Kalthoff (Das Christus Problem, 1902) read the parables as allegories of social and industrial conditions and movements. Such allegorizing is based in some instances upon accidental resemblances and suggestions, as when in the Lost Coin (Lk 15 8) one sees a symbol of the lost soul, because just as the coin bears the image of a king, the soul bears the image of God. In other instances, allegorizing is based on the use and interpretation of certain specific symbols in Scripture, upon the assumption that such interpretation of them gives them the stamp of authority. As, for instance, because in Mt 21 33, the leaders of Israel are portrayed as vine-dressers, the vine-dresser in Lk 13 6-9 (the parable of the Fruitless Fig-tree) must be taken as meaning a leader of Israel; but as the interpretation obviously does not fit the character of the person, the allegorist is compelled to explain that in this case the vine-dresser represents the leaders of Israel 'as they were not.' Again, in some instances, allegorizing is nothing more than the introduction of the theological and philosophical presuppositions of the interpreter. This was the case with the Tübingen exegetes, who found in the four kinds of ground in the Parable of the Sower the four parties or sects of the early Christian Church. In all cases this type of interpretation violates fundamental principles, and misrepresents the teaching of Jesus. A parable from its nature presents a single thought in a figurative form. The thought may be simple as well as single, and in such a case, with the discovery and exposition of this thought the interpretation is complete. All else in the form of the figure must be regarded as background or drapery. But the thought may also be complex (e.g., that in the Parable of the Sower), and then the subordinate features may, by their coincident resemblances in the parabolic figure, throw auxiliary light upon it. Naturally, this principle leaves it to be determined what in each parable is the main thought and whether it admits of or demands auxiliary illustration.

PARAH, pē'ra (פָּרָה, happārāh), 'the cow': A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 23). Map III, F 5.

PARAN, pē'rān (פָּרָן, pārān): 1. A wilderness between Midian and Egypt (I K 11 18), and defined more narrowly as including Kadesh, and, by inference, also the wilderness of Zin and beyond to the S.; but still more narrowly as exclusive of Zin, which lies to the N. (Nu 13 21 and 33 36 LXX.). It is the modern et Tih, a tableland abounding in limestone formation. It served as the refuge of Ishmael when expelled from the camp of Abraham (Gn 21 21). It was one of the stations of the wilderness journey (Nu 10 12, 12 16 [P]). From it the spies were sent out, and thither they returned to make their report (Nu 13 3, 26). 2. A mountain, named with Sinai, Seir, and Teman (Dt 33 2; Hab 3 3). But as these passages are poetical, the intention to name an exact spot is doubtful. It may be Jebel Makra. 3. El-Paran (LXX. tr. 'terebinth of Paran' Gn 14 6), a landmark near Kadesh. Since it appears to be the extreme southern point reached by the Kings of Israel, it may be the same as Elath (q.v.). A. C. Z.

PARBAR, pār'bar (פָּרְבָר, parbār): The Hebraized form of a Persian word, meaning 'summer-house' or 'colonnade.' It is the designation of a building connected with Solomon's Temple on the W., where six Levites were stationed as guards, four at the causeway and two inside the Parbar (I Ch 26 18). The word is used in its original Persian form parwārim of one of the courts of the Temple (II K 23 11, precincts RV, suburbs AV).

PARMASHTA, par-mash'tā (פַּרְמַשְׁתָּא, parmash-tā), Persian for 'chief': One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 9)

PARMENAS, pār'mi-nas (Παρμενάς): One of the 'seven' chosen to administer the charities of the Jerusalem Church (Ac 6 5). Nothing further is known of him. See CHURCH LIFE, § 3.

PARNACH, pār'nak (פַּרְנַח, parnākh): A 'prince' of Zebulun (Nu 34 25).

PAROSH, pē'resh (פַּרֹשׁ, par'osh), 'flea': The ancestral head of a great postexilic family of the same name (Ezr 2 3, 8 3 [Pharosh AV], 10 25; Neh 3 25, 7 8, 10 14).

PAROUSIA, par-ū'shia- or -si-a. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 34 ff.

PARSHANDATHA, pār-shan'da-tha or pār'shēn dē'tha (פַּרְשַׁנְדָּתָה, parshandāthā), a Persian word, 'given by prayer' (?): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 7).

PARTHIANS, pār'thi-anz (Πάρθοι, Ac 2 9): Men of Jewish descent who made their permanent home in Parthia, and were found, like many others of the Dispersion, at Jerusalem, probably as pilgrims celebrating the festival. Parthians, in a strict sense, are nowhere mentioned in the Bible. Parthia was a mountainous land to the S. of the Caspian Sea, bounded by Hyrcania on the N., Ariana on the E., Media on the W., and Carmania on the S. In its earliest known history this territory was a part of the Persian empire, constituting, according to Herodotus (III, 93), a portion of the 16th satrapy under Darius. It remained under Persian control as late as the conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great. When the land passed into the hands of the Seleucids, the Parthians revolted under Arsaces and became an independent state (c. 250 B.C.). But, once independent, and under the lead of the Arsacids, Parthia rapidly grew into an empire extending to the Euphrates and the Indus. The Romans found this power difficult to deal with. In fact, they never conquered it. The Parthians played an important part in the history of Judea during the years following Pompey's conquest (63 B.C.). An invasion by them in 39 B.C., tho repulsed at last, necessitated a reorganization of the government. They finally degenerated and succumbed before the Persians under the Sassanids in 226 A.D.

PARTITION, MIDDLE WALL OF: An expression used by Paul (Eph 2 14) in a passage in which he asserts the abolition of all distinction between Jew and Gentile. It is probable that he had in mind the barrier (sōrēgh) in Herod's Temple that separated the outer court of the Gentiles from the inner courts accessible to Jews alone (Jos. Ant. XV, 2; BJ, V, 5). See TEMPLE, § 28.

PARTRIDGE (qōrē', 'caller'): A bird common in Palestine, but regarded as insignificant in contrast with larger game (I S 26 20). In Jer 17 11 its alleged habit of stealing a nest and hatching young not of its own serves as the basis of a figurative usage. But as the partridge does not do this, the prophet is evidently using a current notion as the ground of his simile. See also PALESTINE, § 25.

PARUAH, pā-rū'a or par'u-a (פַּרְוָה, pārūah): The father of Solomon's officer Jehoshaphat (I K 4 17).

PARVAIM, pār-vē'im or pār'vā-im (פַּרְוַיִם, parwāyim): Probably the designation of a region where gold was mined (II Ch 3 6). Two possible identifications, one in southern, the other in NE. Arabia have been proposed.

PASACH, pē'sak (פַּסַּח, pāsakh): 'The head of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 33).

PAS-DAMMIM, pas''-dam'mim. See EPHES-DAMMIM.

PASEAH, pā-si'a (פַּסְעָה, pāsēah), 'limping': 1. The head of Judahite family (I Ch 4 13, or here a place-name?). 2. The ancestral head of a family of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 40; Neh 7 51, Phaseah AV, Neh 3 6).

PASHHUR, pash'hūr, PASHUR (פַּשְׁחֻר, pash-hūr): 1. The son of Malchijah. With Zephaniah, the priest, he was sent by King Zedekiah (c. 588) to Jeremiah to inquire concerning the outcome of Nebuchadrezzar's attack on Jerusalem (Jer 21 1 f.). Later, he was one of those (Jer 38 1 f.) who were responsible for putting Jeremiah in the miry dungeon (I Ch 9 12; Neh 11 12). 2. The son of Immer, and chief overseer in the Temple under Jehoiaquin. He smote Jeremiah and had him put in the stocks, from which he freed him the next day. Jeremiah gave him the name Magor-Missabib (q.v.), and prophesied that he would go into exile to Babylon (Jer 20 1 f.). As Zephaniah, son of Maaseiah, evidently was overseer of the Temple under Zedekiah (II K 25 18; cf. Jer 29 26), P. probably was taken to Babylon with Jehoiachin (597 B.C.). 3. A priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 38; Neh 7 41). Six of the family had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 22), and a representative of the family sealed the covenant (Neh 10 3 [4]). 4. The father of Gedaliah (Jer 38 1), perhaps the same as 2 above. C. S. T.

PASSAGE (ma'ābhār, ma'bārāh), 'pass,' 'ford': This term is found in the AV of Jg 12 5, 6; I S 13 23, 14 4; Is 10 29; Jer 22 20, 51 32; but the same Heb. word is rendered 'fords' in Jos 2 7; Jg 3 28; Is 16 2. The RV more accurately renders by 'fords' in Jg 12 5, and Jer 51 32 mg. (but 'passages' in the text); also by 'pass' ('passes') in I S 13 23, 14 4; Is 10 29, and 'Abarim' in Jer 22 20. (Cf. ABARIM.) A. C. Z.

PASSENGER: A word found in Pr 9 15; Ezk 39 11, 14, 15 AV in the obsolete sense of 'one who is passing by' or 'through' a place. The RV has the more modern 'they [them] that pass by [through].' A. C. Z.

PASSION: (1) In Ac 1 3, 'after his passion' is literally 'after He suffered,' μετὰ τὸ παθεῖν αὐτόν. (2) The expression 'like passions' (Ac 14 15; Ja 5 17) is the rendering of the compound adj. ὁμοιοπαθής, 'of like feeling,' and means, in these two instances, 'of like nature,' 'with the same natural limitations.' Other occurrences of the word need no explanation. E. E. N.

PASSOVER. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7.

PASS THROUGH FIRE, CAUSE TO. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 26.

PASTOR: The original terms rō'eh, ποιμήν, 'shepherd,' rendered by 'pastor' in Jer 2 8, 3 15, etc., and in Eph 4 11 AV, are in these instances used neither in their literal sense nor in the modern ecclesiastical sense of the Eng. word, but as the equivalent of 'ruler.' Of these renderings RV retains the word only in Eph 4 11. See also CHURCH LIFE, § 8. A. C. Z.

PASTORAL EPISTLES. See TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO; and TITUS, EPISTLE TO.

PATARA, pat'ā-ra (Πάταρα): A seaport of Lycia E. of the mouth of the Xanthus, one of the twenty-three Lycian republics which formed a confederacy of seventy cities under a Lyciarch; the six chief cities (Xanthus, Patara, Pinara, Olympus, Myra, Tlos) had two votes each. P. was the seat of the worship, and a famous oracle, of Apollo Patareus. It was enlarged by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who renamed it Arsinoë (this name did not persist). Considerable ruins remain of walls, temples, theaters, an aqueduct, baths (built by Vespasian), sarcophagi, the pit and circular steps of the Apolline oracle, and a triumphal arch with the inscription 'P. the capital of the Lycian nation.' The ancient harbor is now a swamp. At P. Paul changed ships on his last voyage to Jerusalem (Ac 21 1 f.).

PATH, PATHWAY: These words render the following original terms: (1) 'ōrah, 'path,' 'customary road,' (Job 19 8; Is 2 3, etc.). (2) mēšillāh, 'highway' (Is 59 7; Jl 2 8). (3) ma'gāl, ma'gālāh, 'wheel-road' (Ps 17 5, 23 3; Pr 2 9, etc.). (4) mish'ol, a pass 'hemmed in' on each side, or made by hollowing (Nu 22 24). (5) nāthibh, nethibhāh, a 'raised road,' 'highway'; in the literal sense (Job 28 7), and figuratively for the course of life (Job 19 8; Ps 119 105; Pr 1 15, etc.). (6) shēbhāl, shēbhāl, a 'way that stretches out' (Ps 77 19; Jer 18 15). (7) trēḥos, a 'path made by attrition' (Mk 1 3, and ||s). (8) trochēā, a 'circuit,'

'wheel,' i.e., a road that returns upon itself (He 12 13). A. C. Z.

PATHROS, path'ros, PATHRUISM, path-rū'-sim. See EGYPT, § 1; and ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

PATIENCE. See GOD, § 2.

PATMOS, pat'mes (Πάτμος): A volcanic island of the Sporades, now nearly treeless, modern Patino. It is characterized by an indented coast and has a safe harbor. By the Romans it was made a place of exile for the lower class of criminals. According to tradition, John, the author of Rev, was banished thither by Domitian 95 A.D., where he lived at hard labor for eighteen months, and had his revelations (cf. Rev 1 9 ff.) in the 'cave of the Apocalypse,' now connected with the monastery of St. John, founded in 1088 A.D. by the monk Christodulus, on the authority of a bull (still extant) of the emperor Alexius Comnenus. The embalmed body of John is still shown. Ruins of great antiquity remain.

J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

PATRIARCHS: As the etymology implies, a patriarch (πατριάρχης) is one who rules a clan or tribe by paternal right. The word is used several times in the LXX. (e.g., I Ch 24 31; 'heads of the fathers' houses' RV); but does not occur in the English OT. In the N T the title 'patriarch' is applied to Abraham (He 7 4), David (Ac 2 29), and the sons of Jacob (Ac 7 8 f.). Specifically, the word has come to indicate one of the early progenitors of the human race, or more narrowly, of the tribes of Israel. The Biblical patriarchs thus fall into three groups: (1) The antediluvians, (2) the names in the genealogical list from Shem to Terah, (3) Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. For these last, see articles under the respective titles; only the first two groups will be considered in this article.

There are two lists of the antediluvian patriarchs. The earlier narrative (Gn 4 16-24, J) traces the descent of Lamech from Cain through four generations, and frequently couples some interesting event with the name mentioned. The second genealogy (Gn 5 3-31, P) makes Seth the ancestor of Lamech, inserts this author's customary chronological data, and adds two more names, so that there are in all ten generations from Adam to Noah. The difference in the spelling of the two lists is not so great as it appears in the English translation. From Shem to Terah (Gn ch. 11, P) only nine names appear in the Heb. text; but the LXX., followed by Lk 3 36, inserts 'Cainan' between 'Arpachshad' and 'Shelah,' thus making ten generations here also. The different versions vary widely as to the longevity of the patriarchs. Thus from the Flood to Abraham was 290 years according to the present Heb. text, but is given by the LXX. as 1,070 years! This gives some idea of the extent to which the figures were manipulated by the ancient authorities, usually in the interest of some ideal chronological symmetry. (See CHRONOLOGY OF THE O T.) But according to all the accounts, the length of life ascribed is incredibly high.

It is difficult to determine just what historic facts underlie the various genealogies of Genesis. The ten antediluvian patriarchs, with their enormous ages, are connected with the ten kings who, according to Berossus, ruled Babylonia for 432,000 years before the Flood. The Sumerian originals of these monarchs have recently been discovered (Poebel, Historical Texts, 73 ff.; Langdon, JRAS, 1923, pp. 251 ff.). The descendants of Noah (Gn ch. 10 f.) are apparently personifications of homonymous tribes or localities, e.g., Canaan, Zidon, Ophir, Elam. (See GENEALOGY.) Even in the later chapters of Genesis we are often in doubt as to whether the narratives describe the actions of individuals or tribes. (See LOT.) We may safely say, however, that there is a strong presumption against the individual interpretation of any of the patriarchs before Abraham. Nevertheless, the Biblical writers may have believed that these names belonged to individuals.

PATRIMONY. See FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 8.

PATROBAS, pat'ro-bas or -bas (Πατρόβας): A member of the early Roman Church (Ro 16 14), otherwise unknown.

PATTERN: This term renders the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) tabhñith, 'model' (Ex 25 9, 40; Jos 22 28, etc.). (2) tokhñith, 'measure,' or 'standard,' of the ideal temple (Ezk 43 10; cf. 28 12 RVmg.). (3) mar'eh, 'appearance,' used of Moses' vision of the Tabernacle (Nu 8 4). (4) ὑποτύπωσις, an 'outline,' which serves as a model (I Ti 1 16 AV; 'ensample' RV; II Ti 1 13, 'form' AV). (5) τύπος, 'model' (Tit 2 7 AV; He 8 5). (6) ὑποδείγματα, 'copies' (He 9 23 AV). J. M. T.

PAU, pē'u (פֶּאֱו, pā'ū): A city of Edom (Gn 36 39; Pai in I Ch 1 50). The LXX. reads 'Peor.' The site is doubtful.

PAUL

I. PAUL'S LIFE UP TO HIS CONVERSION.

1. Birth and Early Training. Paul, Παῦλος (originally Saul, Σαῦλος or Σαούλ=Heb. שְׂאוּל, shā'ul), was born in Tarsus, a Cilician city of note, intellectually as well as politically (Ac 21 39, 22 3). Against this express statement the story of Jerome—De Viris illustribus, 5—which makes Gischala of Galilee his birthplace can not count. Tarsus had a strong colony of patriotic Jews, who sent reinforcements to Jerusalem during its last siege, and among whom Paul was brought up. Whatever influence the Greek environment had on him must have been mainly unconscious. It was to Jewish influences he gave up his mind. Not only his father but remoter ancestors were Pharisees (Ac 23 6), and he became a devoted Pharisee himself. Yet the Aramaic was his mother tongue (Ac 9 4, 21 40)—from which it has been inferred that his parents had not been long in the Dispersion—and tho he knew the Hebrew O T, he usually quotes the LXX., and is to be regarded rather as a Greek than a Hebrew Rabbi. He was by birth a Roman citizen (Ac 22 28), and Ramsay has the merit of showing how the imperial idea influenced his mind and imagination, and even his policy as an evangelist. Attempts to trace in Paul other Greek influences which might have reached him in Tarsus—e.g., that of the Stoic philosophy, which had there its native seat, or of the Greek mysteries—are quite inconclusive (cf. Clemen, Paulus (1904), vol. ii, p. 65; W. Morgan, The Religion and Theology of Paul (1917); H. A. A. Kennedy, St. Paul and the Mystery Religions (1913). When Paul says himself (Gal 1 15) that God set him apart from birth, it means that all the influences about him from the beginning—Jewish, Greek, Roman—contributed, apart from any consciousness or intention on his part, to fit him for the work of his life. There was a predestination in them which made him a 'chosen vessel' (σκεῦος ἐκλογῆς, Ac 9 15), but which he only came to see later.

Of Paul's family relations little is known. Later, he had a married sister in Jerusalem whose son was old enough to act in a delicate situation (Ac 23 16 f.). He himself seems never to have married. The gift for celibacy was part of his endowment for the homeless Apostolic life. As appeals to Rome were costly, it has been inferred that in his later days he must have fallen heir to some family property. He must have had a strong physique to be able to survive what we read in II Co 11 23-29, but his presence was not imposing (Ac 14 13). He mentions one distressing and repulsive illness (Gal 4 13), the one apparently from which he suffered chronically or intermittently, and which he elsewhere describes as 'a thorn in the flesh,' 'a messenger of Satan,' who buffeted him to keep him humble amid the extraordinary revelations he had had. Of the various guesses at this (ophthalmia, Farrar; malarial fever, Ramsay; crampe de predicateur, Godet; and epilepsy), there is most to be said for the last, or for some form of hysteria. At Tarsus Paul learned the trade of σκηνοποιός (Ac 18 3), which was connected with the local manufacture of cilicium (goatshair cloth), but it is not certain what modern word gives best the best suggestion of the kind of work he did—weaver, sailmaker, saddler, or what. Its value to him as an Apostle was that it enabled him to make the gospel 'without charge.' ἀδῶκανον (I Co 9 18), and to maintain his character for disinterestedness (I Th 2 9; II Th 3 8; I Co 9 12; II Co 12 14; Ac 20 34). He worked at his trade in Thessalonica, Corinth, and Ephesus.

2. Education in Jerusalem. From Tarsus Paul went to Jerusalem to be educated as a Rabbi in the school of Gamaliel (Ac 22 3). He became a 'zealot' for God, or for his ancestral traditions (Gal 1 14). Many strains of interest united here: national, for devotion to the Law meant devotion to Israel; intellectual, for a great Rabbi was to the Jews what a great philosopher was to the Greeks (Jn 3 10); personal, for in his zeal for the Law Paul was conscious that he had rivals whom he had to surpass, if he was to secure his own future (Gal 1 14 and Ph 3 7); and, finally, religious. Paul was a profoundly serious and pious man: he hungered and thirsted after righteousness, and he sought it devotedly along this line. To be righteous meant to keep the Law, and he strove with all his strength to keep it. One of the most important questions to be considered in the study of Paul's life is, What kind of experience did he have, spiritually, during this period? To this the Epp. make various references. In Ph 3 6 he says that he was, 'as touching the righteousness which is in the law, found blameless,' κατὰ δικαιοσύνην τὴν ἐν νόμῳ γενόμενος ἀμειπτος, which must mean that no one could censure him from the Pharisaic point of view. (In the same sense, cf. Ac 23 1.) In Gal 1 14 it is implied that so long as he was in this Pharisaic life he had a complacent consciousness of some kind: he was not only getting on, but getting on better than others. It is sometimes maintained that we can not use Ro 7 7 as a confession of Paul's personal experience before his conversion. The use of the first person singular, however, in contrast to the plural in Ro ch. 6 where he is dealing with what he assumed to be the common Christian experience, as well as the intensity of the tone in the passage, supports the view that this is autobiography, even if present experience colors the remembrance of the past. To assume that Paul is describing his present condition would be to deny the purpose of the argument to show that Christ can do what the law could not do. We can not be certain, however, whether ver. 7 refers to a distinct moral crisis, in which Paul first discovered the opposition of sin and law in himself, or a recurring moral situation. What does seem certain is that Paul, with all his sincerity, had misgivings as to whether the way he was walking really led to righteousness (see ROMANS, § 2).

3. First Contact with Christianity. We do not know when he came to Jerusalem. We have no evidence that he ever saw Jesus in the days of His flesh. Apparently he came into contact with the new movement in some connection with Stephen. The Cilicians (Ac 6 9) had or frequented a particular synagog in Jerusalem and were Stephen's opponents. Hence Paul probably encountered Christianity first in the form in which it threatened Judaism; Stephen had recalled the words of Jesus which threatened the destruction of the Temple and, therefore, to a great extent the superseding of the Law (Ac 6 14). But apart from definite dogmatic differences, a man so deeply in earnest with his own religion as Paul would soon feel that in the new society there was an attitude of the soul to God which was not his attitude, and which, if it were justifiable, made his religion vain.

Two ideals and experiences of religion confronted each other in the Pharisee (and the Christian, and this ardent Pharisee was conscious at once that in Christianity he encountered the enemy. It was not a Sadducean police regulation, in the interest of the public order, which he assisted to enforce; it was a genuine religious persecution of which he became a leading agent. He often refers to this. Sometimes he speaks of the severity of the persecution (Ac 22 4, 19 f.), sometimes of the good conscience with which he acted (Ac 26 9); sometimes he expresses deep contrition (Gal 1 13; I Co 15 9; cf. I Ti 1 13, where remorse is lightened by the reflection that he had acted 'ignorantly in unbelief,' ἀγνοῶν . . . ἐν ἀπιστίᾳ). These references by Paul himself are of interest in that they agree with the representation in Ac 9 1, that up to the moment of his conversion Paul was persecuting with a good conscience. The 'kicking against the goad' (Ac 26 14) does not mean that he was stifling nascent Christian conviction. He was to the last moment of his prechristian life in the tragic situation described by Jesus; he thought that his persecution of the disciples of Jesus was service rendered to God (Jn 16 2).

II. PAUL'S CONVERSION.

4. Influences Preparatory to Conversion. Paul's conversion is in its issues the greatest event of early Christian history. As such, it is three times told in Ac (chs. 9, 22, and 26), and there are incidental allusions to it in Gal 1 12; I Co 9 1; II Co 4 6; Ph 3 12; I Ti 1 13. It raises three main questions:

(1) What were its antecedents, in the sense of events and experiences leading up to it? In the line of what has been said above, some would deny that there were any: only thus, it is argued, can the supernatural character of Paul's conversion be maintained. But the supernatural is not maintained by being made blankly unintelligible, and if a supernatural event—say the manifestation of Jesus—is to have one result and not another, it must be made to a mind in one condition and not another—that is, to a mind prepared for it. Paul's state of mind had no power to produce the manifestation, but it made it possible for him to understand and appreciate it. As influences contributing to such a state of mind reference has been made to the death of Stephen, to the conduct of Christians under persecution, to ideas suggested in the course of controversy with Christians (e.g., the idea with which the Christians, basing on Is ch. 53, countered Paul's efforts to make them blaspheme—the idea, namely, that Jesus, instead of being accursed of God, as Dt 21 23 teaches, had in the love of God become curse for us), and, in particular, to the spiritual experience of Paul under the Law, as read in Ro 7 7 ff. This experience was the 'goad' (Ac 26 14), which, tho like a stupid or frantic animal he did not know it, was driving him into the arms of Jesus (cf. Findlay in HDB, III, 702 n.).

5. Character of the Event. (2) What was it that took place on the way to Damascus? The answer Paul himself gives us is that the Lord 'appeared to him' (I Co 15 8), or that 'he saw the Lord' (9 1). In I Co ch. 15 he explains his agreement with the Twelve on the fundamental facts of Christianity, the death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. As an Apostle he is a qualified witness of the resurrection, but resurrection is relative to burial; there is no such thing as the resurrection of the spirit. What Paul believed he saw—and what he believed the Twelve saw—was Christ in what he calls 'the body of his glory' (Ph 3 21). That this had a relation to the body which had been laid in the grave is certain, but it had been changed as 'we shall be changed' (I Co 15 51). It is useless to ask how such a body can be seen; it can not be seen at all unless Jesus (as the Fourth Gospel puts it, 21 1) 'manifests himself'; but assuming that He can manifest Himself, the question whether Paul's seeing of the Risen Savior was objective or subjective falls to the ground. It was both. It was subjective in that it was accessible to Paul only, and not to all who were physically in the same situation as he, but it was objective in that it was no hallucination, but a real self-manifestation of the glorified Jesus. All the accounts of Paul's conversion in Ac represent Jesus as not only appearing to the persecutor, but speaking to him; and tho in ch. 9 and ch. 22 a message is given through Ananias which in ch. 26 is put into the lips of Jesus Himself, yet all three narratives agree with Paul himself in Gal 1 16 in connecting with his conversion his vocation to preach the gospel to all men.

6. Relation to Paul's Theology. (3) This anticipates our third question: To what extent was Paul's gospel immediately given or involved in this experience? There was something which he called 'my gospel' (Ro 2 16, 16 25; II Ti 2 8); not Christianity simply, but, in a nature so strong with an experience so distinct, Pauline Christianity. What part of this peculiar phenomenon can be traced to this hour? The following points seem tolerably certain: (a) This experience fixed Paul's Christology. Christ to him is predominantly the Risen One, the Lord of Glory. It is not the incarnation which rules his thoughts, as in the Fourth Gospel, but the resurrection. His Christ is one in whom all carnal limitations disappear (II Co 5 16), one who shares the Father's throne, and has been declared Son of God in power, in virtue of the resurrection from the dead (Ro 1 4). In the splendor in which He appeared to Paul He is the 'image' (εἰκών, II Co 4 4; Col 1 15) of God; it is the 'glory of God' which shines in the face of Jesus Christ (II Co 4 4-6). (b) It fixed his eschatology. Paul saw the Lord, and the world in which the Lord lived was henceforth for him the real world. Immortality and glory were not indeterminate conceptions for Paul, half real or less. There was nothing so real to him as the Lord and His glory. But the Lord of glory was the Son of God, the first-born among many brethren, and Paul's whole hope was to be conformed to the image of God's Son (Ro 8 29). It is a mistake to interpret this only ethically; the image includes all Paul saw at his conversion; the ethical and the incorruptible are blended in it in the Divine. The whole of Paul's Christianity can be put into the eschatological proposition, 'We shall bear the image of the heavenly' (I Co 15 49), if we understand 'image' in the full Pauline sense (II Co 4 4-6). (c) It fixed his soteriology, perhaps not in all the dogmatic or controversial or apologetic forms he afterward gave it in Gal or Ro, but in substance and effect. He knew from this time on with absolute certainty that salvation is of the Lord. It begins on God's side and with a gracious act of God in Christ which man has done nothing to merit. Paul was going madly on the wrong road when he obtained mercy (I Ti 1 13), was apprehended or arrested (Ph 3 12), turned, and put right. Define this experience by relation to God, and it takes the form of a doctrine of Divine sovereign grace—God out of His pure mercy saves whom He will. This is the fundamental doctrine of redemption as a doctrine of God, and all the gospel is in it. Define this same experience by relation to man, and it takes the negative form of a doctrine excluding all human rights or titles to salvation. God did not appear to Paul in Christ because of what he had done or was doing. It was not his devotion to the Law which was rewarded with salvation. All he had ever done, or tried to do, faded into nothingness, or only rose to impeach him; salvation was in Christ alone and in surrender to Him, not in anything Paul could do apart from Him, or antecedent to Him. This again is the fundamental doctrine of redemption as a doctrine of man, and all the gospel is in it—righteousness by faith alone, apart from work of law. Paul knew now that nothing statutory contributes anything to salvation; it is all in Christ, crucified and exalted, and in the free response which Christ evokes in the heart. (d) Finally, it fixed his vocation as Apostle of the Gentiles. (See [2], above.) This does not depend on the fact that the Christ who appeared to Paul was not the Jewish national Messiah, but the heavenly Messiah, who was to have rule over all (cf. Brückner, Paul. Christologie, p. 29); it depends on Paul's instinctive perception that he was being saved by Christ not as a Jew and a Pharisee, but as a man and a sinner. Absolute grace has in it the promise of universality; in the relation of absolute debt to God, all distinctions of men disappear.

III. PAUL'S APOSTOLIC LIFE.

7. Early Ministry. We have two accounts in the N T of what immediately followed Paul's conversion (Gal 1 16 ff.; Ac 9 19 ff.). We may assume that his intercourse with Ananias (Ac 9 9-18) meant something for him, and that he either knew beforehand or received from him, the tradition of the Christian fundamentals to which he refers in I Co 15 3. Paul there represents himself as a link in the chain of tradition (cf. 11 23, παρέδωκα . . . ὃ καὶ παρέλαβον), but in Gal ch. 1 he insists that he owed to men neither his gospel nor his apostleship. From Damascus he went to Arabia (the Haurân? or Sinai?), but apparently not for any length of time. The three years of Gal 1 18, mentioned after his return to Damascus, where he preached as a Christian (Ac 9 20) and made disciples of his own (ver. 25), seem to have been spent more in that city than in Arabia. His escape from Damascus at the risk of his life is referred to in Ac 9 23 ff.; II Co 11 32. He went up to Jerusalem, to make acquaintance with the great man of the Church (Gal 1 18), and stayed with him a fortnight. No doubt from him he would hear much of Jesus. Otherwise, we should infer from his own account in Gal that the visit was one of much privacy. The narrative in Ac 9 28 ff. gives a different complexion to this visit, and seems to imply more (ver. 28 f.) than can easily be put into a fortnight, but both accounts end consistently. In Ac 9 30 Paul is sent via Cæsarea to Tarsus; in Gal 1 21 he comes into the regions of Syria and Cilicia (the latter usually a kind of annex, politically, to the great province of Syria). Paul himself mentions these facts as proof that he did not owe his gospel or his Apostolic commission to the Twelve. How could he, if he had exercised a Christian ministry which God had blessed both before he had seen any of them and in entire independence of the fugitive contact he had later had with one of them?

8. Period of Obscurity. This brings us to the obscure period of Paul's life, which, tho the chronology is uncertain, was of considerable duration. Between his first visit to Jerusalem (Ac 9 26) and his second (Ac 11 30, 12 25), Lightfoot and Turner reckon eight years, Ramsay ten, Harnack eleven (?). (For a full examination of all the evidence, cf. Turner in HDB, art. Chronology. See also N T CHRONOLOGY, III, 2-3.) What did he do all this time? In Gal 1 23 he says that the Christian churches in Judea heard from time to time that their former persecutor was preaching the faith he once attacked. No doubt the existence of churches in Cilicia, which numbered Gentiles among their members (Ac 15 23), was due in part to his work at this time. It was apparently toward the close of this period that Barnabas, who, according to Ac 9 27, had stood sponsor for Paul at Jerusalem, acted a second time as his good genius and brought him to Antioch. A great church had grown up there, which contained both Jewish and Gentile members; The reading 'Ελληνες in 11 20 seems the more probable for two reasons: (1) it would have been nothing new for the Gospel to be preached to Greek-speaking Jews; (2) had Gentiles not been included from the first as well as Jews, would the populace have found a nickname necessary for the new community? Barnabas, who had thrown himself heartily into the work, felt that this was the place for Paul. He went to Tarsus to seek him out (Ac 11 25), and when he returned with Paul, they were for a whole year hospitably entertained by the church (συναχθῆναι, Ac 11 26, as in Mt 25 35; Dt 22 2; Jg 19 18; cf. Bartlet, Com. on Acts 1902, ad loc.). It was this flourishing and generous church which, when a famine came soon afterward (44 or 45? A.D.), sent help to the poor saints of the mother church at Jerusalem by the hands of Barnabas and Paul (Ac 11 30, 12 25). For discussion of this journey and its relation to that described in Gal 2 1 see Commentaries of Lightfoot, Sieffert (Meyer series) and Burton in ICC, and, opposed to them, Ramsay in his Church in the Roman Empire and his St. Paul the Traveler.

9. Missionary Journeys. With the return of Paul and Barnabas to Antioch we enter on that part of the Apostle's career on which we have the fullest information. In the church of Antioch there was organized the first distinctive mission. The story of it is told in Ac chs. 13 and 14.

There is a formal propriety in laying out the life of Paul from this point according to the program in Ac. In harmony with this we have (1) the first missionary journey, through Cyprus and certain cities in Pisidia and Lycaonia, in Ac 13 1-14 28; (2) the second, which, traversing part of the same ground in reverse order, carried the Apostle eventually to Philippi, Thessalonica, and Corinth, and thence once more to Antioch via Jerusalem (if this is implied in 'having gone up and saluted the church,' (Ac 18 22), in Ac 15 40-18 22; (3) the third, which, after passing from Antioch through the Galatian country and Phrygia and through the upper inland parts of Asia, led to a long sojourn in Ephesus. This may have been broken by visits to places within reach, and was terminated when Paul went via Troas to Macedonia, and thence to Corinth, returning once more by the route described in Ac chs. 20 and 21 to Jerusalem—all this in Ac 18 23-21 15. At the same time, there is much to be said for the view of von Dobschütz (Probleme des apostolischen Zeitalters (1904), p. 58), that if we wish to have a really illuminating view of Paul's work it is better to distribute it into two areas than into three periods. In accordance with this scheme he worked first in the regions of Syria and Cilicia, his headquarters being Tarsus and Antioch. Here he had a colleague, perhaps at first something approaching a patron, in Barnabas, and was apparently on some kind of terms with the Jerusalem church. His later sphere of work was in the regions of the Aegean, his headquarters being Ephesus and Corinth. Here he had assistants, but no colleague in the sense in which Barnabas had been a colleague. He was absolutely his own master, and tho he had the most intense desire to keep on terms with Jerusalem and maintain the unity of the body of Christ, he was jealous of his Apostolic independence and resented Jewish Christian intrusion into his churches. When his work in the Aegean regions was done, his mind turned to Spain (Ro 15 24). He would not build on another man's foundation (Ro 15 21; II Co 10 16), and evidently, as Zahn suggests, Egypt and Rome were already occupied.

10. Controversy over Admission of Gentiles. It is impossible to enter into the details of a life so rich, but some features in each period of it must be noted. The churches of Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, founded during the first journey, are identified by many scholars—especially by Ramsay—with the churches of Galatia to which the Epistle is addressed (the South Galatian view). It is a serious but not conclusive argument against this that Paul addresses the churches in question as if they owed their being solely to him (Gal 4 13-20), whereas Barnabas was at this time his colleague and not his inferior. He could hardly have been mentioned in the Epistle only to be censured for 'disimulation,' ὑπόκρισις (2 13). (But see ACTS, § 8, and GALATIANS, § 4.) Against this it is to be noted that from Ac 13 9 Paul becomes the leader of the enterprise (cf. ver. 13, 'Paul and his company'; ver. 16, 'Paul'; vs. 43-50, 'Paul and Barnabas'). However, whether they were or were not the churches of Galatia, it was in connection with them that the controversy broke out which was the subject of the Epistle to the Galatians. While he preached in Pisidia and Lycaonia—which were included in the Roman province of Galatia—Paul had been harassed by unbelieving Jews; after his return, his gospel was challenged by Jewish Christians, who found it not false, but imperfect. They said 'it is needful to circumcise them' (the Gentile converts) 'and to charge them to keep the law of Moses' (Ac 15 5). Paul had evidently preached the gospel implied in his conversion, that Christ crucified and exalted, and the soul's response to Him in faith, are the whole of Christianity; and to him it was as much treason to Christ to supplement this gospel as to supplant it. To condition the Christian standing of the Gentiles by anything statutory was to give it up altogether, and tho Paul was quite willing to be a Jew to Jews (I Co 9 20), he would resist to the uttermost any suggestion that the Gentile must become a Jew in order to be in the full sense a Christian. This would not only mean that he himself had run in vain (εἰς κενόν, Gal 2 2), but that Christ had died for nothing (δωρεάν, ver. 21).

11. The Council Decree. The provisional settle-in which all this was organized can not have been pleasant for Paul, and very likely his stay was short. At Antioch he lingered longer, making his way via the Galatic country and Phrygia to Ephesus. During this second visit to Galatia, according to the 'North Galatian' view (implied in τὸ πρότερον, Gal 4 13; the first is alluded to in Ac 16 6), he was able to warn the disciples (Gal 1 9) against the new gospel which was no gospel, but which was so soon to bewitch them. Ephesus was now for three years Paul's center; 'All they that dwelt in [Roman] Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Greeks' (Ac 19 10), partly by Paul's voice, partly through Pauline Christians like Epaphras (Col 1 7), who introduced the gospel into Colosse, and possibly to places like Hierapolis and Laodicea (Col 2 1, 4 13; Rev ch. 2 f.), where the disciples had not seen Paul's face in the flesh.

15. Troubles in the Corinthian Church. Into the complicated questions connected with Paul's relation to Corinth while at Ephesus it is impossible to enter here. We know that I Co was written from Ephesus, near the end of his stay (16 5-9); that he had written an earlier letter now lost (I Co 5 9); that he had paid a visit to Corinth (his second) in distressing circumstances (II Co 2 1, 12 14, 13 1); that he had written in connection with this another letter, probably lost (tho some seek it in II Co 10 1-13 10. See CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, § 11), 'out of much affliction and anguish of heart, and with many tears' (II Co 2 4); and that what we call II Co, assuming its unity, was written from Macedonia, to which province he proceeded when he was expelled from Ephesus. The distressing circumstances referred to, which were connected with a personal injury of some kind, had been overcome by the letter written 'out of much affliction,' and are finally disposed of in II Co chs. 1-7; chs. 8 and 9 deal with the collection he is making for the poor at Jerusalem (Gal 2 10), and chs. 10-13, on this view, deal with the general condition of the Corinthian church—especially the opposition in it to Paul's apostleship and gospel, and the survivals in the community of pagan immorality (but see CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE, §§ 8-11). He followed his letter quickly, and in the three winter months which he spent in Corinth wrote the Epistle to the Romans. Some scholars also place Gal in this period on the ground that it contains a developed theology, the result of Paul's experience as a preacher, and that it has a close affinity with Ro. But neither of these reasons is conclusive. As has already been shown, Paul's conversion contained implicitly his distinctive gospel; he was then a man of mature age, a learned thinker, who could very rapidly make explicit to himself what was implicit; there is nothing in Gal which would require a theological development covering a number of years after his conversion. The theology of Ga as of Ro represents 'no temporary phase of his thinking,' but the gospel he preached at all times. 'The resemblance is due not to nearness in time, but to oneness of faith.' (See Garvie's Life and Teaching of Paul, pp. 40-47.) Reasons have already been given for an earlier dating of Ga. This earlier date is possible only on the 'South

Galatian' view, but does not necessarily follow from it (per contra, see GALATIANS, Ep. to, §§ 4 f.). All the Epistles of this period deal with the gospel as a doctrine of redemption. They argue, as against men who would introduce a statutory element into Christianity, that it is entirely an affair of grace and of inspiration; that the security in it for holiness is not any system of commands or prohibitions, but union with Christ, the sense of debt to Him, and the indwelling of His spirit; and that apostleship does not depend on historical relation to Jesus, which is in itself of no value, but on the revelation of the Risen Lord (Gal 1 16), the comprehension of the new covenant (II Co ch. 3), a life of devoted service and suffering (II Co chs. 6 and 11), and the Divine attestation of success in evangelic work (I Co 9 2; II Co 3 2 ff.). Ro expounds systematically in calmness of spirit the theology stated controversially with some heat of temper in Gal—an additional reason for allowing a considerable lapse of time between the two epistles.

16. Final Jerusalem Journey. When Paul left Corinth in the spring for Jerusalem he was attended by delegates from most of his churches (Ac 20 4; II Co 8 18; I Co 16 3), in joint charge of 'the collection' (I Co 16 1). He hoped this great proof of Gentile love would unite the churches and conciliate good-will at Jerusalem to himself and his gospel, but he was very anxious and uncertain (Ro 15 30 f.), and against all omens pressed on under some Divine compulsion (Ac 20 23, 21 4, 11-14). The event justified his fears. The N T tells nothing of the way in which the collection was accepted, but we see from Ac 21 20 that the Pharisaic party had entire ascendancy in the church, and tho Paul, to conciliate them, carried compliance to an extreme which it is hard to justify on his own principles (Ac 21 23-26), yet when he fell into the hands of his Jewish enemies, the church does not appear to have done anything to help him.

17. Voyage to Rome. After appearing before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem, and before Felix and Festus at Caesarea, he was compelled to protest against injustice and delay (he had been a prisoner fully two years, Ac 24 27) by exercising his right as a Roman citizen to appeal to the emperor. The voyage to Rome is told by an eye-witness (Ac 27 1-28 16). Paul was probably handed over at its close to the princeps peregrinorum (officer in charge of the foreigners), in a kind of military custody. He rented a house in which for two years he carried on his work unimpeded. The Epistles of his imprisonment belong to this period, and Philippians, which was certainly written in Rome (Colossians [q.v.] and Philemon [q.v.] are by some referred to the Caesarean imprisonment), throws some light on the situation. The gospel had adherents in the palace (Ph 4 22), but there were much dissension and ill-feeling among Christians themselves, even among those engaged in evangelizing (1 15. See PHILIPPIANS, § 1). Loyal and disinterested men, with no by-ends in their Christian work, were rare (2 21). The Pharisaic-Christian propaganda against Paul's work was still going on, and the Apostle warns his beloved Philippians against it in one of his most passionate and scornful outbursts (3 2). (But see PHILIPPIANS, § 1.) The great characteristic of the prison Epistles, however, is their Christology. It is perhaps incorrect, in view of I Co 8 6, II Co 8 9, to speak of an advance or development in Paul's thought; everything is latent in these passages which is unfolded in Col 1 13 ff.; Ph 2 5 ff. But where as in the controversial Epistles of the third journey (I and II Co, Gal, Ro) Christianity is presented as a doctrine of redemption having the Son of God indeed as its center (Ro 1 4; II Co 1 19), it is in the Epistles of the imprisonment presented more directly as a doctrine of Christ. If this needs to be supplemented, we may add—and of the Church as the body of Christ. Christ is in the forefront in Col, the body of Christ in Eph. The sum of both may be given in the words of Col 2 9: 'In him dwelleth all the fulness of the godhead bodily, and in him ye are made full.' Christ has absolute significance for the Apostle; all things have to be defined by relation to Him. God is revealed in Him alone; creation is constituted in Him alone; the Church is brought into being, and has its being, in Him alone. No one knows what God is, or the universe, or the Church, or redemption, apart from Him; but in Him the full and final meaning of all is disclosed. The Apostle, so to speak, takes the metaphysical responsibilities of his doctrine of redemption, and sets the example to believers of Christianizing all their ideas of God, man, and the universe. Christ is held up not only as a historical person, with whom the Twelve had associated—not only as a representative or a universal person, the second Adam—but unequivocally as an eternal and Divine person. The occasion for this, no doubt, lay in external circumstances; but the possibility of it and the impulse to it could only lie within, in the Christian experience of the Apostle himself (see COLOSSIANS, § 2, and EPHESIANS, § 4).

18. Release and Second Imprisonment. The life of Paul can not be clearly traced beyond Ac 28 31. If the imprisonment at Rome here recorded ended in condemnation and his death, the author of Ac must have known, and it is difficult to say why he not only did not tell, but actually suggests (as ver. 30 f. do) the opposite, unless he intended, as has been suggested, to write a third treatise. A favorable issue to his trial was also confidently expected by Paul himself; see Phm ver. 22; Ph 1 24 ff., 2 24, from which it appears that he meant after his long confinement to visit his churches in Macedonia and Asia. Further, the Pastoral Epistles, whether genuine or not, show that this view was prevalent in the early Church (but see TIMOTHY and TITUS, Err. ro). If the Pastoral Epistles are genuine they show that Paul's appeal to Caesar was successful; that he obtained his liberty and revisited many of the scenes of his former activity (Ephesus, Macedonia, Troas, Corinth, Miletus), besides breaking new ground (Crete, Nicopolis in Epirus); and that he carried through an organizing work, of which Ac has no record. Whether he succeeded in his plan of advancing to Spain is not certain: the reference to 'the limit of the West' (τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως) in Clement of Rome is an argument that he did. If this assumption is correct, Paul was acquitted on his first trial before the Neronian persecution broke out in 64 A.D.; but as all tradition ascribes his martyrdom to Nero, he must have been rearrested, and have undergone the imprisonment referred to in the Pastorals, before that emperor died in 68. (See for Pauline dates, in general, NEW TESTAMENT CHRONOLOGY.) It is, however, maintained by some scholars that the Pastoral Epistles can not be regarded as genuine, altho they contain authentic fragments, dealing with events, persons and situations which can be fitted into the historical framework of Acts. Dr. Harrison has worked out such a theory in great detail, having dealt with the linguistic phenomena more fully than has been done before. (See PASTORAL EPISTLES.)

LITERATURE: The best short introduction to St. Paul's life and work is Sabatier's L'Apôtre Paul (Eng. transl. edited by Findlay, 1896); Lewin's Life and Epp. of St. Paul (1875); Ramsay's St. Paul the Traveler (1896), and The Church in the Roman Empire (1893); A. Deissmann, Paul (Eng. transl. 1912), most instructive as to Paul's relation to contemporary conditions; A. E. Garvie, The Life and Teaching of Paul (1910); H. Weinel, St. Paul, the Man and His Work (1906), are all helpful for understanding the outward conditions which affected Paul's work. Of his experience attractive presentations are offered by Gardner, The Religious Experience of St. Paul (1911), and Deissmann, The Religion of Jesus and the Faith of Paul (1924), altho the second unduly depreciates the value of St. Paul as a theologian. His significance for to-day is discussed in Penbody, The Apostle Paul and the Modern World (1923); cf. also D. M. Ross, The Faith of St. Paul (1923); C. H. Dodd, The Meaning of Paul for To-day (1923); A. H. McNeile, N T Teachings in the Light of St. Paul's (1923); C. E. Jefferson, The Character of Paul (1923). Of Introductions to the Epistles Holtzmann's (1892) on the critical and Zahn's (1906, Eng. transl. 1908) on the conservative side are unrivaled; but Jülicher's (1906, Eng. transl. 1904) and Godet's (1893, Eng. transl. 1894) are infinitely more readable, and for most readers very serviceable. Commentaries in English: Lightfoot (Galatians 1887, Colossians and Philemon 1879; Philippians 1888, and Notes on Epp. of St. Paul, 1895); Gifford (1906); Sanday and Headlam on Romans in ICC (1895); Edwards on I Co (1885); Findlay on I Co (1900); Robertson and Plummer on I and II Co in ICC (1911, 1915). Paul's theology can be studied in Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity (1894); Stevens, N T Theology (1899); Somerville, St. Paul's Conception of Christ (1897); Pfeiderer's first book on the subject, Der Paulinismus (1890, Eng. transl. of 1st ed. 1877); Holtzmann's Lehrbuch der neut. Theologie (1911); Feine's Theologie des Neuen Testaments (1919), and Weisslecker's Das apostolische Zeitalter (1892, Eng. transl. 1894-95) are indispensable to students. Cf. also H. A. A. PAULUS, pō'lus, SERGIUS (Σέργιος Παῦλος): The proconsul of Cyprus when Paul visited the island on his first missionary journey. In 22 B.C. Cyprus became a senatorial province and was henceforth governed by a proconsul, or a proprator with title and rank of proconsul. Luke's accuracy in employing the title proconsul in Ac 13 7 is vindicated not only by the above-named facts, but also by an inscription at Karavastasi (ancient Soli, on the N. coast of Cyprus), in which Paulus is mentioned as proconsul. Of the twenty known governors of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus (45 A.D.) is known solely from Luke and the inscription of Soli. (Cf. Hogarth, Devia Cypria, p. 113 f.).

PAVEMENT: The terms martsephelh (II K 16 17) and rûsaphāh (II Ch 7 3; Est 1 6; Ezk 40 17 f., 42 3), both from rûsaph, 'to arrange in layers, or rows,' refer to stone carefully laid in order, probably in plaster. Such stonework constituted the border of the floor of the Temple court and of the banqueting hall of the Persian king. On the occurrence of the term in Jn 19 13, see JERUSALEM, § 44. E. E. N.

PAVILION: The rendering of šōkh, šukkāh 'booth,' 'tabernacle,' or 'tent-like dwelling.' The word is used in the literal sense in Is 4 6, 'tabernacle' AV; Nu 25 8, 'tent' AV; I K 20 12, 16, 'huts' RVmg., and also figuratively in poetry designating the mystery which surrounds the person of God (Ps 27 5, 31 20). A. C. Z.

PEACE: The two words translated 'peace' in EV have a greater range of meaning than is at first apparent to the English reader.<sup>1</sup>

(1) The Heb. shālōm (primarily 'completeness,' 'soundness') comprehends (a) cessation from war (Jos 9 15; Ec 3 8); (b) friendship between individuals (Gn 26 29; Ps 28 3) or with God, especially in the covenant relations (Nu 25 12; Is 54 10); (c) tranquillity or contentment (Is 32 17 f.); and (d) in varying degrees of emphasis, almost everything which makes for safety, welfare, and happiness. 'Peace' is thus the most comprehensive and highly prized gift of God, and is promised as the crowning blessing of the Messianic Age (e.g., in Is 9 6 f.; Mic 5 5). (2) These conceptions were all carried over into the N T εἰρήνη, which appropriated even greater breadth and depth of meaning, culminating specifically in that peace which is the gift of Christ (Jn 14 27, 16 33; Ro 5 1; Ph 4 7). This peculiarly Christian blessing may be defined as 'the tranquil state of a soul assured of its salvation through Christ, and so fearing nothing from God, and content with its earthly lot, of whatever sort that is' (Thayer, Gr. Lex. of the N T). 'Peace' is the favorite Biblical greeting (often, however, translated 'well' in EV, e.g., Gn 29 6; II K 4 20), both oral (I S 1 17; II K 9 22; Lk 24 36) and written (Ezr 4 17; Dn 4 1; every N T Epistle except Ja and I Jn), and to this day is one of the most common words upon Semitic lips. See SALUTATION.

For the peace-offering (shelem), which may have been considered as solemnizing an alliance of peace, see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10.

L. G. L.—E. C. L.

PEACE-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 10.

PEACOCKS (פִּתְיוֹן, tukkiyyōm): These fowls are mentioned as imported by Solomon in connection with his trade with S. Arabia and the East (I K 10 22; II Ch 9 21). Some modern scholars doubt the correctness of the reading. In Job 39 13 the Heb. r'nānīm means 'ostriches' (cf. RV). E. E. N.

PEARL (μαργαρίτης): A gem very much prized in N T times and used as an ornament (Mt 7 6, 13 46; I Ti 2 9; Rev 17 4, 21 21). Its use among the ancient Hebrews, however, is extremely doubtful. The word so translated in Job 28 18 AV (gābhīsh) occurs but this once in the O T, and its cognates in Assyrian and Eth. show that the RV 'crystal' is more correct (cf. Oxf. Heb. Lex.). A. C. Z.

PECULIAR PEOPLE (TREASURE): A phrase in the AV which renders certain expressions that denote the conception of proprietorship in its most intense form. The Heb. term lying at the basis of them all (š'ghullāh, 'possession') was evidently at first applied to treasure cherished and kept in reserve for oneself as a source of exceptional pleasure and value, possibly also held dear because it cost special effort in the acquisition (I Ch 29 3; Ec 2 8). Afterward, and as attached to the word 'people,' it signified God's special and exclusive relation to Israel ('am š'ghullāh, 'people of possession'), and might be paraphrased: 'people jealously cherished and guarded as a treasure' (Dt 7 6, 14 2, 26 18). But even with the word 'people' omitted, the term still designated Israel as J''s own treasure (Ex 19 5; Ps 135 4, 'peculiar treasure' AV). The thought is the same as in Dt 32 9, 'J''s portion is his people.' In the N T the phrase is merely reproduced in citations from the O T (λαὸς περιούσιος, Tit 2 14; λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν, I P 2 9; cf. Eph 1 14), the difference in translation being due to the strongly idiomatic nature of the original Heb. The RV consistently carries through the accurate, tho paraphrastic rendering, 'people for God's [my, his] own possession.' A. C. Z.

PEDAHEL, ped'a-hel (פְּדָהֵל, p'dhah'el), 'God has redeemed': A 'prince' of Naphtali (Nu 34 28).

PEDAHZUR, pi-dā'zūr or ped'a-zūr (פְּדָחְזֹר, p'dhahzūr), 'the Rock has redeemed': The father of Gamaliel, 'chief' of Manasseh (Nu 1 10, 2 20, etc.).

PEDALIAH, pi-dē'ya (פְּדִיָּה, p'dhāyāh, פְּדִיָּה, p'dhā-yāh, in I Ch 27 20), 'J' hath ransomed': 1. The grandfather of King Jehoiaakim (II K 23 36). 2. The third son (I Ch 3 18) of King Jehoachin (Jechoniah), and probably born in Babylon, as his father was under nineteen when taken into exile (II K 24 8 f.). According to I Ch 3 19, he was the father of Zerubbabel, who elsewhere is called son of Shealtiel, brother of P. 3. The father of Joel, ruler under David of Manasseh, W. of the Jordan (I Ch 27 20). 4. A son of Parosh, and a helper in repairing the wall (Neh 3 25). 5. One who stood at the left of Ezra when he read the Law (Neh 8 4). 6. A Levite, appointed by Nehemiah on his second visit to Jerusalem, and as one of the treasurers in charge of receiving and distributing the tithes (Neh 13 13). 7. A Benjamite, the ancestor, in the third generation, of Sallu, a postexilic inhabitant of Jerusalem (Neh 11 7; cf. I Ch 9 7). C. S. T.

PEDESTAL. See TEMPLE, § 15.

PEEL: This term is the AV translation of māraṭ, 'to pull out, or off [feathers, or hair].' In Is 18 2, 7, in a description of the Ethiopians, we read, 'a nation scattered and peeled' (AV), 'tall and smooth' (RV), 'dragged away and peeled' (RVmg.). 'Smooth' or 'polished' would seem to be the best rendering, and in keeping with the primary meaning of the Heb. For 'peeled' (Ezk 29 18 AV) ARV has 'worn' (by the chafing of burdens). In Gn 30 37, 38, 'peeled' RV is the correct translation of the Fi'el of pātsal (instead of the archaic 'pilled' of AV). C. S. T.

PEEP. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 4.

PEKAH, pī'ka (פֶּקָח, peqah): The son of Remaliah, and king of Israel (736-733 B.C.). Under Pekahiah, son of Menahem, P. was general-in-chief of the armies of Israel. He did not, however, share his master's disposition to trust in Assyria, who was by inheritance and choice a pro-Assyrian. Accordingly P., growing impatient, broke into the palace of Samaria with a band of 150 Gileadites, slew Pekahiah, and took the reins of government into his own hands. He then assisted in organizing an anti-Assyrian league, with Rezin of Damascus and the kings of Arvad, Gaza, Ashkelon, Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the Arabian queen Shamsie. Judah declined to join the alliance, and a special coalition was formed between Rezin and Pekah with the object of attacking Jerusalem, dethroning Ahaz, and placing Tabeel (q.v.) in his stead (Is 7 6). According to II Ch 28 5 ff. (the details of which account have little or no support in the earlier sources in II K 16 5 ff. and Is ch. 7), the war which ensued, commonly called the Syro-Ephraimitish war, lasted only a few months. Jerusalem was attacked by a large army; Edom took occasion to seize upon Elath on the Red Sea, and general havoc was wrought throughout Judah. The numbers (120,000 slain and 200,000 captives taken by the allies) given by the Chronicler are incredibly large. But evidently Ahaz was driven to extremities. Contrary to the advice of the prophet Isaiah, he appealed for help to Tiglath-pileser III. Upon the arrival of the Assyrians the allies hastily abandoned the siege of Jerusalem and found themselves compelled to protect their own territories. Tiglath-pileser III carried on a campaign of devastation in the Northern Kingdom, subjugated the territory as far as the Sea of Gennesaret and deported the leading citizens of the country (II K 15 29). P.'s policy was thus proved to be a failure. His opponents of the pro-Assyrian faction seized the opportunity of forming a conspiracy by which he was deposed and slain, and Hoshea, their leader was elevated to the throne.

PEKAHIAH, pek''a-hai'a (פֶּקֶחְיָה, peqahyāh), 'J' opens': The son of Menahem, King of Israel (II K 15 22-26; 737-736 B.C.). His father had declared himself in favor of political friendship with the great Assyrian Empire. Pekahiah seems to have been unable to maintain this pro-Assyrian policy. In less than two years from his accession he fell a victim to a political and military conspiracy. The troubles of the times are pictured in the prophecies of Hosea.

PEKOD, pī'ked (פֶּקֶד, peqōd): A Chaldean people in the Babylonian army (Ezk 23 23; cf. Jer 50 21), the Pukadu of the Assyrian inscriptions, a tribe in SE. Babylonia, adjoining Elam. Some find in Jer 50 21 (cf. mg. 'visitation') a symbolic name for 'Babylon.'

C. S. T.

PELAIAH, pī-lē'ya or pel''a-ai'a (פֶּלְיָה, pēlā'yāh), and פֶּלְיָה, pēlā'yāh, 'God has done a wonder': 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 24). 2. One of Ezra's assistants (Neh 8 7). 3. A prominent Levite (Neh 10 10).

PELALIAH, pel''a-lai'a (פֶּלְאִיָּה, pēlā'yāh), 'J' judges': A priest (Neh 11 12).

PELATIAH, pel''a-tai'a (פֶּלְטִיָּה, pēlā'yāh [also pēlā'yāhū]), 'J' delivers': 1. A Simeonite leader (I Ch 4 42). 2. A prince of Judah, in Jerusalem, seen in a vision by Ezekiel in Babylonia as guilty of death (Ezk 11 1 ff.). The death of P., which followed immediately, was also, apparently, made known to the prophet in his vision (11 13), tho, as in many other places in Ezekiel, it is difficult to distinguish between the symbolic and the actual. 3. A grandson of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 21). 4. The name of a postexilic family (Neh 10 22).

PELEG, pī'leg. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

PELET, pī'let (פֶּלֶט, pelet): 1. A Calebite clan (I Ch 2 47). 2. A Benjamite who attached himself to David (I Ch 12 3).

PELETH, pī'leth (פֶּלֶת, peleth): 1. The name of a family of Reuben (Nu 16 1), perhaps the same as Pallu (q.v.). 2. A descendant of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 33).

PELETHITE, pel'-thait or pī'leth-ait. See CHERETHITES AND PELETHITES.

PELICAN. See PALESTINE, § 25.

PELONITE, pel'o-nait (פֶּלֹנִי, pēlōnī): The designation of two individuals in I Ch 11 27, 27 10, and 11 36. But the text should be corrected according to the l's in II S ch. 23—in the first instance to 'Pal-tite' (II S 23 26), in the second, to 'Gilonite' (II S 23 34).

PEN. See BOOKS AND WRITING, § 2.

PENCE. See MONEY, II.

PENCIL (פֶּנֶץ, seredh, line AV): An instrument used for marking on wood, preparatory to carving (only Is 44 13). Some would translate 'red chalk' (cf. RVmg.), others 'stylus.' See also ARTIZAN LIFE, § 5.

C. S. T.

PENDANT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 2.

PENIEL, pī-nai'el. See PENUEL.

PENINNAH, pī-nin'a (פִּנְנָה, pēninnāh): One of the wives of Elkanah (I S 1 2, 4).

PENKNIFE: The term renders the Heb. ta'ar šōphēr, 'the knife of the scribe,' i.e., the small knife used in making and keeping in order reed pens (Jer 36 23). See also BOOKS AND WRITING, § 2.

PENNY, PENNYWORTH. See MONEY, II.

PEN OF THE WRITER: An expression found in Jg 5 14 AV. The passage is well rendered by Moore (ICC, J), 'those who carry the muster-master's staff.' Burney would omit 'muster-master's' as a gloss.

PENTATEUCH, pen'ta-tiūk. See HEXATEUCH, § 1.

PENTECOST, pen'ti-kost (πεντηκοστή, seil. hūepā), 'the fiftieth [day]': This term is used in II Mac 12 32; To 2 1; Philo, De Septen., § 21, for the second of the great annual feasts (q.v.) of the Hebrews, which fell fifty days after the beginning of the harvest (Lv 23 15, 16). In the later literature it is sometimes designated by the Aramaic name 'atsarta, 'closing' (cf. Jos. Ant. III, 10 6).

1. In the O T. In Ex 23 16 (E) the second of the annual feasts is called the 'feast of the harvest,' which is more specifically described as 'the first-fruits of thy labors, which thou sowest in the field.' In Ex 34 22 (J) it is called the 'feast of weeks,' where the time is more definitely specified as the beginning of the wheat harvest. In Dt 16 9 the latter term is explained as derived from the length of the interval (seven weeks) between the beginning and end of the harvest, i.e., the wheat harvest. It followed the Feast of Unleavened Bread, which marked the beginning of the harvest. No regulations are given in the legislation of Dt for the observance of the feast. It simply emphasizes the joyfulness which is to characterize its observance, the free-will character of its offerings, and its nature as a tribute to J". On the other hand, in the Holiness Code (Lv 23 16 f.) the time of the feast is set at seven Sabbaths complete after the morrow of the Sabbath following the presentation of the first-fruits' (vs. 15-16a), and specific sacrifices are prescribed (vs. 16b-20). The day is to be observed with a convocation, and no servile work is to be done (ver. 21). The Priestly Code (P) (Nu 28 26 f.) does not specify the date of the feast, this being naturally determined by the date of the Passover, which falls on the 15th of Nisan. In addition to the offerings prescribed in the Holiness Code, the regular offerings of the Passover Feast are required (vs. 26-31; cf. Nu 28 19 f.). The briefer and less specific prescriptions for this feast in the Priestly Code as compared with those for the Passover and Tabernacles indicate that, at the time of the compilation of this legislation, it was of relatively less importance than the other feasts, while its purely agricultural character in all the codes and the absence of any attempt to connect it with events in the national history (as, e.g., in the case of the Passover, Ex ch. 12; Dt 16 3) indicate that it originated after the settlement of the Hebrew tribes, being borrowed probably from the Canaanites.

2. In Philo, Josephus, and Later Jewish Literature. Later references to the feast in Philo and Josephus show little change in its character. Philo (De Sec., § 30; cf. De Septen., § 21) simply interprets allegorically the O T regulations, emphasizing especially their Sabbatical character. Josephus mentions ministrations in the Temple by the priests at night (BJ, VI, 5 3), and a sacrificial meal participated in by the priests alone (Ant. II, 10 6). At a later period, however (cf. Talmudic tractate Pesach 68b), it was celebrated as the feast of the giving of the Law, because of the general coincidence of its date with that of the promulgation of the Sinaitic law (Ex 19 1 ff.). This is strikingly brought out in the Book of Jubilees, where a number of Divine revelations are said to have been given on the day of the Feast of Pentecost (1 1, 6 1, 14 1, 15 1).

3. In the Early Church. Paul's desire to be at Jerusalem at P. (I Co 16 8; Ac 20 16) indicates that on the occasion of this feast Jerusalem was visited by Jews from abroad (cf. Jos. Ant. XIV, 13 4; XVII, 10 2). This may account in part for the choice of this time for the first great Apostolic proclamation of the Gospel (Ac 2 14). Moreover, the close association of the outpouring of the Spirit with the day of Pentecost in Ac 2 1 (especially according to the text of D) is in line with the tendency already noted (§ 2, above) to change the feast from one of thanksgiving to a memorial of Divine revelation. This association is even more strongly brought out in early Christian literature (cf. especially Augustine Epist. 54 ad Jan.).

It is to be observed that in early Christian custom the celebration of P. occupied the whole period between Easter and the outpouring of the Spirit (cf. Tert. De Bapt., 19; Orig. Contra Celsum, 8, 22; Const. Apos., 5, 20), not being limited to one day until the Council of Elvira in 305. See also FESTS AND FEASTS, § 7.

PENUEL, pi-nū'el, or PENIEL, pi-nai'el (פְּנֵאֵל, פְּנֵאֵל, and פְּנֵאֵל, פְּנֵאֵל), 'the face of God': I. The name of the place near which Jacob crossed the river Jabbok (Gn 32 30 f.) after his 'wrestling' with the angel. The Heb. tradition sought thus to explain the name, but the basis of the story utilized in Gn was probably a legend connected with the ancient (pre-Israelitic) sanctuary at Penuel. It is mentioned later as a fortified place, the tower of P. (Jg 8 8-17), and still later as 'built,' i.e., strengthened by Jeroboam I (I K 12 25). Site unknown. II. The name of two individuals. 1. The 'father' of Gedor (I Ch 4 4). 2. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 25).

E. E. N.

PEOPLE: Of the various Heb. terms rendered 'people,' the one most distinctive and used in the vast majority (about 95 per cent.) of instances is 'am, from a root (H, עָם in Ges.-Buhl) meaning 'to build together,' and thus primarily a body of people bound together by some bond, probably used in the first place of a tribe or clan in which the bond was kinship. It is used of a people as a political entity, while gōy, 'nation,' emphasized the racial distinctions. Israel was an 'am, and, particularly, the 'people' of J". Naturally, the word is often used in a general sense. In late O T times the expression 'am hā'ārets, 'the people of the land,' was used technically for the non-Jewish element in the land (Ezr 4 4, 10 2, etc.). In post-Biblical Judaism this expression came to mean the ignorant (Jews) in contrast to the learned. In the N T, the two main words are λαός, the equivalent of the O T 'am and used in much the same way (Mt 1 21; Mk 11 32, etc.), and ὄχλος, 'crowd' or 'multitude,' but often used in a less specific sense for people in general (Mt 7 28, etc.).

PEOPLE OF THE EAST. See EAST; EAST COUNTRY; and CHILDREN OF THE EAST.

PEOR, pi'ar (פְּאֹר, happē'ār), 'the Peor': A mountain of Moab, overlooking Jeshimon (q.v.) (Nu 23 28). According to Buhl, Geog. Pal., p. 123, it lay to the N. of Nebo, but this identification is uncertain. It was probably the seat of the worship of 'the Baal of Peor' (see BAAL-PEOR), which is meant by 'Peor' in Nu 25 18, 31 16; Jos 22 17.

E. E. N.

PERAZIM, per'a-zim (פֶּרָאִים, perāsim), 'breaches': A mountain referred to in Is 28 21 as the scene of some well-known event, probably that of II S 5 20. See BAAL-PERAZIM.

PERDITION. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 49.

PEREA, pi-rī'a (Περαία): The name given by Josephus to the portion of Palestine E. of the Jordan. In the O T this is called 'ebher hayyardēn, 'the other side of the Jordan' (Gn 50 10 f.; Nu 22 1, etc.) and in the N T (where the word 'Perea' does not occur) πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, 'beyond the Jordan' (Mt 4 15, 19 1, etc.). In the time of Christ Perea with Galilee was under the dominion of Herod Antipas. See PALESTINE, §§ 13 and 37.

E. E. N.

PERES. See MENE, MENE, etc.

PERESH, pī'resh (פֶּרֶשׁ, peresh): A son of Machir (I Ch 7 16).

PEREZ, pī'rez (פֶּרֶז, perets), 'a breach': Pharez AV in O T, except in I Ch 27 3 and Neh 11 4, 6; Phares in N T Mt 1 3; Lk 3 33: One of the twin sons of Judah and Tamar (Gn 38 29). The tribe of Judah was, accordingly, subdivided into the two branches of Perezites and Zerathites (Pharizites and Zarhites, Nu 26 20 AV). The Perezite branch was again subdivided into Hezronite, from Hezron, and the Hamulites, from Hamul. David was a Perezite, which fact gave the clan the preeminence after his days (Ru 4 13). It was also further glorified by Jashobeam, a general under David (I Ch 27 3). The name of Perez naturally occurs in the genealogy of Christ.

A. C. Z.

PEREZ-UZZAH, -uz'a (פֶּרֶז וּזְאָה, perets 'uzzāh), 'the breach of Uzzah': The name given to the place where Uzzah was smitten for touching the Ark (II S 6 8; I Ch 13 11).

PERFECT, PERFECTION: Perfection is in the O T ascribed to God, to man, and to impersonal objects. (1) When applied to impersonal objects (shālēm, e.g., 'A perfect and just weight,' Dt 25 15; nākhōn, 'established,' 'perfected,' the 'perfect day,' Pr 4 18, etc.), the word is the synonym of 'complete,' i.e., full in measure, ideal in quality and with exactly fitted parts. The notion does not, however, occur with an attempt at precision, but with the same freedom and approximation to exactness as outside the Bible. (2) When applied to the Divine character or works, from the nature of the case, the term must connote absolutely the best in all respects that it is possible for the speaker to think of (tāmīm, II S 22 31; Ps 18 32; Job 37 16; Dt 32 4). (3) When used of man it denotes, first of all, conformity to the ideal entertained at the time, and is therefore a relative and quite variable and expansive term. David claims to be perfect in this sense (Ps 18 23), tho elsewhere confessing sinfulness (Ps 51 3 ff.). Asa was perfect because his attitude was right in all things, tho his conduct in the matter of removing the high places did not conform to the law of J'' (shālēm, I K 15 14). This kind of perfection was attained by many of the towering figures of Israel's history. Noah and Job were perfect (tāmīm, Gn 6 9; Job 1 1, 8, 2 3). It is a duty to attain such perfection (Dt 18 13).

In the N T use of the term the ethical element as distinguished from the statutory, the positive as distinguished from the negative, and the inward as distinguished from the outward become prominent. The notion thus becomes absolute. When Jesus holds up the ideal it is to show it as existing in God (Mt 5 48). Mere performance of duty does not make perfect (Lk 17 10). In the Apostolic teaching the light shed by the life and example of Jesus is thrown on the idea (Ph 2 5; Eph 4 32). And this is finally worked out in the Ep. to the Hebrews into a 'doctrine of perfection' (7 11, 12 23).

PERFUMER. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2.

PERGA, pūr'ga (Πέργη): In Roman times the capital of Pamphylia, situated near the mouth of the Cestrus. P. was captured by Alexander on his eastward march, but played only an insignificant rôle in history. It was the seat of a famous cult of the Asiatic Nature-Goddess, locally known as Leto, akin to the 'Artemis of the Ephesians,' and called the 'Queen of Perga.' Her figure and temple appear on coins of P. The site of this temple, which was plundered by Verres, is not positively identified, but probably it was on the Acropolis, N. of the city. The ruins of P. show that it was a wealthy town. The well-preserved theater seated 13,000 people; the stadium is also well preserved. Besides these there are ruins of a palestra, baths, agora, covered market-porticoes, and a basilica. It was at P. that Paul first landed on the soil of Asia Minor, Ac 13 13, and here it was, perhaps, that he was afflicted with a severe illness (malaria, the 'thorn in the flesh' of II Co 12 7). On their return from the mission in S. Galatia, Paul and Barnabas 'spoke the word in P.' with what success Ac does not say (Ac 14 25). See ASIA MINOR, III, § 12.

J. R. S. S.—S. A.

PERGAMUM, pūr'ga-mum (Πέργαμον): A city of Mysia, situated 15 m. from the sea, at the confluence of two small rivers in the Caicus valley. It lay at the foot of a lofty, steep, terraced hill, towering 1,000 ft. above the plain and crowned by an acropolis, the site of the earliest settlement, said to have been made by Arcadian colonists under Telephus, son of Heracles. The Greek element predominated as early as Persian times. Attalus I (241-197), was the first ruler to assume the title of king. He defeated the Gauls, about 235, and quartered them in that portion of Phrygia thenceforth known as Galatia (see ASIA MINOR, III, 5). In commemoration of his victory, he erected as a votive monument the famous Gigantomachia at Athens, of which the 'Dying Gaul' (Gladiator) is a reminiscence. Attalus I consolidated his kingdom by a wise alliance with Rome, which used P. as a 'buffer-state' between Macedonia and Syria. In emulation of Alexandria and Rhodes, Attalus I proved himself a liberal patron of all industries, but especially of letters, learning (the school of rhetoric greatly influenced Roman oratory and learning), and art (the Pergamenian school of sculpture). His son, Eumenes II (197-159), continued the policy of alliance with the Romans in their wars with Antiochus and Perseus. He fought with Scipio at Magnesia (191), and on the fall of Antiochus (190) received the Thracian Chersonesus and the cis-Tauran domains of Antiochus. His kingdom was almost identical with the ancient kingdom of Croesus (Phrygia, Lydia, Pisidia, Pamphylia, parts of Lycaonia, and perhaps Caria). He founded the famous library, which Antony afterward gave to Cleopatra (200,000 rolls), who incorporated it in the library of Alexandria. In commemoration of the victory over the Gauls, he built on the Acropolis a great altar (40 ft. high) to Zeus, the Savior ('the throne of Satan' Rev 2 13), which he decorated with sculptures and a colossal frieze in high relief, depicting the battle between gods (Pergamenians) and giants (Gauls). This was one of the marvels of the age and now decorates the Berlin Museum. He was succeeded by his brother Attalus II (Philadelphus) (159-138), also a patron of art and letters and founder of Attalia and Philadelphia (q.v.). His nephew Attalus III (Philometor) at the close of his short reign (138-133) bequeathed his kingdom to Rome. In 130 B.C. the Romans organized the kingdom of Pergamum into Provincia Asia (see ASIA MINOR, III, § 1) with Pergamum as capital (hence Rev 2 12 the 'sword,' the symbol of Roman authority), seat of a coventus (judicial district), and center from which radiated the Roman roads for western Asia Minor. During the reign of Eumenes II the librarians of Alexandria, jealous of the library of Pergamum, induced Ptolemy to prohibit the exportation of papyrus (for bookmaking). This prohibition redounded to the good of mankind, for it led to the invention of parchment (Pergamena charta), a more enduring material for books, alluded to in Rev 2 17, 'I will give him' (not your white parchment, but something even more durable) 'a white stone' (or tessera, and I will imitate the example of Octavianus with his new imperial title Augustus, and will write upon the white stone) 'a new name' (of God). The catalog of the library of P., made by Crates, was of great value to writers on the history of literature. A globe of the earth stood in the front court of the king's palace. P. was the birthplace of the rhetor Apollodorus and of the physician Galenus. It was famous for the worship of Aesclepius, to whose shrine and school of medicine ailing visitors flocked from everywhere. It early accepted Christianity and was one of the 'Seven Churches' addressed in Rev 2 12-17. Tho the Attalids were less greedy for divine honors than the Seleucids and the Romans, P. became a noted center of the imperial cult as attested by its proud little 'Thrice-Neokorus.' A temple was erected on the Acropolis to Augustus, who appears on a marble pediment as 'Son of God, God Sebastos.' Hadrian also appears as 'God' on an altar-piece bearing an inscription of a choir-gild. This cult was maintained by gilds of Theologi (cf. title Theologos of John). P. was also a stronghold of magic (cf. R. Wünsch) which wrought such terror in Asia Minor. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

PERIDA, pi-ri'da. See PERUDA.

PERIZZITE, per'i-zait (פִּרִּיזִּי, p'rizzî): One of the races in Canaan which the Israelites were expected to displace (Ex 33 2; Dt 20 17). There is much uncertainty as to their character and affiliations. They were not a race of great importance like the Hittites and Amorites, or even the Canaanites. Their name is not given in Gn ch. 10 among the descendants of Canaan (peoples of the Canaanite group). It has therefore been suggested that they were the aborigines of Palestine whom the Canaanites dispossessed and enslaved (Dillmann, Com. on Gn., ch. 10). According to a better theory, they were not a race at all, but a class or caste among the Canaanites, noted for dwelling in villages (cf. Moore, on Jg 1 5 in ICC).

A. C. Z.

PERPETUAL: This term is the rendering of three Heb. words: (1) nētsah or netsah, the root idea of which is 'brightness' or 'brilliance' and then 'continuance' (Ps 9 6, 74 3; Jer 8 5 [the verbal form], 15 18; Am 1 11). (2) tāmīdh, 'continuance' or 'continual,' in the sense of taking place day by day continually (Ex 30 8; Lv 6 20; Ezk 46 14). (3) ōlām, 'age' or 'age-long,' much like the Gr. αἰών, αἰώνιος, and used sometimes in a sense practically equivalent to 'eternal' (Jer 5 22; Hab 3 6, etc.), but generally in a less absolute sense (Gn 9 12; Ex 29 9, etc.). E. E. N.

PERSECUTION: All the words rendered 'persecution' and 'persecute,' with the exception of θλιψις (Ac 11 19), etymologically lead back to the notion of pursuing. The persecutor is pictured as hunting and following after the persecuted. The idea of persecution, as 'oppression for the sake of conscience,' is only vaguely present in the O T. It came to the foreground through the experiences of the Maccabean age, especially under Antiochus Epiphanes. In the N T it is always held in view as a possibility (Mt 13 21; Mk 10 30), and so made a matter of record when it occurs in fact (Ac 8 1).

A. C. Z.

PERSEPOLIS, per-sep'o-lis (Περσέπολις): The ancient capital of Persia proper, plundered by Alexander the Great. It is referred to in II Mac 9 2 as the city which was entered by Antiochus Epiphanes (circa 165 B.C.) for the purpose of robbing a temple (cf. I Mac 6 1). But it is improbable that a temple was then at Persepolis. E. E. N.

PERSIA, PERSIANS: Persia (Πέρση, pāraš) is the name given in the O T to a country lying SE. of Susiana and NW. of Carmania with the Persian Gulf to the SW. and Arabia to the NE. Like Media, it was inhabited by people of Aryan (more precisely, Iranian) stock. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 6. P. sprang into sudden importance with the appearance of Cyrus the Great (529 B.C.), under whose leadership its people overthrew the Median supremacy, gained control of Media and thus established an empire of their own. Cyrus then proceeded to capture Babylon (538 B.C.), which was at the time in the hands of the weak successors of Nebuchadnezzar. The whole of the vast possessions of Babylon, including Judea, were transferred to the new empire. Media, tho subject to P., must, however, have occupied a privileged place, as its name is associated with that of Persia in the title of the controlling powers ('Persia and Media,' Est 1 3, 10 2; cf. also the usual designation 'Medo-Persian Empire'). The monarchy founded by Cyrus was ruled successively by Cambyses (529-521), Darius I, Hystaspes (522-486), Xerxes I (486-465), Artaxerxes I, Longimanus (465-424), Darius II, Nothus (424-405), Artaxerxes II, Mnemon (405-359), Artaxerxes III, Ochus (359-338), Arses (338-336), and Darius III, Codomannus (336-331). Of these the O T knows and names Cyrus (Is 45 1), Darius I (Hag 1 1, 2 10; Zec 1 1), Xerxes ('Ahasuerus,' Est 1 1, etc.; Ezr 4 7), Artaxerxes I (Ezr ch. 7 passim; Neh ch. 2 passim), and possibly Darius III, Codomannus. With the conquest of P. by Alexander (333-331 B.C.) the empire came to an end. The subsequent return to power of a Persian dynasty (the Sassanids), at the end of the Parthian domination (226 A.D.), falls outside the limits of the Biblical period.

The religion of the ancient Persians was a dualistic system, either devised or perfected by Zoroaster (Zarathustra, c. 600 B.C.). Its sacred book was the Zend-Avesta and its two eternal principles Ahuramazda (Ormuzd) and Ahriman (Angra-Mainyu). In the main, this system appears to have been independent and of non-Semitic origin; but in its later forms it became associated with Semitic ideas, as in the worship of Mithra (the sun-god). In its turn, the Avestan system influenced at least the form of the Semitic religions and among them later Judaism. But the points of contact between the O T and N T on the one side and Zoroastrianism on the other are not numerous, being limited perhaps to angelology and demonology (but cf. Mills, Avestan Eschatology, 1908; also Stave, Einfluss des Parsismus auf d. Juden, 1898; on the whole subject, A. V. W. PERSIS, pŏr'sis (Περσός): A Christian woman at Rome to whom Paul sends a salutation in terms of warm commendation (Ro 16 12).

PERUDA, pi-rŭ'da (פֶּרֻדָּא, pērūdā): The ancestral head of a family of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 55; Perida in Neh 7 57).

PEST, PESTILENCE. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, §§ 2, and 4 (2) and PLAGUE.

PESTLE: A short, thick instrument used for pounding or crushing material (grain, etc.) in a mortar (Pr 27 22). In Pr 27 22 the words 'along with bruised grain' are probably a late gloss (cf. Toy, ICC, ad loc.). See also MORTAR; and Plate II of HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS, Fig. 13. E. E. N.

PETER, SIMON, THE APOSTLE: 1. Name. The original name of Simon Peter (Σίμων Πέτρος) was the Heb. name, שִׁמְעוֹן, Shim'on, Gr. Συμεών, Eng. Simeon, which was easily shortened to conform to the Gr. Σίμων, Simon. By this name he was familiarly known even after his surname Cephas was in common use (cf. Ac 15 14).

2. Early Life. P. was the son of a certain Jona or John (Mt 16 17; cf. Jn 1 42, etc.) and was, according to Jn 1 44, a native of Bethsaida, tho later he became a citizen of Capernaum, where he had a house, and with his brother Andrew was engaged in the fishing business in partnership with Zebedee and his two sons, James and John (Mk 1 18-31 = Mt 4 18-22; Mt 8 14-15 = Lk 5 1-11; Lk 4 38-39). He was married, and it is probable that in later years his wife accompanied him on his missionary tours (cf. I Co 9 5). Tho not wealthy, Simon was a man of some property, not a poor, grossly ignorant laborer. Of his early education and attainments we know nothing definite. Galilee, his home, was practically a bilingual country. A good degree of Greek culture was possessed by the Greek or Gentile elements of the population. Hence Simon had abundant opportunity of becoming well-acquainted with colloquial Greek, tho his mother tongue was, of course, Aramaic. In childhood he was probably taught, as many other Jewish children were, to read the Hebrew Scriptures, altho in the rabbinical sense he was not learned (Ac 4 13).

3. First Contact with Jesus. Among those who flocked to hear John the Baptist were Peter and his brother Andrew—an indication of their interest in the religious hopes of the times. John's words made such an impression that the brothers attached themselves to him as (at least temporary) disciples. Soon after, Andrew met Jesus and at once sought his brother Simon and brought him to Jesus, who even then foreshadowed his future career by saying that he should be called Cephas (Gr. Κηφᾶς, from the Aram. כֶּפֶז kēphā, 'rock,' of which the Gr. πέτρος [Eng. Peter] 'rock,' is the translation; cf. Jn 1 35-42). After continuing with Jesus for a while, they seem to have returned to their accustomed occupation. To what extent P. was with Jesus during the period covered by Jn chs. 2-4 is uncertain. When Jesus opened His public ministry in Galilee He summoned the brothers to a more permanent discipleship (Mk 1 18-20, and ||s). For this summons their previous acquaintance with Jesus had prepared them, and it was with enthusiastic self-sacrifice that they left all and followed Him. As yet, however, P. was only one of many whom Jesus attracted to Himself during the early months of His work in Galilee. This was a testing-time for Simon. He was a whole-hearted, tho often blundering, disciple. While he had much to learn, he was also willing to be taught, and finally he showed such appreciation of Jesus' person and teaching that he was chosen by Jesus to be one of twelve, selected from the larger body of 'disciples,' who were to be 'apostles,' i.e., intimately associated with Him to learn of Him and (ultimately) to be sent out by Him to declare His message and carry on His work (Mk 3 14).

4. Peter One of Jesus' Most Intimate Disciples. With the others James and John, P. made a group of three with whom Jesus was most intimate and who alone were associated with Him on such occasions as the Transfiguration and the Prayer in the Garden of Gethsemane. To P. and his companions Jesus' refusal to allow the enthusiastic crowds, after the feeding of the five thousand (Mk 6 31-44; Jn 6 14-15), to proclaim Him as Messiah must have been a great disappointment. But the Twelve remained steadfast even after Jesus' popularity began to wane, and it was P. who voiced their conviction later in response to Jesus' searching question that He was indeed the Messiah (Mk 8 29; Mt 16 16a; Lk 9 20; cf. Jn 6 68). Mk, our earliest Gospel, apparently knew nothing of the encomium on P. (the 'keys' passage) which follows in Mt (16 16b-20), and Lk. also seems to have been ignorant of it. Mt must have picked it up from some less widely circulated group of traditions, and its genuineness is very questionable. It breaks violently into the context as given in Mk and Lk (and preserved in Mt also), for the Peter who is so severely rebuked in Mk 8 31 ff. and 11 5 is very different from the Peter of Mt 16 16b-20. If this passage preserves a genuine teaching of Jesus it must have been given under other circumstances. But even this supposition is beset by difficulties. If a personal primacy of P. over the Church is taught it is strange that the rest of the N T and the documents of early Christianity give not the slightest hint that P. ever claimed or exercised any such supremacy. P. himself was still far from comprehending the real nature of Jesus' mission. He had no conception of a suffering Messiah. When Jesus soon after declared that it was necessary for Him to go to Jerusalem and suffer, P. protested vehemently and was severely rebuked. The Transfiguration scene may have given him a deeper insight into the nature of Jesus' personality. Thus his education proceeded, new lessons being learned daily. The experiences of Passion Week were full of significance for P. He and John were sent into the city to prepare the Passover meal, which became the Lord's Supper (Mk 14 12 ff. and ||s). He was a witness of the Agony in the Garden (Mk 14 32 ff. and ||s). When Jesus was arrested, P. drew his short sword and struck off the ear of one Malchus (Jn 18 10). Tho with the others he fled when Jesus was arrested (Mk 14 50), he followed the party into the city and through the influence of the unnamed 'disciple' gained admission into the palace where Jesus' trial was proceeding (Mk 14 54 and ||s; Jn 18 15 ff.). Here, when taunted by a servant-maid, with an oath he denied that he knew Jesus (Mk 14 66 and ||s). Overcome by shame, he went outside and wept. He witnessed Jesus' sufferings on the cross. These scenes were so indelibly stamped on his mind that years after the impression was still vivid (I P 2 23, 51). The despair that settled over his soul when he saw his beloved Master die was not lighted by any strong hope of a resurrection. But when the women early Sunday morning brought the news of an open and empty tomb, P. and 'the other disciple' ran to investigate. They found the tomb empty and wondered, with an incipient faith, at the orderly appearance of the grave-clothes (Jn 20 3-10), and then returned to their company. Later in the day Jesus appeared to P., the first of the Twelve to whom He showed Himself after the Passion (Mk 16 1-8; Lk 24 35; Jn 20 1-10; I Co 15 5). To P. this was as a new birth, filled with a living hope (I P 1 3). He was present at most of the post-resurrection interviews between Jesus and His disciples, and to him in particular, probably because of his denial Jesus very tenderly and suggestively reentrusted the Apostolic commission, intimating at the same time the self-denial and suffering involved in his future career (Jn ch. 21).

5. P. One of the Leaders of the Infant Church. P. now took a leading part in the direction of the little band of disciples that was the nucleus of the Christian Church. It was he who proposed the election of a successor to Judas Iscariot (Ac 1 15 ff.) and on the day of Pentecost came forward to make the first statement of Christian doctrine to the world. The sermon as given in Ac 2 14-36 centers about the necessity of proving to the Jews that the crucified but now risen Jesus was indeed God's Messiah. The line of argument followed, from the analogy between ancient prophecy and the recent events connected with Jesus, was a convincing one to many Jews, and large numbers confessed their faith in Jesus as Messiah (Ac 2 37 ff.). Up to the time of the persecution that followed the martyrdom of Stephen the new movement was confined almost exclusively to Jerusalem, and it was P. who had the chief share in the guidance of affairs. His associate was John. These two figure prominently in the accounts of the first conflicts with the Jerusalem authorities (Ac ch. 3 ff.). It was P. who rebuked Ananias and Sapphira for their covetousness (Ac 5 1-11), who was spokesman for the Apostles in their formal trial before the Sanhedrin (Ac 5 17-42), and whose fame was such that later tradition said that even his shadow was able to perform miracles (Ac 5 12-16). After the martyrdom of Stephen the Christian movement took on larger proportions, spreading throughout Palestine and into the neighboring countries. To a certain extent it was supervised by the Apostles. Ac preserves a record of two visitations by P. in connection with this work. The first was when he and John were sent by the Apostles to oversee the evangelistic labors of Philip in Samaria. Here P. came in contact with the magician Simon and severely rebuked his cupidity and lack of spiritual perception (Ac 8 14-25). The second tour led him as far as Joppa (Ac 9 32 ff.), whence he was summoned by a vision and by messengers from Cornelius, a centurion at Caesarea, to be the first to preach the gospel to Gentiles (Ac ch. 10; cf. 11 18, 15 ff.). In this matter P. also found himself doing what he had never done before, fellowshiping freely with Gentiles, recognizing them as Christian brethren, and eating with them. When P. returned to Jerusalem he was called upon by the stricter members of the Church at Jerusalem to explain this unusual conduct. His defense, that he had been guided by the Holy Spirit and that the Spirit's presence had been manifested while he was preaching to the Gentiles (Ac 11 1-18) was accepted, tho probably with misgivings by some persons.

Some time after this P. was arrested by order of Herod Agrippa, with a view to executing him on the following day. But he escaped and left Jerusalem immediately (Ac 12 1-17). Whither he went is not said, and for all further knowledge of Peter's movements we must trust to incidental statements in the N T or to the somewhat unreliable notices in early Christian literature. Since Herod Agrippa died in 44 A.D., the events narrated in Ac chs. 1-12, in case they are arranged in chronological sequence, must have covered a period of about fifteen years. We may say, then, that for that length of time P. was the foremost figure of the early Apostolic Church. It was during this period, three years after his conversion, that Paul visited Jerusalem to talk matters over with P. (Gal 1 18), staying with him fifteen days. This could not have been later than 38 A.D., and was probably a year or so earlier. Paul's desire to have this personal interview with P. incidentally reveals the important place held by the latter in the Apostolic Church at that time. His subsequent career was just as important, but its details have not been preserved. About five years later (49 A.D.), P. was present at the Council in Jerusalem and took a leading part in its deliberations (Ac 15 6 ff.; Gal 2 1-10). By this time he had become recognized as the 'Apostle of the Circumcision' (Gal 2 7), through whom God was working as effectually as He was through Paul for the 'Uncircumcision' (i.e., the Gentile world). These expressions suggest that P.'s activity was—like his own—largely missionary in character and to the Jews of the dispersion as his was to the Gentiles. For this reason P. was in Jerusalem probably only occasionally after his escape from Herod Agrippa in 44 A.D. We learn further, from Gal 2 11-14, that at Antioch (either soon after the Council of 49, before Paul set out on his second missionary journey [49-52 A.D.], or at the close of that journey, when Paul was at Antioch for a while; cf. Ac 18 23), P. was sharply rebuked by Paul for weakly yielding to emissaries of the strict Judaistic party of Jerusalem and withdrawing from that familiar fellowship with the uncircumcised Gentile members of the church, which was characteristic of the church of Antioch. Full fellowship with the Gentile converts had not been specifically discussed at the Council of Ac ch. 15, and P.'s withdrawal did not expressly violate the terms of the agreement reached in the Council. It violated the principles there followed, however, and deserved Paul's rebuke (see also GALATIANS).

6. Later Career of Peter (After 50 A.D.). Of the remainder of P.'s career we are in almost total ignorance. He appears to have continued his missionary labors. In these he was frequently accompanied by his wife (I Co 9 5). Early Christian tradition erroneously looked back to him as the first 'bishop' of the Church of Antioch. But it is certain that he did not organize the great Church. Other ancient traditions speak of his labors in Asia Minor, especially in the regions near the Black Sea. These may be no more than inferences based on the address of the First Epistle. At what point in this later period are we to place the two Epistles attributed to him? The authenticity of the first is more certain than that of the second. It was written from 'Babylon' to the 'dispersion' of northern Asia Minor. Both terms have been taken in a figurative sense, and it is possible that the letter was sent from Rome. Mark was with the Apostle at the time (serving as his 'interpreter' [ἐρμηνεύτης, so Papias; see MARK, GOSPEL OF, § 1 (h)] and gathering the material [in part] for his Gospel), also Silvanus, who appears to have penned the Epistle (5 12-13). Since Silvanus was Paul's companion as late as when he wrote II Cor (1 19), P.'s letter must be dated after 55 A.D. And since Paul's later letters from Rome, Ph, Col, Eph, Phm (59-61 A.D.), betray no evidence of personal contact with P. in Rome, a possible view is that P. was in Rome between 56 and 59 and thence sent his message to the churches of Asia Minor—not to the Pauline churches there, but to other communities that were less directly connected with Paul's work. To what place P. went after leaving Rome, whence he sent the second letter, in case it is his, and whether he returned to Rome—all these are points on which we possess no direct information. According to a wide-spread tradition, which has become generally accepted in Christendom, P. suffered martyrdom at Rome. It must be admitted, however, that the explicit evidence for this tradition can not be traced much further back than 180 A.D.

Obscure, but significant, hints in the N T indicate that even while Paul and P. were still alive the anti-Pauline party tried to play off Peter (and the rest of the original Twelve) against Paul. At Jerusalem Paul had come to close grips with the extremists (Gal 2 4 f.). They followed up their hostility to Paul by their Judaizing propaganda in Galatia in which Paul's Apostolic status was challenged. The 'Cephas-party' in Corinth and the bitter opposition to Paul in that church was probably due to these same enemies or persons influenced by them who seem to have eventually insinuated that Paul was no real Apostle (cf. I Cor 1 12, 9 1; II Cor 11 4, 13, 12 11, etc.). The later stages of this anti-Pauline movement are seen in the pro-Petrine pseudo-Clementine literature. The query arises: was it the desire to exalt Peter (the leader of the Twelve) over against Paul that may have led to the working over of a saying of Jesus into the (extreme) form now found in Mt 16 18b-20?

7. Uncertainty as to Our Knowledge of P.'s Last Years. The earliest notice of P., outside of the N T, in early Christian literature (I Clement, V) is indecisive. The statement in the Epistle of Ignatius to the Romans (about 110 A.D.) at most merely implies the presence at some time of both Apostles in Rome. All that can be said in fairness as to P.'s presence in Rome has been said, with full acknowledgment of the uncertain character of the evidence, by the eminent R. C. historian, Du Chesne (Hist. Anc. de l'Eglise, Tome I [1908] p. 61 ff.). Later writers represent P. as having not only labored but suffered martyrdom in Rome. It is probable, but by no means certain, that P.'s later years were spent in the West and, in part, at the capital. It was inevitable that many legendary details should be invented to fill out a complete story of P.'s career in the city. The exact place of his martyrdom (or burial), many minute details regarding the same, and the exact period of years (25) of his sojourn (as early as c. 170 A.D. he was spoken of as having founded the Church), the representation of him as first bishop of the Roman Church, the attribution to him of an apocryphal Gospel, an Apocalypse, and a 'Preaching,' the famous story of his controversy, in conjunction with Paul, with the magician Simon Magus before Nero, and the strange distortion of the same story in the pseudo-Clementine literature for the purpose of attacking Catholic Christianity—such was the result of combining floating tradition, uncertain legend, wilful invention, and extravagant imagination. None of these details, not even the widely accepted opinion that the Apostle was martyred under Nero about 64 A.D., can be considered to rest on a sure foundation. Apart from the two N T Epistles bearing his name (their genuineness presupposed), we know nothing of his activity after the events referred to by Paul in Gal 2 11-17.

8. Theological Teaching of Peter. The position to be assigned P. in the development of N T doctrine is difficult to state. We have no direct sources for his earlier teaching. The discourses in the first chapter of Ac are of course not verbatim reports and, at least to some extent, represent the general views of primitive Christianity as much as those of any one Apostle. The Gospel of Mark, constructed mainly, according to early tradition, from P.'s teaching, may indirectly represent P.'s maturer views regarding Jesus' person and work. The doctrine of the Epistles of P. is easily ascertained, but here also we are confronted not only with the question of genuineness, especially of the Second Epistle, but also with the problem of the extent to which the doctrine shows the influence of Paulinism and thus represents a stage of P.'s thought when he had modified his earlier views under the influence of Paul.

A chief characteristic of P.'s teaching, as reported in Ac, is that it appears to have been developed as occasion demanded. From Jesus P. had received much more than he had been able to formulate into definite propositions. He had revealed the Father, the higher standards of life, certain great truths of the Kingdom, and He had also impressed the disciples with the great significance of His person and work, and had more than hinted at the necessity of His death and the certainty of His resurrection. But P. had not organized these points into a system when Jesus' death and resurrection occurred, followed by His departure, and the disciples were left to formulate and carry forward the new faith. The speech of P. at Pentecost shows what he first fixed upon as the salient points of the new doctrine. Jesus of Nazareth, tho crucified, is in truth the Messiah. His life showed that He was 'approved' by God, His death was a part of God's plan, evidenced in O T prophecy, and His resurrection, also prophesied and now witnessed to as a fact by those who saw Him, has been followed by His exaltation to (or by) God's right hand. He is now in heaven and is active among His followers by the Holy Spirit, whom He sends from the Father. The central thought here is the Messiahship of Jesus. This Messiahship was interpreted as nearly as possibly according to current Jewish ideas, but in the light of the facts they knew of Jesus as modifying those ideas. Jesus was all that the term 'Messiah' ought to mean. The blessings of the new age, of forgiveness of sin, of the Holy Spirit, were all assured in Him as Messiah and to reject Him was to reject the whole counsel and plan of God (Ac 2 14-36, etc.). Within this general scheme there were many points as yet undeveloped, such as the real relation between Jesus and the Father, the ultimate reason for His death and its relation to forgiveness, the way in which the salvation in Him was to become universal, etc. P. developed in his thinking along these lines, step by step, not always consistently (cf. Gal 2 11 ff.). His was not an original mind, rather a practical one. He probably received from, as much as he contributed to, the general body of doctrine held by the Apostolic Church. His first Epistle shows to what stage his thinking had advanced when it was written. But even in this he is still the practical Christian believer rather than the theologian. See Weiss, Bib. Theol. of N T, §§ 39-40, 44-51; Stevens, Theol. of the N T, pp. 258-324; Works on the Apostolic Age by McGiffert, Ropes, Purves, etc. E. E. N.

PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF: 1. Attestation. The epistle, altho not found in the old-Syriac version or the Muratorian Canon, is referred to by many of the earliest Christian writers. Thus, it is used at the close of the 2nd cent. by Irenæus and Tertullian. Much earlier Polycarp quotes from it, e.g., I P 1 8 in Polyc. 1 3, I P 2 21 in Polyc. 8 1, 2, and I P 2 12 in the Latin of Polyc. 10 2. Eusebius (HE III, 39) says that it was used not only by Polycarp but by Papias. The later writers mentioned above assign the Letter to the Apostle Peter. We can not see much force in the argument based on the contention that in the Petrine discourses reported in Ac and in this Epistle a word is used for the Cross (ἔλσιν) which is never elsewhere so used in the N T except in quotations from the O T.

2. Address. There has been much controversy regarding the address, 'to the elect who are sojourners of the dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia.' This does not necessarily presuppose that the Letter was sent to Jewish Christians. We know (e.g., from the Epistle of James) that the term 'dispersion' had been carried over from the ancient people of God to the new. Further, Ewald's suggestion, modified by Hort, that the order of places given in the address corresponds to the directions taken by the bearer of the letter, is not convincing. We are inclined to find a much more general kind of designation in I P 1 1, and see no grounds for supposing minute geographical exactness.

3. Place of Writing. The only trace of the locality from which the Epistle was written occurs in 5 13. There the writer says: 'She that is in Babylon, elect together with you ('your sister-church in Babylon,' Moffatt), saluteth you.' The Church Fathers believed that 'Babylon' was a cryptic name for Rome. It is so used in the Apocalypse. Professor Souter believes that like the 'dispersion' it was used because the Epistle was written at a time when it was not safe for Christians to write to one another concerning their religion, and he compares the entire lack of an address with the Epistle to the Hebrews.

4. Date. A much more difficult question is the date. A decision turns on the question: Was the persecution referred to in the Epistle domestic or public? Chase points out that not a word is found in the Epistle about men shedding their blood or laying down their lives for the gospel. 'None of the passages . . . contains any reference to or any hint of an organized persecution.' We are compelled to ask: Can the attitude of the State to Christians, as represented in the Epistle, be associated with a fairly early date? Ramsay holds that if it can be proved that Peter died before 70 A.D., the Letter must be assigned to another author. Admittedly, our knowledge of the precise relation of the Roman government to Christians between 60 and 90 A.D. is extremely vague, but so prominent an authority as Mommsen believes that the condition of things suggested by the evidence of the Epistle may have originated as early as the time of Nero. In that case we are probably justified in assigning the document, as Bigg does, to the period between 58 and 64 A.D. Our data, however, on the subject are too meager to admit of dogmatic assertions.

5. Purpose. Plainly, the purpose of the Letter is to give encouragement to persecuted Christians. That is the reason why throughout the prevailing note is that of hope. Probably Moffatt is right in saying that 'the emphasis put upon it [viz., Hope] here is due to the emergency of the moment rather than to any idiosyncrasy or dogmatic prepossession on the part of the author' (Introduction, p. 321). That also is the reason why so much emphasis is laid on the sufferings of Christ. Of course, these sufferings had become central for the thought of the entire Church. Accordingly we need not discover in the author's references to the expiatory value of the death of Christ a direct dependence on Paul. Like most other Christian leaders of the time his debt to Paul must have been great. As a matter of fact the Epistle contains many echoes of Paul's Epistle to the Romans. But he bears witness to a consciousness which was prior to Paul. And, as Moffatt well says, 'the proper appreciation of this central popular Christianity in the Apostolic Age is vital to the proper focus for viewing the early Christian literature' (op. cit., p. 331).

6. Language of the Epistle. One of the problems connected with the authorship is the admirable Greek in which the Epistle is written showing in this a marked contrast with II P. Perhaps some light is thrown on the question by the statement of 5:12: 'By the hand of Silvanus, a faithful brother (in my opinion) I have written you,' etc. (Moffatt's tr.). Did Peter dictate the Letter, or, as Zahn supposes, did he entrust its actual composition to Silvanus? The latter hypothesis would explain a great deal, and it is in no way unreasonable. Von Soden has actually suggested that Silvanus was the author of the Epistle. This, he thinks, would explain its Pauline character. It is, however, improbable that after the death of Peter he should have written in Peter's name, and put this testimony to himself in Peter's mouth. On this hypothesis we might have expected him to choose Paul rather than Peter as his mouthpiece.

7. Descensus ad Inferos. Perhaps the most notable feature of the Epistle is the passage which deals with the Descensus ad Inferos, 3:19 ff. The line of thought is as follows: 'As you suffer in the flesh, so also did Christ. But through the extreme and innocent suffering His spirit remained untouched and potent. Nay, it was set free for a more immediately effective work, and for a wider range of influence. In His emancipated and renewed spirit He entered the world of spirits as the herald of forgiveness and restoration to those who belonged to the generation which the Jews thought especially cursed. And as after His death He 'went' into the prison-house of disembodied spirits, so after His resurrection He 'went' into heaven and is now there triumphant and supreme over powers and authorities and angels' (Dods).

We are by no means impressed by Dr. Rendel Harris' emendation, which presupposes that the word 'Ἐνός' has been omitted after ἐν ᾧ καί in 3:19, by a 'scribe's blunder in dropping some repeated letters.'

LITERATURE: The best commentaries are those of Bigg (ICC, 1901); Hort's Fragment on 1:1 to 2:17 (1898), and Gunkel (in Vol. 2 of Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments, ed. by J. Weiss). H. A. A. K.

PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF: 1. Attestation. The external attestation of the epistle is exceedingly late, meager, and indecisive. Apparently Origen, in the 3d cent., knew of its existence, but was aware that some rejected it. Possibly it was known at Rome in the time of Hippolytus. Eusebius deliberately places it among the disputed writings of the New Testament Canon. We know that Peter's name was associated with a large group of pseudepigraphic writings. These were the Gospel of Peter, the Apocalypse of Peter, and the Acts of Peter. So it is not surprising to find a Second Epistle of Peter.

2. Relation to Epistle of Jude. Probably the most notable fact about the document is its intimate connection with the Epistle of Jude. There has been much discussion as to which of the two is indebted to the other. 'The whole of Jude from ver. 4 to ver. 18, with the exception of vs. 14 and 15, is represented in the 2d ch. and the first three vs. of the 3d ch. of II P.' Scholars are coming with growing unanimity to accept the conclusion of Bishop Chase that 'the various lines of argument converge, and, as far as demonstration is possible in literary questions, demonstrate the priority of Jude.'

3. Hellenistic Coloring. But further arresting features of the Epistle call for attention. It has a very noteworthy Hellenistic coloring. Thus at the very beginning occur the phrases θεῶν δόξαμις (1:3) and θεῶν φύσις (1:4), which point to the 2d cent., 'when a diffused stoicism was predominant throughout the empire,' one of whose key-notes was participation in the divine nature. This marked Hellenistic coloring is associated with an extraordinary vocabulary which Chase calls 'an ambitious one.' As an example, we may quote the word ἐπέπτης, used in the description of the Transfiguration (1:10). This word is taken from the Greek mysteries, 'where it denoted one who was admitted to the third and highest stage.' The use of it is distinctly artificial and unnatural. The language as a whole is in marked contrast with that of the First Epistle. Its heightened rhetoric is much more potent in the Greek than in the restrained English of the AV or RV.

4. References to Pauline Epistles. One of the most significant passages is the reference to Paul's Epistles in 3:16. The writer groups the Pauline Epistles with the γραφαί, which mean primarily the O T. That is to say, a definite collection of Paul's Letters is presupposed, and a collection which possesses canonical authority. This must inevitably point to the 2nd cent., and, with the use of the Epistle of Jude, to a date after Peter's death.

5. Subject. 'Not without truth,' says Dods, 'is knowledge (ἐπίγνωσις) said to be the key-note of the Epistle.' The main subject, however, with which the writer is concerned is the reestablishment of belief in the Second Advent (1 11, 16, 19, 3 3 f.). There are false teachers who ridicule that doctrine. To refute them, the writer especially relies on the idea of the delay as due to the long-suffering of God (3 8 f.), and he shows that their skepticism was associated with impure living (3 11 f.).

LITERATURE: Every important feature of the Epistle is admirably discussed by F. H. Chase in HDB. The best commentaries in English are those of Bigg (ICC) and J. B. Mayor (1907). H. A. A. K.

PETHAHIAH, peth'ā-hai'ā (פֶּתַח־יָהּ, pethahyāh), 'J' opens': 1. The ancestral head of the nineteenth course of priests (I Ch 24 16). 2. A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 23). 3. A Levite who assisted Ezra (Neh 9 5). 4. A Jew who was the deputy-governor for the district of Jerusalem (Neh 11 24). He was responsible to the governor of the whole province. E. E. N.

PETHOR, pi'thōr (פֶּתוֹר, pethōr): The home of Balaam in Mesopotamia near 'the River,' i.e., the Euphrates (Nu 22 5; Dt 23 4 [5]). It is usually identified with Pitru, mentioned by Shalmaneser II (860-825 B.C.), and with Pe-d-rā in a list of Thothmes III (c. 1500 B.C.). It is just S. of Carchemish, on the Sājīn, a few miles from its junction with the Euphrates. Some scholars, taking 'the River' to mean the Nile, locate P. in Egypt. C. S. T.

PETHUEL, pi-thū'el (פֶּתוּאֵל, pethū'el): The father of the prophet Joel (Jl 1 1).

PEULLETHAI, pi-ul'e-thai (פִּעֲלֵי־תַּי, pe'ullethay, Peulthai AV): The ancestral head of a family of Korahite temple-porters (I Ch 26 5).

PHALEC, fē'lek (פָּלֵק, Phalék): An ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3 35 AV; Peleg RV, as in the O T).

PHALLU, fal'u. See PALLU.

PHALTI, fal'tai, PHALTIEL, fal'ti-el. See PAITI.

PHANUEL, fā-niū'el or fan'yu-el (פָּנּוּאֵל, Phanū'el): The father of the prophetess Anna (Lk 2 36).

PHARAOH, fē'rō (פַּרְעֹה, par'ōh, Pharāw, from Egyptian pr'ō, 'great house'): An honorific title (analogous to the modern 'Sublime Porte') given the Egyptian king during the Biblical period. It appears sometimes in association with the personal name of the king (II K 23 29; Jer 44 30) and sometimes alone (Ex 1 11, 5 1; I K 11 18-20). In the inscriptions it occurs as far back as the fourth dynasty, but not as an equivalent to the term 'king,' as in the Hebrew Scriptures. This usage dates from the beginning of the New Empire and can have passed into Palestinian modus loquendi only after 1000 B.C. Accordingly, it is absent from the Tell el-Amarna tablets (1400 B.C.). The Pharaohs were nominally absolute monarchs by virtue of divine origin, but in reality dependent on, and directed by, the hereditary monarchs ('governors of provinces'). A sign of their sovereignty was the double crown of Upper and Lower Egypt.

The Pharaohs alluded to in the Bible are the following: (1) A contemporary of Abraham (Gn 12 14-20). But the name is here evidently made to conform with the later usage, Pharaoh with the Crown of Upper and Lower Egypt.

since it is certain that in Abraham's time the kings of Egypt were not as yet called Pharaohs. Neither is the identification of the individual Pharaoh in this case possible, in view of the great uncertainty as to the exact dates of the time of Abraham. (2) The Pharaoh of Joseph. It is quite probable that this monarch was one of the Hyksos (15th or 16th dynasty), who reigned at On (Heliopolis). But here, too, the name Pharaoh is given by accommodation, and all further identification must be a matter of conjecture, as even the Egyptian names in the Joseph narrative (Potipherah, Asenath, Zaphnath-Paneah) do not occur in the Egyptian records earlier than the 25th dynasty, and the whole record as at present cast is expressed in terms of a later period than the events. (3) The Pharaoh of the oppression was probably Rameses II. Tho this identification is not beyond question, the name Raamses (Ex 1 11), as a store city built by the Hebrews, and other considerations (cf. Driver in Hogarth, Auth. and Arch., 52 ff.) render it more probable than the view that this Pharaoh was Amenophis III or IV. Rameses II reigned sixty-seven years (1292-1225 B.C.) and was succeeded by (4) the Pharaoh of the Exodus, or Merenptah. (5) Solomon's father-in-law (I K 2 46, 3 1), a Tanite king of the 21st dynasty. (6) Shishak (c. 945-924 B.C.), the founder of the 22d dynasty, and invader of Judah under Rehoboam (I K 14 25), is nowhere in the O T called Pharaoh, probably because he was definitely known as a contemporary personality and singled out from among the Pharaohs in general. See also EGYPT, § 10. (7) Pharaoh Necho II (609-593 B.C.) of the 26th dynasty (II K 23 29; cf. EGYPT, § 13). (8) Hophra (588-569 B.C.), contemporary of the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 44 30). Besides these, there are also allusions to (9) the unnamed brother-in-law of Tahpenes (I K 11 14-22); (10) a contemporary of Sennacherib and Hezekiah (II K 18 21); and (11) father of Bithiah, who married Mered (I Ch 4 18). PHARES, fē'rīz, PHAREZ, fē'rez. See PEREZ.

PHARISEES, far'ī-sīz: 1. Name. The word 'Pharisee' is derived from the Heb. root prsh. There is, however, some difference of opinion as to the form of the verb from which it is derived; and the meaning of 'separatist' and 'separated' both have their champions. In the time of Jesus the Pharisees constituted a society known as 'neighbors,' which numbered about 6,000. To speak of them as a 'party,' especially as a political party, is to misrepresent their true character.

2. General Tenets. As in the case of the Sadducees and the Essenes, they are described by Josephus as the Jewish equivalent of one of the leading schools of Greek philosophy. According to him, they occupied a middle ground between the necessitarian position of the Essenes and the belief in absolute free will of the Sadducees (Ant. XVIII, 13; BJ, II, 814). They believed that the souls of the righteous after death entered into new bodies, but that those of the wicked were left in Sheol suffering punishment (cf. Ac 23 6). They believed also in the existence of angels and spirits, both evil and good (cf. Ac 23 7-9). Their most pronounced opinions, however, have to do with the so called 'oral law'—a mass of halākhōth, or authoritative interpretations of the Torah, out of which finally developed the Talmud (Mk 7 5-8; cf. also Mt ch. 23). On entering their societies they bound themselves to observe the regulations governing the Sabbath, tithing, and ceremonial purity. Indeed, their endeavor to distinguish between that which was 'clean' and that which was 'unclean,' and to keep themselves 'separate,' gave them their name. They were held in high esteem by the common people, who honored them for their knowledge of the Law. In fact, this devotion to the Law must be regarded as the central characteristic of Pharisaism. The synagogue was the peculiar institution of the Pharisees as the Temple was for the Sadducees. At the same time, the Pharisees insisted on the support of the Temple and seem to have introduced certain rites which the Sadducees finally adopted, such as the libation of water brought from the Pool of Siloam. Along with legalistic development there was in Pharisaism a strikingly idealistic Messianic hope. The Pharisees, through both their religious and political sympathies, were the one group to develop this hope, altho in its transcendental rather than its political aspects. To them rather than to the Essenes is to be attributed the apocalyptic literature (q.v.), with its passionate longing for the establishment of the Messianic kingdom and the punishment of the enemies of Israel.

3. Origin. The Pharisees, as they existed in N T times, were the outcome of that remarkable historical development which began with the Maccabees. The persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes served to draw sharp lines of distinction between those Jews who had yielded to the Hellenistic drift, represented by the high priest and the wealthy class of Jerusalem, and those who were loyal to the conception of Judaism which had been inaugurated by Ezra. The latter were a party—if it is proper to call them by that name—known as the hāṣīdīm, or 'Pious'; also Hasideans or Assideans. We do not know much in detail concerning this group, but in general they seem to have been under the influence of the Scribes and to have occupied no prominent political or social position. In fact, the revolt under the Maccabees was in many respects like the revolt of the peasants during the German Reformation, except that the 'Pious' did not at the start seek social reorganization. The 'Pious' were subjected to persecution by the Syrians because of their devotion to the Law of Moses and their refusal to compromise in any way with the royal demand for conformity with the Greek religion. It would seem that the 'Pious' gradually broke into two groups during the period of the struggle for national independence prior to John Hyrcanus (135-105 B.C.). On one side were those who stood merely for the performance of Judaism as a cult; on the other side, those who, while equally loyal to their religion, were swept into the field of politics. The first group developed into the Essenes, the second into the Pharisees.

4. Development Under the Maccabees. It is not easy to trace the process of development of this latter group, altho there are certain outstanding facts which may serve to mark its progress. Jonathan (161-142) and Simon (142-135) counted upon the assistance of these political religionists and gave them prominence in the body known as the Gerousia (or Sanhedrin). During the latter part of Simon's reign there seems to have developed a certain degree of hostility toward the Maccabean policy of making international treaties and a tendency to apply the principles of separation to politics as well as to personal religion. About the same time also there appeared the first of those great teachers who laid the foundations for later rabbinism. This process of differentiation within the religio-political group became very distinct in the time of John Hyrcanus, who carried the international and general political policy of the Maccabean house into an attempt to build up a state of the ordinary Syrian type. It was apparently under John Hyrcanus that the group devoted to the Law was first called 'Pharisees' doubtless because their idea of separateness had been developed into something like a general policy governing all aspects of life. During the reign of John Hyrcanus a sharp break came between the Maccabean house and the Pharisees, and the latter became the opponents rather than the supporters of the new government. The reason for this transformation of allegiance, according to Josephus, was the suspicion thrown by a prominent Pharisee upon the right of John Hyrcanus to hold the priesthood because his mother had been a captive. The real grounds were doubtless the general opposition between the policies of the Pharisees and the Maccabees, to which reference has been made. The son of John Hyrcanus, Alexander Jannæus (104-78), pursued an extreme monarchical policy. If Josephus with his Pharisaic sympathies is to be trusted, Alexander was essentially a military ruler, bent on conquering the surrounding territory, and, following the precedent set by his brother Aristobulus (105-104), called himself king. This step served to strengthen the Pharisees' opposition, and for a number of years Judea was rent by civil war between the people and their sovereign. The outcome of this was to solidify the opposition of the Pharisees to the establishment of a monarchy in Judea, yet, paradoxically, to develop its policy to such an extent that when at the death of Alexander his widow Alexandra took his place and ruled the country ten years, hers was in reality a Pharisaic administration, under the leadership of her brother Simon ben Shetach.

5. Development Under the Romans. With the death of Alexandra Judea was again swept by civil war, Hyrcanus I being supported by the Pharisees, and his brother Aristobulus by the Sadducees. As a result of this internecine conflict the state came under the control of the Romans (63 B.C.), and the Pharisees were left to become an influential group, primarily religious devotees to the Law, but possessed of great political influence. During the reign of Herod I the Pharisees were in constant opposition to the monarch, but he was sagacious enough to recognize their power in the state and not to attempt any persecution, altho he punished severely any attempts at revolt. While the political influence of the Pharisees increased among the people, the group, or as it can now be called, the Society, especially developed along religious and academic lines, devoting itself to building up the oral law, which was to explain and protect the Law of Moses.

6. Pharisaic Tenets. During the half century preceding the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.) the Pharisees grew increasingly influential, both among the learned and among the unlearned. Under them the Mosaic legislation was so developed as to become at once a mass of detailed statutes governing every aspect of life, and a standard of virtue which the common people could never expect to attain. It would be a mistake, however, to think of the Pharisees as consciously hypocritical, or as lacking genuine religious sentiment. They recognized God not only as a lawgiver, but also as loving Israel, and along with their halākhōth they developed a theory of the 'evil impulse' (yetsar ha-ra') and a code of morality, known as the 'Two Ways,' which appears later in the Didache. Personally, the Pharisees were inclined to be ascetic, and in the time of Jesus had begun to develop a system of fasting twice a week (cf. Lk 18 10 ff.; Mt 9 14). The criticism passed by Jesus upon them was not so much against their general moral precepts as against their general attitude toward God and religion (cf. Mt 23 1-3). With Him, God was the Father, to be obeyed through love; according to the Pharisees, God was primarily the Lawgiver, to be obeyed through fear (cf. Ga 2 3-5, 5 1, 6 13; Ro 8 14; II Jn 1 7). It should be noticed also that the Rabbis themselves divided the Pharisees into seven classes, considering five of them 'fools,' or 'hypocrites.' The highest type were called 'God-loving.' The Pharisees' attitude toward the revolution of 66 A.D. was one of hesitation. They finally undertook the management of the revolt, perhaps, if we may so infer from Josephus, with the hope of keeping it within moderate bounds. In this attempt they were disappointed, as they were overpowered by the Zealots and other radicals. With the destruction of Jerusalem they were forced to make their home in other cities, particularly Tiberias, where their teachings were reduced by their successors into the Mishna, and the movement which they represented finally passed over into rabbinism.

smaller tributaries of the Abana, and flows from Hermon eastward S. of Damascus, losing itself, like the Abana, in the desert. See also ABANA, and Map I, H, J, 2.

PHASEAH. See PASEAH.

PHEBE, fi'bi. See PHOEBE.

PHENICE, fi-nai'si or fi'nis. See PHENICIA; and PHOENIX.

PHENICIA: 1. Country. Phenicia, fi-nish'i-a (Φοινίκη, Phoenicia RV, Phenice, Phenicia AV), is the name given the territory on the E. coast of the Mediterranean, that anciently extended in general from the Orontes River on the N. to Mt. Carmel on the S. and from the shore-line of the sea E. to the backbone of the Lebanon range of mountains and its N. and S. projecting hills. This entire stretch of shore-line is somewhat more than 200 m. long from N. to S. The shore plains (for there are several of them between the rivers emptying into the Mediterranean) vary in width between one and ten miles. The Phenicia included cities throughout this entire stretch of land, P. proper may be limited on the N. by the river Eleutheros, and on the S. by the Ladder of Tyre. Within these limits we find the location of the chief cities of this people. Some of these were Tyre, Sidon, Sarepta, Gebal (Byblos), Lycus, Tripolis and Arka.

2. Name. The name is derived from the Greek word, phoenix (φοινίξ), which was used as a proper name to indicate something that was of a reddish hue. The Greeks are said to have named the Canaanite peoples who carried to them quantities of purple dye or purple-dyed materials, 'phenix-men.' Hence the designation fastened itself on the peoples who occupied this territory, and then was extended to the land occupied by them.

3. Sources of Information. There are numerous inscriptions in the language of the Phenicians. These documents have been found in Phenicia itself, in some of the colonies established by P. merchantmen, or trade-centers built up in several seaports accessible to the Mediterranean. But they are nearly all short, scrappy, not historical, and comparatively late; that is, in the main, not earlier than the Persian period. Only one inscription dates from the 9th cent. B.C., and it was found on the fragments of a bowl discovered in Cyprus, but gives us no valuable information. The most useful of these brief inscriptions furnish sketchy pictures of worship, lists of kings covering certain epochs, and divinities. When we turn to the records of other countries we find more detailed information. Egyptian, Babylonian, and Assyrian inscriptions contain numerous statements of prime importance scattered through their records from the 16th cent. B.C. to the Persian period. The O T, too, is a valuable source of evidence to the commercial importance of P., especially from the 8th to the 6th cent. B.C. (cf. Is ch. 23; Ezk chs. 27, 28). Josephus, Eusebius, and later Greek writers testify to the prominence of the Phenicians. Only a beginning has been made in bringing to light the remains of that great nation, scattered as they are over a dozen different lands.

4. People. Tradition records much regarding the beginnings of Phenicia. Herodotus tells us (1.1, 789) that the Phenicians came originally from the Red Sea, thought to have been the Persian Gulf, where there were two islands, Tuross and Arados, doubtfully the originals of Tyre and Arvad. Other traditions embody equally incredible stories. The inscriptional materials for definitely deciding this question are too scant to be of value; hence we must fall back on other evidence. Language, religion and ethnology all contribute to the settlement of this point. Their language was a Semitic tongue, only dialectically different from the Hebrew of the O. T. Their religion was almost sui generis; tho we know much about its characteristic elements, next to nothing is known about its origin. Its people were properly classed with the Canaanites as far back as they are known to us, in the 16th cent. B.C. They occupied the coast-line and developed on the sea, while their brethren farther inland developed on the land, and in course of time they became almost two peoples.

5. Early History. The most ancient authentic records about the Phenicians can not be dated earlier than the 16th cent. B.C., tho there are many traditions of their immense antiquity and fabulous maritime activities. In fact, Sargon I (= Shar-gani-sharri (c. 2750 B.C.), Naram-Sin (son of Sargon I) ruled from Elam to the Mediterranean Sea. Arad-Sin held sway to the same western sea. Gudea (2450 B.C.) brought cedar from the Lebanon mountains for his temples in Lagash. Both Hammurabi and Ammiditana held sway to the Lebanon but not over the Phenician coast. Whether it was occupied by Phenicians at that period is a question. From Egypt king Snefru (c. 2930 B.C.) sent ships to Syria to get cedar timber for his temples. The life of Sinuhe (c. 1980-1935 B.C.) gives a glance at the peoples of Syria and presumably of Phenicia in that period. There are references to P. in Egyptian inscriptions of about 1550 B.C., which called the country Kupna (Müller, Aegyptiaca, pp. 77 ff.). The records of the Asiatic campaigns of the Egyptian monarchy, notably of Thutmose III (1501-1447 B.C.), often mention the Phenicians as if they were a people with very definite traits, location, and strength. The famous papyrus, Anastasi I, gives a list of Phenician cities in existence at that day. But the most notable and reliable contemporary source of information on this period is the group of Tell el-Amarna letters. By means of these we ascertain that several Phenician cities were already established and important in the 15th cent. B.C. We find among the whole number mentioned Acco, Kana, Tyre (Uzu in Amarna letters), Sidon (a chief city at that date), Berytus, Byblos, Arka (Irkata in Amarna letters), and Simyra. These cities and towns, as shown in these letters, were subjects of Egypt in that day. It seems that the Egyptian monarchs, soon after the expulsion of the Hyksos kings, followed up their advantage by conquering Palestine, Syria, and Phenicia, Thutmose I extending his boundaries as far as the Euphrates. Henceforth, through the reigns of the 18th dynasty to that of Amenhotep IV, the cities and provinces of Syria and P. paid tribute to Egyptian monarchs. This suzerainty was partially terminated by an invasion of the Hittites from the N., which was aided by desert peoples. Some of the cities surrendered to the Hittites, others attempted to remain loyal to Egypt, and still others became independent.

Thence down through the 19th dynasty (14th and 13th cents. B.C.) of Egypt, P. experienced varying fortunes and misfortunes, tho most of the time subject to the Pharaoh. Early in the 12th cent. a great invasion of all the E. coast of the Mediterranean by sea-forces from Asia Minor and Europe resulted in the defeat of the invaded and the settlement of coast-lands by such people as the Philistines (q.v.).

6. In Times of Early Israel. When we first meet the Phenicians in the times of David and Solomon, they seem to be an independent people with an extensive merchant marine and a notable skill as artizans. Tyre was the chief city, and its king, Hiram, was its royal director. With the Hebrews they had a reciprocity treaty for mutual gain (II S 5 11 f.; I K ch. 5).

7. Commercial Extensions. The location of P. on the seacoast, cut off by mountains on the land side from easy contact with other lands in close proximity, seems to have turned its inhabitants to a seafaring life. This method of travel and trade gradually led them to adjoining shores, to farther shores, to distant shores, until they had tried all waters within reasonable reach. Skilful in ship-building, in manufacturing choice articles of trade, they established with every accessible land valuable commercial relations (Is ch. 23). On land also they had regular routes for the exportation and importation of costly wares (cf. Ezk chs. 27 and 28). When Solomon extended his commerce to distant ports, he employed experienced Phenician sailors to man his ships. When Sennacherib required ships to cross the Persian Gulf in his war on Elam, he imported Phenicians to build his ships. When Necho II of Egypt (608-596 B.C.) required a fleet of sea-going ships he applied to the Greeks for their construction, and to the Phenicians for experienced seamen to man them. When Jonah fled from the face of the Lord, he embarked at Joppa on a Phenician ship. They were the seamen, the Englishmen, of those days. Some of their trading-posts were Cyprus, Carthage in N. Africa, and Tarshish in Spain.

8. Colonial Extensions. These trading-posts gradually became centers in which native Phenicians settled in the interests of trade. Not many centuries passed before each important trade-center became a kind of colony, where commerce, religion, and politics of the Phenician stamp took root. S. Europe, N. Africa, W. Europe, possibly E. Africa, and S. Arabia bear marks of early Phenician influence. But colonies in the modern sense of the term these were not. Their ultimate purpose was commercial and financial. If they could secure and hold the trade of these distant lands, others might have the political and religious control of them. Tyre was the reputed mistress of the seas and of land-commerce in Solomon's day and for centuries later.

9. Government. P., like Babylonia in early times, had no centralized government, but consisted of a number of city-states. Each had its king and the bond of union between them was barely visible. Claim to the throne seems to have been hereditary until a revolution allowed a usurper to be seated. Slight information has come down to us regarding the government of these cities. Some Roman writers tell us that a council of ten men, or an aristocracy, due either to early tribal prominence or to wealth, was the real governing body. In earlier times Sidon, and later Tyre, were prominent among all the group of Phœnician cities, tho exercising no real authority over their inferiors.

10. Religion. The Phœnicians were a people overwhelmed with a pantheon crowded with about fifty divinities. Their fragmentary inscriptions, their proper names, and their language are burdened with the names of deities. These gods had certain relations with mankind, and men were to a certain extent under their perpetual protection. Of the origin of these divinities we know next to nothing. Some of their names occur hundreds of times. The most prominent of these gods, either standing alone or in compound names are: (1) Adonis, i.e., Tammuz (Ezk 8 14); (2) Asclepius, or Eshmun, extensively revered in Sidon, Cyprus, and Carthage; (3) Baal, occurring in hosts of proper names, and worshipped also by both Israelites and Phœnicians; (4) Molech, named under the form milki in many proper names; (5) Melkarth, 'city king,' the ba'al of Tyre; this name is also found frequently in Cyprus and Carthage; (6) Anath, seen in O T proper names such as Beth-anath (Jos 19 38), and Anathoth; (7) Ashtoreth, occurring often in the O T, the same as Astarte; (8) Tanith, the chief goddess of Carthage, her name being found more than 2,000 times in Phœnician inscriptions. Of her origin and nature we know almost nothing. The Phœnicians chose high places as peculiarly appropriate for worship, and there they built their temples and altars. They had their sacred streams, springs, and trees. In fact, these were their most appropriate places of worship.

11. Independence. In the time of Solomon P. seems to have enjoyed independence, Tyre being pre-eminent. In Ahab's day Ethbaal was king of the Sidonians (I K 16 31). Gradually, however, all these coast-cities seem to have come under the authority of Tyre. This condition of things is confirmed by the statements of Assyrian kings, who give us a list of Phœnician cities.

12. Subject to Assyria. The first Assyrian ruler to record his invasion of Phœnicia was Assurnatsirpal in 876 B.C. Of their cities he names Tyre, Sidon, Byblos, Mahallata, Maisa, Kaisa, Amuri, and 'Arvad in the sea,' which brought him tribute. Shalmaneser III (859-824 B.C.) had little difficulty with them, for rather than suffer defeat and waste they quietly submitted with tribute. They did the same for Adad-nirari (811-782). But all internal administration was in the hands of the Phœnicians themselves.

The accession and aggressive policy of Tiglath-pileser III brought a new era to Syrian lands. This great king and Sargon II name three states, viz.: Aradus, Byblos, and Tyre, the northern portion of the coast-line now being reckoned with Hamath. When Sennacherib invaded P., Lule (Elulaios) is called 'king of Sidon'; Tyre lost its authority for a time over the coast-lands, and over Citium on the island of Cyprus. Sennacherib, on the flight of Lule to Cyprus, put Itubaal on the throne of Sidon, levying on him a heavy annual tribute. Under Esarhaddon (681-668 B.C.) Sidon rebelled against Assyrian authority, but was soon captured, ruthlessly destroyed, and its population deported (675 B.C.). Esarhaddon built a new town on another site, called it 'Esarhaddonburg,' and set over it an Assyrian governor. Altho the coast-land possessions of Tyre had a governor, the whole proceeding was a make-believe, for the Assyrian could neither conquer Tyre nor force it to recognize him. The notable stela found at Senjirli bears on its surface a gigantic figure of Esarhaddon, holding in his hand two thongs, one passing through the lip of the puppet figure of Tirhaka, king of Ethiopia, and the other through that of Baal, the king of Tyre; but this is another empty boast, for he captured neither of them. The king of Tyre, according to Assurbanipal (668-626 B.C.), became frightened after the conquest of Egypt by the latter, and paid a heavy tribute. Some of the cities, notably Acco, were severely punished for rebellion.

13. Decline of Power. The decline of Assyria left the Phœnician cities free for a time. But the success of Nebuchadrezzar's army in Palestine and Syria included the conquest of P., except the island city of Tyre. Some time during this period Tyre lost her political grip on her colonies, as well as over the mainland towns. The influx of Greek influence on land and sea rather weakened Tyre's influence, and allowed Carthage to forge ahead as a sea-power. For some centuries thereafter Carthage was the most prominent Phœnician city, tho Tyre during all this time was an amazing commercial success (cf. Ezk ch. 27). Persian domination made Sidon the first city of P. The finest ships in Xerxes' fleet were built by the Sidonians, whose king was second only to the Persian monarch. Tyre came third in honor. Under Persia, for a century and a half, this little country and all its cities prospered marvelously. A severe setback was given it in 350 B.C., when the king of Sidon joined with Nectanebos of Egypt to resist the authority of Persia. Artaxerxes III swooped down upon Sidon and almost annihilated it with sword and flame.

14. Macedonian Conquest. The conquests of Alexander carried with them the capture of the island city of Tyre. Its partial destruction and the sale of its inhabitants into slavery gave it a stunning blow from which it never recovered. The story of the Phœnicians as a nation then came to an end, tho the struggle of the individual cities, has continued for centuries under Greek, Roman, Saracen, Turkish, and now French rule.

PHIBESETH, fai'bi-sefh or fib'i-sefh. See PI-BESETH.

PHICOL, fai'kel (פִּיכֹל, pīkhōl, Phichol AV): The captain of the host of Abimelech, King of Gerar, in the days of Abraham (Gn 21 22, 32 [E]), and also in the days of Isaac (Gn 26 26 [J]), more than half a century later. The chronological difficulty disappears when we note that the two accounts of J and E were originally independent, and are but variant traditions of the same occurrence. E. E. N.

PHILADELPHIA, fil'a-del'fi-a (Φιλαδέλφεια): A city in Lydia, at the northern foot of Mt. Tmolus, on a natural terrace overlooking the valley of Cogamus. It was founded by Attalus II. The valleys of the Meander and Hermus form a loop round Tmolus, with a low watershed at the sources of the Cogamus. P. lies in this loop, and hence guarded the 'door' or 'gateway' of the great trade-route between Sardes-Pergamum and the East, the entrance to which was 'a door opened' to her as a missionary (Rev 3 8). P. never attained the importance postulated by its strategical position. It is aptly characterized by the words 'little power' of Rev 3 8. The surrounding country is very fertile, because of its volcanic character. The city is now called Ala-shehir, 'Red City,' because of the color of its soil. Its situation on the edge of a volcanic region has ever proved its bane and prevented its growth. Its people have preferred to live in safer quarters in the open country, because earthquakes (cf. 'the hour of trial,' Rev 3 10) were so constant (cf. 'he shall go out thence no more,' Rev 3 12) that Strabo wondered that any one should live in P. It was called 'Little Athens,' because paganism was especially vital there, and displayed its piety by numerous temples (cf. 'I will make him a pillar in the temple of my God,' Rev 3 12) and frequent religious festivals. It also bore the name Decapolis. P. changed its name twice; once to Neocæsarea (c. 17 A.D.) in honor of Germanicus, who had dispensed Tiberius' gift to the city when it was destroyed by an earthquake; another time (70-79 A.D.) to Flavia in honor of Vespasian (cf. Rev 3 12, 'I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, . . . and mine own new name'). P. was also a stronghold of a stubborn form of Judaism called the 'synagog of Satan' (Rev 3 9), because of hatred toward the Christian Jews. It was Christianized at an early period, perhaps evangelized by Paul or his companions. It had its early martyrs (cf. 'thou didst not deny my name,' Rev 3 8), and eleven martyrs of P. suffered later with Polycarp (155-156 A.D.). P. suffered many sieges at the hands of the Byzantines, Crusaders, Barbarians and Turks, and was always sustained by the promises in the Apocalypse. It was captured in 1390 by the Turks after a siege of eight years; 'patient' to the end, it was the last city in Asia Minor to fall into Turkish hands, and has also 'patiently' persisted in Christianity to this day.

PHILEMON, fi-li-mən (Φιλήμων): A prominent Christian of Colossæ, to whom the Apostle Paul wrote a brief Epistle. Nothing authentic is known of him, except what is to be gathered from the Epistle, which is that he was a citizen of Colossæ (ver. 1; cf. also Col 4 9); that he was wealthy, for he had slaves; that he had been converted to Christianity through the efforts of the Apostle himself (ver. 19); and that he was an active Christian, possibly an officer, in the Church ('fellow worker,' ver. 1). It is also clear that he was the head of a household, two of whose members are mentioned by name (Apphia and Archippus, probably his wife and son respectively). To these items tradition has added that he was a bishop of Colossæ (Apost. Const. vii, 46), and that he suffered martyrdom by stoning during the reign of Nero, together with Apphia, Archippus, and Onesimus. A. C. Z.

PHILEMON, EPISTLE TO: The briefest of Paul's Epistles and the only one addressed to an individual on a matter of personal concern. Yet Philemon is associated in the introductory salutation (vs. 1-3) with Apphia and Archippus, and 'the church' in his house, a fact which deprives the letter of its merely individual character. Following the salutation, the Apostle gives expression to his thankfulness for the Christian faith and love of Philemon (vs. 4-7). This prepares the way for the main subject of the writing, which is (vs. 8-21) a request, couched in the most delicate and yet manly terms, that Philemon take back a runaway slave, Onesimus, whom Paul calls his 'son' [in the spirit], doubtless because somehow during the course of his imprisonment he had come in contact with him and brought him to the knowledge of Jesus Christ. Resorting to a play on the meaning of the name 'Onesimus' ('profitable'), the Apostle suggests, no doubt with reference to the unnamed wrong done by Onesimus (ver. 18), that the latter had indeed been unprofitable in the past, but would now be profitable both to his master and to the Apostle himself. He pleads with Philemon on the ground of the common faith of himself and Onesimus, which had exalted the relation of master and slave to one of brotherhood. He promises to make good whatever loss the slave had caused his master, either before or in the act of his escape. Having made this request in as urgent and tender a manner as possible, he closes the letter with the usual salutation and benediction, adding an expression of his hope that he would speedily be free to visit Colossæ and asking Philemon to prepare a lodging for him (vs. 22-26).

The time of the writing of the Epistle was the imprisonment of the Apostle at Rome (61-63 A.D.); for it was only in such a populous center that a fugitive slave could have expected to find the conditions favorable for making his escape effective. Moreover, the letter was undoubtedly taken to Philemon at the same time as that to the Colossians by Tychicus, with whom Paul associated Onesimus as a co-bearer of the two Epistles (Col 4 7 f.). This fact also indicates more precisely that the letter was written in the earlier part of the Roman imprisonment. Its genuineness was called into question by the Tübingen critics, mainly on the ground of its close relation with Col. The motive for the composition of such a letter was alleged to be the presentation through an illustrative example of the bearings of the Christian religion on contemporary social life, and the characters were said to be allegorical. A more strictly historical method of study has discredited this theory.

PHILETUS, fi-lí'tus (Φιλήτης): An errorist, mentioned in II Ti 2 17 in connection with Hymenæus (q.v.), said to hold that the Resurrection, i.e., of Christian believers, has already taken place, thus denying the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body.

PHILIP, fil'ip (Φίλιππος), 'lover of horses': 1. Philip the Apostle, mentioned in all the lists of the apostles (Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 14; Ac 1 13). In the Synoptics nothing is recorded beyond the mention of his name, but in Jn there is frequent reference to P. (1 44 ff., 6 5 f., 12 21 f., 14 8 f.). By the close of the 2d cent. P. is clearly identified with Philip the Evangelist (see 2 below). The beginnings of this identification seem to appear already in the N T (see below), with the result that there is practically no independent data concerning the Apostle Philip.

Philip the Apostle is explicitly identified with Philip the Evangelist by Polycrates, Bishop of Antioch (about 190 A.D.), quoted by Eus. HE III, 31 2; V, 24. From Eus. III, 39 2 it has been argued that the same identification is made by Papias (about 140 A.D.). Clement of Alexandria (about 190 A.D.) in Strom. III, 6 2 makes the same identification, declaring that Philip the Apostle gave his daughters in marriage (cf. Eus. HE III, 30 2). Apparently independent statements are made about P. the Apostle in the Johannine tradition, but careful examination and comparison with Ac leads the present writer to believe that there is confusion even here. (Compare, e.g., the suggestion in Jn 6 5, 7 that P. buy bread with the appointment of P. as almoner to the widows in Ac 6 5; and especially P.'s introduction of Greeks to Jesus in Jn 12 22 with P.'s missionary activities in Ac 8 2, 22 f.). This confusion is the more easily explained if the Johannine writings originated in the Province of Asia, where Hierapolis, the later home of Philip the Evangelist, was a very early Christian center (Col 4 10. Cf. Bousset, Theol. Rundschau, July, 1905, p. 293 f.).

2. Philip the Evangelist, first mentioned in Ac 6 5 as one of those appointed to oversee the distribution of alms to widows. All the persons mentioned in this list have Greek names, which would seem to indicate Philip's Hellenistic origin. This makes all the more natural his missionary activity after the persecution occasioned by the work of Stephen (Ac 8 4 f.). It accounts also for his later residence in Caesarea, which there is no reason to question (Ac 21 8). Like some of the Apostles, Philip was married, and according to Ac 21 9, had four daughters, virgin prophetesses. Our later information concerning him and them is derived largely from the Montanists. Proclus, quoted by Caius (about 210), says (Eus. HE, III, 31 4) that 'after him [some unknown prophet] there were four prophetesses, the daughters of Philip at Hierapolis in Asia. Their tomb is there and that of their father.' Polycrates (Eus. HE, III, 31 3; V, 24) mentioned only three daughters of Philip, two buried at Hierapolis, and one in Ephesus. The fourth may have died before Philip's removal from Caesarea. The later tradition, according to which this Philip was bishop of Tralles (Menol. Basil, in Migne, vol. exvii, col. 104, 168), is plainly an attempt to distinguish again between this Philip and the Apostle.

3. Philip the Tetrarch. One of the sons of Herod the Great by Cleopatra of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. XVII, 1 3) and a stepbrother of Herod Antipas (q.v.). By his father's will he was assigned the territory of Gaulanitis, Trachonitis, Batanea and Panias (Jos. Ant. XVII, 8 1; cf. Lk 3 1), with the title of tetrarch. The appointment was confirmed by Augustus (Ant. XVII, 11 4, Gaulanitis omitted and Auranitis added). Lk 19 12 ff. may be an allusion to or reminiscence of Philip's visit to Rome at this time. He married Salome, the daughter of Herodias (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 5 4), the wife first of his half-brother Herod and then of another half-brother (Herod Antipas), so that Herodias was really the stepmother of Philip, not his wife, as represented in Mk 6 17 ff., Mt 14 3; unless, indeed Herod, the first husband of Herodias and father of Salome, bore also the name Philip, which, however, remains conjectural. Cf. Schürer, GVF<sup>3</sup>, vol. I, p. 435, note 19, and per contra, Swete, Com. on Mk, in loc. His reign covered a period of nearly forty years (4 B.C. to 34 A.D.), after which his territory became a part of the province of Syria (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 4 6). Like his father, he was a great builder. He was a just man, on the whole the best of the Herods. See CAESAREA PHILIPPI; and HEROD, § 6.

PHILIPPI, fi-lip'ái (Φιλιπποι): A city and fortress in Macedonia, near the Thracian frontier, situated on a steep hill overlooking the valley of the Angites (Gangites) river, bordered on the N. by forests, on the S. by a marsh, beyond which is the sea. Its seaport was Neapolis. Its original name was Crenides, from numerous springs (κρήνη) about the hill. It was the location of an Athenian colony after 360 B.C. Crenides was captured by Philip of Macedon in 358 and renamed Philippi. Its chief importance for him consisted in the gold-mines, called Asyla, in the neighboring hill of Dionysus, and P. was not far from the auriferous Mt. Pangæus. It passed to Rome 168 B.C. P. emerged from obscurity in 42 B.C., when it was the scene of the great battle between Octavius and Antony on the one side, and Brutus and Cassius on the other—each with nineteen legions. It was on the heights of P. that Cassius committed suicide after the battle which cost him 8,000 men, while Octavius and Antony lost 16,000. Later, Augustus made P. a Roman colony with the name Colonia Julia Philippensis, which probably after the battle of Actium was changed to Colonia Augusta Julia Philippensium, when its citizens received the ius italicum (=immunitas et libertas). As a Roman colony, P. began to outstrip Amphipolis and to lay claim to the dignity and title of 'first' city (Ac 16 12) when visited by Paul about 50 A.D.; Luke was perhaps a native but non-resident of Philippi, and the 'man of Macedonia' who appeared to Paul in a vision (Ac 16 9-10). P. was the scene of a great event in Paul's life (Ac 16 11 ff.) and the home of the first Christian church on European soil, to which ten years later Paul addressed an Epistle. Early in the 2d cent. Ignatius visited P. on the way to martyrdom, and Polycarp addressed to the church at P. an Epistle. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

PHILIPPIANS, EPISTLE TO THE: One of Paul's Epistles, addressed 'to the saints that are at Philippi with the bishops and deacons.'

1. Paul and the Philippian Church. Paul's interest in Philippi began with the visit in answer to the call to 'come over to Macedonia and help us' (Ac 16:6 ff.). Whether the man of Macedonia was Luke, and whether Luke became a native of the town, as Ramsay argues, we do not know. Paul heeded the call, and arriving at Philippi, he found a group of 'devout persons' ('God fearers') from among the Gentiles, headed by Lydia (q.v.). His unfolding of the Gospel to them at the 'place of prayer' (See Prayer, § 3) resulted in the formation of the Philippian church, of which the jailer in the city doubtless became a prominent member. With this church Paul sustained especially cordial relations. He made two, possibly three, visits to it and twice at least (possibly four times) the church sent him gifts (4:16 and II Cor 11:9, cf. Ph 4:15). The last of these gifts had arrived some time before the writing of the Epistle. It had come by the hands of Epaphroditus as a token of the church's devotion to him. When Epaphroditus fell sick the Apostle was much distressed both personally and because of the Philippian Church's interest in him. No other church, so far as we know, was as loyal to Paul and none responded to his leadership with as clear an understanding of his ideas. He regards their Christian life as a vindication of his ministry and a source of satisfaction to himself (2:15, 16, 4:1).

2. Occasion, Object, Characteristics. The special occasion of the Epistle was the arrival of Epaphroditus with a gift of money from the Philippian Christians (2:25, 4:18), and its object is to express Paul's gratification and gratitude for this kindness. Other matters are included in the writing, such as the exhortation to harmony, to self-forgetful service of one another, warnings against Judaistic teachings and licentious lives. But these are subsidiary and incidental. Hence the characteristic of the writing is predominantly that of joy ('epistola de gaudio,' Bengel). The doctrinal element in it is comparatively small; but so much of it as the Apostle has felt called upon to include (2:5-9) has served as the basis of a most stimulating discussion on the method of the incarnation.

3. Date and Place of Writing. That the Epistle was written from some prison is explicitly stated (1:20). But from what prison? Until recently, there was one imprisonment of Paul's certainly known and another held to be most probable. The first between 56 and 61 A.D. consisting of two stages, namely in Caesarea and Rome; the second, in Rome, traditionally placed in the Mamertine, whence Paul was led to execution. This latter could not have been the imprisonment referred to in Philippians. In 1900, H. Lisco of Berlin (Vincula Sanctorum) suggested the possibility of an earlier imprisonment at Ephesus (before 55). Deissmann came independently to the same conclusion (Light from the Ancient East, 1910, pp. 229-231), and later in his contribution to Anatolian Studies, etc., in honor of Sir W. M. Ramsay (1924), attaching to it the theory that the 'Letters of the Captivity' were written at this time. Others have given their support to this view (Kirsopp Lake, B. W. Bacon, B. W. Robinson). But upon the whole, the theory has not advanced beyond the stage of a hypothesis. Per contra, the considerations in favor of the older view that the imprisonment during which Paul wrote letters was the Caesarean-Roman, gained strength with the more thorough discussion of the question. There remains, however, the further problem as to whether Paul wrote Philippians from Caesarea or from Rome. The internal evidence points to Rome. Only here could Paul have been in touch with Christians belonging to 'Caesar's household' (4:22). In Caesarea the phrase could only have meant the official group in the headquarters of the Imperial government, which is very improbable. Rome was also a place where many were active in the propagation of the Gospel, some moved by genuine zeal, and others out of 'faction, not sincerely' (1:14-18). The mention of the 'Pretorian guard' (1:13) also indicates Rome. Furthermore, the relation of Philippians with Philemon and the probability that Paul would come into touch with Onesimus in Rome rather than in Caesarea, confirms this view. Accordingly, the general consensus of scholarship fixes upon Rome as the place of the writing.

But if Paul wrote it at Rome, did he do so during the earlier or the later portion of his imprisonment there? From the affinities of thought and spirit between it and Ro on one side, and the other Epistles of the imprisonment on the other side, shading off as they do into the Pastorals, Lightfoot (Philip. pp. 30 ff.) argued for the earlier date. Ph would thus be a connecting-link between the four great doctrinal Epistles and the later writings of Paul. On the other side, in behalf of the lateness of Ph, it has been said that the Roman imprisonment is assumed in it to be a matter of some standing (1:7, 13 f., 17); that the Apostle is looking forward to his speedy liberation (1:25, 2:23 f.); that it presupposes at least four journeys between Philippi and Rome as having taken place since Paul's arrival at Rome; and finally that at the time of the writing Paul's companions had left the city, since he does not mention them by name in his salutations, but, on the contrary, explicitly says that he was left alone (2:19, 20). Accordingly, the great majority of later investigators (Weiss, Godet, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Vincent, Zahn) have dated the Epistle from the last days of the imprisonment (63 or, better, 61 A.D.).

4. Contents. The salutation (1:1, 2), in which Paul joins Timothy's name with his own, is followed by an expression of thanksgiving. This is based upon Paul's personal relations with those addressed, their fellowship in the furtherance of the gospel, and their general steadfastness in the spiritual life. The thanksgiving imperceptibly passes into a devout prayer for their spiritual progress and comfort (1:3-11). The Apostle then gives them an account of his own circumstances, especially of his efforts to promote the spread of the gospel, and those of some who preached not sincerely, but 'of envy and strife' (1:12-26). This is followed by an exhortation to unity and lowliness of mind (self-forgetfulness in the service of others), taking Jesus Christ as their model

(1 27-2 11) and, to stimulate them still further in this course, he appeals to them on the ground of his personal relation to them and the joy that he and they should have in one another (2 12-18). He then tells them of his intentions, the proposed visit of Timothy, and of the illness and recovery and mission of Epaphroditus (2 19-30). At this point there occurs a rather abrupt turn from personal to more general affairs. The Apostle begins with the exhortation to 'rejoice.' As he has prefixed the word 'finally' to the expression, it would be natural to suppose that he was about to close the letter; but either because, after an interruption involving an interval of time, he has seen the need for writing to them upon a new subject, or because, while even writing he has realized such a need, the Apostle breaks into a warning against the danger from the influence of Judaizing teaching among them. He illustrates by the contrast of the Jewish Law and the experience of grace in his own past life what he wishes them to take into account (3 1-16); but this easily leads to another implicit warning against the very opposite danger from the side of disregard of moral law as exemplified in the lives of some who observe no law but that of their fleshly natures (3 17-4 1). At this point the Apostle returns to his exhortation, asking two of the members of the Philippian Church (Euodia and Syntyche) to put their dissensions aside (4 2, 3). He exhorts all to joyfulness, to a sturdy resistance of the spirit of anxiety, and to the pursuit of all things good and noble (4 4-9). The last paragraph (4 10-20) is reserved for an acknowledgment of the pecuniary contribution sent to the Apostle through Epaphroditus, concluding with an expression of his assurance that the spirit of kindness which prompted his readers to this deed would have its adequate reward. The Epistle then ends with the usual salutations from 'all the saints, especially them that are of Caesar's household' (4 21) and the benediction (4 22).

5. Genuineness and Unity. That Paul wrote the Epistle was first questioned by Evanson (Dissertation, etc., 1792, p. 263), but the real discussion of the subject was not begun until Baur classified it with the 'conciliatory tendency' documents, produced toward the end of the Judaistic controversy. But tho Baur's followers (Schwegler, Holsten, etc.) for a time persisted in the denial of the Pauline authorship of the Epistle, under the repeated searching investigations given the subject from a less biased point of view (Hilgenfeld, Pfleiderer, Jülicher) its genuineness has been brought more and more clearly into view. In more recent years, an argument in favor of its pseudonymy has been attempted by van Manen (EB, s.v.; also Handl. d. Oudchrist. lett., 1900), but without any apparent impression on the majority of scholars.

But, assuming its genuineness, the further question of the unity of the writing has been raised. On the strength of an allusion by Polycarp to 'epistles' by Paul to the Philippians, Le Moyne (Varia Sacra) propounded the view that the writing as extant consists of two Epistles fused into one in the process of transmission. This view has been made the basis of efforts to separate what precedes 3 1 and what follows, and to construct each into a distinct Epistle.

But the language of Polycarp implies nothing more than that Paul had communicated with the Philippians by letter, the plural being, as is often the case, a more vivid form of the singular; and all efforts at the partition of the Epistle have been unsuccessful. This is also true of more recent attempts to disprove its integrity (Spitta, Zur Geschichte u. Lit. d. Urchristenthums, 1893; C. Clemen, Die Einheit d. paulin. Briefe, 1894).

PHILISTIA, fī-lis'ta-a or -list'ya, PHILISTIM, fī-lis'tim, PHILISTINES, fī-lis'tinz (פְּלִשְׁתִּים, p'lesheth, פְּלִשְׁתִּים, p'lishthi): 1. Name. The term 'Philistia' designated a strip of fertile land including many towns between the Mediterranean and the Shephelah, beginning S. of Joppa and stretching indefinitely to the borders of Egypt. The name is the basis of the term 'Palestine.' It was already given by the Assyrians as early as 800 B.C. (Palastu, Pelistu, Schrader) broadly to southern Palestine. By the Egyptians, however, only the Philistines are expressly named (Pulesati, in the monuments of the reign of Rameses III). The O T usage of the name Philistine is peculiar. In the singular it is given to individuals only (Goliath, I S 17 8, 18 3, etc.) and only in the plural to the people as a whole, differing in this from other gentile adjectives (e.g., Hittite, Hivite, Canaanite, etc.), which are used collectively. This usage points to a sense of difference between the Philistines and other non-Israelites, and is supported by the translation of the term in the LXX. into ἀλλόφυλοι (but sometimes Φυλιστιεῖς), and also by the fact that the Philistines are preeminently 'the uncircumcised.'

2. Origin and Affiliations. Recent investigations have led to the conclusion, now generally adopted, that the Philistines were one of the group of 'sea peoples' which in the latter part of the 13th and early part of the 12th cent. B.C. overran the E. Med. coast region (and even attempted the conquest of Egypt), and broke up the Hittite control of N. Syria. The Philistines (i.e., Pulesati, their own name, as given in the Egn. inscriptions) settled on the sea-coast of 'Palestine' (then Canaan) giving their own name to the region. These people were non-Semitic in origin, hailing from Crete (probably) and also from the islands of the Aegean and the SE. coast of Asia Minor, whence they were driven by the forward movement of other peoples (perhaps the Phrygians).

3. Organized Life. Religion. The organization of the Philistines was effected around the five principal cities of Philistia (Ashdod, Ashkelon, Ekron, Gaza, and Gath). Whatever primitive tribal distinctions may have existed among them (Caphorim, Cherethim, Philistim) were completely displaced by this redistribution of the population according to which each principal city became the center of a circuit and gave its name to its inhabitants (Ashdodite, Gittite, etc.). These five circuits were ruled over by five lords (šrānīm, always used in pl., Jg 3 3; Jos 13 3; I S 5 8, 6 16, etc.), and appear to have been independent of one another, tho they commonly acted in concert, betraying the existence of a more centralized rule not specifically named. Whether the office of 'lord' was hereditary or elective, and whether it involved military as well as civil functions, and, further, what was its exact relation to that of king (e.g., Achish of Gath, I S 21 11, etc.; Mittinti of Askelon, and Hanun of Gath, Keilins. Bibl. II, 20), does not appear clearly. Special commanders are, however, named 'princes,' šārim, more correctly 'chieftains' (I S 18 30, 29 2), who evidently had charge of the armies (I S 23 3, 28 1). Their religion, which was probably either altogether or partly borrowed from the Canaanites whom they conquered, shows Semitic characteristics such as the worship of divinities in pairs (Dagon and a fish-goddess, Marna and Derke-to, apud Diod. II, 4) and Semitic divine names (the foregoing as well as Baalzebub). They had soothsayers (Is 2 6) and priests and diviners (I S 6 2) as well as temples (Jg 16 26).

4. History of the Philistines. The Philistines make their appearance in history at nearly the same time with the Israelitic invasion of Canaan. It was inevitable that, sooner or later, the Israelites, as masters of the highland, and the Philistines, in control of the coast, should come into conflict. In the first stage of the conflict which ensued their higher development as a military people gave them the decided advantage (Jg 10 7 ff.). In spite of temporary checks to their encroachments (Jg 3 31), they succeeded in bringing the Israelitic tribes under their yoke. The conquest was completed during the last years of Eli, when they captured and carried into their own territory the emblem of Israel's nascent national life, the Ark of the Covenant (I S chs. 4 ff.). The weakness of Israel, however, was only the result of inexperience and lack of organization, and when, under Saul, unity of action and strong leadership were attained, the Philistine yoke was shaken off, and under David the oppressors were even put under Israelitic suzerainty (II S 8 1, 21 15 ff.). For the rest of the period of their independent existence, Philistines and Israelites seem usually to have been at peace with each other, but occasional conflicts are noted in I K 15 27, and 16 15 (9th cent.) and in II K 18 8 (8th cent.). The Assyrians in their invasions of Palestine found much in the Philistine cities to seize; and their monuments contain many accounts of attacks on them. In the Maccabean age the Jews appear to be in possession of Philistia. The name Philistine was still, in the days of Josephus (Ant. I, 6 2), used mainly of Philistia, tho the application of it to the whole land of Israel had already come into use (Jos. Cont. Ap. I, 22). Cf. W. Max Müller, Asien und Europa, p. 387 ff., and for the later investigations, Macalister, The Philistines, Their History and Civilization (1914); Cambridge Anc. History, Vol. II (1924), p. 283 ff. A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

PHILOLOGUS, fi-lol'o-gus (Φιλόλογος): A Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Ro 16 15).

PHILOSOPHER (φιλόσοφος), PHILOSOPHY, φιλοσοφία, from φίλος, 'lover,' and σοφία, 'wisdom':

1. Origin of the Term. There is an ancient tradition (Cicero, Tusc. V, 3) to the effect that the term was invented by Pythagoras; but it is not sufficiently supported. The earliest use of the word is in its strict etymological sense by Herodotus (1 3) in a passage where he represents Solon as traveling in search of wisdom ('philosophizing'). Plato understands by philosophy, first, the Socratic love of the truth as distinguished from and opposed to the Sophistic assertion of it (Phædr. 278, 'Wisdom belongs only to God, man can be only a lover of wisdom' = 'philosopher.' Cf. also Lysis, 218). Thus at its beginning, the term was intended to point out the relativity of knowledge; it shows the existence of a consciousness of limitations in knowing. It was an expression of modesty. But as the object of the search for the truth can not be anything short of the ultimate reality, Plato goes further and defines those as philosophers who set their affections on that which in each case really exists (Rep. 480). In the Platonic system, accordingly, philosophy is identified with the more technical dialectics. With Aristotle, the first and most common sense of the word is left behind, but the technical sense develops into two branches according as the sphere of the search for wisdom is looked at narrowly or broadly. In the former case, there are many philosophies (Met. IV, 1, 1026, 18; Mathematics, Physics, Theology). In the latter sense, philosophy is the science of pure being (Met. VI, 1, 1026, 31; cf. XI, 3, 1060, 31), or as later renamed, metaphysics. The Stoics, consistently with their fundamental position that the essence of things is moral rather than intellectual, understood by philosophy a striving after virtue, which, however, they conceived broadly as including and dominating theoretical as well as practical affairs. Hence, according to them, philosophy is proficiency in physics, ethics, and logic (Seneca, Epist. 89, 3). It is distinguished from 'wisdom,' which is the science of divine and human things (Plut. De Plac. Philos. 1, Proem). The Epicurean idea is, like the Stoic, associated with the notion of the supreme good. Epicurus himself is said to have defined philosophy as 'the rational pursuit of happiness' (Sext. Empir. Adv. Math. XI, 169).

2. Philosophy and Christianity. Thus at the time of the first preaching of Christianity, philosophy had secured a recognized place as the mistress of that peculiar province of knowledge which is explored, not because of any need of outward life, but either from a simple desire for knowledge for its own sake, or as furnishing a unifying principle and goal for all action. As such it had been cultivated for over five centuries, and produced a number of concrete systems, each aiming to set forth the inner unity of the universe and to make ultimate reality an object of definite knowledge. The earlier of these systems (Ionic, Eleatic, Heraclitean, Pythagorean, Anaxagorean, Atomistic, Sophistic, Socratic, Cynic, and Cynic with minor varieties) had lost their hold as final and satisfactory solutions of the problem. The influence of Socrates was still perceptible through the systems of Plato and Aristotle, but these systems themselves were believed to need modification and development along certain lines. Of the post-Aristotelian philosophies, the Stoic and Epicurean were most widely held; and it is with these that Christianity came in contact. Of the pre-Christian Greek systems, however, Platonism had already touched and measurably affected Jewish thought in Alexandria, and thus also later entered into the formulation of Christianity so far as its doctrinal content was concerned. In another way, too, Christianity and philosophy came in contact, i.e., when adherents of the former assumed an aggressive attitude within heathendom.

3. Philosophy and the N T. The explicit allusions to philosophy in the N T (Ac 17 18; Col 2 8) are naturally related to current forms, and indicate on the one side the recognition of common ground on which an understanding must be reached between the teachings of Christianity and those of philosophy; and on the other, irreconcilable differences on the ground of which the Christian teacher must warn his pupils against its illusive attractions. The philosophers of Ac 17 18 were evidently interested in Paul's preaching, a fact largely due to their having grappled with the same problems as were presented most prominently by the Apostle in his preaching. The earlier Stoicism was pantheistic; the earlier Epicureanism agnostic, if not positively atheistic. But in the days of Paul these two types had drawn closer to each other, the former becoming more and more theistic and the latter deistic. By Epictetus (Diss. i, 9) God, without being completely detached from the universe, is recognized as Creator and Guardian and is even spoken of as Father of men. Seneca goes further, and makes conduct depend on the realization of God's personal attention to human affairs. 'So live among men as if the eye of God were upon you; and so address yourself to God as if men heard your prayer' (Epist. 10). And even Providence and immortality had come to be regarded as living issues in the realm of philosophy; and, what is more important from the practical point of view, the ruling place of philosophy in life was recognized. Cicero calls philosophy 'the director of our lives, the friend of virtue and enemy of vice.' So far as contemporary philosophy was busied about solving these problems, the first teachers of the gospel neither challenged it nor cast suspicion on its work and influence. Their attitude toward it was that of interested neutrality. The philosophers on their side, misled by the fact that the postulates and mediate aims of Christianity were so near akin to those of their own profession, regarded it as a species of philosophy, a view which gradually worked its way into Christian circles and became the dominant one in the 2d cent. under Justin Martyr and Tatian.

4. Abuse and Distrust of Philosophy. But philosophy had its imitations and illegitimate outgrowths. On account of these, both in the N T allusions to it and in the literature of the general period, a certain undertone of distrust is perceptible and a certain tendency to caution and discrimination in dealing with it. First of all, its votaries cultivated a quasi-Pharisaic contempt for the outside world. This gave rise to a series of personal traits and habits by which the philosopher was distinguished from the non-philosopher layman. The former was known for his long and unkempt hair and beard, his generally slovenly dress, his scorn for luxuries, and his alleged abstemiousness and self-contentment. It is upon these grounds that the satirist Lucian makes his vigorous attack on the philosophic sects of his day (Vitarum Auctio, Piscator, Hermotimus, Convivium, Nigrinus, etc.). In the persons of such men philosophy was but the mask that concealed selfishness, vainglory, greed, and sensuality. In fact, the portraiture of Lucian is based upon the existence of shameless hypocrisy in the ranks of philosophy. In another way the name of philosophy was used by schemers who exploited the region of the occult, the border-land between religion and science, and made a source of gain of the natural hunger for true knowledge of the inner meaning of the world and its Creator. PHINEHAS, fin'e-has (פִּנְחָס, pîn'hās, probably an Egyptian name, pe-nehasi; cf. Nestle, Eigen. 112): 1. The son of Eleazar and grandson of Aaron, and high priest (Ex 6 25; Jg 20 23; I Ch 6 4, 50), distinguished for zeal in behalf of J', which he displayed by stepping forward at a critical time to punish an offender in Israel and thus stay a plague (Nu 25 7 ff.). This deed was always regarded as most deserving, and was celebrated both in poetic composition (Ps 106 30) and in the later historical records (Sir 45 23; I Mac 2 26, 54). It must be viewed not merely as an act of rebuke against mixed marriages, for such marriages were not in themselves offensive if the non-Israelite were willing to forsake idolatry and enter into the covenant of J'. It was rather because in this particular case the alien insisted on bringing her religion as a seed of corruption into Israel. P. officiated as the priest in the war with the Midianites under Joshua (Nu 31 6), and was deputed to go into the land of Gilead to rebuke the tribes on the E. of the Jordan for building an altar, a step regarded as the possible beginning of disintegration for Israel (Jos 22 13). He was assigned an inheritance in the hill-country of Ephraim (Jos 24 33). 2. A son of Eli, slain in the war with the Philistines (I S 1 3, 4 4 ff.). 3. The father of Eleazar, a contemporary Ezra (Ezr 8 33). A. C. Z.

PHLEGON, flī'gon (Φλέγων): A Christian of Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Ro 16 14).

PHOEBE, fī'bā (Φοβη, Phoebe AV): A 'servant' ['deaconess' RVmg.] of the church at Cenchreae, whom the Apostle Paul commends to the Roman Church (Ro 16 1). The additional item given in the description of her as 'a helper' (succourer AV, προστάτις) is the feminine of a word meaning, in general, 'patron,' or 'protector.' In Athens the office of patron involved the charge of the affairs of persons without civic rights. The Roman law recognized the patronus as the representative of the foreigner. Such patrons were not uncommon in Jewish communities (cf. Schürer, Die Gemeindeverfassung d. Jud. in Rom, p. 31). But Phoebe could have occupied such a place only informally and unofficially, and must have been a person of wealth and position to do so. A. C. Z.

PHŒNIX, fī'nīks (Φοῖνιξ, Φοίνιξ, Phenice AV) A place E. of Sphakia on the S. coast of Crete, the only harbor that affords safe anchorage at all seasons of the year, because of the peculiar configuration of its entrance, which opens toward the northeast and southeast winds (Ac 27 12). Strabo, Ptolemy, Stadiasmus (Mar. magn.), and Luke use the form Φοῖνιξ, while Ptolemy distinguishes between φοινικὸς λιμὴν (the harbor) and Φοῖνιξ πόλις (the city). The name of the harbor (now Loutro) was transferred to the city on the plateau 2,000 ft. above the harbor where it still persists as Phinikia. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

PHRYGIA, frij'ī-a. See ASIA MINOR, III, 11.

PHURAH, fiū'ra. See PURAH.

PHUT, fūt. See PUT.

PHUVAH, fiū'va. See PUAH.

PHYGELUS, fai-gī'los (Φύγελος, Phygellus AV): A member of the Christian brotherhood who, in II Ti 1 15, is represented as having 'turned away' from Paul with 'all that are in Asia,' evidently through fear of becoming involved in his fate, or for doctrinal reasons. See also HERMOGENES. J. M. T.

PHYLACTERY, fi-lak'tər-ī (φυλακτήριον, the same as the תפילין, təphillīn, frontlets of Dt 6 8 f., 11 18): The Gr. term means literally 'a means of preservation' either of that which it is designed to preserve (i.e., the Law in the memory) or as that which is meant to preserve the wearer from harm; hence an amulet or charm, more probably the latter. Whatever the original significance of the word, there is no doubt that it was used as synonymous with the təphillāh (pl. təphillīn) of later Judaism, which is approximately rendered 'prayer-band.' The use of təphillīn is based upon four passages of the Law (Ex 13 9, 16; Dt 6 8, 11 18). These were interpreted to mean that the true Israelite should actually wear the written Law on his arm and on his forehead. The passages in Ex, however, are manifestly metaphorical. About those in Dt there is some vagueness, admitting of their being taken literally. In any case these four texts were used as the emblem of the whole Law, and placed in the phylacteries. These phylacteries consisted of two leather pouches each fastened to a band and by the band attached to the worshiper's person. The more important of the two was subdivided into four compartments and was tied to the head so as to bring it between the eyebrows (hence 'frontlet'). Each one of its compartments contained a copy of one of the passages above named as enjoining the use of phylacteries. The other phylactery, consisting of one compartment, was tied to the inside portion of the left arm in such a manner as to bring it as near as possible to the heart when the arm was bent in joining the two hands together. The date of the origin of the custom of wearing phylacteries may be approximately fixed as the 2d cent. B.C. (cf. Kennedy in HDB). The custom was fixed into a law in the Talmud directing every male Israelite after his 13th year to use them at morning prayers except on Sabbaths and festivals. The wearing of phylacteries, which is perpetuated to the present day within orthodox Judaism under the technical title of 'laying the tephillin,' is highly ritualistic in its nature and requires rigid conformity to certain minute regulations in the construction of the pouches, in the order in which they must be put on and taken off, and in the form of words to be uttered while being put on and taken off.

Jesus, by implication, disapproved of the stress laid on the use of phylacteries by the Pharisees. He pointed this out as a sign of their love of display. 'They make broad their phylacteries' (Mt 23 5). This means that they wore larger pouches than ordinary, and made the bands by which they were attached to their persons correspondingly broader. It is possible that His utterance regarding them may have been actuated by the additional consideration that phylacteries were fast becoming, if they had not already become, objects of superstition. It is certain that somewhat later they were regarded by many as means of protection against demons.

PHYSICIAN. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 3.

PI-BESETH, pai-bī'seth (פִּיבֶסֶת, pī bheseth, Phibeseth AV), 'house of Bastet,' the cat goddess: The city Bubastis, the mod. Tell-Basta, with extensive mounds, in Lower Egypt on the E. side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile. It was the capital of the 18th nome of Lower Egypt, and in 1000 B.C., under the Bubastic (22d) dynasty, became next in importance to Thebes. Its temple, containing important monuments, has been recently excavated by Naville. P. is referred to incidentally in Ezk 30 17. C. S. T.

PICTURE: This word is the rendering in AV for two words, meaning perhaps 'something to look at,' both from the root sākhāh, 'to look out,' 'look for.' For (1) maskīth, RV reads 'figured [stones]' (Nu 33 52), to agree with Lv 26 1, i.e., stones with carvings or pictures used as idols. Other renderings are 'watch-towers,' 'standards' (as conspicuous); or by emendation, 'ships.' In Pr 25 11 ERV has baskets, ARV network (carving) of silver. For (2) sēkhīyāh, RV reads 'imagery' (Is 2 16). C. S. T.

PIGEON. See PALESTINE, § 25; also SACRIFICE AND OFFERING, § 5.

PI-HAHIROTH, pai''-hə-hai'reth (פִּיחִירוֹת, pī hahīrōth): The last encampment of the Israelites before the crossing of the Red Sea, near Baalzephon (Ex 14 2, 9; Nu 33 7; we should also read 'Pi-hahiroth' for 'Hahiroth' in ver. 8). The location is unknown. C. S. T.

PILATE (Πόντιος Πιλάτος): Pontius Pilate was the fifth Roman procurator of Judea, Samaria, and Idumaea (26-36 A.D., or 27-37 [Dobschütz]). Pilate's origin is obscure. He obtained knighthood either by birth or favor. One medieval tradition makes him a Gaul of Vienne, another a German hostage in Rome who joined the 22d legion, fought in Pontus (hence Pontius), and obtained the name Pilatus because of his skill with the pilum; on another less probable view he was a descendant of a freedman (pileatus, corrupted to pilatus, from pīleus, the 'felt cap' worn by manumitted slaves) formerly owned by a member of the Samnite gens of the Pontii. P. was appointed procurator by his patron Sejanus, the anti-Semitic prime minister of Tiberius, and was probably instructed to crush Jewish fanaticism. His predecessor, Valerius Gratus (14-25 A.D.), had resided quietly in Caesarea, content to enrich himself (among other ways by selling the office of high priest), and had respected Jewish superstitions. P. gave offense from the outset. He transferred the headquarters of the army from Caesarea to the palace of Herod (the Praetorium, Mk 15 16, etc.) in Jerusalem. The Roman standards, surmounted by eagles and banners with embroidered portraits of the god-emperor, were held by the Jews to be a violation of the second commandment. P. had remained in Caesarea, whither an excited mob repaired from Jerusalem to beg him to remove the abomination from the holy city. They clamored about the palace for five days; on the sixth P. admitted them to his judgment seat and threatened to massacre them unless they dispersed. They refused, and offered their bare throats to the soldiers. Finally, P. ordered the removal of the obnoxious standards, probably induced thereto by a bribe from Jerusalem. His second offense consisted in taking money from the sacred treasury (Corban) to construct an aqueduct from the Pools of Solomon to Jerusalem. Shocked at this deed, the Jews gathered before his tribunal, abused him, and accused him of embezzling a portion of the funds. In anger P. had the mob mercilessly butchered. P. gave a third offense by hanging up inscribed shields in Herod's palace. The Jews appealed to Tiberius, who ordered the removal of the shields to the temple of the divine Augustus in Caesarea. In similar frequent tumults the Zealots of Galilee took a prominent part, whereupon P. complained ineffectually to Herod Antipas, whom he further offended by attempting to punish the Zealots in Galilee. P. went to Jerusalem in 29 (see N T CHRONOLOGY II, II, (I).) to be on the ground during the Passover, because he had reason to anticipate trouble, and during this visit occurred the events that will make him notorious as long as Christians repeat 'suffered under Pontius Pilate.' That the Jews could be conciliated was shown by Vitellius, who visited Jerusalem in 36, and won the good-will of the populace by a remission of taxes, and of the priests and people by permitting the official robes of the high priest (hitherto stored in the castle of Antonia) to be deposited in the Temple. The final offense of P. led to his downfall. An impostor of Samaria claimed that he had received a revelation to the effect that Moses had concealed certain gold vessels on Mt. Gerizim. The people of Samaria, hitherto loyal to Rome, had gathered in a body (unhappily armed) to hunt for these vessels. P. sent soldiers to disperse the mob; a bloody massacre ensued and a whole village was destroyed. The Samaritans complained to Vitellius, who deposed P. (36-37) and sent him to Rome for trial. Tiberius died before P. reached Rome, and he languished in prison for some time. His case was probably never tried, and his end is enshrouded in uncertainty. Eusebius asserts that after many calamities P.

committed suicide to forestall execution by Caligula. Malalas says that Pilate was beheaded by Nero. According to the legend in the Mors Pilati, his body was thrown into the Tiber, but the demons caused such perturbations in the river that the body was removed to Vienne and finally sunk in a lake on Mt. Pilatus, where it still causes storms. The Acta Pilati, professedly P.'s official report to the emperor concerning the trial and crucifixion of Christ, played a great rôle in early times; Justin Martyr appealed to them (thrice); so did Tertullian (about 180) and Eusebius (about 280). This record was destroyed, probably by Maximian (311). The extant Acta Pilati form a portion of the Gospel of Nicodemus, belonging to the 4th-5th cents., and were written for Jews by Jewish Christians. The Epistola Pilati, addressed to Claudius or Tiberius, purports to be P.'s account of the resurrection of Christ. The Paradosis Pilati tells of P.'s trial, condemnation, and execution by Tiberius. P. prays to Jesus, who forgives him. This legend formed the basis of P.'s canonization as a saint in the Abyssinian Church (June 25), while in the Coptic Church he is reckoned one of the martyrs. The Mors Pilati tells of his banishment to Vienne, suicide, and final burial in Lake Pilatus. Tradition makes P.'s wife (Procla, or Claudia Procula) a 'proselyte of the gate' and a secret follower of Jesus. She is canonized as a saint in the Greek Orthodox Church (October 27).

PILDASH, pil'dash (פִּלְדָּשׁ, pildāsh): The ancestral head of a Nahorite clan (Gn 22 22).

PILGRIMAGE. The rendering of māghōr (in pl.), 'sojourning,' 'place of sojourning' (Gn 47 9; Ps 119 54; also Ex 6 4 AV). There is no suggestion in these passages of the earthly life as a mere temporary 'sojourning' (place) preparatory to a more abiding one (in heaven). But such apparently was the meaning N T writers (cf. He 11 13 and I P 2 11) read into this and similar O T expressions. E.E. N.

PILHA, pil'he (פִּלְחָא, pilhā) Pileha AV): The representative of the postexilic family (Neh 10 24).

PILL. See PEEL.

PILLAR. See TEMPLE, § 14; and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 29.

PILLAR, PLAIN OF THE: The designation of the place where Abimelech was made king (Jg 9 6 AV, 'oak [terebinth] of the pillar' RV). The Heb. matstsābh, 'pillar,' is with Moore, Int. Crit. Com., ad loc., to be emended to matstsēbhāh, and we should read 'the massebah-tree,' perhaps the stone set up by Joshua (Jos 24 26 f.) under the oak by the Sanctuary of J' in Shechem. C. S. T.

PILLOW: This is the rendering in AV of several words. (1) kābhār, something 'netted' (IS 19 13, 16, 'quilt' or 'network' RVmg.). Michal used it 'at the head' of the teraphim either to support the head or else as a net to cover it. (2) kešeth, a band or fillet used as a charm in divination (Ezk 13 18, 20). (3) mēra'āshōth (fem. pl.), 'place at head' (Gn 28 11, 18). RV has here correctly 'under his head'; and for the same Heb. word in I S 26 7, 11, 16, 'at his head' for 'at his bolster' AV; in I S 26 12 'from Saul's head' for 'from Saul's bolster' AV; in I S 19 13, 16, 'at his head' for 'for his bolster' AV. In I K 19 6 the rendering is the same in both versions. (4) προσκεφάλιον (Mk 4 38) means a cushion such as was used for a seat by rowers. C. S. T.

PILOT. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

PILTAL, pil'tai or pil'tē (פִּלְטָא, piltay): The head of the priestly family of Moadiah (Neh 12 17).

PIN: In all the occurrences of this word it is the rendering of the Heb. yāthēdh, which means 'a (wooden) peg,' and is often used to denote the tent-pin. (Cf. Jg 4 21 f., 5 26, where AV has 'nail.') See also NAIL.

PINE AWAY. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (1).

PINE-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

PINION. See GOD, § 2.

PINNACLE. See TEMPLE, § 30.

PINON, pai'nen (פִּינֹן, pīnōn): A clan chieftain of Edom (Gn 36 41; I Ch 1 52). See also PUNON.

PIPE. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (2).

PIRAM, pai'rām (פִּירָם, pīrām): King of Jar-muth, captured and put to death by Joshua (Jos 10 3, 16-27).

PIRATHON, PIRATHONITE, pir'ā-then, -ait (פִּירָתוֹן, pīr'āthōn), 'height' (?): The home of Abdon, the last of the minor Judges (Jg 12 15); also of one of David's heroes and captains (II S 23 30; I Ch 11 31, 27 14). It was in Ephraim, in the hill-country of the Amalekites, generally identified with Far'āta, 5 m. SW. of Nablus (Shechem); by G. A. Smith as a fortress at the head of the Wādī Fā'rah, NE. of Nablus. A Pirathon was fortified by Bacchides (I Mac 9 50). C. S. T.

PISGAH, piz'ga (פִּישְׁגָּה, pišgāh, always with the art., and always in the phrases 'top of P.' and 'slopes [springs,' Dt 4 49 AV; ASHDOTH PISGAH, Jos 12 3 AV] of P.): A mountain summit, mentioned as a landmark and station of the Israelites in Moab (Nu 21 20; Jos 12 3, 13 20). It was noted as an outlook-point. Here Balak built seven altars for Balaam, and invited him to survey the hosts of Israel (Nu 23 14). Moses also viewed the land of promise from it (Dt 34 1). In this case it is explicitly identified with Mt. Nebo in the Abarim. Identified also with Naba, a ridge about 2½ m. in length and ½ m. broad projecting westward from the plateau of Moab near the NE. corner of the Dead Sea. It commands a comprehensive view of the whole of SE. Palestine (G. A. Smith HGHL, p. 563). A. C. Z.

PISHON, pai'shen (פִּישׁוֹן, pīshōn, Pison AV): One of the rivers of the Garden of Eden (Gn 2 11 f.). See EDEN.

PISIDIA, pai-sid'i-ā. See ASIA MINOR, III, 12.

PISPA, pis'pa (פִּשְׁפָּה, pišpā): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 38, Pispah AV).

PIT: This word renders the following original terms: (1) bōr, 'a large hole made by excavating' (Gn 37 20 f., etc.). (2) b'er, 'well' (Gn 14 10, etc.).

(3) gēbh, 'trench' (Jer 14 3, 'cistern' RV), also gebhe (Is 30 14, 'cistern' RV). (4) gūmmāts, 'ditch' (Ec 10 8). (5) paḥath, 'opening' (II S 17 9, 18 17; Jer 48 43, etc.). (6) sh'ōl, 'hollow' (Nu 16 30, 33; Job 17 16, etc., often rendered 'hell'). (7) shūhāh, sh'hūth, sh'hūth, shahath, sh'hāh, all from the same root idea 'to sink down,' (Pr 22 14, 28 10; La 4 20; Job 33 18, etc.). (8) βόθυνος, 'deep place' (Mt 12 11) and (9) φρέαρ, 'well' (Lk 14 5; and, figuratively, Rev 9 1). The term is also used metaphorically as the equivalent of either the grave (Job 33 18), Sheol (Nu 16 30, 33), or a snare. A unique usage is that of Is 51 1, where Sarah, the ancestress of the people, is so designated. A. C. Z.

PITCH: In the Bible 'pitch' means bitumen, which was used in making boats water-tight. It occurs (Gn 6 14) as the trans. of kōpfer, a word borrowed from the Assy. kupru; and in Ex 2 3, Is 34 9 as the trans. of zepheth, also a loan-word. According to Ex 2 3, it was used with hēmār (the usual Heb. word for 'bitumen') in protecting Moses' basket from the water. In Is 34 9 it is represented as a fluid and burning. All three words may mean the same, hēmār alone being Heb. C. S. T.

PITCHER: This word renders (1) kadh, an earthen jar used for holding and carrying water from wells or springs (Gn 24 14 f.; Ec 12 16, etc.). It served also as a receptacle for oil or flour (I K 17 12, 'barrel' AV and ERV, and 'jar' ARV), and was made with handles, by which it might be lifted and carried about, and with a mouth large enough to permit the insertion of a torch (Jg 7 16 f.). (2) ne-bhel, also rendered 'bottle' or 'flagon' (La 4 2). (3) κεράμιον, 'earthen vessel' (Mk 14 13). See plates of POTTERY (p. 68) and HOUSEHOLD UTENSILS I (p. 273). A. C. Z.

PITHOM, pai'thom (פִּתּוֹם, pīthōm): A town in Goshen, in Lower Egypt, founded by Rameses II as a store-city (Ex 1 11 [JE], treasure city AV). Its Egyptian name was pa-Tum or pa-tum ('house of Tum,' or 'house of the setting sun'). It was situated on the banks of the canal connecting the Nile with the Red Sea. Its ground-plan was in the form of a perfect square enclosed by strong walls. Within this enclosure stood a temple dedicated to Tum (the god of the setting sun), and subterranean chambers of various sizes, quadrangular in shape, without communication with one another, and approachable only from above. These were lined with walls and floors of brick made, some with, and some without, straw. There is little doubt that they were intended for the storage of grain and other provisions (cf. Naville, The Store City of Pithom, 1885). A. C. Z.

PITHON, pai'then (פִּיתוֹן, pīthōn): A grandson of Jonathan (I Ch 8 35, 9 41).

PITY (also compassion, which as the synonym of sympathy [fellow-feeling] occurs only in I P 3 1 and He 10 34; elsewhere it is always the equivalent of pity): One or both of these words are used to render: (1) hāmā (Ex 2 8, etc., root idea 'to spare'). (2) hesedh, 'goodness,' 'kindness' (Job 6 14 RV). (3) hūs (vb. Ezk 9 5; Dt 7 16, etc.). (4) hānan, hēn, 'favor,' 'grace' (Jer 22 23 RV, etc.). (5) nūdh, 'to show grief' (Ps 69 20). (6) rāham, rahāmīm, 'deep emotion' (Am 1 11, etc.). (7) εὐσπλαγχνος, Ja 5 11; I P 3 8, 'compassionate' RV. (8) οἰκτεῖται (Ro 9 15). The feeling of kindness toward the weak, the erring, and suffering is uniformly represented as one that exists in the heart of God toward men and is enjoined upon as well as encouraged in the Israelite toward his fellow Israelites, especially the poor (Zec 7 9; Pr 19 17), the helpless and the defenseless (Ps 146 9), and the distressed (Job 6 14); but not toward an enemy (Dt 7 16) and an alien. Yet by its association with the will of J'' it takes its place in the complex of religious affections (Hos 6 6). Jesus, by obliterating all race and ritual distinctions as to those who should call forth the sentiment (Lk 10 25-37), gave the law of compassion universal breadth. A.C.Z.

PLAGUE: This term is frequently used to render, somewhat loosely, a number of Heb. and Gr. words: (1) mag-gēphāh and negheph (from nāghaph, 'to push' or 'strike'), a 'stroke,' as a punishment from God (Ex 9 14, 12 13; Nu 14 37, etc.). (2) makkāh (from nā-khāh, 'to smite,' a 'smiting' or 'stroke,' Lv 26 21; Nu 11 33, etc.). (3) negha' (from nāgha', 'to touch'), a 'touch,' i.e., the touch of God, by a visitation of sickness or otherwise (Gn 12 17; Ex 11 1; and especially in Lv ch. 13 f., of the 'plague' of leprosy). (4) debher, 'pestilence' and consequently nearer 'plague' in the usual sense of the term than the other words so rendered (Hos 13 14). The pestilence that brings death is what is meant, and the sense of the statement is that J'' Himself will be as a death-dealing pestilence to the unrepentant Israelites. (5) μάστιξ, a 'whip' or 'scourge,' used of sickness (Mk 3 10, 5 20, 34; Lk 7 21). (6) πληγή, a 'blow' or 'stroke' (Rev 9 20, 11 6, etc.). See also DISEASE AND MEDICINE, §§ 2 and 4 (2). E. E. N.

PLAGUES, THE: The term usually given to the series of disasters that befell the Egyptians when the Israelites were seeking to gain their freedom.

These were viewed by the Heb. writers as visitations of J'' upon the Egyptians for refusing to let Israel go and as demonstrations of His almighty power (Ex 7 3 ff., 9 14, etc.). As the narrative (Ex chs. 7-10) now stands, there were ten such occurrences: 1, blood; 2, frogs; 3, lice; 4, flies; 5, murrain of cattle; 6, boils; 7, hail; 8, locusts; 9, darkness; 10, death of the first-born. But this narrative is composite (see EXODUS, § 4 f.), and no one of the three original narratives gave the full list of ten. The list of J was the longest, comprising seven (Nos. 1 [which in J is viewed as foul water in the river, not blood], 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10). That of E comprised five (Nos. 1, 7, 8, 9, 10), while that of P also included five (1, 2, 3, 6, 10). Those given in all three documents were apparently only Nos. 1 and 10, but it is possible that in E and P the lists were longer than is now apparent. In Pss 78 and 105 also there are lists of the plagues, seven in each case, of which six are identical, but the order is different. Evidently there were variant traditions in Israel respecting the number, the tendency perhaps being to consider seven as the correct number (cf. the apocalyptic use of this number in Rev 15 1 ff., 21 9, 'the seven last plagues').

In each of the narratives (J, E, P) a miraculous character is assigned to the plagues, but in different degrees. In the oldest (J) only the general exercise of His control over nature by J'' is assumed. It is J'' that brings them about, but how is not told, except by suggesting the use of some natural agency, as the wind in connection with the locusts, 10 13, 19 (cf. the same view of the recession and return of the waters of the Red Sea in J in 14 21, 27). While in J the plagues are above all punishments, in P, and to a less degree in E, the marvelous character is made more prominent in that the plagues are brought by the stretching out of touch of Aaron's (P) or Moses' (E) rod, and it is in P's narrative that the plagues as wonders or signs are especially emphasized (see the analysis of the narrative in Exodus, § 4 f.). It is reasonable to infer, therefore, that in the earliest form of Israel's tradition the 'natural' side of the plagues was recognized and that which made them so remarkable was their occurrence in connection with Israel's struggle for freedom in which their prophetically gifted leader was enabled to interpret and use them as signal manifestations of J' in favor of His people. And that in those times, when every extraordinary natural phenomenon was referred directly to Divine action, such would be the interpretation not only of the Israelites but even of the Egyptians is altogether probable.

It would not be surprising, then, if a close study of the narrative of the plagues in connection with natural phenomena characteristic of Egypt should reveal that certain of them seem to be connected in a sort of natural sequence, which renders the narrative more intelligible to the modern reader and at the same time adds to its historical probability. The results of such observations have been gathered and convincingly presented by Prof. A. Macalister in HDB, s.v., who is followed in the main by McNeile in his recent Com. on Exodus (1908, Westminster Commentaries). The Nile often becomes a dull red after reaching its height (in August), and the water might easily, under special circumstances, become foul, as the red color is due to immense numbers of minute living organisms. Such conditions would be favorable for the appearance of unusually large numbers of frogs, plagues of which have occurred a number of times in Egypt, generally in September. The decomposition of the dead frogs would favor the breeding of innumerable swarms of flies and other insects, and produce unhealthful conditions likely to bring about pestilence among beasts as well as men. Hail-storms, very rare in Egypt, have been known to occur in January, which is about the time demanded by what is said about the injury done to the crops by the hail (9 21). In the wake of the hail-storm the east wind brought with it locusts (a common plague in SW. Asia). The darkness that could be 'felt' (10 21) might easily have been caused by the terrible hamsin wind which brings with its hot blast sand and fine dust so that even breathing is difficult. The last visitation, the death of Egypt's first-born, connects itself naturally with the general pestilential condition of the country at that time. Thus, there were, in general, but two great natural agencies at work to cause such a series of disastrous visitations, the presence of an unusually large quantity of decaying animal matter, and an unusual degree of atmospheric disturbance, bringing violent storms of wind and hail. That a tradition, centuries old before it was written down, should be an exact account, correct in every detail, of such a series of occurrences is improbable. The tradition gradually took its present form under the influence of dominant religious and other conceptions. But its historical basis is not thereby overthrown, nor is it necessary to give up the essential correctness of its view that these visitations were evidences of God's power and of His care for His people Israel. PLAIN: This term is used (in the AV) for seven

Heb. and one Gr. words or expressions. (1) 'abbēl, 'meadow,' always in compound names of places (as Jg 11 33, 'Abel-cheramim' RV, 'meadow of vineyards' RVmg.). (2) 'ēlōn, 'oak' ('terebinth' RVmg.), only found in this form in names of places (Gn 12 6, 13 18, 14 13, 18 1; Dt 11 30; Jg 4 11, 9 6, 37; I S 10 3; cf. Jos 19 33). (3) biq'āh, 'open, broad, valley,' used as the opposite of hills or mountains, often rendered 'valley' (Dt 8 7, 11 11; Ps 104 8; Is 41 18, 63 14), used of level land (Is 40 4; Ezk 3 22 f., 8 4; cf. 37 1, 'valley'), for the 'plain' of Babylon (Gn 11 2; cf. Dn 3 1), of Ono (q.v., Neh 6 2), of Aven (Am 1 5, 'valley' RV) between the Lebanon and Antilebanon, for the Jordan Valley (Dt 34 3), and for other 'valleys' (cf. Jos 11 17, 12 7; Zec 12 11; II Ch 35 22; Jos 11 8). (4) kikkār, 'circle'; always rendered 'plain,' and, except in I K 7 46, II Ch 4 17, in RV with a capital P. It designates the Jordan Valley south of where it broadens out at the Jabbok, as far as and including the Dead Sea, if the 'cities of the plain' (Gn 13 12) were S. of the Dead Sea (Gn 13 10 f., 19 17 f.; Dt 34 3; II S 18 23; Neh 3 22, 12 28; cf. Mt 3 5, 'region round about the Jordan'). (5) māshōr, 'level country' (Ps 27 11, 143 10 ARVmg.; Jer 21 13; Zec 4 7; I K 20 23, 25; cf. Is 40 4, 42 16; Ps 26 12). 'The plain' is the technical term for the table-land of Moab or Reuben (Jos 20 8) from the Arnon to Heshbon (Dt 3 10, 4 43; Jos 13 17, 21; II Ch 26 10; Jer 48 8, 21), called also 'P of Medeba' (Jos 13 9, 16). (6) 'Arābhāh, 'steppe,' 'desert-plain.' The technical term for the hollow or depression (Dt 1 1 RVmg.) of the Jordan Valley, the Dead Sea, and S. to the Gulf of Akabah. El-Ghōr is the modern name from the Sea of Galilee to 6 m. S. of the Dead Sea, below that el-'Arābah. The AV renders by 'plain' or 'plains,' except (so also RV) in Ps and the Prophets, where a desert or wilderness is intended. The RV retains 'plains' in some cases (Nu 22 1, etc.; Dt 34 1, 8; Jos 4 13, 5 10, 13 32; II K 25 5=Jer 39 5=52 8); elsewhere in RV it is 'Arabah.' RV emends the text in II S 15 28, 17 16 to read 'fords.' See also ARABAH. (7) sh'phēlāh, 'lowland,' the technical term for the low hills between the Mts. of Judah and the Maritime plain, S. of the vale of Aijalon (I Ch 27 28; II Ch 9 27; Jer 17 28, etc.). It is distinguished from the mountains, the Arabah, the Negeb (south), and the plain by the sea (Dt 17; Jos 9 1). See PALESTINE, § 7 (b). It is often rendered (in AV) 'vale,' 'valley.' RV has uniformly 'lowland.' In Jos 11 2 it refers to the lowland W. of Carmel, and near the coast. (8) τόπος πεδινός (Lk 6 17 RV, 'level place'). C. S. T.

PLANE-TREE. See PALESTINE, § 21.

PLANK. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

PLASTER: (1) sīdh (n. and vb.), 'lime,' 'white-wash.' In Dt 27 2-4, the stones were to be covered with a preparation of lime, to provide a surface on which writing might be inscribed with a pigment, as was done in Egypt. (2) gīr (Aram.), the plaster on a wall (Dn 5 5), similar to sīdh above. (3) tūah (vb.), 'to overlay,' 'smear,' the walls of a house with a mud plaster (Lv 14 42; cf. vs. 43, 48). (4) mārah (vb.), a medical term, 'to smooth' or 'smear' a boil or sore with a plaster (of figs in Is 38 21). C. S. T.

PLATTER: The rendering of two Gr. words: (1) παροψίς, lit. 'a side-dish' (παρά, 'by the side of,' and ψίς), i.e., a dish 'in which delicacies are served up' (Thayer, Gr. Lex. of N T) (Mt 23 25 f.). (2) πλατῆς, 'a board' or 'tablet' and here a flat dish or 'platter' in the ordinary sense (Lk 11 39; charger AV in Mt 14 8 f.; Mk 6 25 f.). Such a dish could be of earthenware or of metal. 'Charger' is also used in AV to render qē'ārāh (Nu 7 13, etc.) and 'āgharṭāl, prob. 'bowl' (Ezr 1 9), both 'platter' RV. E. E. N.

PLAY: (1) nāghan, which means 'to play on a stringed instrument' (I S 16 16, etc.; II K 3 15; Ps 33 3; Ezk 33 32). (2) tsāhaq (Pi'el) in Ex 32 6, to enjoy oneself with singing and dancing, after sacrificing (cf. vs. 17, 19; and καλλεῖν in I Co 10 7). (3) sāhaq (Pi'el), to 'play' or 'sport,' by singing and dancing with music of stringed instruments (I S 18 7; II S 6 5, 21; I Ch 13 8, 15 29), of the playing of children (Zec 8 5), of contending in a tournament (II S 2 14), of playing or sporting with something (Job 40 20, 41 5 [40 29]). (4) Shā'a' (Pilpel), 'the playing' of a child (Is 11 8). C. S. T.

PLEAD. See LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 4.

PLEASANT PLANTS. (Is 17 10.) See ADONIS, PLANTINGS OF.

PLEDGE: An article given as security or surety for the restoration of money borrowed. In early Heb. society such articles were apt to be garments, or a utensil of some sort (Ex 22 26; Dt 24 6-17; Job 24 3, etc.). In later times fields and houses were mortgaged (Neh 5 3) and outside parties were invoked as security (Pr 6 1, 11 5, etc.). In all periods the way was open for the cruel oppression of the poor by the rich in respect to pledges. Both the Law and the prophets sought to mitigate the evils and inculcate a more humane spirit (see reff. above; also Am 2 8; Ezk 18 7). The wise men warned against the risk involved in becoming a surety (Pr 6 1, 11 15, 22 26, etc.). The word pledge has, however, other meanings, as in I S 17 18, a 'token' to assure those at home of the safety of those in camp. In Gn 38 17-20 the meaning is self-evident. In II K 18 23, Is 36 8, 'give pledges to' should be 'make a wager with'; so RVmg. See EARNEST; also TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3. E. E. N.

PLEIADES, plai'a-diz or pli'a-diz. See ASTRONOMY, § 4.

PLOW: The plow in common use in Palestine even to-day is a very primitive instrument, as will be seen by the accompanying illustration (cf. also Plate under AGRICULTURE). The framework is rudely constructed and not of great strength. The plowshare ('eth; cf. Is 2 4; Jl 3 10; Mic 4 3) is almost flat (rather than upright) and merely breaks up the surface of the soil to the depth of three or four inches, instead of turning it over in deep furrows as is the case with the plows used in Europe and America. The word maḥārēshāh [from hārash, 'to cut in'] is also rendered 'share,' I S 13 20, and 'mattock' in ver. 21, while 'eth is rendered coulter, but as the Oriental plow has no coulter this is certainly wrong.

According to the LXX., maḥārēshāh should be rendered 'sickle.' The passage has probably suffered in transmission. See FILE. In plowing, the single handle is held with the left hand, leaving the right free to use the goad. See also AGRICULTURE, § 4.

PLUNDER. See WARFARE, § 5.

POCHERETH, pek'i-reth, HAZZEBAIM (haz'-si-bā'im חֲזַזְבַּיִם ḥazzeḇaim, ḥazzeḇaim ḥazzeḇaim, P. of Zebaim AV): The name of a subdivision of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59).

POET (ποιητής): This word is used only in Ac 17 28 by Paul in introducing a quotation to his Athenian audience from a Stoic writing (Cleanthes, Hymn to Zeus). But as the same sentiment is expressed by Aratus (3d cent. B.C.) in the more precise form in which he reproduces it (Phenomena), the Apostle uses the plural 'poets.' Paul quotes another Greek poet (Tit 1 12), the calling him after the Hebrew fashion a prophet (Epimenides, On Oracles). In I Co 15 33 there is a trace of poetic form, but as no author is named, the presumption is that the words were a popular proverb. A. C. Z.

POETRY: 1. The N T in Prose. The N T is composed entirely in prose, with the exception of quotations from previous poetical writings and possibly liturgical formulas used by the earliest Christians in worship. Such may be the Magnificat (Lk 1 46b-55) and the Song of Zacharias (Lk 1 68-79) and I Ti 3 1. The effort to reduce sayings of Jesus to the parallelistic forms of Hebrew poetry (Briggs, New Light in the Life, etc.) can at best apply only to the Aramaic originals of those sayings. This leaves the whole Greek portion of the Bible, historical, didactic, and apocalyptic, in prose.

2. Poetic Form in O T. In the O T, however, at least six whole books and large portions of others are poetic, not only in form but in contents (Ps, Pr, Job, Song, Ec, and La, to which may be added Sir and Wis of the Apocrypha). The Hebrews were no exception to the rule that all races in their earlier stages of development express their inner life in verse. Before they began to write the records of their tribal or national achievements, they had already become possessed of a collection of songs and epic accounts of ancient leaders, small portions of which have been embodied in the Biblical text. The lost books of Jashar (q.v.) and the Wars of Jehovah (q.v.) were undoubtedly poetic. The Song of Lamech (Gn 4 23 f.), the Blessing of Jacob (Gn ch. 49), the Blessing of Moses (Dt ch. 33), the Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5), the Songs of Moses and Miriam (Ex 15 1-18), and several smaller fragments are probably examples of a large number that did not survive.

3. Distinction Between Poetry and Prose. The effort, however, to make an exhaustive list of the poetic portions, large or small, of the O T is rendered futile by the obvious difficulty of drawing a clear line between highly artistic prose and rather commonplace poetry. While it is easy to say in general that the difference between poetry and prose lies in the fact that the former possesses the two cardinal peculiarities of imaginative conception in subject-matter and versified expression, this general characterization is not sufficient to enable one to discriminate in every particular case. It might be a question, for instance, whether the prolog and epilog of Job were prose or poetry. What can be done is to indicate in general the types or classes of poetic composition, and some of the technique of versification. But in doing this we must abandon the strict use of the ordinary classification and nomenclature of classic poetic literature as epic, lyric, and dramatic. These are usable only in a modified form when applied to Semitic lore. A new element, too, must be taken into account in dealing with the poetry of the Hebrews. This is the religious feeling which characteristically pervades and dominates it almost without exception.

4. The Psalm: Its Varieties. The term lyric so far as it denotes the poetry that springs from a highly wrought state of feeling, is indeed perfectly adapted to describe a large portion of Hebrew versified composition. But of the lyric form there are many varieties; the most common is the psalm, or religious lyric, used in ordinary worship either as a hymn of praise or as a prayer. This, of course, is true of its strict and pure type. The Hebrew poet does not, however, limit himself to the mere expression of feeling addressed to God; he permits his sentiments toward other men to mingle with his individual relation to God and thus, in addition to the hymn and prayer, a third type of psalm arises, i.e., the exhortation (warning, encouragement, his toric portraiture, or love-song). All these, with the song of thanksgiving for special victory over an enemy (pæan), occur in the Psalter.

5. The Dirge or Qīnāh. A special class of lyrics is that of dirges (Qīnāh, pl. Qīnōth) in which expression is given to overwhelming grief, either for a private or for a public calamity. The laments of David over Saul and Jonathan (II S 1 19-27) and over Abner (II S 3 33, 34), and especially the Book of Lamentations, furnish fine specimens of this form.

6. Didactic Poetry. Poetry whose object is to admonish and instruct the young was also evidently from the earliest ages quite common. It was developed into many subordinate varieties, such as the riddle, the fable, the parable, the proverb, and the epigram, whether of the philosophical or the political type. Of the riddle the story of Samson contains a distinct and typical illustration (Jg 14 14, 18). The fable is represented in Jotham's story of the trees seeking a king (Jg 9 8 ff.); and of the maxim in all its forms the lines ascribed to the poets Agur and Lemuel in Pr ch. 30 1 ff. furnish abundant examples. This type is sometimes called Gnostic poetry. But when it takes an extensive, elaborate, and discursive form it is proper to entitle it didactic. This is the prevailing type in the Wisdom literature. Outside of Pr, Job chs. 28 and 31 may be cited as outstanding illustrations within the Canon, and the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon (of the Apocrypha) carries it out to its perfect development. See also PARABLE; PROVERB; PROVERBS, BOOK OF; and WISDOM, WISE MEN.

7. Dramatic Poetry in O T? Whether there is any dramatic poetry in the O T has been seriously questioned. The controversy hinges on the definition of the word dramatic. If the term be made to imply all that it does in the Greek literature, it must be admitted that there is no Hebrew drama; but if it be used as a general word to denote the representation of action and life not necessarily for reproduction upon a stage, there are dramatic passages in the prophetic writings as well as in the Psalms, and the Book of Job and the Song of Solomon are certainly dramatic. Ps 24, at least from vs. 7 to 10, is constructed in the form of a trilogy, ver. 7 being uttered by one person, or by a chorus, 8a by another, and 8b by a third, and the whole series is repeated in vs. 9 and 10.

8. Prophetic Verse. Strictly speaking, the utterances of the Prophets, so far as they express emotion of the most exalted type, would be classified as lyrics; but as they grow into an importance and form of their own, it will be proper to separate them into a class by themselves under the specific title of Prophetic Poetry. These utterances are in some respects analogous to the orations, or public discourses, of the Greek political leaders. But whereas the latter are framed in and occasioned by purely political settings, those of the Prophets were spontaneously produced under Divine inspiration, and worked out their own frame and setting according to circumstances, being of course always addressed to specific needs.

9. Mixed Forms. It goes without saying that these various types were at times blended, resulting in poetry that may be classified under one or another name, according as one takes into consideration one or another of the different aspects and characteristics as predominant. An adequate name for these is that suggested by Professor Briggs, 'composite poetry' (cf. Briggs, Introd. to Holy Scripture).

10. Versification Parallelism. Poetic forms, like standards of excellence, differ very widely among different peoples. But there can be no true poetry without some effort at cadence and musical expression, i.e., versification. Among the Hebrews it appears that versification was aimed at mainly in two ways, i.e., parallelism and accent. Parallelism has been called the great formative principle of Hebrew poetry. The use of it in the O T was first brought into view with some measure of fulness by Bp. Lowth (De Sacr. Poesi. Hebr. XIX, 1753). He called attention to three kinds: (1) Synonymous parallelism, (2) antithetical parallelism, (3) synthetic parallelism. Later investigators have discovered three others, i.e.: (4) introverted parallelism (Bp. Jebb), (5) emblematic or comparative parallelism, and (6) climactic parallelism, in which the last word of each line becomes the first of the next. The use of parallelism satisfies the instinct for symmetry. It divides the expression into parts, and balances these one with another, creating a correspondence between them. At the same time it is a great help to the memory in the committing and repetition of what has been written.

11. Rhythm. Parallelism, however, only establishes symmetry in the construction of sentences or clauses. Hebrew poetry went further than this in introducing rhythm into the clauses themselves. Just how this was accomplished has been brought to light by the investigations of Ley and Briggs, made independently and simultaneously. These investigations show that rhythm was secured by arranging words not according to the quantity of their vowels but according to their natural accents, including, in rarer cases, secondary accents in longer words. This was facilitated by that peculiarity of the Hebrew language that makes the grouping of words of one syllable possible, and thus affords a considerable freedom to the versifier in grouping accents.

12. Meter. The metrical unit, therefore, in Hebrew poetry was furnished by counting the accented syllables of the clause. The further question whether the unaccented syllables were also counted has been answered by Bickell in the affirmative, who also holds that only one unaccented syllable must follow or precede the accented one. In such a case only iambic or trochaic measures are possible. As against this, Ley and Briggs contend that only the accented syllables were counted, allowing of dactylic and anapestic measures. The length of the measures thus constructed was variable. Most common is the trimeter distich, or measure consisting of 3+3 accents. Josephus calls this the hexameter. It is the prevailing measure in Job. The tetrameter distich or measure of 4+4 accents is also common, especially in the Prophets. The shorter dimeter distich of 2+2 accents is rare. By dropping one of the accents in the second member of the trimeter distich the measure 3+2 was developed, and has been called by some scholars the pentameter. This seems to have found favor, especially where a highly wrought state of feeling was struggling for expression. It is the prevalent measure in Jeremiah (cf. also Is 40 1-4, 9-11; Ps 23, 27 1-6). Budde has called this the qināh, 'dirge,' from its occurrence in La. But the theory has not found universal acceptance (cf. Duhm in EB and Briggs, Introd. to Holy Scripture). See also PROVERBS, BOOK OF, § 3.

13. Strophe. The arrangement of these measures in strophes or stanzas, in spite of the controversy on the subject, is put beyond doubt by the frequent occurrence of refrains at regular intervals in certain poems. Babylonian and Egyptian poetry also have clearly marked strophical arrangements, and it is not improbable that they influenced Hebrew methods of composition. The simplest and commonest strophe in Hebrew is constituted by the doubling of the distich (so in Ex ch. 15). When this strophe is doubled, the larger strophe of eight lines is made up; and by the addition of another or by putting three strophes of four lines together, the strophe of twelve lines is obtained (cf. Is 9 8 ff., where the refrain shows this construction). The refrain of two lines additional brings the great strophe of fourteen lines into view, which is, as far as now known, the longest in use in Hebrew poetry, and is to be found in Job ch. 28 and Am 1 3-2 10.

14. Rime. Rime is only occasionally used by the Hebrew poets. In Ps 105 it has been put to good service in heightening the effect of the expression. Rime, however, is of the nature of word-play or word-painting, and it never attained in Hebrew the importance given it in Arabic, where its constant use necessitated the elaboration of a set of rules to govern it. In Pss 6 and 110, and especially in Is chs. 24-27, word-play of the nature of rime is used with somewhat of the realism of modern music.

15. Acrostics: Alphabetic Poems. Acrostics were another artifice to which the Hebrews resorted to heighten the effect of poetic expression. In one case, the author of verses has succeeded in weaving his name into them (Pedaiah, Ps 25 22, 34 23). Of more frequent occurrence is the alphabetic poem in which each verse or measure begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps 25, 34; La chs. 1, 2, 3 and 4). Ps 119 consists of 22 sections, each section constructed upon the plan of eight successive measures or verses beginning with the same letter of the alphabet, all being arranged in the regular order of the Hebrew letters.

POLL: As a noun the term polls is used to render the pl. of gulgūleth, 'skulls,' 'heads,' as 'round' (Nu 1 2, 18, 20, 22, 3 47; I Ch 23 3, 24) in the sense of individuals when numbering a people; as a verb the AV has 'poll' for (1) gāzaz (Mic 1 16) in the sense of making the head round, by 'shaving' off the hair, as a sign of mourning; ARV reads 'cut off the hair.' (2) gālah, to 'shave' the hair (II S 14 26 'cut off' ARV). (3) kāšam (only Ezk 44 20, 'cut off' ARV). (4) gātsats, 'to cut off' (Jer 9 26 [25], 25 23 49 32; 'polled' ERV). In these passages the AV 'utmost corners' is due evidently to a misunderstanding of the Heb. (cf. RV). C. S. T.

POLLUTE, pe-liūt'. See PURE, PURITY, PURIFICATION, §§ 6 (2) and 10.

POLLUX, pol'uks. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

POMEGRANATE, pem'gran-it or pom'gran-it. See PALESTINE, §§ 21 and 23.

POMMEL, pom'el: The Heb. gullāh (rendered 'pommel,' II Ch 4 12 f. AV) refers to the bowl- or globe-shaped part of the capitals of the two brazen pillars of the Temple (cf. RV, and also I K 7 41 f.).

PONDS: A term found only in Ex 7 19 RV ('pools' AV), rendering miqweh, 'a collection' of waters (in artificial cisterns, reservoirs, etc.). In the same verse the AV 'ponds' (=RV 'pools') renders the Heb. 'āgham, 'stagnant water' (left by the receding Nile). On Is 19 10 (AV) cf. RV. See also POOL.

E. E. N.

PONTIUS, pon'shūs or pon'ti-ūs. See PILATE.

PONTUS, pon'tūs. See ASIA MINOR, III, 13.

POOL, POND: Several Heb. words are thus rendered in EV. (1) 'āgham denoted especially, tho not always, a collection of stagnant water (Ex 7 19, 8 5, 'ponds' AV; Is 14 23), which was apparently contrasted with (2) a miqweh or 'gathering together' (cf. Gn 1 10; Lv 11 36) of water in a storage-pond (Ex 7 19 'pools' AV). (3) An artificial reservoir was commonly called a berēkhāh (Arab. birket, N T κολυμβήθρα, Jn 5 2 ff., 9 7 ff.). These reservoirs were supplied with water by surface drainage, by springs, or, more rarely, by a conduit from a distant source. The smaller pools were usually rectangular excavations lined with cement. The largest, like 'Solomon's Pools' near Bethlehem (cf. Ec 2 6), were constructed by damming up some narrow valley. The Bible mentions particularly the pools at Gibeon (II S 2 13), Hebron (II S 4 12), Samaria (I K 22 38), Heshbon (Song 7 4), and Jerusalem (q.v., § 13 f.). L. G. L.—L. B. P.

POOR: 1. Terms Used to Describe the Poor. A variety of words is used both in the Heb. and Gr. to characterize those in need. The most important are the following: (1) rāsh (ptcl. of rāsh, to which the N T terms πένης, πτωχός, correspond), which is the distinctive word to mark poverty in the common use of the term (I S 18 23; II S 12 3 f.; Pr 10 4, 13 8, etc.). (2) 'ebhyōn (represented in the N T by πένης, πτωχός, ἐνδεής) denotes one who is in want either of means or of help, and so may be translated either 'poor' or 'afflicted' (Ex 23 6, 11, etc.). (3) dal (represented in the N T by ἀσθενής, πένης, πτωχός, ταπεινός), which signifies 'thin,' 'reduced,' 'feeble,' and describes not only those who are literally in want, but also those who are reduced in social condition, oppressed, or miserable (Gn 41 19; Ex 23 3, etc.). (4) 'ānī (in the N T πένης, πτωχός, πρᾶς, ταπεινός), translated in our English versions mostly by 'afflicted' or 'poor,' denotes one who is 'miserable' more perhaps from ill treatment and oppression than from actual poverty, tho, of course, the latter kind of misery is included. The three terms 'ebhyōn, dal and 'ānī are used with a religious connotation, i.e., while those who are described (particularly by the term 'ānī) are in some form of wretchedness, they may be looked upon as the godly, the servants of Jehovah. This use of the terms appears in the Psalms in the recurring phrase 'the poor and needy,' which refers to those who elsewhere are called 'the godly,' the 'righteous.' (See Driver in HDB, vol. iv, p. 19.) One other word requires attention and this is 'ānāw, which signifies humble-minded toward God, and is usually rendered 'meek' (represented in the N T by ταπεινός, πτωχός τῷ πνεύματι, πρᾶς). It is in the prophetic and poetic books of the O T that these words appear with a wider range of meaning than that of mere material want (Ps 10 17; Is 61 1, etc.).

2. Treatment of the Poor. As at all times and among all peoples, so in Israel the poor were always to be found. They were not forgotten in the provisions of the Law, and the spirit of true religion was set forth as one of kindness and helpfulness. The Law, in the interests of the poor, provided for the right of gleaning (Lv 19 9, 10; Dt 24 19, 21); for the prohibition of usury (Lv 25 35, 37); for portions from the tithes to be shared by the poor after the Levites (Dt 14 28); for the daily payment of wages (Lv 19 13), and by other like regulations for relieving the hopelessness of poverty. According to Israelitic law, no Jew could lose his freedom through poverty, and there came to him stated periods of 'release,' a time when he could redeem his property (Lv 25 39, 47). Selfishness and greed once and again defeated the claims of righteousness in these matters, and the Prophets were earnest in their warnings and rebukes. The spirit of the O T is exalted in its attitude toward the worthy poor. Proverbs and Ecclesiastes have much to say in regard to the poverty which comes through wilful folly, but they equally set forth the blessings of him who helps the needy and honors God in a wise charity. In the N T Church the poor became from the first the object of earnest care (Ac 4 34 ff., 6 1; Ro 15 26; Gal 2 10; Ja 2 2-6). See also MEEK, MEEK-NESS. J. S. R.—L. B. P.

POPLAR. See PALESTINE, § 21.

PORATHA, pō-rē'tha or pōr'a-tha (פֹּרְתָה, pōrā-thā, a Persian word): One of the sons of Haman (Est 9 8).

PORCH: In Jg 3 23 the word mišd'rōn, rendered 'porch,' is of uncertain meaning, and it is not known to what part of the house it refers. In Mk 14 68 the προαύλιον is probably the 'vestibule' of the αὐλή, or 'court,' situated at the πυλῶν, or 'gateway' ('porch' in Mt 26 71). The word στοά (Jn 5 2, 10 23; Ac 3 11, 5 12) means a covered colonnade protecting those walking, or standing, from the sun and rain. See also TEMPLE, §§ 8, 20, 27; and SOLOMON, § 4.

PORCIUS, pōr-si-ūs or -shi-ūs. See FESTUS.

PORCUPINE. See PALESTINE, § 24.

PORT: This term is used once (Neh 2 13 AV) for sha'ar, which elsewhere in AV (and RV here) is rendered 'gate.'

C. S. T.

PORTER: The rendering of shō'er (Aram. tārā', Ezr 7 24). In II S 18 26, II K 7 10 it refers to the 'gatekeeper' of a city gate. The former passage we should perhaps emend so as to read 'at the gate' for 'unto the porter.' In II S 4 6, as emended by many following the text of LXX., it is used of a doorkeeper (female) of a house. Elsewhere the term refers to the gatekeepers in the Sanctuary. It is often used in Ch, Ezr, Neh, and usually rendered 'porter' in AV, but RV has 'doorkeeper' in several passages in Ch (I Ch 15 18, 16 38, etc.). In Ezr and Neh the doorkeepers and singers are distinguished from the Levites (cf. Ezr 2 41 ff.; Neh 7 44 ff., etc.), but in Ch they are called Levites (I Ch 23 1 ff., etc.). According to I Ch 23 5 the porters numbered 4,000; they were 'sons' of Korah and Merari (I Ch 26 19). See also PRIESTHOOD, § 9. C. S. T.

PORTION: The rendering of (1) 'āhūz, 'what is laid hold on' (Nu 31 30 AV, but 'one drawn out of' RV). (2) dābhār, 'thing,' 'affair' (II Ch 31 18 AV, also RVmg.; but 'duty' RV; Job 26 14 AV and RVmg., but 'a small whisper' RV). (3) hebbhel, 'line' (Jos 17 5, 14, 19 9, 'part' AV, 'line' RVmg.; Ezk 47 13). (4) hēleq, heḡāh (Aram. hālāq, Dn 4 15; Ezr 4 16), 'share,' especially in the division of inheritance (Gn 14 24, 31 14; 'Naboth's portion,' II K 9 21). (5) hōq, denoting the orderly or lawful share, as if determined by 'statute' (hōq) (Gn 47 22 AV and RVmg.; Pr 31 15; 'tax' RV). (6) mahā-lōqeth, 'section,' 'subdivision' (Ezk 48 29). (7) mānāh, mēnāth, 'part' (I S 1 4; Ps 63 10). (8) pī-shē-nayim, 'mouth of two,' i.e., enough to fill the mouth of two persons = double share (Dt 21 17; II K 2 9). But in such instances the numeral is used not in its strict mathematical sense but as a general designation of great abundance). (9) shēkhem, 'shoulder' (Gn 48 22, 'mountain-slope' RVmg., a significant way of denoting a piece of land in a hilly country). (10) pathbagh, 'delicacy' (Aram., Dn 1 8 f.). (11) μέρος, 'part' (Mt 24 51; Lk 15 12). (12) ἀπομέτριον, 'measure of wheat' (Lk 12 42). In EVV 'portion' is used either absolutely in the sense of 'part,' as of a whole, or relatively, of what may fall to one out of a common mass, such as a meal (Est 9 19; Ps 63 10), or patrimony (Lk 15 12). In the latter case, the exact sense is that of 'share.' From this usage arises a more specific one, viz., since a share in an ancestral estate is regarded with feelings of peculiar appreciation, and since rights in it are inalienable, 'portion' expresses Israel's rights and privileges in its God ('He is the portion of his people,' Ps 119, 57, 142 5; Jer 51 19; La 3 24). The obverse of this is also true, i.e., Israel is J's portion (Dt 32 9; Zec 2 12). (Cf. also 'portion of a weak man,' Job 20 29, 27 13; Is 17 14.) A. C. Z.

POSSESSION. See DEMON, DEMONOLOGY, §§ 4 ff.; and FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 8.

POST: The rendering of the Heb. rāts, 'runner,' which, in such passages as II Ch 30 6, 10, Est 3 13, etc., Job 9 25, Jer 51 31, denotes the swift messengers used to carry royal messages. In the Persian service they were mounted on the swiftest horses, and were noted for their speed (cf. Herodotus, 8 98). See also HOUSE, § 6. E. E. N.

POT. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 11.

POTIPHAR, pot'ī-fār (פֹּתִיפָר, pōtīphār, abbreviated from 'Potiphera,' q.v.): The name of the 'officer of Pharaoh's, the captain of the guard' ('chief of executioners' RVmg.), who bought Joseph from the Midianites (Gn 37 36, 39 1). The name of the office he occupied (sar haṭṭabbāhām) is evidently given not in its exact Egyptian form, for it does not correspond with any one of the numerous court position known to be attached to Egyptian royalty, but in its equivalent in Palestinian and E. Semitic terminology. The Heb. term šārīš (rendered 'officer') means eunuch; but Potiphar was a married man (Gn 39 7 ff.), and, accordingly, the word is probably used in a general sense not involving sexual disability, which is sometimes the case, tho married eunuchs are not unknown to history (cf. Burkhardt, Arabia, I, 290; Ebers, Aegypten, p. 299). A. C. Z.

POTIPHERA, po-tif'ī-rā (פֹּתִיפָר, pōtī phē-ra'): Priest of On, Joseph's father-in-law (Gn 41 45, 50, Potipherah AV). The Egyptian meaning of the word is 'he whom Ra gave.' With the omission of the article (in Egyptian) it becomes Potiphar. A. C. Z.

POTSHERD, pet'shurd': The rendering of the Heb. heres, 'a piece of pottery,' either a whole piece or its broken fragments: the latter in Job 2 8, 41 30; Is 30 14 (sherd); Ezk 23 24; the former in other instances. Broken fragments of pottery were in common use as a cheap and convenient material on which to write notes, letters, and memoranda. See also POTTERY. E. E. N.

POTTAGE. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 3.

POTTER, POTTERY: From the earliest historic times pottery has been made in Palestine. Excavations have brought to light many specimens, showing the usual development from the more crude to the more finished products as time advanced. Most of the vessels used in the Hebrew household were made of pottery. Their frailty is used by the O T writers to illustrate human helplessness before God's power (Ps 2 9; Is 30 14; Jer 19 11) and the power of the potter over his clay to illustrate the Divine sovereignty (Is 64 8; Jer 18 2 ff.; Ro 9 20-24). See ARTIZAN LIFE, §§ 7-9; with Illustration. E. E. N.

POTTER'S FIELD. See JERUSALEM, § 46.

POUND. See MONEY, I, 2, and II; and WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4.

POWER: This term renders Heb. and Gr. words as follows: (1) 'ēl, 'strength' (in the phrase 'it is in the power of my [thine, their] hand,' Gn 31 29; Pr 3 27; Mic 2 1). (2) g'bhārāh, 'might' (a poetic word, Ps 21 13, 71 18, 145 11; Job 41 12, 'strength' RV). (3) z'rāa, 'arm' (Ps 79 11). (4) hayil, 'force' (I S 9 1, 'valor' RV; Ezr 4 23). (5) yād, 'hand' (Dt 32 36). (6) kōāh, 'strength' (Gn 31 6; Ex 15 6). (7) kaph, 'palm' (Hab 2 9, 'hand' RV). (8) memshālāh, 'dominion' (II Ch 32 9). (9) 'az, 'ōz (Gn 49 3; Ps 62 11). (10) 'izzūz, 'strong one' (Is 43 17, 'mighty man' RV). (11) shillōn, 'authority' (Ec 8 4, 8). (12) ta'ātsūmōth, 'substance' (Ps 68 35). (13) tōqeph, 'energy' (Est 10 2). (14) 'ēl yād, 'power of hand' (Neh 5 5). (15) āpax, 'rule,' 'authority' (Lk 20 20, 'rule' RV). (16) δόναμις, τὸ δυνατέον, 'power' (Mt 24 30; Lk 9 1, etc.). (17) ἐξουσία, 'authority' (Mt 9 6; Rev 2 26, 'authority' RV; Ro 9 21; Jn 1 12, 'right' RV). (18) ισχύς, 'force' (II Th 1 9; II P 2 11, 'might' RV). (19) κράτος (Eph 1 19; He 2 14). (20) The word 'power' sometimes appears without a definite equivalent in the original, but as a necessary complement of the thought as in Rev 13 14 f. AV, 'had power to,' etc., where RV more literally renders 'it was given him to,' etc. A. C. Z.

PRÆTORIAN GUARD, PRÆTORIUM. See PRÆTORIUM.

PRASE: 1. Preliminary Definitions. The term 'praise,' as descriptive of sacred utterance, has two uses which are usually blended, tho sometimes distinguished. The first of these regards the content of the utterance, denoting such expression toward God as is highly charged with jubilant sentiments like adoration and thanksgiving. The second regards rather the manner of the utterance, denoting the poetic and musical formulas in which these sentiments are liturgically embodied. In the first usage 'praise' is more or less contrasted with 'prayer' in its narrow sense (humiliation and supplication). In the second usage 'praise' is sometimes extended so as to cover any musical form of worship, even if not Godward in direction or not jubilant in tone.

The Biblical concept of 'praise' is chiefly conveyed by the frequent use, especially in the Psalms and the later histories and prophecies, of such words as hālāl, 'praise,' yādhāh, 'give thanks,' shābhah, 'praise,' bārakh, 'bless,' zāmar, 'sing praise,' ānāh, 'sing,' shīr, 'sing,' rānan, 'shout,' gīl, 'rejoice,' etc., with their derivatives. The exact shades of meaning in some of these are uncertain, and indeed do not seem to be consistently observed (hālāl apparently contains the notion of making brilliant, yādhāh that of extending the hands in protestation, bārakh that of kneeling, zāmar that of playing an instrument, ānāh that of antiphony, gīl that of circling in a dance, etc.). Evidently the Hebrew idea of social worship included the excited and vociferous outpouring of feeling in words and tones, in which the conspicuous mental elements were the objective laudation or magnifying of God and the declaration of subjective loyalty and zeal on the worshiper's part. In the N T the principal terms are εὐλογεῖν, αἰνεῖν, ἐπαίνεῖν, and ὑμνεῖν and their derivatives, emphasizing the ideas of 'eulogy,' 'glorification,' and 'song.'

2. References in the O T. The distribution of the O T references to 'praise' in these technical senses suggests that the practise was chiefly developed from the time of the Exile onward. For example, hālāl (directed toward God) occurs about seventy-five times in Pss, twenty in Ch, five in Ezr and Neh, and seven elsewhere—all probably late. The Hebrew name of the Psalter is tehillim, 'praises.' One of the types or ceremonies of sacrifice was the tōdhāh, commonly rendered 'thanksgiving,' but probably more a protestation of loyalty than of gratitude. A frequent ejaculation is hallelū-Yāh, 'Praise J' (see HALLELUJAH). It would seem, therefore, that with the development of a fuller cultus came the necessity for these poetic and musical elements. Praise was essentially a social act, performed normally in the Temple (or synagog) as a part of the stated ritual. (For many references as to details, see under MUSIC.) The Psalter takes its name from the fact that most of its contents were formulas for such use, tho the difference in texture between its poems is considerable (see under PSALMS, §§ 4 ff.). Characteristic psalms of praise are 24 7-10, 28 6-9, 47, 67, 92, 93, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100, 113, 116, 117, 118, 145, 148, 150, with many more in which reflective or historical elements are interwoven (such as 18, 46, 65, 103, 104, 107, etc.). Books IV and V are particularly strong in this regard, but praiseful introductions, conclusions, refrains, and episodes occur in all parts of the collection. Notable examples of poems of praise outside the Psalter are the Song of the Exodus (Ex ch. 15), that of Deborah and Barak

(Jg ch. 5), that of Hannah (I S ch. 2), that of David (II S ch. 22=Ps 18), that of Jonah (Jon ch. 2), and that of Habakkuk (Hab ch. 3)—with the poems preserved in the N T (Lk chs. 1-2). Altho the materials of some of these are apparently early, they all have been at least reworked in the style of the Psalter. The same praiseful spirit is clear in the many doxologies (see § 4, below) scattered through the N T (Gal 1 5; Ro 1 25, 9 5, 11 33-36, 16 25-27; II Co 11 31; Ph 4 20; Eph 3 20-21; I Ti 1 17, 6 15-16; II Ti 4 18; I P 4 11, 5 11; II P 3 18; Jude vs. 24-25; He 13 21; Rev 1 5-8, 4 8, 11, 5 9-10, 12, 13, 7 10, 12, 11 17, 15 3-4, 16 5-7, 19 1-2, 6-7).

3. Favorite Topics and Sentiments. So familiar are most of the classical passages of Biblical praise that the many aspects and implications of their thought are not always clearly perceived. Their great and most essential topic is the infinite nature of God, especially His supremacy, holiness, truth, justice, and wisdom. These regal attributes are dwelt upon with such singular richness of feeling and vigor of expression that the Biblical phraseology is a treasury from which all liturgies have drawn constantly. Interwoven with these ascriptions of power and moral perfection are abounding recognitions of God's goodness and mercy in the constitution of the world, in the course of national history, and in personal experience. Adoration thus passes over into thanksgiving. Further, the thought of what God is and how He manifests Himself awakens exclamations of enthusiasm and confidence in the soul that feels itself the chosen object of His care. Hence out of adoration and thanksgiving grow exultation, loyalty and zeal. And all these bring with them a greater or less degree of trust and assurance for the future. If God is everlasting and unchangeable, then beneath His care all life, present and to come, is safe and full of peace.

4. Doxologies. Literally, a doxology is an ascription or acclamation of 'glory' to God, but usually extended to cover various liturgical concluding-formulas of adoration and thanksgiving. As a rule, doxologies include some phrase like 'forever,' emphasizing the eternity of God and of His praise, and they are customarily accompanied by the response 'Amen.' Doxologies differ from benedictions in that they declare or exhort to the veneration of God instead of invoking blessing or favor from Him. Striking illustrations in the O T are the doxologies appended to the 'books' of the Psalter (see PSALMS) and those in the N T Epistles and Apocalypse (see § 3, above). Several Psalms conclude in a doxologic strain (as 7 17, 18 49, 21 13, 24 7-10, 30 12b, 45 17, 52 9, 57 5, 11 [refrain], 79 13, 145 21), and several begin in a similar way (as 9 1-2, 18 1-2, 29 1-2, etc.). Ejaculations like 'Hallelujah' (q.v.), 'Blessed be God' (Ps 68 35), 'Bless the Lord, O my soul' (Ps 103 1, 22, 104 1, 35) and 'His loving kindness . . . forever' (Ps 118 29, 136 1-26, etc.) belong to the same general class. The Gloria of the Angels (Lk 2 14) and the ascriptions of the Heavenly Hosts in the Apocalypse are notable. All these have been extensively utilized in Christian liturgies.

PRAYER: 1. Preliminary Definitions. In every religion that has a clear conception of a personal God there will be attempts at verbal and vocal intercourse with Him. Such intercourse is prayer in the general sense. It is usual, however, to distinguish between 'prayer' proper, which is in prose and spoken, and 'praise,' which is poetic and sung (see PRAISE). It is usual, also, to draw a line between conversational or 'ejaculatory' prayer, which is closely mingled with common activities, and 'formal' prayer, which implies some withdrawal from such activities and a greater degree of rhetorical order and finish. The most common O T term for praying is pālāl (Hithp.) and for prayer, ṭṭhillāh, the root-meaning of which is disputed. It seems to contain some notion of 'cutting' or 'separating,' whence come conjectures that it may suggest an old Semitic custom of self-mutilation in petition, or that of dividing and arranging a sacrifice, or even the habit of self-scrutiny in the Divine presence. Most of the other O T words suggest entreaty or supplication, which was the predominant element of the general Hebrew conception, tho the formal prayers preserved contain many other elements. The commonest N T word is εὐχεσθαι, which seems to emphasize the notion of 'calling aloud,' of vociferous appeal, while in other frequent terms, like δεῖσθαι and αἰτεῖν, 'petition' is uppermost. For the 'giving of thanks' the standard term is εὐχαριστεῖν.

2. Summary of References. The whole Bible, but especially the O T, abounds in references to the practise and the subject of prayer. The O T histories and prophecies frequently represent men as speaking freely to God, as He does to them (as in the stories of Gn chs. 3-4; Ex chs. 3-4; Is ch. 6; Jer ch. 1, etc.). Most of these are simply cases of the literary anthropomorphism which is a familiar characteristic of Hebrew style. But the practise of deliberate prayer is also extensively noted or implied (see § 3, below). There are many extended prayers, which, tho embedded in the narratives, are very highly formulated, as if shaped by mature liturgical practise, so that they seem to be samples of the styles belonging to public worship (see examples below). In the N T the Gospels offer something concerning the prayers of Jesus, with some specific teachings from Him, and in Paul's writings especially the purport or sum of his habitual prayers is often indicated. Under 'prayer' may also be grouped various formulas of benediction, malediction, greeting, and farewell that are couched in devout language.

3. Places, Times, and Attitudes. In early times the place of prayer was probably wherever sacrifice was offered, the two forms of worship being closely interdependent (Gn 12 8, 26 25, etc.). But while the relation between the two was not forgotten, they were later often separated. Thus in the Temple ritual it is not clear that there was much public prayer by the priests, tho private prayer by the on-lookers was customary (Lk 1 10). Naturally for the devout the Temple became the place of prayer par excellence, toward which, if at a distance, the face should be turned (I K 8 30, 33, etc.; Ps 5 7; Is 56 7; Mk 11 17; Ac 3 1), and its site has since retained this significance. But as synagogues developed, they also became 'houses of prayer,' since in their services prayers replaced the sacrifices of the Temple. From their usages the first Jewish Christians undoubtedly patterned their social services (Ac 2 42, 6 4). The προσευχή, place of prayer, at Philippi (Ac 16 13), was probably not a building, but simply a retired spot in the open air, such as Jews often used in places where there was no synagog. Private prayer, of course, might occur anywhere, as within a chamber (Dn 6 10), on the housetop (Ac 10 9), or at a street-corner (Mt 6 5). The times of sacrifice at the Temple—morning, 'evening' (i.e., early afternoon) to which the hour of sunset was added, naturally gave rise to similar times for prayer, tho of these not much mention is made (Dn 6 11; Ps 55 17, 141 2; Ac 3 1, 10 30). The instinctive conception of prayer is reflected in the bodily attitudes adopted, all of which imply respect, humility, or eagerness, such as standing (Hannah, I S 1 28; Solomon, I K 8 22; the Pharisee, Lk 18 11), sitting (II S 7 18), kneeling (Ezra, Ezr 9 6; Jesus, Lk 22 41; Stephen, Ac 7 60), or bowing toward the ground, and even prostration (Eliezer, Gn 24 26; Elijah, I K 18 42; the people, Neh 8 6). In the first two attitudes the hands were usually extended upward (Ps 141 2) or spread out (Ps 143 6).

4. Some Special Types. One of the earlier types of prayer was that of 'inquiring'—seeking some token as to the wisdom of an action or the truth of an opinion—which is common in primitive stages of religion generally. It is not clear how the reply to such inquiries was usually obtained—probably through some form of lot. Besides many instances that are explicit (Eliezer, Gn 24 12-14; the people, Jg 1 1, 20 18, 23, 28; Gideon, Jg 6 36 f., 39; Saul, I S 14 37, 41, 44; David, I S 23 10-12, 30 8; II S 2 1, 5 19, etc.), it is not unlikely that a similar sense is hidden under many vague references to 'seeking Jehovah.' The Hebrew mind was naively ready to turn to God in prayer at all sorts of practical junctures, as to a protector and friend. Very notable are the prayers attributed to Jeremiah. The longer examples (Jer 10 23-25, 12 1-3, 14 19-22, 15 15-18, 17 12-18, 18 19-23, 20 7-13, 32 17-25), besides many brief ejaculations, seem organically part of the narrative in which they stand, tho the last may have been editorially expanded in accordance with liturgical usage. It is not clear whether certain other cases in the prophecies should be classified here or under the next head (Is 63 15-64 12; Mic 7 14-20; Hab 1 2-17). The question of their exact interpretation depends upon the theory of the structure of the books in which they appear. Scattered through the histories are rather numerous prayers, often marked by great richness of form and contents. Among these striking examples are Jacob's petition when in fear of Esau (Gn 32 9-12), the intercessions of Moses (Ex 32 11-13, 31-32; Dt 9 26-29; Nu 14 13-19, etc.), David's reception of the promise regarding Solomon (II S 7 18-29; I Ch 17 16-27), Solomon's petition for wisdom (I K 3 6-9; II Ch 1 8-10), and his great prayers at the opening of the Temple (I K 8 23-53, 56-60; II Ch 6 4-6, 14-42), Hezekiah's appeal against Sennacherib (II K 19 15-19; Is 37 16-20), the confessions of Ezra (Ezr 9 6-15), Nehemiah (Neh 1 5-11) and the people (Neh 9 5-38), and Daniel's thanksgiving and intercession (Dn 2 20-23, 9 4-19), besides many similar passages in the Apocrypha (as To 3 2-4; Wis ch. 9, etc.). It is evident that most, if not all, of these are to be ascribed to the editorial period in which the various books took their final shape; but even so, they offer striking evidence of the literary development of liturgical prayer in the age of Judaism. This remark applies also to the traditional formulas of the modern synagog. Besides all these, there are numerous prayers in poetical form, both in the poetical books, like Job, Psalms, and Ecclesiasticus, and embedded in the histories and prophecies. Several of the Psalms are called 'prayers' (Pss 17, 86, 90, 102, 142, and cf. 72 20 and Hab 3 1), and the same term is often used in the text as if applying to the utterance in general (Job 16 17; Ps 61 1, etc.). See PRAISE.

5. Effect Upon Christian Usages. The forms of thought and expression found in the prayers of the O T have had an incalculable influence upon all Christian usages, both because they are marked by a singularly elevated and comprehensive spirit of worship, and because their literary embodiment is full of dignity, warmth, and richness. If they are carefully examined, they are found to illustrate more or less all the main constituents of prayer in general—humiliation, profession or declaration, supplication (including intercession), thanksgiving, and adoration. Every historic liturgy has been powerfully influenced by them, as well as the myriad utterances of free prayer.

6. Jesus' Habit and Teaching. The Gospels often mention Jesus' habit of prayer, usually in connection with important junctures in His ministry, as at the Baptism (Lk 3 21), before the first preaching tour (Mk 1 35; Lk 5 16), when the Twelve were set apart (Lk 6 12), at the feeding of the 5,000 (Mt 14 19, 23; Mk 6 41, 48; Lk 9 16; Jn 6 11, 23), at the feeding of the 4,000 (Mt 15 36; Mk 8 6), at Caesarea Philippi and before the Transfiguration (Lk 9 18, 28-29), at the return of the Seventy (Mt 11 25-26; Lk 10 21), as the occasion for a teaching (Lk 11 1), at the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11 41-42), in blessing the children (Mt 19 13; Mk 10 16), regarding the Holy Spirit (Jn 14 16), at the Last Supper (Mt 26 26-27; Mk 14 22-23; Lk 22 17, 19, 32; I Co 11 24-25), in the Intercessory Prayer (Jn ch. 17), at the Agony (Mt 26 36, 39, 42, 44; Mk 14 32, 35-36, 39; Lk 22 41-44), and on the Cross (Lk 23 34; Mt 27 46; Mk 15 34; Lk 23 46). Tho all these references may not have exactly the same historic texture, we surely infer from them that prayer was a frequent feature of Jesus' daily life, yielding an incessant refreshing of His spirit. Among the recorded teachings of Jesus are several concerning prayer, almost wholly upon its supplicatory side, as, for example, regarding simplicity (Mt 6 5-8), regarding God's fatherly attitude (Mt 7 7-11, 21 22; Lk 11 5-13, 18 1-8), regarding unity in asking (Mt 18 19), urging intercession for enemies (Mt 5 44; Lk 6 28; Mk 11 24-25), and for helpers (Mt 9 38; Lk 10 2), besides the suggested model, or Lord's Prayer (see below), and the striking promises to those who stand in perfect fellowship with Him and ask 'in his name' (Jn 14 13-14, 15 7, 16, 16 23-24, 26). These passages differ somewhat in significance. None is more weighty than this: 'If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ask whatsoever ye will, and it shall be done unto you' (Jn 15 7), if the force of the conditional clause be duly noted. The so called Lord's Prayer appears twice (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 1-4), in two somewhat different forms. Tho its phraseology was derived from current Jewish usages, the collocation of thoughts was new, and we must believe that Jesus filled the familiar words with a fresh depth of meaning. Just what was His intention as to the use of the formula by His followers is disputed, since οὕτως οὖν, 'after this manner,' may mean 'in these precise words' or 'in this general style' or 'with this spirit.' From the variations in the two texts and the striking paucity of clear references to the prayer in the rest of the N T, we infer that no exact verbal prescription was meant. See also LORD'S PRAYER.

7. In Apostolic Usage. Among the early Christian converts the habit of social prayer is recorded as a matter of course (Ac 1 14, 24, 2 42, 4 31, 6 4, 6, 12 5, 12, 13 3, 14 23, 21 5; I Co 11 4-13), besides being implied in many exhortations. The use of prayer is attributed to the Apostolic leaders, especially to Peter, John, and Paul (Ac 3 1, 6 4, 8 15, 9 11, 40, 10 9, 11 5, 16 13, 16, 25, 20 36, 22 17, 28 8). In Paul's Epistles are extensive suggestions of how broad and deep was the scope of his personal thanksgiving and supplications on behalf of those among whom he worked (I Th 1 2-3, 2 13, 3 9-13; II Th 1 3, 11-12, 2 13-14, 16; I Co 1 4-8; II Co 1 3-4; Ro 1 8-10; 10 1, 11 33-36; Ph 1 3-11; Col 1 3-13; Eph 1 3, 15-21, 3 14-21; Phm vs. 4-6; I Ti 1 12, 17; II Ti 1 3-5, besides many brief references). The injunctions about prayer in the Apostolic writings are also abundant and urgent (I Th 5 17-18; II Th 3 1-2; I Co 11 2-16, 14 2-17; II Co 1 11; Ro 8 26-27, 12 12, 15 30-32; Ph 4 6; Col 4 2-4; Eph 6 18-20; I Ti 2 1-2, 8; Ja 1 5-8, 4 2-8, 5 13-18; I Jn 3 21-22, 5 14-16). From all these it is plain how vital and fruitful the exercise of prayer was known to be in the early stages of Christianity's development. To this the number and character of the formal salutations and benedictions distributed through the N T add further instructive witness, tho the date of some of them may be later than that of the documents with which they appear.

PREACH, PREACHING: 1. In the O T. Terms used in the O T and the N T to designate the proclamation of Divine truth, religious and ethical. In the O T qārā', 'to call,' 'proclaim,' 'cry,' etc., is used frequently of the prophetic message (cf. Mic 3 5 of false prophets) in various aspects as (1) denunciation (Jon 1 2), (2) revelation of the Divine will (Jer 11 6), (3) Messianic promise (Is 61 1). It is even used to describe a political propagandum set forth by the Prophets (Neh 6 7). In two passages bāsar, 'to declare good news,' is used (Ps 68 11; Is 61 1). With the gradual decline and disappearance of spoken prophecy during and after the exile, qārā' came to be used of written messages (Zec 1 14), until finally, with the ever increasing prominence of the written tōrāh and the disappearance of Hebrew as a spoken language, the function of the preacher became largely that of interpretation (m'thurgām; cf. Ezr 4 7 for the word ['set forth' EV], and for the idea Neh 8 8).

2. In Later Judaism. With the development of the synagog, 'application' (d'rāshā', lit. 'inquiry') as well as interpretation of the tōrah became essential and 'preaching' in the original sense of fervid, religious and ethical appeal, subordinate (cf. Philo De Sept., ch. 6; Quod Omnis Probus, ch. 12).

3. In the N T. To the extent that the new era, beginning with the Baptist, was a revival of prophecy (Mt 11 9), 'preaching' resumed its former character. Consequently the terms κηρύσσειν, 'to proclaim as a herald,' and κηρύγμα, 'preaching,' are frequent in the N T. Jesus' mission is essentially one of 'proclamation' of good tidings concerning the Kingdom of God (Mk 1 14; Mt 4 23), expressed by such terms as εὐαγγέλιον and εὐαγγελίζεσθαι. At the same time Jesus continued to 'teach' in the synagogues in the traditional sense referred to above (i.e., by reading, interpreting and applying the Law and the Prophets (Mk 1 29; Lk 4 16 f.).

The earliest Apostolic 'preaching' was essentially prophetic in character, consisting of testimony concerning the Resurrection of Jesus and His imminent return for Judgment (cf. Ac 2 32-36; I Co 15 1 f.; I Th passim), which soon came to include the ethical implications of the message (notably in Paul's 'preaching,' cf. I Th 4 1 f.). Apostolic 'preaching' is designated by such terms as εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, καταγγέλλειν, 'to announce,' 'declare' and λαλεῖν, 'to speak.' In the original custom of the early Church preachers were those who had been witnesses (μάρτυρες) of what Jesus had said and done. With the spread of the gospel and the lapse of time, the 'preaching' office was assumed by others, especially those endowed with 'the word of wisdom' and 'of knowledge' (I Co 12 8). These constituted a distinct order in the early Church, known as Prophets (cf. Eph 4 11), who with the office of 'preaching' sometimes joined other functions of a predictive character (Ac 11 27). In the Pastoral Epistles and in the Didache 'preaching' is becoming more and more, if not entirely, the function of the Bishop (I Ti 3 2; Did xv, 2). See also CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, §§ 6, 7.

PRECEPT: The rendering of (1) mitswāh, 'order,' 'ordinance,' or 'appointment' (Neh 9 14; Is 29 13 AV, 'commandment' RV; Jer 35 13; Dn 9 5). (2) piqqūdhīm, 'ordinances' (Ps 119 passim). (3) tsēw 'maxim' (Is 28 10), a specification of a general law made brief and easy for purposes of instruction. (4) ἐντολή, 'charge' (Mk 10 5; He 9 19 AV, 'commandments' RV). A. C. Z.

PRECINCTS: The rendering of the obscure פרוור, parwārīm (II K 23 11, suburbs AV; I Ch 26 18 RVmg.). See also PARBAR.

PREDESTINATE, PREDESTINATION: These words are generally used in theological discussion for the doctrine that God has from eternity determined upon all those individual human beings who shall be saved by His grace. The word 'predestinate' does not occur at all in the English of the O T and only four times in AV of the N T, where in RV it is replaced by the word 'foreordain' (Gr. προορίζω, Ro 8 29, 30; Eph 1 6, 11).

1. Strict Predestinarianism. According to the school associated with the names of Augustine and Calvin, the idea of predestination is supposed to lie behind or above that of election (see ELECTION). The term 'election' stands for that act or process in time through which the grace of God reaches and grasps and does its effectual work upon communities (as Israel) and individuals; 'predestination' stands for that eternal purpose which was in the mind of God before time began. Already the whole program of the universe lay before that Mind, completely willed and foreseen in all its minutest details. The processes of time are but the realizing, objectively to God, of that absolutely perfect plan of them which proceeded from His will and was, as it were, subjectively foremirrored in His thought in eternity. This must include not only the quiver of every leaf but every sin of every soul, and the final destiny of each individual soul. That destiny God has willed eternally, whether it be salvation or destruction. The doctrine that the fate of the lost was irrevocably fixed in eternity is known in theology as the doctrine of preterition (passing over). In support of this general position appeal is made both to Scripture and to reason, and these sources of authority are applied to three main elements in the situation: (1) All who believe in God at all believe in His eternal power and wisdom as well as in His righteousness and love. He is the Being from whose will and plan the actual universe takes its rise. He can not be conceived of as ignorant of His own designs at any point, or as unable to fulfil them. Nor, on the other hand, can any fact or event be conceived as existing or occurring apart from His will; that would be simply a partial atheism. Moreover, the Scriptures fully reveal and attest this conception of God. Even the O T announces Him as the Creator of all, whose wisdom is the source of the universe and controller of all its events (Gn ch. 1; Pr 3 19, 20, 8 22-31; Ps 104 27-30; Jer 10 12; Is 40 12, 13), who thoroughly comprehends the inner life of man (I S 16 7; Ps 139; Jer 17 9, 10) and directs his whole course of experience (Job 5 11-15; Pss 90, 91; Pr 16 33). And all this is abundantly confirmed and illumined in the N T. The teaching of Jesus rests on the idea of God's complete sovereignty over nature and man (Mt chs. 5-7); and so it is with the Apostolic teaching. God is not to be pictured 'acsi in specula sedens expectaret fortuitos eventus' (Calvin). (2) The universal human consciousness is aware of a guilt it can not remove, a thralldom in sin which it can not break. This, too, is assumed, asserted, expounded throughout Scripture (see SIN). This carries with it the conviction that man can never gain any merit before God's righteousness. His only just desert is the extremity of punishment (Is 1 28; Ezk 18 4; Ro 3 9-20, 6 23, 7 24; I Jn 2 16, 17). If God were to destroy the whole race, the act would be a just one in view of man's universal sin. (3) But Scripture describes what man's reason could never have discovered, viz., the working of the redeeming grace of God: (a) This loving-mercy of the righteous Judge selected Abraham and his race after him as the first instrument of a glorious purpose. Throughout the O T we are made to see that God always takes the first step, always chooses the person whom He would use or bless, whether as prophet or king, or private saint, even a heathen king (Ezr 1:1; Is 44:28). Moreover, the rise of the Messianic hope means that God caused His ultimate purpose to be reflected in broken beams upon the hearts of His prophets and prophet bards (Heb. 1:1, 2). (b) The sending of Christ was predetermined in eternity (Eph 1:4; cf. Jn 17:24); the individual man in Christ had his place assigned him in the same eternal plan of God (Ro 8:29, 30, 9:11; Eph 1:4-11). There is nothing more fully and variously insisted on in the N T, or more constantly confirmed in the experience of believers than this, that salvation is the unmerited and gracious gift of God. Mercy from its very nature never can be deserved, never can be earned, never can be explained. Its root lies always deep in the mystery of His character and of His purpose who grants the mercy. Even the atonement which reveals, secures, and pledges this mercy to those who are 'the called according to His purpose' does not explain the grace from which it sprang, nor confer any right, even on 'the called,' which is outside of that grace itself. (c) But further, this mercy which is eternally fore-ordained can not be defeated in time. That the grace of God is irresistible is also said to be witnessed alike by the N T and the universal Christian consciousness. The very act of faith in which this grace is realized is self-abandonment to the final power of God and is itself His gift (for which Eph 2:8, with questionable exegesis, is usually cited). If the grace is irresistible through which the elect one passes into the life of Divine fellowship, the doctrine of final perseverance follows with an inevitable necessity.

2. Opposing Systems. The doctrine which has been sketched above took its rise in the mind of Augustine, who was stimulated to formulate and develop it by the positions taken by one who is known in Church history as Pelagius. (1) The Pelagian doctrine was an extravagance in its conception alike of man's freedom and of Divine grace. The former is exaggerated to the extent of maintaining that every man is absolutely free at every moment to decide between right and wrong, that there is no inheritance of sinful conditions, that habit is no bond, and that, therefore, the grace of God is a mere adjutorium, an auxiliary to the native power of man to do good. (2) A mediating position is that occupied by the various degrees of semi-Pelagians (including the Roman Catholic Church since the Council of Trent), otherwise called Synergists, who hold that the human will cooperates with the Divine grace; this need not imply that man has any merit in salvation, since, as Melancthon put it, his will leads him to seek that power from God without which salvation is impossible, and that power flows from sheer and undeserved mercy. (3) A third method adopted, for example, by J. B. Mozley (A Treatise on the Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination, 1883), consists in assuming an agnostic position on philosophical grounds. This whole matter lies in a region where our ideas are both true and indistinct. We may start from the fact, and fact it is, that God makes the first approach to every individual in pure and unmerited grace, or from the other equally sure fact that man is conscious of desiring and seeking God and conscious of deliberate choice when he accepts mercy, and then we may make deductions regarding the ultimate relations between that Divine will in eternity and man's will in time; but these deductions must inevitably be inadequate and therefore false. We are inherently incapable of thinking from these two bases—the eternal plan and the human will—so as to discover their harmony.

3. Bases of Criticism of Predestinarianism. No helpful criticism of the Augustinian doctrine is possible which does not fully acknowledge the extraordinary speculative strength and the deep religious spirit of that system. It founds and centers all on God; and in this it immeasurably surpasses the puny homocentric systems which have their brief day. Religion is the discovery that man needs God absolutely, and the gospel is an answer, wholly out of God's will of love, to that infinite need. The Augustinian system is an attempt to do full honor to that human need and that Divine will. Hence criticism which weakens man's sense of complete indebtedness to grace or which so insists on his freedom as to involve the notion of a self-wrought righteousness is a wound to the heart of the Christian consciousness. But the Augustinian system has been opposed by innumerable evangelical Christians (specially by those known as Arminians) at two points: viz., in its doctrines of preterition and of irresistible grace. The true predestinarian can not conceive of saving grace except as irresistible, and hence he maintains that to the non-elect, to the souls that perish, it was never intended to be applied. Those are the main points of attack. And the arguments may be conveniently set forth as follows:

(1) Regarding the passages which are cited above as the principal Pauline passages on the subject, the following facts seem to be important: (a) In Ro 8:29, 30, the writer's imagination carries him forward to the state of glory, to review the entire process from the final result. Looking backward, the perfected soul must attribute all its stages to the loving will of God. No human self-will has place or merit or praise in that wondrous retrospect. And all is traced ultimately to Him who in His eternal will fore-ordained what has come to pass. Nothing is said here about either the relation of this will to the lost or the function of the human will in the process. And yet this function is abundantly recognized elsewhere as a reality both stern and essential. (b) In Ro chs. 9-11, the discussion is concerned primarily with national life and destiny, but the Apostle does not avoid direct statements which must apply primarily to the individual (9:19-24). And there it is that the preteritionist can find verbal support for his position (esp. vs. 21, 22). But, on the other hand, the same great passage contains statements which attribute full responsibility for the disaster to the human action: (a) Israel sought righteousness by

'works' and not by 'faith' (9 31 f.); (b) the very 'zeal for God' being bound up in their minds with a false conception of God's righteousness led them astray (10 2, 3); (c) yet some did hearken, tho not all (10 16; cf. 3 3); (d) when Christ was preached certain branches were broken off 'by their unbelief' (11 20); (e) and 'God is able to graft them in again' (11 23, 24)—in a passage where the thought fluctuates constantly between the idea of the nation rejecting Christ and the individual doing so; (f) even the decree which 'shut all up unto disobedience' was teleological, and its aim is uttered in the astonishing statement, 'that he might have mercy upon all' (11 32). (g) The remaining passage (Eph 1 3-14) is again concerned with the fact that in Christ Jew and Gentile are made one in the new community which is called the Church, and which is so richly described in this Epistle. As to this passage, emphasis must be laid upon the fact that no decree is described which is not conditioned by the name of Christ. Nor is the phrase 'the good pleasure of His will' left undefined, as if some end beyond all conception lay concealed in His redemptive act. Rather is it quite clearly described as 'the praise of the glory of his grace.' Grace, the holy and loving will of God, is as such the source, and its exercise is the end, of the whole process. To be gracious—to be love—is God's nature, and to fulfil that nature in His relations to man, under the conditions of His righteous character, is the object of the redemption in Christ.

(2) Scripture as a whole assumes that man exercises choice toward the will of God, whether that will appear as law to be obeyed or as grace to be accepted. In each case the result, whether of blame or praise, is attributed to the attitude of the human soul (e.g., Ro 2 1-16). Hence Israel's unbelief is the real ground of Israel's rejection; not original sin, but this climactic sin of despising grace. To this the whole course of the Christian consciousness bears witness. It carries in its life the two elements of dependence on God and action upon that dependence, of choice toward God and surrender to His choice. Neither can be ignored without damage to the conscience and the will of man. Paul is conscious of God's call (Gal 1 15), but does not shrink from saying that he fights against his lower nature lest he should be 'rejected' (I Co 9 26, 27). The Philippians must work out salvation because God is working in them (Ph 2 12, 13). Throughout, the appeal of the gospel is to men who can act upon it, and throughout it is the sincere appeal of God's love to all men. There is no darker side to the doctrine of preterition than its seeming attribution of insincerity to the assertions that God loves the world, that it is not His will that any soul should perish, and that He offers mercy without respect of persons.

(3) The preteritionist is open to attack on other grounds, drawn from the wider range of Christian doctrine. One or two points only can be noted here. (a) The statement of Augustine that the lost are passed over in order to display God's justice and the elect are saved in order to display His grace has lost its point since the rise of the fuller doctrine of a vicarious Atonement. The very nerve of that doctrine is that in the saving of men by the Cross God has revealed His righteousness. Punishment is no longer necessary for that. (b) Again, the statement, that if faith is itself a determining factor in God's choice then salvation is of merit, has also lost its point; for we no longer look on faith as a work which secures merit (see JUSTIFICATION). It is in its very nature the denial of personal merit and the acceptance of a Divine righteousness and a Divine strength. (c) Yet again, when Paul passes from the agony of the particular situation in which Israel is placed, to regard the cosmic or universal meaning of Christ in Eph ch. 1 and Col ch. 1, he does not present the eternal will of God as unconditioned. The Son of His love conditions the eternal purpose of God (Col 1 13 ff.). Everything is foredetermined in relation to His Person and in the name of that eternal love. Human history is seen in the light of this love, as it were through the conditioning person of the Son. But in this case it must be human nature as it is acted upon by Christ, and as it reacts toward Him, that God eternally planned. Destiny is fixed not by ancestral sin, or by any fact apart from, or in addition to, the redemption in Christ, but by the supreme sin, which is unbelief—the rejection of His supreme grace.

PREFER: John the Baptist bore witness that, tho Christ was temporally his successor, yet, owing to His possessing an eternal priority, He had come to take precedence over him (ἐμπροσθέν μου γέγονεν, Jn 1 15, 30, 'become before me' RV, 'preferred' AV), who was simply the 'forerunner.' S. D.—M. W. J.

PREPARATION DAY (παρασκευή): This term signifies in general any day which preceded a great feast. The usage is somewhat analogous to that of the English 'eve' (Christmas eve, New-year's eve, etc.). In a very narrow sense, it came to be the name of the single day of the week which precedes the sabbath. Between these two extremes of usage lie the N T occurrences of the term (Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 14, 31, 42). In the Synoptics the day indicated is presumably Friday. Mark even explains by adding 'that is, the day before the Sabbath' (πρόσάββατον). John uses the qualifying expression 'of the Passover' as if the day preceding the Passover was customarily called 'the preparation of the Passover,' irrespective of whether it fell on Friday or any other day. The rabbinical designation of the day was 'erebh happesah', 'eve of the Passover,' which is not exactly equivalent to John's usage. Accordingly, John must have meant it either as the Synoptics did—that is, of the Friday of Passover week—or in a sense in which the etymological and primitive meaning coalesces with the conventional and specific one. That Friday was called the Preparation is very clear from Josephus (Ant. XVI, 6 2) and the ecclesiastical usage of the first half of the 2d cent. which undoubtedly followed that of the Jews (Did. 8). See also FASTS AND FEASTS, § 7. A. C. Z.

PRESBYTER, PRESBYTERY. See CHURCH LIFE, § 8.

PRESENCE: In most instances the occurrences of this word in EV need no discussion. But where the 'presence' of God is meant, the meaning is, in some cases, not immediately obvious. In all such instances the Heb. term is pānīm, 'face' (in various forms, 'face of,' 'my face,' etc., often rendered 'before me,' etc., in RV). (1) In one group of passages it is the invisible, but not less real, indwelling of God (or J') in His sanctuary that is meant (II Ch 20 9; Ps 95 2, etc.). (2) In other cases it is the manifestation of the power of J', in nature, war, pestilence, etc., that is in mind, ancient thought assigning such things to the immediate action of Deity (Ps 68 8; Is 19 1, 64 2 f., etc.). (3) Those parts of the earth to which He was supposed to be particularly near, or in which He was particularly interested, or where He was accustomed to manifest Himself were 'in His presence' (Gn 3 8, 4 16; Jer 52 3, etc.). (4) More generally, His omnipresence is sometimes in mind (Ps 139 7, etc.). (5) The spiritual communion with God, felt as a blessed and present reality, is spoken of as His 'presence' (Ps 16 11, 31 20, 51 11, etc.). (6) The personal presence of God in His heavenly abode or court is referred to at times (Job 1 12, 2 7; I Ch 16 27 [?]). (7) Finally, we have the most significant use of the term in Ex 33 14 f. Moses, not satisfied with the promise of the 'angel' (Ex 32 34, 33 2), begs for a fuller and closer manifestation of J', and this is the reply, 'My presence shall go' (with thee'), to which Moses responds, 'If thy presence go not up, carry us not up hence.' In other words, 'presence' here means the personal presence of J' in the midst of His people. The whole passage with its sequel in 34 6 f. is one of the most elevated and spiritual in the O T. E. E. N.

PRESENT. See GIFT; and TAX, TAXATION.

PRESIDENTS (פְּרָשִׁי, šār-khīn, probably a Persian loan-word, Dn 6 2-7): A title of administrative officers whose duties, however, are not defined, tho the incumbents seem to have been in a position of authority over the satraps. A. C. Z.

PRESS, PRESS-VAT. See VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1.

PRETORIUM: Gr. πραιτώριον, a Latin word which was adopted into later Greek. It originally meant the headquarters of the 'pretor' or general in a camp; then came to be applied to the official residence of the ruler of a province. AV renders it common hall in Mt 27 27, and judgment hall in Jn 18 28, 33, 19 9; Ac 23 35; while in Mk 15 16 it takes over the word Pretorium, and in Ph 1 13. translates 'palace.' The RV gives Pretorium in all the gospel passages, translates 'palace' in Ac 23 35, and Pretorian Guard in Ph 1 13. In Jerusalem the procurator had as his temporary residence, or 'pretorium,' the palace of Herod in the western part of the city, near the Jaffa gate, tho some identify it very improbably with the castle of Antonia, the massive citadel and barracks that overhung the Temple, the headquarters of the troops in the city. The magnificent palace of Herod the Great in Cæsarea was used by the Roman procurators of Judea as their official residence. The rendering of the RV in Ph 1 13 has good historical support. In this case Paul was chained to the soldiers of the guard. But Ramsay, following Mommsen, interprets the word as meaning 'the supreme Imperial Court, doubtless in this case the prefect, or both prefects, of the Pretorian Guard together with the assessors and high officers of the court.'

R. A. F.—E. C. L.

PREVENT: This word is used, in its more archaic sense, in the AV as the translation of qādhām (in Pi'āl and Hiph'āl), προφθαίνειν and φθαίνειν. It means: (1) 'To be before,' 'anticipate' in time (Ps 119 147 f.; Job 41 11 [3]; Mt 17 25; I Th 4 15). (2) 'To bring timely help,' 'to succor' (Ps 21 3 [4], 59 10 [11], 79 8; Is 21 14). (3) 'to frustrate,' 'to come upon' RV, with hostility (II S 22 6, 19=Ps 18 5 [6], 18 [19]; Job 30 27; Am 9 10). In Job 3 12 RV reads 'receive me,' i.e., care for me so that I do not die. C. S. T.

PREY: This term renders the following Heb. words: (1) bāzaz, 'to rob' or 'to spoil,' and its derived nouns baz and bizzāh, 'spoil,' 'plunder,' nearly always used of the spoil, persons or property, taken in war (Nu 14 3; Dt 2 35; Neh 4 4, etc.). (2) toreph, 'that which is snatched' or 'torn,' used mainly of the prey of wild beasts (Gn 49 9; Nu 23 24, etc.). (3) shālāl, and its noun shālāl, usually rendered 'spoil'; the common word for the spoil of battle (Jg 5 30; Jer 20 5, etc.). (4) malqōah (from lāqah, 'to take'), 'that which is taken' (Nu 31 11 f., etc.). (5) adh, 'booty.' This term occurs in the present Heb. text in three places (Gn 49 27; Is 33 23; Zeph 3 8), in but one of which (the first) is its meaning certain. (6) 'ōkhel, 'food' (Job 9 26, 39 29). (7) tsayidh (from tsūdh, 'to hunt' [?]), 'food' in general (Job 38 41). See also WARFARE, § 5. E. E. N.

PRICKS: In the O T this word is used in Nu 33 55 to translate the Heb. sēkh (pl. sikkim), meaning anything sharp, LXX. σκόλοψ (cf. II Co 12 7). In the N T the same word is found in Ac 9 5 AV, as a translation of ζέφυρα, 'goads,' which, however, lacks good textual authority in this place. It does occur, however, in the account of Paul's story of his conversion before Agrippa in Ac 26 14. J. M. T.

PRIESTHOOD: 1. Introductory Statement. The subject of the Israelitic priesthood is involved in much obscurity. Our evidence is contained in a number of sources belonging to different periods, some of them only imperfectly preserved, many of them of uncertain date, all furnishing a number of data impossible to unite in a perfectly consistent and satisfactory presentation. In the second place, during the whole period of the existence of the priesthood in Israel (nearly 1400 years) conditions were constantly changing, and this progressive movement is only imperfectly represented in our sources, some of which describe the conditions of an earlier time, others lay down principles to be put in force at some future day, others set forth ideals never realized, while in but comparatively few cases, probably, do they describe things as they actually were at the date of writing. No discussion of the priesthood of Israel can hope to arrive at more than tentative conclusions, at least on many points. In the following article the historical development of the priesthood will receive most attention, other aspects of the subject being subordinated to this.

2. The Priesthood in the Earliest Documents.

In the earliest documents of the O T the priesthood is generally mentioned only incidentally, not discussed specifically. The usual Heb. (and Phœnician) term for priest was kōhēn. Among the early Arabs the related term kāhin signified 'seer,' and it is likely that in the earliest (pre-Mosaic) period the Heb. kōhēn and the Arab kāhin were very much alike, especially since our earliest evidence (see below) regarding Israel's priests emphasizes their 'prophetic' functions even more than their 'priestly,' in the ordinary sense of that word. A satisfactory etymology of kōhēn has not been found (cf. Koberle in PRE<sup>3</sup>, vol. xvi, p. 32), altho the sense 'the one who stands [to officiate as priest]' has many advocates (cf. Driver, Camb. Bible on Ex 28 1). The term kēmārīm, chemarim, found a few times (II K 23 5; Hos 10 5; Zeph 1 4) as a designation of idolatrous priests, was probably a foreign word.

(a) The Priesthood in J and E and the older Portions of the Historical Books Jg-II K.

Very little is said regarding priests in the old narratives J and E. The patriarchs offer sacrifice as heads of their families or clans (Gn 12 8, 15 9 ff., etc.). Rebekah goes (to a sanctuary with a priest?) 'to inquire' of J'' (Gn 25 22). In the former case the act is not thought of as specifically priestly. Incidentally, in Ex 19 22 (J) priests are mentioned as present in the camp, but who they were, whether the priests of the several tribes, or 'Levites' as Aaron was (cf. Ex 4 14), is not stated. On the other hand, in the account of the ratification of the covenant in 24 5 (E), instead of priests, 'young men of the children of Israel' were sent by Moses to offer the sacrifices. The difference here may be that of the view-point of the two documents, E seeming to be little interested in the organized priesthood. In the old accounts of the Mosaic legislation in Ex 20 22-23 33 and 34 10-26 nothing whatever is said of priests. But the implied references to sanctuaries (20 24, 22 29, 23 14-19, etc.) assume a priesthood as existing. The passage which (tho only a fragment) gives us practically our only early information regarding the regular priesthood in Israel is Ex 32 25-29 (J), where the 'sons of Levi' are represented as being rewarded for their loyalty to J'', at the time of the great defection of the mass of the people, by the priesthood; for this is the meaning of the technical expression (ver. 29) 'consecrate yourselves . . . to Jehovah' (lit. 'fill your hand to J'''; cf. Jg 17 5; also Ex 28 41, etc.). The same event is referred to in Dt 10 8 (based on JE), where, more explicitly, it is said: 'At that time Jehovah set apart the tribe of Levi, to bear the ark of the covenant of Jehovah, to minister unto him and to bless in his name.' In the notice about the making of the Tent of Meeting (Ex 33 7-11, E, also a fragment) it is rather surprising to read that Joshua (instead of 'priests' or 'Levites') was appointed by Moses to have charge of the Tent. In the JE sections of Joshua, which have been subjected to a pretty thorough-going 'Deuteronomic' revision (see HEXA-TEUCH, § 20, and JOSHUA, BOOK OF, § 5), priests, or, as is said in 3 3, 'the priests the Levites,' carried the Ark at the crossing of the Jordan (ch. 3) and at the siege of Jericho (ch. 6), which is in agreement with Dt 10 8. In Jg the only reference to priests is in the old and instructive story in ch. 17 f. regarding the foundation of the sanctuary at Dan in the most northern part of the land. In this story we learn that two of the important functions of a priest were caring for a sanctuary and consulting the oracle (i.e., being the medium through whom the Divine will was to be ascertained). We learn further: first, that it was possible in ancient Israel for one to set apart one of his own family to act as a priest (17 5; cf. I S 7 1; II S 8 18) tho himself not of a priestly family, and second, that a 'Levite' was, however, considered the legitimate person to be a priest (17 13). It is also interesting to note that the 'Levite' spoken of here hailed from Bethlehem-judah, as tho he were a Judahite by blood and a 'Levite' by profession, i.e., the term 'Levite' seems not to be used here in the tribal sense. This 'Levite' was looking for a permanent home (17 9), and was evidently glad to accept the offer made him by Micah, and still more content to become the priest of the tribe of Dan (18 19 f.). According to 18 30, he was none other than a grandson of Moses, but it is probable that this notice is to be distinguished from the main story as containing a separate tradition.

The information concerning the priesthood given in the early narratives in I and II S is of the highest value, altho not as full or clear as we might wish. With Eli, 'the priest' at the sanctuary in Shiloh, were associated his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, who seem to have had the active management of the sanctuary largely in their hands (I S 1 3, 9, 2 12 ff., etc.). The sanctuary at Shiloh was a 'temple,' not a tent. The arrangements appear to have been quite simple. There was easy access on the part of the worshipers to the immediate vicinity of the door of the sanctuary (1 9 ff., 2 12 ff.). Instead of a large body of ministering 'Levites' (as required in the Priest's Code; see § 9, below) we read only of a priest's 'servant' attending to the cooking of the sacrifices (2 13). While there seem to have been well-known customs regarding the method of sacrifice, the priest's portion, etc., the absence of everything like the elaborate prescribed ritual of P is noteworthy (2 12 ff.). Nothing is said of the genealogy of Eli in the earlier portions of the narrative (in I S chs. 1-6). As priest, Eli had charge of the sanctuary, exercised prophetic functions, and acted also as local judge. As Shiloh was the sanctuary where the Ark was kept, it was the most important sanctuary in Israel. At the same time, the whole narrative seems to be altogether inconsistent with the idea of one only 'high priest,' the head of a hierarchy such as is described in PC. (see § 9 (b), below).

In the story of Samuel's leadership of Israel (I S chs. 7-12) there is no mention whatever of priest or Levite. Samuel was, technically, neither, tho, with the exception of being stationed permanently at a sanctuary, he exercised all priestly functions (cf. especially I S 9 13). In the stories of Saul's campaign against the Philistines (I S 14 3, 18 f.) and of David's struggle with Saul (I S 23 6-10) priests appear as bearers of the ephod (q.v.), by which the will of J' was ascertained. In the first of these references it is Ahijah, son of Ahitub the grandson of Eli; in the second, it is Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, also son of Ahitub, and therefore either a brother of, or identical with, Ahijah. In either case the descent from Eli is to be noted (tho it rests solely on the notice in 14 3). The story of Saul's massacre of the eighty-five priests at Nob is of interest mainly for its intimation of the large number of priests at that sanctuary, all of them belonging apparently to the same family, or, better, clan. The story is late in its present form, however, and may not represent accurately the actual occurrence. The account of David's experience with Ahimelech at Nob (21-9) is interesting mainly as implying that at this place there was a very important sanctuary, where the holy showbread was placed before J', and where David's trophy, the sword of Goliath, was laid up 'behind the ephod.' It is usually assumed that Nob succeeded Shiloh as the residence of the priestly family of which Eli was the head when Shiloh was devastated (or threatened) by the Philistines, but of this there is no direct evidence. It is more likely that at Nob there was an old independent sanctuary with its own body of priests, as was the case at Gibeon (I K 3 4), Bethel (I S 10 3), and many other places.

When David became king and established a sanctuary of J' at his new capital, Jerusalem, he put his companion and friend in exile, Abiathar, in charge as priest (II S 8 17, 20 25). With him was associated Zadok (lineage not given). No special importance is attached to these priests in the entire account of David's reign, not even in the account of the removal of the Ark to Jerusalem. David himself, on important occasions, assumes a priestly attitude and performs priestly acts (II S 6 14-19; cf. the similar attitude of Solomon, I K 8 22 ff.), and even appoints certain of his sons to act as priests (II S 8 18). The subordination of the priests to the royal authority is assumed throughout the history of the kingdom. This is clearly evidenced in Solomon's deposition of the aged Abiathar and banishment of him to his patrimony at Anathoth (I K 2 26 f.). In the account of the dedication of Solomon's Temple the priests are merely mentioned as the ones who transported the Ark from David's sanctuary to its new resting-place (I K 8 3 ff.). The part taken by the king, who acted the part of a priest-father to his people, was so conspicuous that nothing but mere routine work was left for the priests to do.

In the account of the innovations introduced by Jeroboam I in N. Israel, it is said that he 'made priests from among all the people, that were not of the sons of Levi' (I K 12 31). The point of view here is evidently that only 'sons of Levi' were legitimate priests. Jeroboam himself is represented as officiating (as a matter of course) at the altar as priest-king (I K 12 33, 13 1-4).

The remaining passages where mention is made of priests in I and II K, down to the account of the reign of Josiah, add little to our information. It was 'the priest' of J' Jehoiada, whose wife was a king's daughter according to II Ch 22 11), who organized the revolt against the usurper Athaliah and her Baal-cult, and placed the legitimate heir Joash on the throne (II K 11 4 ff.). The account in II K ch. 12 incidentally reveals the presence of a number of priests in attendance at the Temple, but the administration of affairs appears to have been somewhat lax. It is interesting to observe that the king's word was supreme. The priests were his subordinates and obeyed his commands. The same subserviency to the royal will is to be noted in the case of Urijah, head priest of the Temple under Ahaz, at whose command a new altar, after a heathen model, was made to displace the old altar used by Solomon (II K 16 10 ff.).

(b) The Attitude of the Eighth-Century Prophets Toward the Priests.

The great prophets of the 8th cent., Amos and Hosea in N. Israel, and Isaiah and Micah in Judah, dealt with the religious conditions of their times frankly and courageously.

Amos rebukes the masses, especially the upper classes, for their excessive zeal for formal religion coupled with lack of regard for morality, and for corrupt practises at the sanctuaries (2 7 f.); for their selfish delight in sacrifices, free-will offerings, and tithes (3 4 f.), and in pilgrimages to famous shrines (5 5); and for their idea of the supreme importance of such forms of worship (5 21 ff.). Amos could not have had a high opinion of the priests of the sanctuaries where such ideas were fostered. As the signs of the gracious providence of J' in the past history of Israel he names prophets and Nazirites (2 11), but (significantly?) omits priests. His reply to Amaziah, the priest of the 'king's sanctuary' at Bethel, deals with him as an individual rather than as a priest and, apparently, does not question the legitimacy of his priesthood (7 10 ff.).

In Hosea the N. Israelite priesthood is severely arraigned. It is not the illegitimate (i.e., non-Aaronic, or even non-Levitic, as might be expected from I K 12 31) status of these priests that is condemned, but their gross neglect of known duty. This duty, according to Hosea, was mainly to teach the people to know J' (4 4-9) aright. Instead of doing this, the prophet declares 'they feed on the sin of my people and set their heart on iniquity' (4 8). That is, they were content with the rich income they derived from the elaborate cultus, which was full of gross corruptions, and only encouraged such things instead of rebuking them (cf. also 5 1 ff., 6 9). For cultus itself, i.e., sacrifices, etc., Hosea, like Amos, seems to have had little respect (cf. 6 6), and therefore the 'law' (4 6) which the priests were to teach Israel was the moral and spiritual element of the religion of J', not the ceremonial. In Isaiah (28 7) and Micah (3 11) two charges are made against the priests, drunkenness and teaching 'for hire,' indicating that the Jerusalem priests were in as sad need of reform as were those of N. Israel.

(c) The Evidence of Dt 33 8-11.

This passage in the ancient poem entitled 'The Blessing of Moses' is so important as to demand the closest attention. At whatever date the poem was written, it expresses the view of the priesthood entertained by devout followers of J'' at that time. The main points emphasized here are the following:

(a) The priestly class is designated as 'Levi' and counted as one of the tribes of Israel. (b) Their devotion to J'' is set forth in the strongest terms and stated to have proved itself in a test at Massah and Meribah. (c) Their loyalty is further shown by the fact that they have placed fidelity to J'' above all other claims, even those of kindred. (d) Their peculiar privilege is that to them is entrusted the 'Thummim' and 'Urim' of J''. (e) Their priestly duties are, in the main, three: to make known the will of J'' through the sacred oracle or lot ('Thummim' and 'Urim'), to teach Israel the law and ordinances of J'', and to officiate at the altar of J''. (f) Finally, the more secular aspect of 'Levi' is revealed in ver. 11, where the prayer is that J'' may bless His substance and put down His enemies.

But the date and the interpretation of this important passage are open to debate. To the present writer a date in the 9th cent. or early in the 8th cent. seems satisfactory. The reference to a 'testing' at Massah and Meribah (ver. 8) suggests the events recorded in Nu 20 10-13 (cf. Ex 17 2-7), but the tradition is not identical. What is said in ver. 9 is probably to be explained by Ex 32 27 ff. (see above). The 'Thummim' and 'Urim' are referred to in I S 14 41 (according to the true Heb. text) and in 28 6, and there can be little doubt that it meant the sacred lot which it was the priest's special privilege to understand how to 'cast' and interpret.

3. Historical Result. It is on the basis of a correct interpretation of these early notices that a true view of Israel's priesthood must rest. A very difficult phase of the problem is that relating to the connection between the tribe of Levi and Levi as the priestly element in Israel. The notice in the ancient poem (Gn 49 5 ff.) shows clearly that there was a tribe Levi, but there it is purely secular and is condemned, while in Dt 33 8 ff. it is religious and praised. Aaron is spoken of as 'the Levite' in a sense other than tribal in Ex 4 14. We are here in the presence of an insoluble difficulty. Conjectural solutions abound, but none is satisfactory (cf. Burney, The Book of Judges, 1920, pp. 436-441). Whatever the original tribal connection of the Levites may have been, this much seems certain—that from Moses' time on until after the Exile the priestly class in Israel was spoken of as 'Levites.' The etymological significance of the word lēwī is unknown, and no theory can be based on conjectures regarding it. To reward their loyalty to J'' Moses constituted the Levites of his day the priests of the newly organized people. This meant originally not the exclusive right to offer sacrifices, for that could be done by almost any one in ancient Israel, but rather the guardianship of the Ark, the care of any sanctuary of J'' in Israel, the custody of the sacred lot, and the duty of making known the principles and practises of the religion of J'' to the people. This is actually about all that the early sources permit to be asserted regarding the priesthood as organized by Moses. They leave us in almost complete ignorance regarding the position of Aaron. He is mentioned in both J and E, but rather as a mere assistant or subordinate of Moses, and in the organization at Sinai he is assigned no special place. We do not know how he came to be viewed as an important priest and head of the priestly line of any given sanctuary.

When the tribes of Israel settled in Canaan and distributed themselves over its territory they made use of a large number of sanctuaries, scattered in different parts of the land (see HIGH PLACE). While the most important of these was, perhaps, Shiloh, because the Ark was finally there, many others were held in high esteem, e.g., Gilgal, Bethel, Beer-sheba, Nob, Gibeon, Hebron, etc. At each of these permanent sanctuaries there was a priesthood and this priesthood was composed (probably) of Levites. Levites who were not attached to any particular shrine maintained themselves as best they could. Only as a Levite was attached to a sanctuary was he, under normal circumstances, actually a priest.

The establishment of the Davidic sanctuary at Jerusalem proved to be an event of most decisive influence on the priesthood of Israel. Here, after the Temple of Solomon was built, was the most magnificent sanctuary in Israel. While it is true that the early record in I K does not give us many details regarding the priesthood here, and, on the other hand, that the accounts in I and II Ch regarding David's elaborate arrangements of priests and Levites and other ministers of the sanctuary is doubtless but a projection back into the Davidic Age by the priestly author of Ch of the ideas and institutions of his own day, still it is altogether likely that from the first the arrangements at this royal sanctuary were somewhat elaborate—that is, there were numerous priests, the leading family being that of Zadok, and these were graded into several classes as the 'great,' or chief priest (II K 12 10, 22 4, 8, 23 4), and the priests of the 'second order' (II K 23 4, 25 8), and the three (or more) 'keepers of the threshold' (II K 23 4, 25 8). In addition, there were probably numerous subordinate Temple servants, such as 'hewers of wood and drawers of water' (Jos 9 21 ff.), consisting mainly of people of foreign blood, as captives in war or remnants of the old Canaanite population now reduced to servitude (cf. I K 9 20 f.), who were the ancestors of the later and more formally organized groups known as 'Nethinim' (q.v., and cf. I Ch 9 2; Ezr 2 43, etc.), and 'the children of Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 55, etc.). But of the details of the whole organization and the methods of their administration of their office, little is positively known.

The status of the priesthood in the Kingdom period was high. Probably, there was no other class in ancient Israel whose influence was so great. The glowing eulogy in Dt 33 8 ff., which states this in its most favorable terms, reveals the priesthood at its best, and it is altogether probable that at many a sanctuary in ancient Israel the priesthood were revered as the exponents of the Law of J'' and the guides of the people in the way of His judgments.

The support of the priesthood was derived mainly from the various kinds of offerings, as those portions which were unconsumed on the altar or by the worshippers were the share of the priests. There were other sources of income such as tithes (cf. Am 4 4), and presents of money or provisions (cf. Gn 28 22; I S 10 3). The earlier notices say almost nothing about this, but in the later codes the income of the priests is quite definitely prescribed, doubtless in accordance with ancient usage.

With the passing away of the Northern Kingdom in 722 B.C., the future of the priesthood became dependent entirely on the fortunes of Judah and Jerusalem, especially the latter, and from this time on the history of the priesthood becomes practically that of the priestly organization at Jerusalem. Here was the center of the organized religious life of the nation, and the customs followed here would be likely to be imitated in the other sanctuaries of Judah, of which there were many, until the reform of Josiah (621 B.C.) abolished them all and made the Temple in Jerusalem the sole public sanctuary in Judah.

4. The Priesthood in the Code of Dt. This brings us to the view of the priesthood set forth in the Code of Dt, which was compiled some time near 650 B.C. (see DEUTERONOMY, § 5) and made the basis of Josiah's reform of 621.

In the introduction to the Code (10 8) the tribe of Levi is spoken of as having been 'set apart' by J' to bear the Ark, to 'minister' before J', and to 'bless' in His name, and in accordance with this the tribe had no special territory, like the other tribes, but was scattered here and there throughout Israel and dependent largely upon the good-will and charity of their fellow Israelites (cf. also 18 1 ff.).

In this Code the standing expression for the priests is 'the priests the Levites' (18 1 and passim), i.e., the Levites (viewed in Dt as the members of the tribe of Levi) are the priestly element in Israel and as such every Levite is de jure a priest, altho he might not be one de facto. This view is fully stated in 18 1-8, which must be interpreted for its historical significance in the light of the preceding prescriptions in ch. 12, in which the position is taken that there is to be but one sanctuary in the land where the sacrifices can be legitimately offered and priests officiate and the people assemble for their social worship. The officiating priests at this sanctuary (which was the Temple, altho never expressly so named) were Levites, and to this sanctuary any Levite dwelling in any part of the land had the right to come and officiate as a priest (18 8-9). This regulation, apart from the view that underlies it, is probably to be understood as intended to cover those cases that were likely to occur whenever the Code should become generally observed. It is not likely that the Code has in mind a constantly shifting priesthood at Jerusalem. It can hardly be doubted that, when the Code was compiled, the Jerusalem priesthood was fairly well organized. This is implied in the Code itself, incidentally, in the phrase 'the priest that shall be in those days' (26 3). It is of utmost importance to observe that in Dt 'priest' and 'Levite' are practically equivalent terms. There is no trace of the idea that the Levites were the servants of the priests. The only distinction is that not all Levites were actually officiating as priests at the sanctuary.

The support of the priests is provided for in 18 3 f. thus: 'And this shall be the priests' due from the people, the shoulder, and the two cheeks, and the maw. The first-fruits of thy grain, of thy new wine, and of thine oil, and the first of the fleece of thy sheep shalt thou give him.' Other provisions in the Code, such as we find in 12 12, 13, 14 27, 29 (where the Levite is to receive a share of the tithes every three years as also in 26 12 ff.), 16 11, 14, indicate that these gifts were not always brought to the sanctuary, but could also be distributed to the Levites, who, like the 'stranger,' were to be found 'within thy gates' in all the cities of the land. What were the duties of these numerous Levites, who were scattered here and there throughout the land, is not in the Code, probably because the ideal (all priests at the one only sanctuary) and the actual conditions at the time (many Levite-priests scattered over the land at the various sanctuaries) were somewhat in conflict and no clear statement was possible. The importance of the Levites in the local communities is perhaps indicated in 17 9, 12, 19 17, and 21 5, where it is implied that they constituted a part of the local judiciary. A query suggests itself: was there any opposition at any time to the claim of exclusive priestly rights, etc., on the part of 'Levi'? Cf Nu ch. 17 and see AARON'S ROD.

5. The Effect of the Reform of 621 B.C. Such were the general conditions when the reform of 621 brought about a change with far-reaching consequences. In general, the immediate effect of this reform was that the provisions of the Code of Dt were now made binding on the religious life of the nation (II K ch. 23). All formal religion was now concentrated in Jerusalem. The many sanctuaries ('high places') of the different cities of the land were dismantled and the Temple was made the only legitimate place of worship. The effect was to greatly enhance the prestige of the priesthood of the Temple. However, the priests of the old local sanctuaries who now flocked to Jerusalem were not allowed 'to come up to the altar of Jehovah at Jerusalem' (II K 23 9), i.e., they were refused the full privileges accorded them by the Code (Dt 18 8-9), but were allowed 'to eat unleavened bread among their brethren.' Here we are to find, in all probability, the beginning of that formal distinction, unknown to the Code of Dt, within the ranks of the Levitical body, between the 'priests' proper and the remaining Levites, who, while retaining certain priestly privileges and entitled to support, were not allowed to officiate at the altar. The priestly body which was in actual possession of the Temple at the time of the reform tenaciously clung to its privileges, and henceforth counted itself as the only legitimate body of priests. They could claim descent from Zadok, and the tendency as time passed was to emphasize this as the test of legitimacy. It is not likely that the Temple priests were able to carry out this program with complete success, and in spite of their efforts the ranks of the priesthood were probably quite materially increased by country Levites, who asserted their rights and were able to maintain them. This will account for the relatively large number of priests in postexilic days.

The references to the priests by Jeremiah, whose work was contemporary with the reform movement, are mainly to the effect that they were delinquent in the fulfilment of their duty as the teachers of righteousness (1 1, 18, 28, 29, etc.). The organization remained, as before, subservient to the royal will and was as willing to sanction the policy of the corrupt Jehoiakim and Zedekiah as to approve that of their righteous father, Josiah. Incidentally, references in Jer (19 1, 20 1, 29 25 f., 52 24) show that the priesthood was well organized up to the fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.).

6. Ezekiel's Theory of the Priesthood. The leniency with which the exiles were treated enabled the priests to maintain their organization and made it possible for them to plan for the measures to be taken when the restoration should take place. The prophet Ezekiel, himself a priest, stated his views in his ideal sketch of the future community (Ezk chs. 40-48). The Levitical priesthood is to be divided, according to Ezekiel, into two classes: the one, the 'sons of Zadok who from among the sons of Levi come near to Jehovah to minister unto him' are to be 'the keepers of the charge of the altar' (40 46). These alone are to be priests in the full sense of the word (44 15 ff.). The other group, designated as 'the Levites, that went far from me when Israel went astray,' could minister in the sanctuary, 'having oversight at the gates of the house, and ministering in the house; they shall slay the burnt offering and the sacrifice for the people and shall stand before them to minister unto them.' But 'they shall not come near unto me to execute the office of a priest unto me nor to come to any of my holy things, unto the things that are most holy; but they shall bear their shame. . . . Yet I will make them keepers of the charge of the house' (44 10-14). The reason assigned for this prescription, viz., that the Levites 'went astray,' must be taken to refer to the 'high-place' worship, which had been put under the ban by Dt, and which was doubtless largely tainted with idolatry, altho under Manasseh at least, if not at other times, the 'sons of Zadok' in Jerusalem must have been guilty of the same thing.

The functions and privileges assigned to the priests by Ezekiel are set forth most fully in 44 15-31. They alone were permitted to enter the sanctuary and minister at the 'table' (i.e., altar). When so doing, they were to be clothed with appropriate (linen) vestments, which were not to be worn at other times. They were to keep their hair trimmed, but not shaven. They were to abstain from wine when ministering within the inner court. In their marriage relations they were to be circumspect. They were to teach the people of J" the difference between the 'holy' and the 'common,' the clean and the unclean. They were to be the judges of the people, and they themselves were to observe all the commands. Their income and support were to be derived entirely from their office. They were to eat the vegetable offerings, the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering. All 'devoted' things were to be theirs, also the first of the first-fruits, and the heave-offerings, and the first meal for baking. A strip of territory in the center of the land 25,000 cubits long by 10,000 wide was to be reserved for them and their families. In the center of this was the sanctuary (500 cubits square). To the N. of this was to be another like strip assigned to the Levites, while S. of it a narrower strip (5,000 cubits wide) was for the 'city.' To the E. and W. of this square (25,000 by 25,000 cubits) was to be the territory of the 'prince,' whose main duty was to provide the offerings (45 1-8). These specifications show that to Ezekiel the future community was viewed from a purely theocratic point of view—a church rather than a state. At the center was to be the sanctuary, and next to that the priesthood, the holy portion of the community, standing between the community and God.

It is remarkable that in all these details there is no mention made of a high priest or of gradations in the priestly body. Further, there is no reference to Aaron, or to the 'sons of Aaron' as a designation of the priests. All the other Levites are considered to have had a legitimate title to the priesthood, but to have forfeited it through their misconduct. In all these respects the differences between Ezekiel and the Priest's Code are noteworthy.

7. The Priesthood in the Holiness Code (Lv chs. 17-26). Parallel in many respects to the Code of Dt and Ezekiel's ideal constitution is the code now generally known as the Holiness Code (HC) in Lv chs. 17-26 (see HEXATEUCH, § 23, and LEVITICUS). Here the tendency so marked in Ezekiel is found elaborated more fully. The rules of ceremonial purity to be applied to the priests are laid down with much detail (21 1-22 16). In distinction from, and possibly intended as an advance upon, Ezekiel's position in HC we find distinct mention (21 10-15) of the 'high priest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil is poured, and that is consecrated to put on the garments.' This priest, above all others, is to be most careful of his conduct (ceremonially). In HC also the priests are spoken of not as Levites, but as 'sons of Aaron' or 'the seed of Aaron,' and, apparently, the priesthood is restricted to these. But many scholars regard this as a later addition to the original form of HC. All that can be said with certainty is that among the priestly scribes of the exilic and postexilic times, who busied themselves with the task of perfecting the Law as the constitution of the new community, the position that descent from Aaron was necessary in order to be a priest finally became so well established that it was regarded as indisputable. The passages exhibiting this view in HC are probably later than Ezekiel, whatever may be said of the date of this Code in its original form. It may well be that descent from Aaron was the reply made by non-Zadokite priests whose legitimacy was challenged by the Zadokite group.

8. The Priests at the Time of the Return. In the lists of the returned exiles preserved in Ezr and Neh it is said that 4,289 priests returned, belonging to four main families: Jedaiah-Jeshua, Immer, Pashhur, and Harim (Ezr 2 36-39; Neh 7 39-42). Apparently, these represent the four main families into which the whole body of priests had been divid-

10. The Priesthood in the Later Persian Period. The actual condition of the priesthood in the later Persian period is obscurely revealed in the record in Ezr and Neh. The high priest was the religious head of the community, but not until after Nehemiah, when the hold of Persia on the western provinces of the empire was weaker, does he seem to have been recognized as its civil head, and then, possibly, because the Persian government consented to have him act as governor in lieu of a separate Persian official appointed for the purpose. Ezra, who was entrusted with the authority of governor (cf. Ezr 7:25), and Nehemiah, who had the title as well as the authority, seem to have paid little attention to the high priest in their day. This was perhaps because the high priest, with many of the common priests, was opposed to Ezra's program of reform. Nehemiah had the assistance of Eliashib, the high priest, in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem, other priests aided the work in the same way (Neh 3:1, 3, 21 f., 28 f.), and priests assisted and cooperated in the great work of promulgating and adopting the Law as the constitution of the community (Neh 8:4 ff., 10:1-3). Certain priestly families consented also to take up their permanent abode in the city, the others, presumably, continuing to reside in the country and coming into the city only as their duties at the sanctuary required. In process of time this led to a subdivision of the whole priestly body into the twenty-four courses, or relays, which are described in I Ch 24:1-19. The basis of the classification here is, as usual, genealogical, sixteen courses being reckoned to the descendants of Eleazar and eight to those of his brother Ithamar. This arrangement continued in force until N T times (cf. Lk 1:5; Jos. Vita, 1).

Notwithstanding the formal adherence of the priesthood to the new order instituted by Ezra and Nehemiah, there were many who were secretly in favor of a much less rigorous policy and even some who cared little for the more ideal and sacred aspects of their office. Evidence on this point is found in the severe arraignment of the priesthood by the prophet Malachi and in the account in Neh 13:4 ff., 28 f., of Nehemiah's conflict with the high priest and certain members of his family.

11. The Priesthood in the Greek and Roman Periods. Of the history of the priesthood from Nehemiah (c. 432 B.C.) to the Maccabean revolt (168 B.C.) very little is known. The list of high priests given in Neh 12:10 f. carries the succession down to Jaddua, who was in office when Alexander conquered Asia. From notices in Josephus the list can be continued as follows: Onias I (son of Jaddua), Simon I (son of Onias I), Eleazar (another son of Onias I), Manasseh (uncle of Eleazar), Onias II (son of Simon I), Simon II (son of Onias II), Onias III (son of Simon II), who became involved in difficulties with his sovereign Seleucus IV of Antioch, and, according to one account (II Mac 4:1-6), was held in captivity near Antioch until slain by the usurper Menelaus (II Mac 4:33 ff.); but according to another account he fled to Egypt, where he founded the rival temple at Leontopolis (Jos. BJ, I, 11; VII, 10:2). Very little is known of the administrations of these high priests. Simon II, 'the just,' has a sure place in Jewish history through the warm eulogy upon him in Sir 50:1-21. This passage contains, perhaps, our most reliable information regarding the priesthood in this period, and shows it in its most attractive aspect.

In the great contest between Hellenism and Jewish patriotism and conservatism which led to the Maccabean revolt, large numbers of the priests were found ready and even eager to throw down the barriers and open the doors to the most radical and corrupting influences of Hellenism. The story told in II Mac chs. 1-7 need not be repeated here. Jason, the brother of Onias III, faithlessly abused the trust reposed in him by his brother and bribed Antiochus IV to confer upon him the office of high priest (c. 175 B.C.). But Jason was soon supplanted by the still baser Menelaus, who offered the king a higher sum than Jason was paying. This man held the office when the aged Mattathias, also a priest (I Mac 2:1), raised the standard of revolt. Numbers of the priests still remained faithful, as did also the mass of the people. With Menelaus, who lost favor and was executed by order of Antiochus V (c. 164 B.C.), and his successor Alcimus (q.v.), who died about 160 B.C. (I Mac 9:54 ff.), the Maccabean party would have nothing to do. When Judas Maccabeus restored the worship of J' at Jerusalem (165 B.C.), tho 'he chose blameless priests' (I Mac 4:42) to officiate, there was no recognized high priest and the office was vacant until the Feast of Tabernacles (153 B.C.), when Jonathan, brother of Judas, accepted the royal appointment and assumed the office. On Jonathan's death (143 B.C.) he was succeeded by his brother Simon.

Onias III (assassinated by hired agents of Menelaus in 171 B.C.), was the last of the old line of high priests in legitimate succession, as Jason, Menelaus, and Alcimus were only usurpers. With Simon a new line began, since the people voted to make the high-priesthood hereditary in his family (I Mac 14:41). Both Jonathan and Simon were not only high priests, but also held the chief political authority. As president of the Council (see SANHEDRIN), which now became more important than before, the high priest was virtually the chief justice of the nation. This union of two distinct offices in one man was continued with Simon's successors, who later (first with Aristobulus I, 105-104 B.C.) assumed the title of 'king.' The Maccabean, or Asmonean, line of priests came to an end virtually with Hyrcanus II, whom the Romans deprived of political authority in 63 B.C., allowing him to retain his high-priestly office. Hyrcanus was carried into exile by the Parthians in 40 B.C. From the time of the accession of Herod the Great (37 B.C.) until the Fall of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), the high priests were set up and deposed entirely at the caprice of the Herods or of the Roman governors. The twenty-eight high priests who held office during this period of 107 years were selected, in most cases, from four or five leading families. One who had once held the office was even after his deposition accorded a dignity and honor which raised him far above the level of the ordinary priests. To such men the title 'high priest' was still given, and perhaps also to other members of the most prominent priestly families, even tho they may never have actually held the high office. This will account for the somewhat loose use of the term in the N T and also in Josephus.

The political aspect of the office of high priest, which became so prominent in the Maccabean period, never lost its prime importance. The revenue of the Temple, which was controlled and used by the priests, was enormous. The priesthood culminated in an aristocracy (see SADDUCEES) possessed of immense wealth and great influence. It was inevitable that they should be deeply interested and involved in politics, and their policy was, in general, that of submission to the Herodian or Roman authority, in order that they might not be disturbed or dispossessed of their wealth and position by a popular revolt. More and more, after the supremacy of the Law was established by the efforts of the priest-scribe Ezra, but especially after the Maccabean war, the old teaching function of the priests was taken over by the scribes (q.v.), most of whom were Pharisees, while the priestly party was known as the Sadducees. Between these two parties no love was lost. But the priesthood was too strongly intrenched behind the walls of tradition and the popular devotion to the Temple and its services, which, according to the Law, were in their hands exclusively, to be uprooted except by the most violent catastrophe. This came at last with the destruction of the city and Temple in 70 A.D., in which sanctuary and priesthood, so long allied, went down together, never to be revived, while scribism survived and remains even to-day.

PRINCE: This word renders sixteen Heb. and three Gr. words: (1) ʾāḥashdarpān, Aram. from the old Persian, meaning officials over several small provinces, 'satraps' RV (Dn 3 2, 3, 27, 6 1 ff.; in Ezr 8 36; Est 3 12, 8 9, 9 3, where the Heb. form of the same word is used; AV has 'lieutenants'). (2) hashmannīm (Ps 68 31), 'ambassadors,' 'nobles,' conjectured from the text. Briggs renders 'swift messengers' (from past ptepl. of hūsh, 'to hasten'). (3) kōhēn, 'priest' (Job 12 19 AV), as representatives of an important order in the community. (4) nāghādh (lit. 'one in front'), hence a 'leader,' 'ruler,' or 'prince' (Job 31 37; Ps 76 12 [13]; Pr 28 16); used of the king of Israel (I K 14 7, 16 2, etc.), always in RV [mg. 'leader'] for the king of Israel where AV has 'captain' (I S 9 16, etc.) or 'ruler' (II S 6 21, etc.); for foreign rulers (Ezk 28 2; Dn 9 25 f.); for the high priest (Dn 11 22). The same word is used for other high Temple officials and translated variously 'ruler' (I Ch 9 11, etc.), 'governor' (II Ch 28 7 AV), also for a military officer (II Ch 32 21, 'leader' RV). (5) nādhīb, 'willing' or 'noble' in character, then in rank; a poetic term for nobles or princes (I S 2 8; Job 12 21; Ps 107 40, etc.). (6) nāṣikh, a late word perhaps from Assyr. nasiku (vb. nasāku, 'to anoint' or 'install') (Jos 13 21, 'dukes' AV; Ezk 32 30; Mic 5 4; Ps 83 11 [12]; Dn 11 8 AV, 'molten images' RV mg. correctly). (7) nāsī, 'one lifted up,' 'a chief prince.' It is used of Solomon (I K 11 34); elsewhere (except in Ex 22 27) it occurs only in Ezk, P, and Ch, for which AV usually has 'prince' but also 'captain' and 'chief' in P. RV renders almost uniformly by 'prince.' In Ezk it is used of Zedekiah (7 27, 12 10, 12, 21 25 (30), 19 1); of chief men of Judah (21 12 (17), 22 6, 45 8, 9); of the future Davidic king (34 24, 37 25), and theocratic ruler (44 3, etc., chs. 48 f. often); and of foreign princes (26 16, 27 21, 30 13, 32 29, 38 2, 3, 39 1, 18). In P it is used of non-Israelite chiefs (Gn 34 2; Nu 25 18; Jos 13 21), of Abraham (Gn 23 6); heads of Ishmaelite tribes (Gn 17 20, 25 16); elsewhere in P and Ch of rulers of the congregation (Ex 16 22; Jos 9 15, 18, 22 30, 34 31, 35 27; Lv 4 22; Jos 9 18b, 19, 21, 17 4, 22 14, 32) and especially of the tribal chiefs and representatives in their religious organization (Nu 1 16, 44, 2 3, etc.; fifty-seven times, especially in Nu chs. 2, 7 and 34; I Ch 2 10, 4 38, 5 6, 7 40; II Ch 1 2; I K 8 1; II Ch 5 2). (8) ṣḡhānīm, a loan-word from Assyr. ṣaknu (vb. ṣakānu, 'to set,' 'appoint'), which means the 'prefect' of a conquered province (Is 41 25 AV, 'ruler' RV, 'deputy' RVmg.). For other renderings of this word cf. Ezk 23 6, 12, 23; Jer 51 23, 57. (9) partīm (from the old-Persian fratama, 'first') (Dn 1 3, 'nobles' RV; cf. Est 1 3, 6 6). (10) qātsīn, 'decider'; used of a military chief (Dn 11 18 AV, 'captain' RVmg.; cf. Jos 10 24; Jg 11 6, 11); more generally, of a man in authority (Mic 3 1, 9 AV, 'rulers' RV; Pr 25 15 AV, 'rulers' RV, 'judge' RVmg., where Toy reads qetseph, 'anger'; cf. Is 1 10, 22 3; Pr 6 7). (11) raḥb, 'chief' (Jer 39 13, 41 1 AV, 'chief officers' RV) (see OFFICER (7)). (12) raḥb-bhān (Aram.), 'lords'; used of Babylonian kings (Dn 5 2, 3 AV, 'lords' elsewhere). (13) rāzān, 'a potentate,' parallel to 'king' (Pr 14 28). (14) rōzēn, ptepl. of rāzan, 'be weighty,' 'commanding' (Jg 5 3; Pr 8 15, 31 4; Hab 1 10, parallel to 'king'; Is 40 23, parallel to 'judges'; cf. 'rulers' in Ps 2 2). (15) sar, 'ruler,' 'captain,' 'prince' (corresponding to Assyr. šarru, 'king'). This term occurs very often, more especially in the later O T literature, for various officials of high rank under foreign kings; of Ammon (II S 10 3; Am 1 15; I Ch 19 3); of Assyria (Is 10 8, 31 9); of Babylon (II Ch 32 31; Ezr 7 28; Jer 38 17, 18, 22, 39 3, 50 35, 51 67); of Edom (Is 34 12); of Egypt (Gn 12 15; Is 19 11, 13; Jer 25 10); of Elam and Media (Is 21 5; Jer 49 38); of Gilead (Jg 10 18); of Greece (Dn 10 20); of Midian (Jg 7 25, 8 3); of Moab (Nu 21 18, 22 8 ff., 23 6, 17; Am 2 3; cf. Jer 48 7, 49 3); of Persia (Est 1 3, etc.; Dn 10 13, 20, and in RV 8 9, 9 3); of the Philistines (I S 18 30); of Succoth (Jg 8 6, 14); for officials under kings of Israel and Judah (never for king's sons); under David (I Ch 22 17, 23 2, 24 6, 29 24; Ezr 8 20); Solomon (I K 9 22; I Ch 23 2); Jehoshaphat (II Ch 17 7); Ahab (I K 20 14 ff.); Hezekiah (II Ch 29 30, 30 2 ff., 31 8, 32 3); Josiah (II Ch 35 8); Jehoiachin (Jer 24 1=II K 24 12, 14); Zedekiah (II Ch 36 18; Jer 24 8, 34 21); in general (Job 3 15, etc.; Ps 45 16 [17], etc.; Pr 8 16 etc.; Ec 10 7, 16, 17); for officials of Judah or Israel (II Ch 12 5, 6, 21 4, 22 8, etc.); of the tribes (Jg 5 15, Issachar; I Ch 28 1); of the postexilic community (Ezr 8 25 RV, 29, 9 1, 2, 10 14; Neh 11 1, 12 31 f.); of the host of Jehovah (Jos 5 15 RV, 'captain' AV); of the sanctuary (I Ch 24 5 ff., 'governor' AV). The RV often renders it by 'captain,' for a military officer ('prince' AV; e.g., I Ch 27 22; II Ch 21 9, etc.). (16) shālīsh, 'military officer' (Ezk 23 15), but elsewhere rendered 'captain.' (17) ἀρχηγός, 'chief leader,' used of Christ (Ac 5 31; cf. the same word in Ac 3 15, 'author [RVmg.] of life'; He 2 10, 12 2, 'captain' AV, 'author' RV). (18) ἀρχων, 'ruler' (Mt 20 25; I Co 2 6, 8; Rev 1 5, all AV). The 'prince' of the evil spirits is referred to (Mt 9 34, 12 24; Mk 3 22; Lk 11 15, 'chief' AV), the ruler of the irreligious world (Jn 12 31, 14 30, 16 11; Eph 2 2). (19) ἡγεμών, 'first,' 'chief' (Mt 2 6, quoted from Mic 5 2 [1], which reads: 'among the thousands [families] mg.] of Judah'). The Heb. alaphē, 'thousands of,' was read as allūphē, 'chiefs of.' C. S. T.

PRINCES, THE SEVEN: Seven men named in Est 1 14 as those who were privileged to see the king's face and sit 'first in the kingdom.' Their names are given as 'Carshena, Shethar Admatha, Tarshish, Meres, Marsena, and Memucan, the seven princes of Persia and Media.' Tho these names are not evidenced otherwise, they seem to be of Persian formation, and the statement in the book may thus rest on a historical foundation. E. E. N.

PRINCIPALITY, PRINCIPALITIES (ἀρχή, ἀρχαί): Angelic beings which, according to Jewish speculations current in N T times regarding the world of spirits, were arranged in different ranks, and were denoted by the term ἀρχή (pl. ἀρχαί). Paul makes use of this terminology (Ro 8 38; Eph 1 21, 3 10; Col 1 16, 2 10, 15), without implying to what extent he accepted such speculations as true. In Eph 6 12 the ἀρχαί are evil powers. In Tit 3 1 powers of this world are meant. See also ANGELOLOGY, § 5; and GNOSTICISM. E. E. N.

PRISCA, pris'ka (Πρίσκα, or in some places the dim. form Πρίσκυλλα): The wife of Aquila (q.v.) and always mentioned with him. Since in Ac 18 2 it is only affirmed that Aquila was a native of Pontus, from the form of Prisca's name in Ac (Priscilla), we are justified in assuming her Roman origin (cf. the Cæmeterium Priscillæ at Rome), if indeed the name of Aquila also be not that of a Roman freedman (CIL, VI, No. 12,273). From the fact that when the two are mentioned the name of Prisca often precedes that of her husband (less often in D), it has been inferred that she was the more important personage of the two (Ro 16 3; II Ti 4 19; Ac 18 18, 26). According to Harnack (ZNTW, 1900, pp. 16-41) Aquila and P. (mainly the latter) were the possible authors of He. Of this there is, however, no positive proof. J. M. T.

PRISCILLA, pri-sil'ā. See PRISCA.

PRISON: A term used for several Heb. and Gr. expressions: (1) bēth hā'āšūrīm (hāšūrīm, Kēthābh), 'house of the bound [i.e., prisoners]' (Ec 4 14; Jg 16 21, 25. Moore (ICC, ad loc.) would read pl. of āšūr, 'bond'; cf. the following. (2) bēth hā'ēšūr, 'house of the bond' (Jer 37 15). (3) bēth hakkele', 'house of confinement' (I K 22 27=II Ch 18 26; II K 17 4, 25 27; Jer 37 15, 18; Is 42 7, 22; Jer 37 4 [cf. Q<sup>er</sup> and Kēthābh], 52 31; cf. 'prison [kele'] -garments' (II K 25 29=Jer 52 33), lit. 'garments of imprisonment.' (4) bēth

šōhar, 'the round house': a tower (?), the name of or for a prison in Egypt (Gn 39 20-23, 40 3, 5). Šōhar is perhaps a Hebraized Egyptian word. (5) bēth hap-quddāh, 'house of visitation' (i.e., punishment) or 'oversight,' in Babylon, in which King Zedekiah was imprisoned (Jer 52 11). (6) mahpekketh, 'stocks,' an instrument in which legs and arms were confined, compelling a crooked posture. They were used as a punishment for Jeremiah (Jer 29 26, 'stocks' RV; cf. Jer 20 2, 3) and for Hanani (II Ch 16 10, 'house of the stocks' RVmg.). (7) maṭṭārāh, 'guard,' 'ward,' used with hātsēr, 'court of the guard' RV (Jer 32 2, 8, 12, 33 1, 37 21, 38 6, 13, 28, 39 14, 15; Neh 3 25), except Neh 12 39, 'gate of the guard.' This court was in the king's palace, and Jeremiah was placed there to keep him from working against the king, perhaps also to protect him (Jer 38 28; cf. vs. 24 ff.). (8) maṣṣēr, 'dungeon' (Is 24 22), a figure for exile (Is 42 7, 'dungeon' RV; Ps 142 7 [8]). (9) ōtser, 'coercion' (Is 53 8, 'oppression' RV correctly). (10) bēth hammishmār, 'house of the guard' (Gn 42 10), a place of detention, translated elsewhere in ward (Lv 24 12; Nu 15 34; cf. mishmār in Gn 40 3, 4, etc.). (11) In Is 61 1 'prison' is supplied in EV after p<sup>er</sup>qah-qōah, 'opening,' as a figure of freeing from the darkness of prison. (12) δεσμοτήριον (Mt 11 2; Ac 5 21, 23, 16 26, 'prison-house' RV). (13) οἰκημα, 'a dwelling-place' (Ac 12 7, 'cell' RV). (14) τήρησις, the place where prisoners were kept (Ac 5 18, 'ward' RV; cf. 4 3, 'hold' AV, 'ward' RV). (15) φυλακή, 'a place where captives were kept,' the term most often used in the N T (Mt 5 25; Mk 6 17; Lk 3 20; Ac 5 19, etc.), and in the LXX. for the more common Heb. terms. (16) The RV (in Mt 4 12; Mk 1 14) renders παραδοθῆναι by 'delivered up' ('cast into prison' AV). C. S. T.

PRISON GARB. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3, (b).

PRIZE (βραβεῖον): The reward for victory in the Grecian athletic contests, consisting of a simple wreath, composed, in the Isthmian games (near Corinth; cf. I Co 9 24) of pine, in those at Olympia of wild olive, etc. The honor was intensely and universally coveted. In Ph 3 14, where the language is metaphorical, the prize is the purified heavenly life, the reward for success in the Christian race.

S. D.—M. W. J.

PROCHORUS, prek'o-rus (Πρόχορος): One of the 'seven' chosen to administer the charities of the Jerusalem Church (Ac 6 5). See CHURCH LIFE, § 3.

PROCONSUL (ἀνθύπατος, deputy AV): The past consul or past pretor acting in the provinces as deputy consul. After 53 B.C. five years must elapse before the past pretor could become proconsul. The proconsul was clothed with military, civil, and judicial authority. His powers were unlimited. The term of office was one year, but often prolonged. Two such officers are named in the N T, Sergius Paulus (Ac 13 7 ff.) and Gallio (Ac 18 12). Reference is also made to the office without specific mention of persons (Ac 19 38). J. R. S. S.—E. E. N.

PROCURATOR. See GOVERNOR.

PROFANE: The term renders the Heb. words (1) hōl (Ezk 22 26, 42 20 AV, but 'common' RV) fr. hālāl ('to be loose'), used in the sense of 'to profane,' etc.; very frequent in the law as the opposite of 'to be holy' or 'clean'; (2) hānēph (Jer 23 11, 15, but 'hypocrisy' AVmg. and 'ungodliness' ARV); and (3) the Gr. βέβηλος, 'impious' (I Ti 1 9). A. C. Z.

PROFESSION. See CONFESSION.

PROGNOSTICATOR. See ASTRONOMY, § 9; and MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 7.

PROMISE: In the O T both the verb and the noun 'promise' are used in the ordinary sense of a declaration of one's intention. The Heb. text of the O T has, in fact, no word equivalent to 'promise,' but uses the more generic term 'word' and the verbs 'to speak,' 'to say.' In the N T, on the contrary, the terms rendered 'promise' (ἐπαγγελία [especially with the article], ἐπαγγελμα, ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι) are specific to the point of technicality.

Of all the N T writers, the Apostle Paul gives the clearest conception of what was understood by 'the promise.' Even in his speech before Agrippa, he defines it as the central fact of Jewish religious thought that God of old had declared His design to visit His people in the person of His Anointed (Ac 26 6, 7). This promise had been fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. For Paul, 'gospel' and 'promise' are equivalent. That was the 'promise' before Jesus came, which is the 'gospel' after He completed His work; conversely, that is the 'gospel,' since the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, which was the 'promise' under the O T. In this sense Paul makes the promise the only revelation of the mode of salvation. It was by the promise that men were saved under the O T, not by the Law. For the promise was made to Abraham, and Abraham antedates the Law by four centuries (Gal 3 17). This is evidently the force also of the argument in Ro ch. 4. How far the same thought was in the mind of Peter when he declared in his discourse on Pentecost that the promise had been intended for his hearers it is impossible to say. But his appeal is to a well-known expectation, and he aims to arouse a vivid realization and appreciation of the content of the promise.

The promise stands related to the general subject of prophecy as the heart to the whole body. It is at its very core and constitutes its life principle. It is, therefore, related to the covenant as the equivalent for God's share in it. But, like the covenant, it was conditional and must be appropriated by the individual for himself through the act of faith. Hence the inseparable connection of faith and promise in Paul's discussion (Ro ch. 4). A. C. Z.

PROPHECY, PROPHET: 1. Names. The names given the prophet in the Bible are quite significant. In the O T he is called rō'eh, hōzeh, nābhī'. The first two, almost synonymous, from roots rā'ah and hāzāh, both 'to see,' suggest the man of vision, and are properly rendered 'seer.' The prophet is thus one whose sight pierces through the veil that hides the world of Divine things, or one for whom this veil is lifted occasionally so that he obtains an inner knowledge of the realities beyond.

The term nābhī' (from nābhā', 'to announce' [tho some make this root a weaker form of nābha', 'to bubble up,' 'pour forth' a stream of speech under inspiration]), presents the prophet as a man of speech, one who gives forth words under strong excitement, or in an exalted state of feeling. The difference between the first two and the third of these terms lies in the fact that the first two point to the method of the prophet's receiving his information and the nature of that information, whereas the third points to the method of the delivery of his message. In addition to these strictly technical terms, the prophets had applied to them other designations, more or less descriptive of their office and work. They were 'keepers,' or 'watchmen' (Is 21 11 ff.; Jer 6 17; Ezk 3 17, 33 7; Mic 7 4; Hab 2 1 ff.; Is 52 8, 56 10, 62 6), 'men of God' ('man of God,' 'the man of God,' I S 2 27, 9 6 ff.; I K 12 22; II K 4 22, 25), 'servants of J'' (Is 20 3; Jer 25 4, 26 5, etc.), 'messengers of J'' (Is 42 19, 44 26; Hag 1 13; Mal 3 1). In the N T the common term is προφήτης (from πρό, 'before,' and φημί, 'to speak'), 'one who speaks before,' i.e., 'forward,' 'forth,' or better, one who stands in the presence of (before) an august personage, as a minister before the king, and communicates his will to the people, who have no immediate access to him. A prophet is then a servant of God who represents him before men. He is thus the obverse and complement of the priest. Just as the priest represents the people before God, taking their prayers and offerings into His presence, so the prophet represents God to the people, taking His message or word to them.

2. Development of Prophecy. In its origin Hebrew prophecy is associated with kindred developments among the non-Israelitic peoples, and is rooted in the desire to know the Divine will with reference to the ordinary affairs of life. This desire has produced among all the races of mankind countless forms of soothsaying and divination. Among the Israelites this craving for supernatural knowledge was purged of its lower associations, and as it gained spiritual strength it grew into public-spirited and lofty service of God and of His people. From another point of view, 'the man of God,' who at first secured and gave men knowledge from God affecting their private welfare, was called of God to a higher mission as a vehicle of His spirit and voice, to the end that His kingdom might be advanced upon earth. The development of prophecy in Israel thus includes two distinct periods with a long transition between them. The first period extends apparently to the days of Samuel, and the transition ends with the appearance of Elijah. During this age of transition two kinds of prophets, the one called a seer (rō'eh) and the other the 'prophet' more strictly speaking (the nābhī') existed. These were distinct from each other, and neither of them was exactly what the prophet later became, e.g., in the days of Elijah or Isaiah (I S 9 9). The change began by the transfer of the name of the prophet to the seer and the gradual obliteration of the distinction. That the individualistic conception of the prophet's function survived long into the transition period is clear from such facts as Saul's consenting to consult a seer with reference to the lost asses (I S 9 6), Ahaziah's sending an embassy to Baalzebub to know whether the injury he had received from an accidental fall would prove fatal (II K 1 2), and Jehoshaphat's inquiring of the prophets whether the campaign on which he and Ahab of Israel were venturing would result in victory (I K 22 5 ff.). On the other hand, long before what we have called the period of transition, Hebrew prophecy had cast off those cruder outward practises (the observation of the flight of birds, of the entrails of sacrificial victims, incantations, etc.) by which the Divine will was supposed to be conjured into view. Urim and Thummim, ephod, and even sacrifice as means of consulting God were relegated to the priestly office (see URIM AND THUMMIM). It was very late however, before the prophetic spirit so completely possessed its subjects as to make them trust to the moral force and rational conviction inherent in their message. In the earlier ages the prophets did not hesitate to use violent physical measures in enforcing their teaching. Samuel hewed Agag to pieces (I S 15 33), Elijah put to death the prophets of Baal (I K 18 40), also those emissaries of King Ahaziah who had addressed him disrespectfully (II K 1 10, 12). Elisha cursed, in the name of J'', the lads who ridiculed him (II K 2 24). In the latest times it was most usual for the prophet to endure suffering in the faithful execution of his work (see, however, for an early example of this, the case of Micaiah, I K 22 27).

3. 'Schools' of Prophets. During the later portion of the period of Judges the prophets come into view in organized communities or 'schools.' These were associated with the worship of J'', for they are connected with the shrines located at such places as Jericho (II K 2 5), Gilgal (II K 4 38), Ramah (I S 19 18), Gibeah (I S 10 5, 10), and Bethel (II K 2 3). From these centers they exerted a strong influence; and their appearance at any particular spot was often the signal for the outbreak of a contagious religious fervor. Saul, on being anointed king, fell in with a company of them, and 'the spirit of God came mightily upon him,' rendering him, for the time being, a sharer of their characteristic activities, which, it is said, gave rise to the proverbial utterance: 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' (I S 10 11 f.). The great leader of these prophetic guilds (whether he was also their first organizer does not appear clearly) was Samuel. His position as 'judge' no doubt added to the esteem in which the prophets were held for their own sake. It may have been due to his influence that Saul suppressed the heathen counterpart of prophecy in Israel and outlawed the practise of necromancy and soothsaying together with other forms of magic arts. The fact that he was himself the first, and only one on record, to violate this law (case of the witch of Endor, I S ch. 28) is all the more significant of the consciousness that the difference between prophecy as a factor in the life of Israel and the divination common among the heathen was vivid, and that the true nature of prophecy was appreciated by the intelligent Israelite.

4. The Prophet as Statesman. It was of the essence of theocracy that it fostered dependence upon him who knew the will of God, i.e., the prophet.

In the administration of the affairs of government his knowledge was absolutely essential. The part of the prophet, therefore, in the Israelite state was from the beginning conceived to be of the utmost importance. Moses, the dictator of the Exodus period, is the ideal and prototype of all subsequent prophets (Dt 18 18, 34 10). His successor, Joshua, took up this part of Moses' work as well as the political, without, however, being given the technical name of prophet. Samuel combined in his person the offices of judge and prophet. With the coming of the monarchy the kings had beside them what may be called court-prophets. Gad was 'David's seer' (II S 24 11). Heman is given the title of 'the king's seer' (I Ch 25 6). With the division of the kingdom, and the corruption of the worship of J'' by Jeroboam, there arose a natural antagonism between prophets and kings, reaching its culmination in the fierce conflict between Elijah and the dynasty of Omri on the other. It does not appear that Elijah was a member of any prophetic school, but in his implacable warfare against Baalism and his determined efforts to put it down he doubtless had the sympathy, if not the outward support, of all the prophets of J''. His primary object was to purify and restore the worship of J'' to its ideal condition. It is this that gives him his epoch-making significance in the history of Israel (see ELIJAH). Under Elisha the same purpose was maintained, and even more successfully pressed, since Elijah had already fought the hardest part of the battle. The combined ministries of these two prophets cover a period of 100 years (circa 875-775 B.C.), and as the closing years of the later prophet probably overlap the earlier portion of the ministry of Jonah the son of Amittai (II K 14 25), and possibly that of Amos, they lead up to the type of prophecy that is best known. It is true that the dynasty of Jehu did much to conciliate the prophets by reinstating the worship of J'', and His servants as the counselors of the kings (II K 10 30 ff.), but the relation of kings and prophets never became quite ideal in the Northern Kingdom. When Amos came forward, he did not meet with a cordial reception. It is true he did not possess the professional training and was not classified as a prophet, but this does not altogether account for the surprise and annoyance of the royal party at his appearance in Israel and the effort to get rid of him (Am 7 10-13).

5. The Prophet as the Preacher of Righteousness. The type of prophet represented by Amos became permanent. It is a type that combines in the same personality the character and work of the high-minded, independent statesman and that of the teacher of pure morals and preacher of spiritual monotheism. The prophets of this class took part in public affairs, but they were for the most part content to address their words to the people. They stood in the position of semi-independent leaders, seeking to mold the affairs of society and of the state from the point of view of the moral principles involved in the religion of J''. Their efforts were largely aimed at the leavening of the body politic with the leaven of sound ethical teaching, tho they did not always refrain from urging definite programs in the event of great public crises. Isaiah clearly outlined to Ahaz what he ought to do in view of the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance (7 3 ff.), and Jeremiah performed a similar duty toward Jehoiakim and Zedekiah (36 27, 38 14); but, on the whole, the prophets would have been content to leave the course of affairs to be determined by the new state of moral life engendered by their preaching. They never flinched from exposing the evils that were sapping the national life, or from denouncing unprincipled leaders and warning against short-sighted policies and foreign alliances.

6. Prophetic Inspiration. The secret of the prophets' power was the invincible conviction in their own souls and in the souls of their hearers that the message which they delivered was not their own invention, but came directly from the God whom they served. They felt themselves to be appointed to their life-work and equipped for it by an irresistible influence which was none other than the very spirit of J". They represent this spirit as filling and possessing them and impelling them in their labors (Mic 3 8; Ezk 11 5). It was as if a mighty hand had seized them and was moving them on in spite of themselves (cf. Ezk 3 22, 'the hand of Jehovah was there upon me'). The first touch of this influence was often a vivid experience recognized as a solemn inauguration into their life-work (Is 6 1 ff.; Jer 1 4 ff.; Ezk 1 4 ff.). In many cases the call was met with a natural reluctance growing out of a sense of insufficiency for the great duties brought into view. Jeremiah pleaded his youth and lack of fluency in speech (1 6). Ezekiel was prostrated by the overpowering sense of God's presence and had to be raised and encouraged before he could take up the task assigned him (1 23, 2 1 f.). Long before these, Moses had passed through a similar experience (Ex 3 11 ff.). But once yielded to, the call made them brave and carried the assurance of a Divine commission at each successive service involved in it. 'The word of Jehovah came' to the prophet as occasion required (Jer 14 1, 15 1, etc.; Zec 8 1, etc.). Just how this took place is not said. In many cases it was through visions (see REVELATION, § 10). Hence they introduced their messages with the formula 'Thus saith Jehovah' (Am 1 3, 6, etc.; Mic 6 1, etc.).

7. False Prophets. The name 'prophet' was from the beginning assumed by many who did not realize its meaning, had no idea of the work and office, and no right to it. The first occasion on record when it became necessary to discriminate between these and the true prophets of J" was in the reign of Jehoshaphat, when Micaiah, the son of Imlah, stood up against the 400 'false prophets' (1 K 22 6). The difference between the true and the false was in this case presented as consisting not in the source of the inspiration of the two classes, but in the motives actuating the men on each side. It was the same J" who sent the 'lying spirit' to Zedekiah and the spirit of truth to Micaiah, but He sent the former, because Zedekiah was more anxious to speak words pleasing to the king than to tell the truth which God might make known to him, and the latter, because Micaiah cared nothing for the feelings of the king, and was intent upon declaring the will of God alone. The responsibility for the evil consequences is placed on Ahab. The principle is more clearly stated by Micah (2 11). The false is he who accommodates his message to the corrupt state of mind of his hearers, and preaches what is pleasing to them. In a certain sense the false prophet is a creature of the popular demand for smooth sayings (Is 30 10 ff.). The motive of such a prophet may be traced to a most selfish root—he prophesies fair things for a reward, and 'whoso putteth not into their mouths, they even prepare war against him' (Mic 3 5). The true prophet could only say of the false that he had not received his inspiration from J". His was a 'vision of his own heart' (Jer 23 16-32). The differences between the true and false prophets were, therefore, that the former had (1) a message from J" accompanied by inspiration, (2) an absolute disregard of the acceptability (pleasing effect) of his message on his audience, and (3) a similar disregard of the consequences of his delivering it on his own comfort and outward welfare. On all these points the reverse was true of the false prophet.

8. Test of True Prophecy. But how are the hearers of a prophet to know that he has a message from God and that his motives in bringing it are pure and unselfish? Evidently, only from the nature of the message and its agreement with what they independently know of God. All external attestations and corroborations must be subsidiary and auxiliary, and therefore yield uncertain and meager results as means of convincing men of the Divine origin of an utterance. Elijah appealed to the supernatural manifestations of power as evidence of the truth of his claim for J" as against Baal, but the effect was insignificant and superficial, because the minds of the people with whom he had to do did not recognize the difference between a miracle whose direct efficient cause was God's will and one which was mediated through magical and occult arts. An appeal is suggested further in Dt 18 22 to the fulfilment of the predictive element in prophecy as a proof of its Divine origin; but from the nature of the case this proof would be of little, if any, use to the persons and the time immediately addressed (cf. Jer ch. 28). What the hearer of a 'word of God' wants to know is whether at the time he is listening he can be sure that he is hearing the voice of a true messenger of God. That something predicted will come to pass in the future may accredit him to posterity, or possibly even to the hearer himself in case he lives to see the fulfilment of the prediction, and again have occasion to hear the same prophet, but it can not attest the message for the time and occasion of its deliverance. Hence should the message call for immediate action, it must fail of its purpose, if the fulfilment of the predictive element in it is to be its credential. Hence, too, in the Deuteronomic passage the testing question is given as one that may validate the claim of the prophets to the people as a whole through a series of generations rather than to the individual audiences they may address at particular times. In actual practise also the test was found inadequate and led to complaints (Ezk 12 21-28).

9. Written Prophecies. At first prophecy, like forensic oratory, was purely oral, perhaps even extemporaneous in form (cf. the term word, burden, i.e., 'oracle,' 'utterance'). It was natural, however, that so far as it had value for more than the mere occasion that called it forth, it should be preserved. How early the practise of writing down prophetic oracles was resorted to is not known. It is exceedingly probable that certain fragments of very old written oracles are incorporated in somewhat later documents. Is chs. 15 and 16 are by many supposed to be an illustration. By a few critics they are even ascribed, upon the basis of an obscure tradition, to Jonah, the son of Amittai, in the reign of Jeroboam II (780-740). It is precisely the reign of Jeroboam II that furnishes the first undoubted writing down of prophecies in the case of Amos. From the days of Amos onward the intimate connection of prophecy with governmental policy makes it possible to trace its history and note its adaptation to the times. During the days of the growing influence of Assyria, Amos and Hosea were active in the Northern Kingdom, Micah and Isaiah in the Southern. As Babylon prevailed and up to the Exile, Nahum, Zephaniah, and Jeremiah were leading prophets. During the earlier years of the Exile, we have Obadiah, Habakkuk, and Ezekiel, followed at the end of the Captivity by Deutero-Isaiah. The prophets of the Restoration were Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, and those of the post-restoration (Greek) period, down to the middle of the 2d cent. B.C., were Joel (probably), Jonah, and Daniel.

10. Literary Style and Prophecy. In the matters of diction and style there are, strictly speaking, no peculiarities distinctive of the prophets. They use poetry or prose according to the prevailing custom of their day or the requirements of the particular subject of their discourses. The poetic form is more common in the writings of the earlier canonical prophets and the prose in the later. In general, both in poetical and prose composition, the play of the imagination is large and free. This is, however, due partly to Oriental traits of mind, and partly to the excitation and exaltation of the prophet because of the importance of his message. Vivid figurative language is quite a favorite; but the idea of a technical, symbolical vocabulary devised or developed for use by the prophets only, as for instance, the choice of the word 'day' to signify 'year,' or of 'mountain' to signify 'kingdom,' is a mere figment of the imagination. Whenever cryptographic expressions are used, as by Jeremiah in his allusion to Babylon under the name 'Sheshach' (q.v., Jer 25 26, 51 41), it is precisely as the same method might be used elsewhere than in prophecy. These modes of expression were simply intended to conceal from outsiders the identity of the things alluded to, while they revealed them to the people interested.

11. Interpretation of Prophecy. The starting-point in the interpretation of prophecy is that the prophetic word is always addressed in the first place to a specific audience. There is no such thing as prophecy dealing with non-existent situations. Every word of God is called forth by a definite time and environment. But when the exigency that has elicited it has passed away, the word does not lose its value; for in meeting the exigency the prophet has announced principles of permanent validity. Whenever similar situations arise in the future the prophecy serves as a standard to be referred to. Circumstances may change, but principles remain the same; and once uttered, principles must be recognized as having bearings whenever similar circumstances arise again. The interpreter must then first ask: What did the prophet intend to say to his immediate audience? and afterward: What underlying principles of his utterance may be taken as his message to the world of mankind for all time? This does not mean that the prophet had two separate audiences in view when he spoke, but that the fundamental positions on which his address is based are the same for all ages.

12. Predictive Prophecy. The primary object of the prophetic declaration being to bring men into closer harmony with the Divine will (righteousness), the declaration often took account of what God had done in the past. The prophet in such a case was a historian. He recorded God's dealings and the occasions in men's conduct (obedience or rebellion) which moved him in the exercise of His mercy or justice. Much of Hebrew Prophecy consists of these appeals to the past and is in narrative form. In the broadest sense of the word that section of the O T which tells of God's guidance of His people is prophetic. Jewish tradition, true to an accurate instinct, called its contents 'The Prophets' (n'bi'im). It includes the Books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. But the prophet also announced the Divine will for the present, and was in that capacity a preacher. Finally, as he looked forward into the future and declared God's purpose to achieve certain results, he became a predictor. The relation of this power to predict to the natural or acquired sagacity and political insight and foresight, possessed in a measure by all real statesmen, has been made a subject of a sharp controversy. It is sufficient to say that to the Hebrew of the prophetic age such a question would have been meaningless. The power of the prophet to foresee and announce beforehand events which J<sup>d</sup> designed to accomplish was a gift of J<sup>d</sup> endowing and distinguishing its recipient as a special agent of God in furthering His will. The prophets as a class did indeed possess a large amount of political sagacity; but they invariably viewed the quality as something not acquired by education, inherited, or otherwise obtained in natural ways, but as a bestowment from on high. But predictions may be of merely passing importance, such as the one by Amos that Jeroboam (II) should 'die by the sword' (7 11), or of eternal moment, such as the long line of utterances referring to the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth. They may be further viewed as absolute and contingent. Inasmuch as the object of the communication of God's will was to bring about a change for the better in the conduct of men, predictions of evil were in the great majority of instances no more than warnings or threats against persistence in evil doing. When the change aimed at by the prophetic word was accomplished, the prediction was canceled. If the people would 'amend their ways and their doings, and obey Jehovah, their God,' then 'Jehovah will repent him of the evils he hath pronounced against you' (Jer 26 13). The mere appearance of absoluteness in a prediction is no sure sign of its being really such. Jonah did not put his prediction that Nineveh should be destroyed in forty days in a contingent form (3 4), and yet when his preaching had had its effect, the actualization of it became unnecessary.

13. Fulfilment. When, however, what was foreshadowed, either in a general outline of the Divine plan or as a specific event, came to pass, the prophet's word was said to be fulfilled (πληροῦσθαι, Mt 4 14; Lk 4 21). The term is, however, one applied to O T Scripture broadly and not to the predictive element alone (cf. Mt. 3 15, 5 17, to 'fulfil righteousness,' 'the law,' i.e., 'to obey' and thus vindicate or to fill with a larger meaning; cf. Paul's expression 'to establish,' Ro 3 31). The actualization of predictive prophecy is its vindication and clarification. But it is not solely on this account that it is called fulfilment, but also because it adds to the significance of the utterance the sanction of the firm conviction that the word spoken was a true one. There can be no question, however, about the use of the expression at times in a rather formal and technical sense. Especially does the phrase 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken' (Mt 1 22, 2 15, etc.) come to have the force of a mere formula of quotation, since it is not always in their original senses that it introduces the words of the prophets.

14. Prophecy in N T. During the interval between the close of the prophetic section of the O T and the birth of Jesus there was a general feeling that the spirit of prophecy had fallen into silence. When, however, John the Baptist made his public appearance, it was believed that the long silence was broken. At all events, there was a general receptivity toward the words of John himself. When the fame of Jesus' works and words went abroad, He was without hesitation accorded by many the name and standing of a prophet (Mt 21 11; Mk 6 15; Lk 7 16). Jesus Himself characterized John the Baptist as a 'prophet and more than a prophet' (Mt 11 9). In the days following the first planting of the Christian Church the name was given to that class of ministers whose utterances were accompanied by special signs of spiritual exaltation (see CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 6), though they may have lacked the clearness and coherence of others who were more strictly called teachers (Ac 11 27, 21 10; I Co 12 28, 14 20; Eph 3 5; see TEACHING, TEACHER). With the end of the Apostolic Age, this type of ministry seems to have become quite rare and to have completely disappeared during the course of the 2d cent. It was revived, however, at least in name, toward the end of the same century by Montanus and his associates. Since that time the tendency has been to restrict the use of the name 'prophet' to the circle of Biblical speakers and writers who brought inspired messages from God to men.

PROPHETESS: In Is 8 3 the word means simply the wife of the prophet, elsewhere a woman exercising prophetic functions. Five such are mentioned in the Bible. Miriam (Ex 15 20), Deborah (Jg 4 4), Huldah (II K 22 14), Noadiah (Neh 6 14), and Anna (Lk 2 36). In Rev 2 20 a woman who claimed to be a prophetess, to whom the author gives the opprobrious name Jezebel, is severely condemned for her false and immoral teachings. A. C. Z.—E. E. N.

PROPTIATION: This word is used by RV only four times in the N T (Ro 3 25; He 2 17; I Jn 2 4, 4 10). The revisers were careful to show in their marginal readings that in two other places the same Greek root is used. In the publican's prayer (Lk 18 13) for 'be merciful unto me' they suggest 'be propitiated to me.' In He 9 5 for the 'mercy-seat' they suggest 'the propitiatory.' These two marginal readings take us directly back into O T usage, whereas the other four, as applied to a person, are peculiar to the N T.

1. In the O T the Heb. word (kāphar and derivatives) is generally translated in the LXX. by the Gr. word ἱλασσεσθαι and derivatives, which become 'propitiate' in the English N T. But in the English versions of the O T 'propitiate' is never used. In its place very often appears the word 'atonement,' which again does not occur in RV in the N T (and in AV only in Ro 5 11). In the O T the uses of kāphar, whose root meaning is 'cover,' are most varied, and the translations likewise vary (cf. Gn 32 20, 'appease,' lit. 'cover his face'; Lv 4 20, etc., 'make atonement'; Ps 65 3, 79 9; Is 6 7, 'forgiven,' 'expiated' mg.; Ps 78 38, 'forgave'; Pr 16 14, 'pacify'; Is 47 11, 'put it away,' etc.; on the kappōreth, i.e., mercy-seat, see ARK). But two main usages are to be distinguished as the most extensive and most important. (a) First, we have the use of the word in relation to the effect of sacrifice, especially of the sin-offering (see SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS). It would appear that in some way the blood of the animal (Lv 17 11), when applied to the altar, was thought to 'cover' the sin and even the person of him on whose behalf the priest was acting (Lv 5 18, 19 22). In this class of passages the priest is said to make the atonement, and the result is that God forgives. (b) But in passages which are not concerned with sacrificial ritual kāphar is used of the immediate Divine act of pardon; and in these it is He who 'covers' the sin, hides it from His own eyes, so that His dealing with the sinner is not henceforth in respect of that sin. In at least two passages the word is used with the threat or prayer that sin shall not be forgiven (Is 22 14; cf. I S 3 14, where sacrifice is mentioned, and Jer 18 23). It is remarkable that in many of those passages in which God is said to forgive sin no mention is made of any means of atonement, as in Is 6 7 (where the 'coal' or 'hot stone' from the altar [of incense?] can hardly be equivalent to sacrifice), 27 9; Ezk 16 63; Ps 65 3, 78 38, 79 9. In some of these cases the sin was probably committed 'with a high hand,' i.e., it was a breach of that covenant within which alone the sacrificial system had its force. And hence we find this marvelous act of Divine mercy traced directly and only to the mercy and loving-kindness of God (e.g. Ps 25 11, 130 3, 4). This region of experience remained for Israel inexplicable. How can men account for, or trust in, a mercy which covers sin even before repentance (Cheyne on Is 27 9)? And why should atonement—the covering of sin with blood—be necessary for sins of infirmity and ignorance, and none be needed for those which strike at the very throne of God? It is superficial to solve the problem by saying that the sacrificial view was lower, because it grew out of primitive notions of the Divine nature and relations, and was really abolished for the higher spirits by the other view that the Divine forgiveness is unconditioned save by the repentance which its promise produces. The two views lived on together in Israel. They seem to find a reconciliation in the Isaianic picture of the servant of Jehovah. They are both justified in the N T experience as that was created by Christ and described by the Apostles.

2. This is not the place to discuss the Christian doctrine of atonement (see RECONCILIATION AND ATONEMENT). We must only refer to the one fact that in the N T Christ Himself is spoken of as taking the place of the sin-offering and becoming the means by which human sin is covered and Divine forgiveness takes effect. In each of the N T passages the word is used in relation to sins and their forgiveness. In Ro 3 25 f. there is the explicit statement that Jesus 'in His blood' exercised a propitiative function (Deissmann proves his case [EB, 3033, 3034] that ἱλαστήριον must be taken in general terms to mean 'propitiatory thing,' unless the context compels us to say 'sacrifice.' But his attempt to elude the sacrificial reference in this verse fails because the words 'set forth' and 'in his blood' make the reference to the death of Christ more obvious and natural than to 'blood fellowship with the exalted spiritual Christ'). In the Johannine passages the word is used without exposition, as if it described a fact most familiar to the Christian consciousness, that Christ Himself, in His whole meaning and value, as well as in His sacrifice, is our propitiation. It is, on the one hand (I Jn 2 4), a ground of confidence and comfort to the man who has sinned, and that because it describes the relation of Christ to our sins (within the covenant, as it were). On the other hand (I Jn 4 10), it is the fact through which the very essence and glory of the love of God has been made known to us. In sending His Son to be the propitiation for our sins, God has gone far beyond the region of sins of infirmity or ignorance. It is all sins, of all men, which have been here dealt with by Christ. And from this act of God, from nothing earlier or lower, we are able to reach the conclusion that God is love. In He 2 17 we are moving among many O T associations. But the all-changing fact here is that we are dealing with a Person of superhuman, nay of supreme, qualities. The Son of God became incarnate (2 14, 17), in order that He might become the kind of high priest who could propitiate as to the sins of the people (cf. Ro 8 3, where περὶ ἀμαρτίας carries with it the idea of sacrifice offered for sins).

The implications here can not be dealt with in this article. Suffice it to point out that (1) the 'propitiation' in the sense of 1 (b) above, the covering of sin by God's pardon, is here traced back, as in the O T, to His own spontaneous grace, His holy love. That (2) in the Person of Christ, His Son whom He sent, we again find the propitiation of 1 (a) above. In His death He has somehow 'covered' sin. The twofold Hebrew view of Divine forgiveness is here lifted to unity. That (3) this propitiation was not first a theory and then a dogma. It was first an experience and then a message; for they actually found the forgiveness of God; and they found it in connection with, or through, their whole historical experience of the Person of Christ in life and death and life again.

PROSELYTE, pros'i-lait (προσέλυτος): 1. In the O T. The common translation of the Heb. gēr, meaning a convert from one religion to another, specifically a convert to the religion of Israel. In the earlier O T usage gēr means simply a resident 'stranger' or 'sojourner,' as distinguished from the nokhrî or 'foreigner' (Dt 14 21; cf. II S 1 13 with II S 15 19). Gradually, however, in the Holiness Code (HC) and Priestly legislation (P) the term was appropriated to the description of the non-Israelite inhabitant of the land who either wholly or in part became incorporated into the religious life of the nation (cf. Ex 12 19, 48; Lv 17 8, 10, 15; Nu 15 14, 15). In I and II Ch gēr is used to designate not only foreigners in the land proper, but other foreigners also who accept the Jewish faith (I Ch 13 2; II Ch 30 25), i.e., the meaning approaches the strictly technical sense of proselyte, i.e., 'a convert from another faith.' See also GENTILES.

2. In the LXX, and Later Literature. While this is not the only sense in which προσέλυτος is used in the LXX. (cf. Ex 22 21; Lv 19 34; Dt 5 14; against Allen in Expositor, October, 1894, pp. 264–275), it is the predominant usage (cf. Nu 35 15; Lv 17 8; I Ch 22 2; To 1 8 [N]; Ps 93 [94] 6). This is the only sense in which the word is used in the Mishna (see passages cited by Schürer, GJV, III, p. 175), in Philo (De Monarch. I, § 7), and in the N T (Mt 23 15; Ac 2 10, 6 5, 13 43).

3. Development of the Proselyting Spirit. This gradual change in the meaning of gēr and προσέλυτος indicates a corresponding development in the proselyting spirit in later Judaism, which undoubtedly received an impetus from the universalism of the later prophets, notably the Second Isaiah, while the struggle to 'purify the land' under Ezra and Nehemiah, issuing in the priestly legislation, not only resulted in the incorporation into the religious community of many foreign residents in the land, but actually opened a legal way for the reception of men of other than the Jewish race (cf. Lv 24 22). Moreover, the revival of the national spirit under the Maccabean princes was accompanied by an active propagandism with resort even to methods of force (Jos. Ant. XIII, 9 1, 11 3, 15 1; cf. also such passages as Is 26 15; Ps 47 8, 60 9 f., which may be Maccabean). The same spirit was furthered also by the circumstances of the Diaspora, which brought Jews into contact with other races and naturally stimulated their desire not only to maintain their position, but also to enlarge their influence. That as a result large numbers of Gentiles, some of them persons of influence, accepted Judaism either wholly or in part is evidenced not only by Josephus (BJ, VII, 33; II, 39; Contra Ap. II, 40) and the N T (Lk 7 5; Ac 2 10, 13 50), but also by contemporary poets and historians (Horace, Sat. I, 9 68-72; Juvenal Sat. 14 96-106; Dio Cassius 37 17), and by burial inscriptions (e.g., CIL, No. 29,756; CIGr. No. 9,903).

4. Admission and Status of Proselytes. The conditions under which outsiders were admitted to the Jewish community and their status naturally varied at different times and in different places. First of all were the proselytes proper who theoretically, at least, were members of the Jewish community (gērē hatšedheq). For these, as in fact for all persons, the priestly legislation required the full acceptance of the Jewish law and of Jewish rites as expressed in the formula, 'One law shall be unto him that is home-born and unto the stranger' (Ex 12 49; Lv 24 22; Nu 9 14). This was the condition under which neighboring tribes were incorporated by the Maccabean princes (e.g., by Aristobulus I; Jos. Ant. XIII, 11 3). In the early Christian Church, also, it was the constant contention of the Judaizing party that converts must at least be circumcised (Gal 6 12). But even in the land itself (cf. Ezr, Neh, passim) it was difficult or impossible to maintain this strict standard, so that there gradually grew up a class of adherents much larger in number, commonly called 'they that feared Jehovah' (yir'ē-Yahweh, Ps 115 11, 118 4; Mal 3 16), or φοβούμενοι (also σεβόμενοι) τὸν θεόν (Ac 13 43; Jos. Ant. XIV, 7 2; CIL, Nos. 29,759, 29,760, 29,763). As the term itself implies, these had at least renounced idolatry, and probably also observed certain Jewish rites such as the keeping of the Sabbath and abstinence from certain kinds of food (Juv. Sat. XIV, 96-106). Josephus mentions also fasting and the bearing of lights (Contra Ap. 39). It is certain also that immersion, ῥῃστῆλα, 'bath', was required in the case of adherents as well as of proselytes (cf. Pesach 8 8; Orac. Sibyll. IV, 164). These were also in the habit of visiting the synagog (Ac 17 4). For the later (essentially erroneous) views as to 'proselytes of the gate' and their relation to 'proselytes of righteousness' see Schürer, GJV<sup>4</sup>, III, p. 177 f.

5. Proselytes and the Early Christian Church. In isolated cases converts were undoubtedly won directly from among the Gentiles, but in the early Christian period at least most converts came from among the proselytes and adherents to Judaism (Ac 2 11, 6 5, 8 27, 10 2, 11 20, 13 43, 14 1, 16 14, 17 4, 18 7). The missionary zeal of the early Christians was often only a new direction given to the proselyting energy of the Jews (cf. Gal 1 13 f.). There are certain observances and customs of the early Church which in all probability were suggested by Jewish regulations for proselytes and adherents. This may be the origin of the restrictions laid upon the Gentile Christians in the so called Apostolic decree of Ac 15 29. This also may have been the origin of baptism both as practised by John the Baptist and in the early Church (cf. Didachē, ch. VII, and see also BAPTISM).

PROVERB: This term renders the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) ḥidhāh, of Aramaic origin, meaning 'shut,' 'closed,' hence that which is of hidden meaning—a riddle or puzzle; rendered 'proverb' only in Hab 2 6; elsewhere rendered riddle, hard question, dark saying, etc. (2) māshāl (from the vb. māshal, the use of which is similar to that of the noun), root idea, 'comparison'—hence a saying which conveys more than its simply literal meaning, and thus (a) a 'similitude' or 'parable' (Ezk 17 2 f., 'riddle,' 'parable' AV, 20 49, 24 3, 'parable' EV), (b) a 'proverb' in the ordinary sense of the word (Pr 1 1, 6, 10 1, etc.), (c) a saying or sayings with some special or even prophetic import (Nu 23 7, 18, 24 3 f.; Ps 49 4, 78 2; Job 27 1, 29 1, all rendered 'parable'), (d) a common proverbial saying (Is 10 12, 24 13), and (e) an expression of contempt or reproach, a taunt (Dt 28 37; I K 9 7, etc.). (3) παροιμία (from παρά and ὁμός, 'way,' hence 'a saying aside from the way,' i.e., not an ordinary saying or, according to others, a 'way-side,' i.e., tribe or common saying), a 'proverb' proper (II P 2 22), or an obscure or 'dark' saying (Jn 16 25, 29 AV). (4) παραβολή, 'comparison' (Lk 4 23 AV; less happily rendered 'parable' in RV, altho this is the usual meaning of the word). See further PROVERBS, BOOK OF; and WISDOM, WISE MEN. E. E. N.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF: 1. Name. The Proverbs, or, as in AV, The Book of Proverbs, is entitled in the Heb. Bible simply מִשְׁלֵי, from its first word mishlē, 'the proverbs of' (Solomon). The full title of the book in its present form is 'The proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel.' This title was, in all probability, attached to the book by a late editor, on the basis of the captions of the old collections of proverbs now embodied in the book in 10 1 f. and 25 1 f.

2. Contents. The analysis of Pr, which is comparatively simple, is as follows:

Introduction, 1 1-6, indicating the practical purpose the book is intended to serve.

I. The excellence and nature of wisdom and wise conduct, 1 7-9 18.

1. The practical value of wisdom, set forth by means of sundry warnings and exhortations, 1 7-7 and 9 1-18.

2. Wisdom in its more universal and transcendent aspects, as the only safe principle of life and as the associate of J<sup>n</sup> in the work of creations, 8<sup>1-36</sup>.
- II. 'The proverbs of Solomon,' a collection of 375 (376) wise saying ('proverbs') covering the general field of practical morality, 10<sup>1-22 16</sup>.
- III. Two short sections, each having its own caption, 22<sup>17-24 22</sup> and 24<sup>23-34</sup>, containing proverbs closely similar in character, but not in form, to those of Div. II.
- IV. A second collection of 137 'proverbs of Solomon,' similar to those of Div. II. This collection is said to have been made by 'the men of Hezekiah, King of Judah, 25<sup>1-29 27</sup>.
- V. A collection of discourses on various topics:
- a. The 'words of Agur,' 30<sup>1-39</sup>.
  - b. The 'words of King Lemuel,' 31<sup>1-9</sup>.
  - c. The worthy woman described, 31<sup>10-31</sup>.

3. Literary Characteristics. While the entire material of Pr, both as to literary form and contents, belongs to the 'Wisdom Literature' and manifests the general characteristics of that class of literature, the contents of Pr are not of the same uniform character throughout, and it is upon the differences to be observed in the character of the material in the several sections that certain conclusions may be reached as to the age and compilation of the book.

The word 'proverb' (q.v.) is applied in Pr to several distinct literary forms. The simplest of these is a couplet or distich, i.e., an aphorism consisting of two members, which bear both a rhythmic and a logical relationship to each other. The rhythmic relationship consists in the number of accents or beats in each of the lines or members (in the original Heb.). The scheme may be 3 and 3, e.g., 10<sup>7</sup> zēkhēr tsaddīq libhrākāh,

or 4 and 3 as in 12<sup>1</sup>, or 3 and 4 as in 14<sup>28</sup>, or 4 and 4 as in 25<sup>2</sup> (the illustrations are from Kittel). It is not certain that lines of two beats or accents occur. Logically, the two members of a proverb may be related as antitheses (antithetic parallelism) as 10<sup>1, 2</sup>, etc., or as both stating the same thing but in different words (synonymous parallelism), or as exhibiting a comparison; or both members may form distinct parts of the same continuous thought, each supplementing the other in a variety of ways.

The couplet is the fundamental form used in Pr and the other Wisdom books (Job, Ec). Only rarely does a tristich (three-membered proverb) occur (e.g., 22<sup>29</sup>, 28<sup>24</sup>). Quatrains (or double distichs) are, however, frequent. Even in the more discursive parts of the book, where, instead of isolated proverbs, the same subject is discussed in a number of consecutive sentences, the fundamental form of the couplet maintains itself (e.g., ch. 7).

4. Order of Composition. When the book is examined in the light of the use of these various forms, interesting facts are revealed. The long section II (10<sup>1-22 16</sup>) consists entirely of couplets of three or four beats each (the apparent exception, 19<sup>7</sup>, is probably textually corrupt). In this section each couplet is, without exception, a complete 'proverb' in itself. No principle of arrangement seems to have been followed in making this collection, unless we discover it in the fact that in chs. 10-15 the parallelism is mainly antithetic, while in chs. 16-22 it is mainly either comparative or continuous. So far as subject-matter is concerned, no order of arrangement can be discovered. Sect. IV (chs. 25-29) presents the same general characteristics as Sect. II. In Sect. III (22<sup>17-24 22</sup>), on the other hand, the parallelism is synonymous, and the quatrain (or double couplet) is the form mainly used. In Sect. V, a (ch. 30) the parallelism is synonymous, but there is a tendency to overstep the bounds of the quatrain and make use of three or even more couplets to express the complete thought. In Sect. V, b and c (ch. 31), the synonymous quatrain is the standard form. When we pass now to Sect. I (1<sup>7-9 18</sup>), we have, instead of aphorisms consisting of single or double couplets, a more extended treatment of separate themes, e.g., 1<sup>8-19</sup>, a warning against keeping company with sinners; 1<sup>20-33</sup>, wisdom's call or appeal, etc. Further, all the separate discourses in Sect. I deal with some aspect of the common subject 'wisdom,' and are pervaded by a peculiar hortatory tone ('my son'), which reminds one of portions of Dt. It is the tone of the teacher, urging his pupil to listen and heed his instruction. This section is, therefore, more of a unity than any other part of the book.

From the point of view of literary character the proverbs in Sect. II must be pronounced the most perfect. These are not mere popular sayings, but products of fine literary workmanship. In fact, there are no ordinary popular proverbial utterances, such as might be picked up in the marketplace, in Pr. What we have to do with here is the choicest product of the Wisdom schools and presupposes long training and practise before such art could be brought to the degree of perfection we see exhibited in Pr. In point of perfection, the proverbs in Sect. IV are only a little inferior to those of Sect. II. Comparison will show that, in the main, these proverbs are somewhat less polished and sententious, and a little more clumsy than those in Sect. II. In Sect. I the pure 'proverb' form is deserted, and the couplet is made use of only to do service in a more extended form of discourse which might better be classed as poetry.

5. Authorship and Date. From the foregoing facts certain general conclusions may be drawn as to the authorship and date of Pr. It is evident that the book is not a unity, but rather a compilation of material of varied character, some of which was found at hand by the compiler, in the form of collections already furnished with captions of their own (Sects. II, III, a, III, b, and IV). Two of these sections are entitled 'The proverbs of Solomon' (II and IV). The title of the book (1<sup>1</sup>) is probably only a convenient designation by a late editor in view of the position assigned to Solomon in Israelitic tradition as the most brilliant of Israel's wise men. In view of the well-attested character of this tradition (I K 4<sup>29 ff.</sup>, 10<sup>1</sup>), it is undeniable that some of Solomon's proverbs may be found in Sects. II and IV. But the Solomonic authorship of either of these two collections is out of the question. The whole background, religious, ethical, social, and political, presupposed in these collections, taken as a whole, belongs to an age much later than that of Solomon. The same observation is true in even greater measure of the other parts of the book (Sects. I, III, and V). On the other hand, it does not seem necessary to come down to a late postexilic date for Sects. II and IV—undoubtedly the earliest portions of the book. The main arguments relied upon by Toy—for example, the monotheism, the absence of nationalism, the picture of social life, the philosophical conceptions, and the relation to the other Wisdom books of the Jews—apply either only to the book in its present final form or to the other sections (I, III, and V), and are more than counterbalanced by other considerations, especially by the fact that the argument from silence tells equally well against as for a postexilic date for these two sections. The references to the king, the absence of all references to the predominantly priestly, legalistic, type of life of later Judaism, the earnest moral tone—all these point just as significantly to the last century or two of the preexilic period (cf. Kittel). Which of these two collections is the earlier is now impossible to determine. Most scholars consider the perfect finished form of the proverbs of Sect. II an evidence of earlier date, but Davidson argues, on the contrary, that the less finished proverbs of Sect. IV are the older. Who the author or authors of these two most ancient collections were is, of course, unknown. All that can be said is that they are the product of the Wisdom schools (see WISDOM, WISE MEN). The other sections of the book are undoubtedly later than II and IV, all of course also emanating from the circle of 'wise men.' Apart from the Introduction, Sect. I is the latest part of the book and is probably to be dated in the early part of the Greek period or in the latter part of the Persian, i.e., between 350 and 250 B.C.

6. Purpose and Teaching of Pr. The purpose of the whole compilation is set forth with sufficient clearness in the Introduction (1 1-6); to impart the knowledge of 'wisdom,' 'instruction,' the understanding of the words of 'the wise,' to give to the young man 'knowledge and discretion,' etc. The purpose was practical, i.e., moral and religious rather than speculative. Pr was thus intended to serve as a book of practical morality in which the purely ethical is not definitely distinguished from the religious. The fundamental note of wisdom is 'the fear of Jehovah' (17, 9 10, 15 33). The theology of the book throughout is a pure, simple monotheism. There is little reference to existing religious institutions, and yet a strong religious tone pervades the book. There is no irreverence, no atheism or even skepticism. A sincere belief in God and in His wise and just government is everywhere manifest. The ethical principles of Pr might be called to-day utilitarian. But this is only because there was no clear or generally accepted view of the future life. The old eschatology, in which Sheol is simply the final gathering-place of the dead, where existence is only of a negative sort, was still regnant. The reward of good conduct is a truly happy and prosperous life, and that of evil conduct is disaster. Honesty, truthfulness, prudence, temperance, justice, generosity and pity, self-control, industry, humility, purity and chastity—such are the virtues extolled and emphasized in Pr as the marks of the truly wise man. He who neglects these things and practises their opposites is a 'fool.' The ideal of family life is high. Faithfulness in the marriage relation and obedience to parents are urged with great earnestness. The description of the capable housewife in 31 10-31 is a classic. In all this it is the individual, not the mass or the nation, as so commonly in the Law and the Prophets, who is addressed, and it is individual, not public or national, ethics (and religion) with which Pr is concerned.

Of philosophy, in the Greek sense, there is nothing in Pr. Only in ch. 8 is there an approach to a philosophical line of thought. Here 'wisdom' is almost personified and viewed as the universal principle of creation, but the thought is not worked up into a definite theory.

In Pr we have what may be called the practical application of the lofty teachings of prophecy and the formal righteousness of the Law to the every-day life of the individual. The ethical elevation of the Prophets is not reached in Pr, but these practical deductions by the wise men, the teachers of Israel's youth, must have been of the greatest service to religion and morality. The finer Christian virtues of the N T are not to be found in Pr, but this was due mainly to the limitations of the age to which the book belongs. See also WISDOM, WISE MEN.

LITERATURE: The general character of the book is well set forth by Toy in Enc. Brit. and EB, and Nowack in HDB, all s.v. Proverbs. See also Driver in LOT, and Kittel in PRE<sup>3</sup>, vol. xviii (1906); Cheyne, Job and Solomon (1887); Kent, The Wise Men of Ancient Israel (1895); Davison, The Wisdom Lit. of the O T (1894); Toy, ICC (1899, very thorough); Perowne, in Camb. Bible; G. C. Martin, in New Cent. Bible (1908). E. E. N.

PROVINCE (ἐπαρχία): One of the main divisions of the Roman Empire (Ac 23 34, 25 1). Augustus in 27 B.C. divided the administration of the provinces between the Senate and himself, assigning to the former those undisturbed by war or acute difficulties; so that, under changing circumstances, from time to time provinces were transferred from one jurisdiction to the other. Over the senatorial provinces governors of consular rank in Africa and Asia (of pretorian rank elsewhere), called proconsuls, were appointed, and enjoyed great dignity though little power, as they had no military control. Over the imperial provinces the emperor, at his pleasure, appointed his own imperial legates of consular rank where the military necessities of the provinces were large (of pretorian rank where they were smaller). These legates also directed judicial affairs, holding the power of the sword, and procurators under them were responsible for finance. When a district was subject to unusual disturbances, it might be placed under a procurator who was only partially subordinate to the legate of his province, but had a separate military command and could try even Roman citizens, except when they appealed to Cæsar. Such was the relation of Judea to Syria in 6-41 and 44-66 A.D. Not only in Judea, but in the great cities of Egypt and Asia Minor, the Jews were allowed exceptional privileges under their own laws. On the whole, the provinces were well governed.

PROVOKE: The rendering in most instances of κα'αs, to be angry, or irritated, especially of man's sinful conduct as arousing the Divine anger. The verb nā'ats, 'to despise,' is so rendered in AV of Nu 14 11, 23, 16 30; Dt 31 20; Is 1 4 (cf. RV). Provocation (He 3 8, 15) is a quotation of Ps 95 8, where the Heb. m'ribhāh refers to the incident recorded in Ex 17 7 (cf. Nu 20 13). E. E. N.

PRUDENCE, PRUDENT: These words (in AV) render terms from four Heb. and two Gr. roots: (1) bīn, 'to understand' (Jer 49 7, Qal. ptepl.; Is 10 13, Niph. ptepl., 'understanding' RV; Is 16 18, Hiph. ptepl., 'skilful' RVmg.; Pr 16 21, 18 15; Is 5 21, 29 14; Hos 14 9 [10]). (2) 'ārōm (Pr 19 25, 'beware' AV, 'learn prudence' RV), and derivatives; noun 'ormāh (Pr 1 4, 'subtlety' AV 8 12, 8 5 'wisdom' AV); adj. 'ārūm, 'to be crafty,' 'shrewd,' always in Pr in good sense of intellectual sobriety and acuteness (Pr 12 16, 23, 13 16, 14 8, 15, 18, 22 3, 27 12). (3) sēkhel, sekhel, 'insight,' 'discretion' (II Ch 2 12 [11], 'discretion' RV), and the derived verb sākhā, Niph. ptepl., 'one who acts circumspectly' (Pr 19 14; Am 5 13), Niph. fut. (Is 52 13, 'deal wisely' RV). (4) qōṣēm, 'diviner' as in RV (Is 3 2). (5) φρόνησις, 'understanding,' joined with σοφία (Eph 1 8). (6) σοφός (LXX. for Heb. nābhōn), 'intelligent,' 'having understanding' (Mt 11 25 = Lk 10 21; Ac 13 7; I Co 1 19 from Is 29 14). C. S. T.

PRUNING-HOOK. See VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1.

PSALMS, BOOK OF: 1. Canonical Place and Traditional Title. The Book of Psalms is the chief extant collection of the national and religious poetry of Israel. In the Heb. O T it is the longest, usually the first and certainly the leading book in the Hagiographa or third division of the Canon. Its traditional title in Hebrew is 'Praises' (ṭhillīm) and in the LXX. and the N T, 'Psalms' (ψαλμοί), and both Hebrew and Greek thought further connected it with David (τῶ τοῦ Δαυὶδ, II Mac 2 13; Ac 2 25, 4 25, etc.), whence came the title 'Psalms of David' in the Latin, older English and other versions. The collective term 'Psalter' is from the Cod. Alex. of the LXX (ψαλτήριον, properly the name of a musical instrument).

2. Number of Poems and Division into Books. In both the Hebrew and the LXX. the book consists of 150 poems, but the numbering in the LXX. differs from that in the Heb. text (Pss 9-10 and 114-115 being united and 116 and 147 each divided—besides an appended Ps 151). It is to be noted that there are some duplicates (as 14=53; 40 13-17=70; 57 7-11+60 6-12=108, etc.), that some poems are more or less divisible (18, 19, 22, 24, 89, 144, etc.), and that many Psalm-like poems in the O T might be added (as from Ex 15, I S 2, Is 12 and 38, La 1-5, Jon 2, Hab 3, etc.). The collection is laid out in five 'books,' namely, I, 1-41; II, 42-72; III, 73-89; IV, 90-106; V, 107-150, the ends of the first four being marked by special doxologies (41 13, 72 18-19, 89 52, 106 48). At the foot of Book II there is also the note, 'The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.' This division into books is probably connected in some way with the growth and gradual arrangement of the collection. The total number of poems included may have some relation to a scheme of stated readings in synagog services.

3. The Captions or Titles of the Poems. Most of the poems have captions or titles of some sort, which, together with a few other interjected terms, are clearly not integral parts of the poems themselves (tho so treated in the Heb. text), but editorial notes or rubrics. Their date and origin are unknown, but at least a considerable time before the LXX. translation was made. They belong to several different classes. Some seem to designate to what species the poem belongs, especially shīr='song' (30 times, in Ps 45 with 'of loves' added and in Pss 120-134 with 'of ascents' added); mizmōr, a more technical term for a religious 'psalm' (57 times, 13 of which are with shīr); maskīl, maschil, usually taken to mean an instructive or meditative ode (13 times, once with shīr, once with ṭhillāh and once with both shīr and mizmōr); mikhtām, michtam, which may mean something highly valued (6 times and also perhaps in Is 38 9, once with 'to teach' added); ṭhillāh='prayer' (5 times); ṭhillāh='praise' (once); and shiggāyon (also in pl. shighyōnōth, shigionoth, in Hab 3 1), perhaps a dithyramb (once). [It should be noted that as regards these terms and other points in the captions the LXX. implies a text not exactly like the Heb. that we have.] Tho the contents of the poems do not clearly justify the above interpretations, the terms at least mark dividing-lines between the poems and suggest that the collection is made up of pieces of varied character. It may be that maskīl and mikhtām refer to some liturgical or pedagogic application, now unknown. In this case they belong with certain marks of intended use, like 'to teach' in Ps 60, 'to remind' in Pss 38 and 70 (possibly connected with the incense-offering), 'for the tōdhāh' in Ps 100 (usually translated 'thanksgiving' or 'thank-offering'), 'for singing' in Ps 88, 'for the Dedication of the House' in Ps 30 and 'for Sabbath' in Ps 92. The LXX. adds other such rubrics, for example assigning Pss 24, 48, 94 and 93 to the first, second, fourth and sixth days of the week respectively. The expression 'For the Supervisor' (or 'Chief Musician') occurs 55 times (all but three in Books I, II and III), possibly in each case applying to the preceding rather than the following Psalm (so Thirtle). In 26 cases words are added that are supposed to refer either to melodies to be used or to some general method of musical rendering (for all these see under MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 6).

What seem to be attributions of authorship occur in the captions of 101 poems, David being named in 73 cases (Pss 3-9, 11-32, 34-41, 51-65, 68-70, 86, 101, 103, 108-110, 122, 124, 131, 133, 138-145), Asaph in 12 (Pss 50, 73-83), the Korahites in 11 (Pss 42, 44-49, 84-85, 87-88), Solomon in 2 (Pss 72, 127), Moses, Ethan and Heman in 1 each (Pss 90, 89 and 88, the last also being in the Korahite list), and 'the afflicted' in Ps 102. Of the 49 anonymous or 'orphan' poems the LXX. gives 12 to David (Pss 43, 67, 91, 93-99, 137, but the last also to Jeremiah), 4 to Haggai and Zechariah (Pss 138, 146-148, but the first also to David) and 1 to the sons of Jonadab (Ps 71), besides some variations from the Heb. in other cases. The matter is further complicated by variations in the versions and in the Talmud, the latter assigning poems to Adam (Ps 92, 139), Melchizedek (Ps 110), Abraham (Ps 89), etc. The Hebrew preposition before the names is regularly -l, which need not mean 'by' as of an author, but only 'associated with' as of some other traditional connection. Hebrew thought undoubtedly took it as a mark of authorship, and thus it has been generally received since. This view is strengthened by the fact that Pss 3, 7, 18, 34, 51, 52, 54, 56, 57, 59, 60, 63, 102, 142 have notes naming the historical occasion concerning which the poem was prepared or used, all but one of these (Ps 102) being connected with the story of David in Samuel. The most striking of these is Ps 18, where both caption and poem duplicate II S 22 in full, tho with much verbal variation. Since this latter chapter is an appendix rather than a part of the history proper, this correspondence establishes little except that readings from the histories and poems related to them appear to have often been combined—a fact illustrated by the existence of several such poems in situ in the histories, tho not repeated in the Psalter.

4. Critical Value of the Captions. If the captions are taken as direct statements of authorship and even of historical occasion, from them must proceed the critical view of the Psalter as a whole and the interpretation of its several poems. This was not uncommon in the older commentation. But this hypothesis encounters so many difficulties that it is now almost universally given up. The general belief is that the captions afford valuable means of identifying collections antecedent to the present Psalter, literary sources out of which it was built up. Thus, especially as regards the 'Davidic,' the 'Korahite,' and the 'Asaphic' poems, their appearance in almost continuous series or blocks seems to imply that they had previously been collected. Of this the colophon in 72 20 is a strong corroboration, tho its exact placing is a cause of discussion. The hypothesis of antecedent manuals accounts for doublets like 14=53, especially in conjunction with the remarkable fact that 42-83 is mainly Elohistic in its use of the divine names, while all the rest of the collection is mainly Jahvistic. Book IV mostly consists of a series of ritual songs of such related quality that they may well have formed one of the prior collections (this series includes Ps 107). In Book V there are the two groups known as 'Hallels' (Pss 113-118 and 146-150) and also the series entitled Songs of Degrees or Ascents (Pss 120-134), which may have been used by pilgrims 'going up' to Jerusalem at the annual feasts or songs sung ritually on one of the stairways in or near the Temple. The general hypothesis of 'psalters within or before the Psalter'—here only merely sketched—accords with many phenomena in the poems themselves as well as in the captions. But it is not easy to work out in detail, especially as we can only guess how much original material has been left out in editing and how far what is retained has been reworked to fit new conditions. It is not strange that different conclusions are reached as to the sequence and genesis of each single element. Briggs, for example (in ICC, 1906-07), sets up a complicated scheme of successive source books; the salient feature of Elohism in Pss 42-83 he attributes to late editors working in Babylonia. J. P. Peters, on the other hand (in his The Psalms as Liturgies, 1922), argues ingeniously that the Elohistic section originated four or five centuries earlier in the Northern Kingdom for use at the sanctuaries of Dan, Shechem, Bethel, etc., but was later remodeled for use at Jerusalem.

5. Selah. The term selāh is of unknown meaning. It occurs 71 times in the Heb. Psalter, all in Books I-III, except Pss 140 and 143) and thrice in Hab 3—always at the end of a verse except in Pss 55 19, 57 3; Hab 3 3, 9, usually after an obvious passage or section, rarely at the end of poem (Ps 3, 9, 24, 46, tho not in the LXX, except with 9, which is there grouped with 10). In Ps 9 16 it is preceded by 'Higgaion.' The interpretations of it vary widely. The LXX renders it by διαψαλμα, 'break' or 'transition,' but the Targum, the Gr. versions and early patristic writers (like Jerome) by ael, semper, elc τῶς, elc τοῦς αἰῶνας, etc., 'always' or 'forever.' The Heb. form may come from a root meaning 'to lift up,' whence the modern conjecture that it is a rubric calling for a fresh outburst of voices or instruments. But, on the other hand, from its placing in the poems it has also been regarded as a sign for a pause or silence. Some have further questioned whether it may not be an abbreviation for an unknown expression. At all event it is not an essential part of the poems in which it occurs.<sup>1</sup>

6. Poetic Form. In their poetic form the Psalms present features like those of other poetical books and the detached poems in the O T. These include a marked tendency in a given poem or passage to use lines of about equal length and with the same number of strong accents, many striking cases of assonance and alliteration (but not rime) and a remarkable parallelism between small groups of lines, worked out according to several distinct plans. The prevailing verse is the couplet or distich, but monostichs are not uncommon at the opening of poems, and tristichs are also frequent. The Heb. text comes to us with a careful system of added marks or accents (as also in Job and Proverbs), probably indicating a traditional mode of cantillation, tho just how and from what period, is not known. Refrains, marking a stanza-structure, occur obviously in Pss 42-43, 46, 49, 57, 80, 107, etc., with many less evident cases. Many other poems fall into somewhat equal sections (such as Ps 50, 148, etc.). The obscure term selāh may be a sign of similar divisions (see above). Several poems are alphabetic or acrostic in some way, as by lines (Pss 111, 112), by verses (Pss 25, 34, 145), by double verses (Pss 9-10, 37—the former very imperfect), or by groups of eight verses, each beginning with the same letter (Ps 119). Most of these have a more or less didactic quality (except Ps 145), and the plan was probably to aid memorization. As a whole, the Psalter poetry, like that elsewhere in the O T, is decidedly finished and artistic in expression, implying practised skill in both writers and editors. (It should be noted, however, that the actual text that we have is in individual passages confused, difficult and probably corrupt.)

7. Notable Groups of Poems. While fully recognizing the really extraordinary individuality of the great majority of the poems, the attentive and sympathetic student early begins to note that many of them fall into groups or classes, each marked by some strong likeness in topic, spirit or manner. These groups are only partially coincident with the mechanical groups indicated by the captions. When analysis is carried down into separating single poems into their constituent parts and allowing for the probability that such poems as these are often decidedly composite, the actual distribution of certain distinct strains of expression proves to be intricate and even perplexing. More and more, however, the study of the facts of this nature proves important as bringing into view several types of sentiment and embodiment that appear to be well recognized and in vogue, so as to have acquired a somewhat established phraseology and manner. Some of them prove to have striking similarities with other parts of the O T, especially with prophecies like Isaiah, Jeremiah, and certain minor books, with the Wisdom literature and with certain parts or aspects of the histories.

Thus many poems have a meditative or monitory cast, such as Pss 1, 8 (which completes the picture of the Creation as given in 104), 15, 19, 24a, 33, 34, 37, 49, 50, 90, 111, 112, 119, 139, etc. There are several historical poems, either recounting ancient facts, as in Pss 18, 78, 89 (where vs. 19-37 curiously supplement Ps 78), 105, 106, 132, 135, 136 and several passages elsewhere, or dwelling on certain events, chiefly catastrophes, that seem nearer at hand, as in Pss 46, 48, 76, 83 (on the jubilant side), and Pss 44, 74, 79, 89 38-51, 137, etc. on the despondent side). The historic persons named range only from Melchizedek and Abraham down to David, and, of the tribes, Judah, Ephraim and Manasseh (or 'Joseph' collectively) are those chiefly mentioned, with slight references to four more. Of places, regions and countries, Jerusalem and 'the Land' are repeatedly named, while Pss 83 and 137, with some scattered passages, supply a few more references. The so called 'royal' Psalms, mentioning David, a 'king' or 'the anointed' (Pss 2, 18, 20, 21, 45, 61, 63, 72, 89, 110, 132), are linked together by repeated expressions that imply a rather settled tradition of thought in which are blended the personality of David, the ideal of the Theocracy and the national self-consciousness (apparently personified as 'David'). These are often called 'Messianic' in some distinct sense. The Temple is mentioned or clearly implied in at least one out of three poems and may be conjectured in many more; and these references are widely distributed. Songs of an evidently liturgical or ritual quality abound, with many short passages of like tone, especially in the last two books (but note also Pss 20, 24b, 47, 65a, 67, 84, etc.), usually embodying adoration and thanksgiving. Altho these contain surprisingly few vivid references to the ritual of sacrifice (which is elsewhere mentioned or implied to a limited extent), they are naturally associated with that ritual. The recent contention of Peters (op. cit.) that all the poems are to be regarded as specific rituals for sacrifices seems on the whole much overdrawn. Very conspicuous are the poems made up chiefly of outcries under great adversity or oburgations against 'enemies' or 'the wicked.' These constitute what is usually called the 'imprecatory' aspect of the Psalter. Of the many whole Psalms in this class some are particularly intense in what seems to be a personal reaction (such as Pss 35, 41, 109), while others evidently have to do with national conditions. The frequent recurrence of tones of suffering, indignation and sometimes despair arrests attention and provokes inquiry. In many cases (as in Pss 12, 37, 69, 88, etc.), two classes seem sharply contrasted—on the one side the 'godly,' 'righteous,' 'poor,' and 'needy,' on the other the 'wicked,' 'violent' or some similar expression, as if a local community were divided into moral factions.

8. Are 'I' and 'Me' Personal or Collective? Throughout the collection the pronouns and verbs vary irregularly between singular and plural, sometimes in adjacent verses, sometimes by sections, sometimes as between whole poems. There has been much debate whether the singulars refer to the individual author or stand for the nation or its common consciousness by a sort of personification. Opinions differ widely as to given cases, tho the critical tendency is now to think that the notions and experiences are more often collective than purely personal. This view is strengthened by the frequency of conventional phrases and trains of thought.

9. The Critical Problem in General. The critical problem of the Psalms is exceedingly intricate and difficult. The main questions are evidently as to their origin and date, as to the method and motive of their collection and as to the interpretation consequently to be put upon the book as a whole and upon individual poems. Certain primary factors in the problem are hard to define and appraise, such as, for example, (a) the stages of development in Hebrew poetry in general, (b) the extent and nature of psalmody in the first and second Temples respectively, (c) the historic background, personal or national, for the strongly plaintive or 'imprecatory' tone running through the Psalter, and (d) the question of priority as between the Psalms and other parts of the O T in cases where quotation one way or the other seems to have been made. No summary can here be given of the varying views of commentators on these or other factors or even touch on all sides of the problem. Some of the great diversities of criticism are due to a failure to allow for the probability of compositeness in the book and in its parts. The collection is surely not a homogeneous unit, neither are its constituent 'books' nor its apparently serial groups. Some at least, perhaps a majority, of its poems are themselves only editorial or traditional units. Wherever a poem or a group of poems is composite, conflicting views about it are inevitable. So a closer scrutiny is desirable to discover whether the text indicates that materials of different texture and intention have been combined. In this mere subjective feeling on the critic's part is not a safe guide, though it may help after objective lexical and logical analysis has been applied. The following compressed statement is naturally influenced by the present writer's efforts to pursue such analysis.<sup>2</sup>

10. Origin and Date. The various periods to which the composition of the Psalms has been assigned range through eight or more centuries—from the time of David (about 1000 B.C.) to that of the Maccabees (from 167 B.C.), or even considerably later. Using the supposed evidence of the captions, on the one hand, it has been held that all or most of the poems were written by David or his more immediate successors. On the other hand, it is now not uncommon to find all or most of them placed late in the postexilic period, if not wholly in the Maccabean time and its sequels. Neither of these extreme views seems tenable in the face of the evidence.

An important critical fact is that running through the collection are three prominent strains of expression, each fairly distinct in diction and range of thought and sentiment. These may be named the plaintive, the liturgical, and the didactic. The plaintive material is marked by some tone of gloom, repining, protest, or denunciation, with passionate entreaty for the intervention of God's justice and power. The mind of the writers is in a state of stress, almost of agony. The liturgical material, per contra, is jubilant, confident and praiseful, resting on the mighty and merciful attributes of God, tho sometimes with a rather ceremonious and conventional type of expression, combining assertion with direct prayer and praise. The didactic material is reflective, retrospective or hortatory, dealing sometimes with general problems of existence, sometimes with facts in past history, sometimes with every-day affairs, all from the viewpoint of an observer or teacher. In general, the plaintive material may suggest the prophetic habit of mind, the liturgical that of the priest, and the didactic that of the wise man or scribe. In the first and third sets of passages are found the clearest parallelisms with other O T books, in each case rousing the query whether such books were not in use. Some of the plaintive matter (that pertaining to national disaster) seems to be earlier than that of the other classes, while other plaintive matter seems subsequent. Many cases occur where such matter has been reworked, as if to rectify its pessimism or adapt it for continued use after its original occasion had disappeared. It is fairly clear that the intention of the completed collection was both didactic and liturgical, making it a religious manual with more than one aspect. In addition, attention is due to any poems and passages as do not fall readily into the above three categories, but are either vestiges of an older time or fresh products of other impulses. Such unclassified matter constitutes a fourth topic for study.

Regarding all these, a working hypothesis is needed that shall harmonize the data in the Psalter with the general progress of Hebrew history. If part of the plaintive material is somewhat primary, the earliest national situation available is that of the Exile (after 586 B.C.), while the troubles of the restored nation, a century or more later, favored the retention of this and also further additions, especially as communal and partizan antagonisms developed. The liturgical style is naturally associated with the restored Temple (after 516 B.C.), in whose services psalmody was probably far more conspicuous than in the Temple of the monarchy. It is here that traces of ritual influences from Babylonia are most likely to be found. As to the didactic material, something depends on the obscure question of the relation of the Psalms to other O T books. If Jeremiah, for instance, quotes from them, they must precede his time so far as given passages go. If, on the other hand, certain Psalms presuppose the completed Pentateuch, such poems must be postexilic. It is hard to see what direct connection the strongly didactic poems have with the Temple system. They suggest rather that discursive and pedagogic interest which was ultimately concentrated in the institution of the Synagog. They supply matter for instruction through personal memorization (like Proverbs). How early such writing began is not clear, but it was prominent after the Exile. The unclassified material probably is of several kinds. Some of it may well be preexilic, especially where akin to the fresh and strong odes still extant in the histories. But much of it may come from poets in much later times who stepped aside from the beaten track of sentiment and style. Room should be freely left for poems or passages from as early as the time of David, but the difficulty of identifying such is serious.

If the Psalms be thus regarded as a gradual literary growth, mostly in the Exile and afterward, we must further inquire for the popular need and the definite sphere of use that shall account for their formal preservation and final acceptance as Scripture. As already said, some psalmody may have had place in the first Temple, especially as it became the center of the whole nation. But it is in conditions of the Exile that attempts at religious assembly of another sort gave occasion for using songs of plaintive outcry and petition. After the Return services at the Temple offered place for ceremonious liturgical song, supplemented by any less formal gatherings outside. As such gatherings for edification and catechetical effort increased in influence—of which general tendency the weighty fact of the O T is an evidence—psalmody doubtless took a deeper hold on popular affection and its formulas became more fixed. Ultimately, as parties within the community became separated and the gap between the orthodox and the lax, between the 'pious' and the 'wicked' became more evident, fresh growths of poetic expression were natural, including new plaintive songs on the one side and idealistic 'Messianic' songs on the other. In general, this hypothesis leads to regarding Books II-III as representative of the earlier or exilic impulse, Book IV and much of V as illustrative of the Temple interest and Book I (with scattered poems elsewhere) as containing the special sentiments of the rather late time when the collection was completed. This locates the origin of the main contents of the collection between about 575 and about 200 B.C.

11. Editorial Method and Motive. Assuming, as most critics now do, that the present Psalter was compiled out of prior collections, the date of the final editing must, of course, have been before the LXX. translation of the Hagiographa was made (here assumed as during the 2d cent. B.C.), but how much before is unknown. Who the editors were and even where they worked is unclear, as also who were those of the earlier books marked with names like

'sons of Korah,' 'Asaph,' 'David,' etc. Many features in the prior collections may have been modified or obliterated. But enough remains to lead us to infer that they were service-books for the Temple and for other places of religious assembly. The final motive is often said to be to make a Temple hymn-book. But this seems not broad enough, since there is so much that is inconsistent with all we know of Temple services and since this latter material is pushed into prominence. The musical directions in some of the captions, it is true, seem to indicate Temple usages, but the transfer of these to the developing Synagog is not hard to conceive. Other points in the captions, as well as much in the poems, embody that exaltation of Scripture which became a strong characteristic of the synagog system.

Various studies have been made to show why the poems were arranged in their present order. Verbal correspondences may have played some part in certain cases, but other cases imply an intentional contrast in topic or spirit. It seems likely that at certain points the editors sought to temper or offset extreme expressions by more moderate ones. The aim seems to have been to preserve what had become traditional, with only that amplification or rectification needed to fit it for constant and general use. This applies notably to the cases where plaintive poems are supplied with liturgical endings, openings or refrains. The general success of the editorial process is shown by the ready way in which the Psalms have passed over into Christian usage in translation or paraphrase as standard formulas for prayer, praise and devout meditation.

12. Interpretation and Significance. It follows from this line of thought that the high value of the Psalter lies in its light upon Hebrew religious convictions and sentiments as held in experience and expressed in public and private devotion. This light falls chiefly upon the period following the Exile, when the work of the greater prophets had been wrought and after the discipline of the Exile had been undergone. But it is helpful also as to earlier times, since the national consciousness is unbroken in its development. The Psalter brings some evidence of the infiltration of religious ideas from both Babylonia and Persia, but the main substance of its faith and hope is its own.

Since the book is a miscellany, its contents need to be used with discrimination, all parts of it not being equally significant and many poems requiring comparison with others of the same class for due elucidation. An instance of a striking difference in texture is found in Ps 112, which is a singular effort to duplicate Ps 111. A group that calls for much comparative consideration is that of the so called 'royal' psalms, which are best handled with some conception of the ideal Israel as the center. Throughout the book are terms and phrases which in Christian application has acquired a special and even technical sense. The meaning of these, and hence the massive import of the poems in which they occur, can be made sure only by comparison of passages both within the Psalter and somewhat outside. Under such thoughtful study, however, the book as a whole pre-

PULSE: (1) The incorrect rendering of the adj. qālā (from qālāh, 'to roast' or 'parch'), meaning 'roasted' or 'parched grain' (II S 17 23, where the repetition of the word is probably a scribe's blunder). (2) In Dn 1 12, 16, the Heb. zērō'im or zērō'nīm means 'that which grows as a result of sowing [the seed]' and consequently 'pulse' is too restricted in meaning. Vegetable food in general is meant.

PURAH, piū'ra (פֻּרָא, pūrah, Phurah AV): The servant of Gideon (Jg 7 10).

PURE, PURITY, PURIFICATION: 1. Usage of Terms. The ideas of cleanness and uncleanness (purity and impurity) are expressed in the Bible through a series of synonymous terms only vaguely distinguishable from one another. (1) The commonest of these are the contrasted tāhōr, 'clean,' 'pure,' and tāmē, 'unclean,' 'impure,' with their N T equivalents καθαρός and ἀκάθαρτος. Other terms are (2) bārār, with more direct reference to physical cleanness (Ps 18 26). (3) zakh, with reference to freedom from mixture with foreign substances (Ex 27 20; Lv 24, 7; Ex 30 20). (4) hāmūts, 'salted' (Is 30 24 'clean' AV, 'savory' RV). (5) hāsaph, 'stripped' (Jl 1 7). (6) nāqī, with reference to moral innocence (Ex 23 7; Ps 24 4). (7) ἄνθός, 'innocent,' 'spotless' (II Co 7 11; I Ti 5 22).

2. Cleanliness. Bodily cleanliness, as in itself a desirable and enjoyable condition, was prized in Bible lands as elsewhere. The Egyptian priests bathed their bodies in cold water twice every day and twice every night (Herod. II, 27). That it was not a mere priestly custom appears from the incident of Pharaoh's daughter bathing in the Nile (Ex 2 5). The custom of bathing in public was, however, introduced late among the Jews, and public baths were first built in imitation of the Greeks and Romans (I Mac 1 14). In the earlier period there is no mention of any special arrangement known under the name of bath. Bathing (rāhats, also shāṭaph in I K 22 38) in the O T is the washing of the body for ceremonial purposes (Lv 15 5 ff.; cf. also Jn 13 10).

3. Cleanness as Fitness to Come Before God. But cleanness was regarded as something more than bodily cleanliness. The latter was a part of the former, and the former was governed by the religious motive of acceptability before God. To be clean was, in this sense, to have everything removed from one's appearance or constitution which would bar the way to the free approach into the presence of God. One was clean or unclean as he conformed or failed to conform to certain requirements which were religiously or ceremonially prescribed.

was made the basis of a system of ablutions before meals; and one who did not conform to this provision ate with unwashed—that is, common—hands (defiled, Mk 7 2 RV). But even this was not thought sufficient, for to wash after the meal was also required. To provide for the successful or beneficial carrying out of this requirement it became necessary, in houses where feasts were to be held, to have water-pots with water for the guests to use in these ablutions (Jn 27); and further to secure against danger of defilement in any other way a system of washing of cups and pots and brazen vessels was devised (He 9 9 f.; Mk 7 4).

8. Importance of the Ceremonial. How large the importance of the question of purity and purification had become is shown by the fact that a new teacher's standing was apt to be gaged by his attitude to the matter. The disciples of John were challenged by the faithful Jews to explain their master's teaching on this question (Jn 3 25). (On the refinements devised and observed in later Judaism see Schürer, HJP, II, ii, pp. 106-111; Edersheim, Life of Jesus the Messiah II, 10.) It is worth noticing that among the things which rendered unclean was the use of canonical or sacred books. It was a question, for instance, whether the Song of Solomon rendered unclean. Those who believed in its canonicity said it did; those who did not, took the opposite ground.

9. Jesus' Attitude. Jesus' attitude toward this elaboration was that of the prophetic reformer, who drives back to the ethical root of the system. His teaching does away with ceremonial impurity altogether. Cleanness and uncleanness inhere in moral attitudes and relations, not in physical contacts (Mk 7 1-23 and ||s).

10. Unclean Land. But uncleanness might be contracted by a whole country. (1) In the case of a murder which remained unpunished (Dt 21 1-9) as no expiation could be made for the land except by the death of the murderer (Nu 35 33). (2) Through immorality (Jer 3 1). (3) Through idolatry (Jer 27 16, 3 2; Hos 6 10). Foreign countries were unclean because of the false gods worshiped in them (Am 7 17). The food eaten in foreign countries was, therefore, also unclean (Hos 9 3 f.; Ezk 4 13). This is what made the Exile such a fearful visitation of wrath to the Israelite (Is 26 19). Profanation of holy ground was liable to take place when aliens trod it (Ezk 44 7, 9, pollute AV, Ac 21 28), and, in fact, all alliances and compromises with idolatry are occasions of profanation (Ezk 36 18).

11. Modes of Purification. Purification was a restoration of the privilege of approach to the altar. It involved incidentally freedom of participation in the functions of social life. The process by which it was secured varied according to the kind and degree of uncleanness contracted. Simple and general purification was secured through the bathing of the body and of the clothes of the person purified (Lv 15 8, 10, 11). These were then put on again at the end of the day. This was all that was required in cases of uncleanness contracted with a person having an issue or by contact with anything rendered unclean by such a person (Lv 15 5-11).

12. Special Ritual. For purification from uncleanness of a severer kind, special rituals were devised.

(1) The simplest of these was that for cleansing from an issue (Lv 15 19). In this case uncleanness lasted seven days. At the end of that time, by washing the body and the clothing in running water, uncleanness was removed; but on the eighth day the person must appear before the priest with two turtle-doves or young pigeons and offer one for a sin-offering and the other for a burnt-offering. (2) In cases of child-birth cleansing depended first of all on the sex of the new-born infant. (a) If this were a man child, the period of uncleanness was fixed at seven days (Lv 12 2). A period of thirty-three days following was known as 'the days of purification,' during which the mother was not allowed access to the Sanctuary, nor could she touch anything hallowed lest she defile it. At the end of the days of purification, she presented a lamb as a sacrifice and in cases of extreme poverty a pair of turtle-doves or young pigeons (Lv 12 8; Lk 2 24). (b) For a daughter the duration of both the days of uncleanness and of purification were doubled. Otherwise the ritual was the same. (3) In case of leprosy the time of purification was fixed at seven days. It was inaugurated by the presentation of the person healed with two clean birds at the gate of the city (he having previously lived in separation outside). The priest killed one of the birds, allowing its blood to flow into a bowl of water. Then he took a bunch of hyssop, dipped it into the bowl and sprinkled the person. Next he released the other bird. The person was then declared clean, shaved his hair and washed his clothes and spent the seven days of his purification still in separation; but on the seventh day, he again washed his clothes and shaved. On the eighth he appeared at the Sanctuary with two male lambs and a female one, or in case of poverty with one lamb and two doves or pigeons, together with a meal-offering, one as a burnt-offering and the other lamb as a trespass-offering. The priests then anointed the person's right ear, right thumb, and right big toe with the blood of the trespass-offering, and with part of the oil; the remainder of the oil he poured on the person's head after making a libation before J'. The man was thus completely pure (Lv ch. 14). (4) Most peculiar of all was the ritual for purification from uncleanness contracted by contact with a corpse. The first step was the selection of a red heifer without blemish, which also had never been put to service by man. This heifer was sacrificed, her body being burned with cedar wood and hyssop and scarlet, and the blood sprinkled toward the Sanctuary. The ashes of the sacrifice were gathered and preserved, and whenever needed, mixed with living water. This water, now called holy water ('water for impurity'), was then sprinkled upon the person defiled, on the third and on the seventh day, and on washing his clothes and his body as in simple purification such a person was pure (Nu ch. 19). (5) The restoration of the Nazirite accidentally made unclean by contact with a corpse was effected by his serving seven days of purification in separation, at the end of which he shaved all his hair. On the eighth he brought two turtle-doves or young pigeons to the door of the sanctuary (one for a burnt-offering, and the other for a sin- and trespass-offering like that offered by the leper on being healed). This closed the ceremony (Nu 6 9-12).

PURGE: This term, in its former broad meaning of 'purify,' 'cleanse,' by removing what is impure, is used correctly for one Gr. and six Heb. words: (1) bārar (Ezk 20 38; Dn 11 35, 'purify' RV); (2) dūah (Is 4 4); (3) zāraq (Mal 3 3, 'refine' RV); (4) hātā, in Pi'el (Ps 51 7, 'purify' RV); (5) tāhēr (II Ch 34 3, 8; Ezk 24 13, 'cleanse' RV); (6) tsārāph (Is 1 25); (7) διακαθαρίζειν (Mt 3 12; Lk 3 17, 'cleanse' RV); εκκαθαίρειν (I Co 5 7; II Ti 2 21); καθαρίζειν (Mk 7 19; He 9 14, 22, 'cleanse' RV); καθαίρειν (Jn 15 2; He 1 3, 'cleanse' RV); καθαρισμός (He 1 3, 'purification' RV; II P 1 9, 'cleansing' RV). 'Purge' is also found in the AV for forms of kāphar, for which the RV has the correct renderings (Ps 65 3 [4], 79 9; Is 6 7, 22 14, 27 9; Ezk 43 20, 26; Pr 16 6; I S 3 14) 'forgive,' 'expiate.'

C. S. T.

PURIM, piū'rim. See ESTHER, § 6; and FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2.

PURPLE: In the Bible the word 'purple' always refers to purple-dyed stuffs (of various kinds), or garments made from them, not to the dye itself. See COLORS, § 2; and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5.

PURSE. See BAG (2); and DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 2.

PUT, put (פוט, pūt, Phut AV, Gn 10 6; Ezk 27 10): One of the four sons of Ham, in the ethnological and geographical table of Gn ch. 10, the others being Cush (Ethiopia), Mizraim (Egypt), and Canaan. Put, together with Lud, furnished mercenaries for the armies of Tyre (Ezk 27 10), of Egypt (Jer 46 9; Ezk 30 5), and of Gog (Ezk 38 5). Their favorite weapon was the bow. Nahum (3 9) groups them with the Lubim, i.e., Libyans, as helpers of No-Amon or Thebes, and in the Genesis table they are grouped with the Egyptians and the Ethiopians. In all the prophetic passages the LXX. supports this view by translating Put 'Libyans,' and many O T commentators accept this identification, which is still further confirmed by the Coptic name (Phaiat) of the W. part of Lower Egypt. Egyptologists (e.g., Müller, Asien u. Europa, ch. vii) deny the correctness of this identification, and regard Put as the Hebrew name of the land of Punt, of the Egyptian inscriptions. This land stretched along the African coast of the Red Sea from the desert E. of Upper Egypt down to Somaliland. From the inscriptions of the 12th, 18th, and 20th dynasties we learn of a lively commercial intercourse between Egypt and Punt. From it the Egyptians imported slaves, monkeys, spices for incense, gold, ivory, ebony, ostrich feathers, and eggs. The inhabitants were partly negroes and partly of Hamitic stock. If this identification be correct, the prophets use 'Put' in a broad sense, to include all Africa E. of Egypt and Ethiopia. For Pul, Is 66 19, read, with LXX., 'Put.'

PUTEOLI, piu-ti'o-lai (Ποσειδών): A Roman seaport N. of Naples. It was founded by Greeks in 512 B.C., and called Dicaearchia; occupied by Rome in 215. It became a Roman colony in 194, and was renamed Puteoli ('fountains,' 'craters') It was the chief commercial city of Italy, in direct touch with the Orient, and had a large Oriental population. It is mentioned but once in the N T (Ac 28 13).

PTHITES, piō'fhait (פִּיֹּתִי, pūthi, Puhites AV): One of the clans inhabiting the region of Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 2 53).

PUTIEL, piō'ti-el (לֵאֲוִיִּם, pūṭi'el): The father of the wife of Aaron's son Eleazar (Ex 6 25).

QUAIL. See PALESTINE, § 25; and FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 10.

QUARRIES (קִרְיֹת, qiryōt, 'graven images,' Jg 3 19, 26, RVmg.): The Heb. term strictly means 'hewn stones.' The region of Gilgal (q.v.), where these 'quarries' were located, was noted for a group of sacred stones, possibly objects of worship, mentioned as a landmark. There is no evidence of a stone quarry in the place (cf. Moore in ICC). In I K 6 7, 'quarry' RV does not correspond to any Hebrew word, but translates the passage according to its sense ('before it was brought away' RVmg.). For quarrying stone among the Hebrews cf. Ben-zinger, Hebr. Arch.<sup>1</sup>, p. 236; and among the Egyptians, Maspero, Dawn of Civilization, p. 383 f.

QUARTER, SECOND. See JERUSALEM, § 36.

QUARTUS, kwēr'tus (Κούαρτος): A Christian whom Paul associates with himself in salutations to the Roman Church (Ro 16 23). Mentioned in the same verse with Erastus, 'treasurer of the city,' he is designated simply as a 'brother.'

J. M. T.

QUATERNION, kwā-ter'ni-on, from Vulg. quaternio (Gr. τετραδίων, 'a squad of four'): A division of soldiers, consisting of four men, usually assigned to the guarding of prisoners. Four quaternions were placed over Peter at the time of his arrest by Herod (Ac 12 4). One quaternion was on guard at the Crucifixion (Jn 19 23; cf. Ev. Petri 9). The night being divided into four watches, one of the companies would watch while the other three slept through each watch.

J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

QUEEN: The original terms so rendered are: (1) malkāh, m'lekketh fem. of melekh, 'king,' and βασίλισσα; used only of the Queen of Sheba, Vashti, Esther, Belshazzar's mother (?), Candace, and in Song 6 8 f.; Rev 18 7. (2) g'bhārāh, 'mistress'; the title of the queen mother (I K 15 13 ARVmg.; Jer 13 18, etc.), and once of the consort (I K 11 19). (3) shēghāl, 'wife' (Neh 2 6; Ps 45 9). (4) sārāh, 'princess' (Is 49 23; cf. I K 11 3).

The 'queens' of the polygamous Orient were as a rule merely members of an immense royal harem, whose status was somewhat higher and more secure than that of the concubines (Song 6 8; cf. I K 11 1-8). Often, however, a certain wife would enjoy her lord's special favor, and consequently be raised to a position roughly corresponding to that of a modern queen consort (Tahpenes, I K 11 19); Vashti, Est ch. 1; cf. Neh 2 6). This would ordinarily be the first wife married after the king's accession, especially if of noble birth (Pharaoh's daughter, I K 3 1; Jezebel, I K 16 31); but the favorite might be chosen for her beauty (Est 2 7, 17), or because she had given birth to an acceptable heir (so apparently, Bathsheba; cf. I K 2 13). The O T, however, does not apply the title 'queen' to the wife of any living Hebrew monarch.

On the other hand, as in Oriental courts to-day, the king's mother often exercised a most weighty influence (Jer 13 18; cf. II K 24 12; I K 15 13; ?Dn 5 10). Only after Ahab's death was Jezebel called 'queen' (II K 10 13); and it was as queen mother that Athaliah gained the influence which she later used to usurp the throne (II K ch. 11). King Solomon's attitude toward his mother is also significant (I K 2 10).

The only female sovereigns mentioned in the Bible are the Queen of Sheba (I K ch. 10; Mt 12 42 and ||s), Candace of Ethiopia (Ac 8 27), and Athaliah of Judah (II K ch. 11). L. G. L.—E. C. L.

QUEEN OF HEAVEN. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 14 (7).

QUEEN OF SHEBA: The Arabian queen who visited Solomon (I K 10 1-10). Nothing more is known of her outside of what is given in the Biblical story. For the country Sheba (also called Seba) see ARAB, ARABIA; ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETNOLOGY, §§ 11, 13; SABEAN; and SHEBA.

QUESTION. See PROVERB; and WISDOM, WISE MEN, § 2.

QUICK, QUICKEN: These words occur often in AV and are occasionally used in RV to render terms usually translated 'alive,' 'living,' 'to make' or 'keep alive' or 'to cause to live.' At times the meaning is purely physical (e.g., Nu 16 30; Ac 10 42; etc.); in other cases, especially in the Psalms, while the physical reviving is the basis, the expression often includes more. In Paul, spiritual newness of life is sometimes meant (e.g., Eph 2 5; Col 2 13), but generally, it is the resurrection life that is intended (Ro 4 17, 8 11, etc.; cf. also Jn 5 21, 6 63). E. E. N.

QUICKSANDS. See MEDITERRANEAN SEA.

QUIRINIUS, kwai-rin'1-us (Κουρίνιος): The name of a Roman governor of Syria under whom a census was taken in Judea at the time of the birth of Jesus (Lk 2 1, 4; Cyrenius AV). No explicit mention of such a census occurs elsewhere, but Q. is known to have been governor in 6 A.D. and to have taken a census then (Jos. Ant. XVIII, 1 1, 2 2). For the difficulty raised Ramsay (Was Christ Born in Bethlehem? [1898]) proposes the following solution: There was a system of periodic enrolments in Syria in cycles of fourteen years, beginning from the first annus Augusti (23 B.C.). An enrolment was therefore due, and was made, in Syria in 8 B.C.; but for state reasons Herod had it deferred in Judea until late in the summer of 6 B.C., when Quirinius was special legatus Augusti to carry on war against the Homonadenses (6-4 B.C.), being in command (ἡγεμονεύων = dux; Luke here also is correct) of the army and directing the foreign policy of Syria, while Varus (governor of Syria, 7-4 B.C.) retained the administration of the civil affairs of the province. This enrolment, in order to save the susceptibilities of the Jews, was given a Jewish character, being conducted according to tribes and households. Consequently, no tumults occurred. This explanation, while perhaps possible, is involved in too many conjectures to be considered probable without further definite evidence. The known facts are that Q. was consul in 12 B.C.; was appointed legatus Augusti for Syria for the first time, 6-4 B.C., proconsul of Asia, 3-2 B.C., and legatus Augusti for Syria for the second time, 6-9 A.D. (after the death of Herod). During this second governorship the famous enrolment of Quirinius took place, causing tumults, because Judea was now incorporated into the Roman Empire, and the enrolment was considered a mark of servitude. Q. died 21 A.D. J. R. S. S.—E. E. N.

QUIVER. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 3.

QUOTATIONS: 1. In the O T. Quotations by O T writers from preexisting sources are of two kinds, i.e., those whose sources are given and those made anonymously. Of the first class are the citations from the Book of Jashar (Jos 10 13; II S 1 18); the Book of the Wars of Jehovah (Nu 21 14); and, in the LXX., the Book of the Song (I K 8 53). Many cases of reference to the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel and to the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah are also specifically found in I, II Kings and I, II Chronicles (cf. Israel, I K chs. 14, 15, 16, 22; II K chs. 1, 10, 13, 14; I Ch ch. 9; II Ch chs. 20, 33; Judah, I K chs. 15, 22; II K chs. 8, 12, 14, 15, 16, 20, 21; Judah and Israel, II Ch chs. 25, 28, 32; Israel and Judah, II Ch chs. 27, 35, 36; Kings, II Ch ch. 24), but not by way of quotation. Of the second class are the poetic passages, such as the Song of Lamech (Gn 4 23 f.), the Song of Moses (Ex 15 2-18), and many prose extracts which, from the nature of the case, can not be positively identified. To the latter class must be added also the passages common to two or more writers, with reference to which the question arises whether they are original with either of the writers, always admitting the possibility of their being quoted by both from some antecedent writing (e.g., Is 2 2-4 = Mic 4 1-3; Ob ver. 5 = Jer 49 9).

2. In the N T. (1) From Pagan Writers. Quotations by N T writers from pagan writers and from the Apocrypha are rare. The clearest cases are the lines introduced by Paul into his discourse on Mars Hill (Ac 17 28, from Aratus, or Cleanthes), and into his letters (I Co 15 33, from Menander; Tit 1 12, from Callimachus; I Co 12 12-27, perhaps from the fable of Menenius Agrippa), and by Jude into his Epistle from Eth. En. and Ass. Mos. vs. 9, 14).

(2) From the O T. Quotations in the N T from the O T are very numerous. They are found in every book of the N T, except Phm, I, II, and III Jn, and II P, and are drawn from every book of the O T except Est, Song, and Ec. It is not easy to draw the line between an explicit quotation and a trace of the influence of an older writer's language on a later one. Statistical statements on this subject must be taken with some allowance. Swete allows only 160 such direct quotations, while Westcott and Hort give the number as 1,279. Nevertheless, the number of explicit quotations from the O T in the New has been computed with an approach to accuracy as 275.

3. Classes of Quotation. According to the relation which quotations sustain to the original text, they may be classified as follows: (1) Direct citations translated immediately from the Hebrew O T (e.g., Lk 1 17 from Mal 3 1). These are not numerous. (2) Direct quotations made from versions. Of these the vast majority are based on the LXX., and develop differences between the original as found in the O T and the form of it which appears in the quotation, such as: (a) changes in the order of the clauses, e.g., Ro 10 20 reverses the order of clauses in Is 65 1, from which it is taken. (b) The addition of a word or clause, e.g., in Jn 6 31, from Ps 78 24 ('do it' is not in the O T, but added by the LXX.). (c) The mistaking of one Heb. word for another, because of identity of radicals, e.g., Ac 15 17, took the Heb. אֱדוֹמִי ('dhm) in Am 9 12 to mean 'ādhām, 'man,' instead of 'Ēdhōm, 'Edom.' (d) The changing of words by slight changes of radicals, e.g., Ac 15 17 from Am 9 12, giving 'seek' (yidhr'shū) for 'possess' (yīr'shū). (e) The substitution of words or clauses by processes now impossible to trace, e.g., Ro 9 27 f., from Is 10 22 f. (f) The substitution of different renderings, which would be admissible as alternate translations of the same Heb. originals, e.g., He 1 7, from Ps 104 4, where the word 'wind' is used instead of 'spirit,' both being possible renderings of rūah (cf. also He 2 6-8, from Ps 8 4-6, where 'angels' appears instead of 'God,' for 'Ēlōhām). Besides the LXX., however, the Aramaic translations occasionally serve as the basis of quotations, as in Ro 9 33, 10 11 and I P 2 6, 8, from Is 28 16 (here the Targumic insertion 'in him' is reproduced); I Co 15 54, from Is 25 8, where 'forever' is the Aram. for 'unto futurity.' (3) Indirect, or secondary, quotations are made not from any O T text or version, but from writings into which they had been incorporated. The existence of such quotations is attested by the agreement of two or more N T writers varying uniformly from the known O T texts. Such cases could not, of course, be attributed to habits of memory, and, tho they might be due to the use of lost or unknown texts, it is more likely that they arise from citing quotations (cf. I P 2 6 f. with Ro 9 33; Ro 12 19 with He 10 30). (4) Quotations from memory are such as agree with no text exactly and present a considerable freedom in reproducing the original. Such are Ro 11 4 from I K 19 18; Jn 2 17 from Ps 69 9; cf. also I Co 14 21 f. from Is 28 11 f. (5) Parallelistic quotations give the sense of the original writer without any effort to reproduce his words. (6) Combined quotations utilize more than one O T passage, and are quite common (e.g., Ac 15 17, from Am 9 12 and Jer 12 15).

4. Principles Governing Quotations. The principles upon which N T quotations are made from the O T are precisely the same as those which govern all quotations elsewhere in literature (cf. Johnson, The Quotations of the N T from the Old). While the sacredness of the O T to the N T writers is everywhere manifest, there is a great latitude in the use of its language. (1) Some O T passages are used in their exact O T sense. (2) Others are taken as containing general principles, which had an application in their original form, but might be applied also to the time of the reader. (3) A third class are the quotations based on the principle of accommodation. This is done when the language of an old writer is adopted as a chaste and familiar form of words to express one's own thoughts (cf. Mt 2 18, from Jer 31 15 f.). (4) A fourth class is that in which O T transactions are allegorized, and the language referring to them incorporated in an allegorical sense (cf. Gal 4 21 f.; I Co 9 9).

5. Introductory Formulas. Efforts to establish distinctions according to the formulas by which quotations are introduced do not succeed. The formulas 'The Scripture saith,' 'It saith,' 'It is written,' 'Then was the Scripture fulfilled which saith,' 'This was done that the Scripture might be fulfilled,' sometimes mean no more than quotation-marks in modern book-making.

R

RAAMA, rē'a-mā, RAAMAH, rē'a-mā. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

RAAMIAH, rē'a-mai'a (רַאמְיָהוּ, ra'amyāh), 'J' thunders': One of the leaders of the Return (Neh 7 7; Reelaiah in Ezr 2 2).

RAAMESSES, rā-am'sīz (רַעַמְסֵס, ra'amšēš) Rameses AV: A store-city named in connection with Pithom as built by the Israelites under the direction of Egyptian task-masters (Ex 1 11). It was situated in or near Goshen. The name suggests its having been founded by Rameses II, generally supposed to be the Pharaoh of the Oppression. See also PRITHOM.

A. C. Z.

RABBAH, rab'a (רַבָּה, rabbāh), 'great [city]': The capital of the Ammonites; usually Rabbath and Rabbath-Ammon. One of the most important cities on the E. of the Jordan. Map I, G 8. It was besieged and captured by David (II S 12 29; I Ch 201), but was allowed self-government under its own princes (II S 17 27). It must have consisted of two parts, of which one was stormed by Joab (II S 12 27), and the other by David. It was here that the sarcophagus ('iron bedstead') of Og, King of Bashan, was to be seen (Dt 3 11). In the 3d cent. B.C. it was Hellenized, and given the name of Philadelphia after Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-246 B.C.). According to Polybius (V, 71), Antiochus the Great seized and annexed it to his dominions (218 B.C.); but in 135 it was in the hands of Zeno Kotylas (Jos. Ant. XIII, 81). The modern site is fixed by the name 'Amman' in the upper Jabbok (Wādī 'Amman) NE. of Heshbon. According to Conder, there are here ruins of Byzantine, Arab, and Roman (of the age of the Antonines), as well as prehistoric times. The N. portion of the site ends in a pool hewn out of the rock, and accessible from the city through an underground conduit (Polybius, V, 71). This was probably the citadel stormed by Joab. Cf. the plan of the mine and the description in Baedeker's Palästina u. Syria; also Barton, Archæology and the Bible, p. 217 f.

RABBATH, rab'əth. See RABBAH.

RABBATH-AMMON, rab'əth-am'ən. See RAB-BAH.

RABBI, rab'i or rab'ai, RABBONI, rab-bō'nai: A title given by the Jews to their learned teachers. The Heb. form rabbī (רַבִּי) is from rabh (רַב) with the pronominal ending ī, 'my,' and means literally 'my great one,' or 'my master' (in a polite sense). Other (Aram.) forms were rabbān and rabbōn. The Gospels frequently change the Heb. rabbī to διδάσκαλος, 'teacher' (perhaps also to κύριος, 'lord,' Mt 17 4, or ἐπιστάτης, 'overseer' or 'ruler,' Lk 9 33), but at times simply transliterate it by ραββί (or ραββελ) (Mt 23 7 f.; Jn 1 38, etc.). Mary at the tomb used the Aramaic form rabbōnī, 'my master' (Jn 20 16). Jesus forbade His disciples to claim this title, since He alone was qualified for such a title (Mt 23 8 ff.), and God alone should be called 'father,' also a title which the Jewish teachers applied to their learned doctors. See Dalman, Words of Jesus, xiv.

E. E. N.

RABBITH, rab'ith (רַבִּית, rabbith): A town of Issachar (Jos 19 20). Map III, G 2 (identification not certain).

RAB-MAG, rab'mag (רַב־מַג, rabh-māgh = Babyl. rab-mu-gi), 'great prince': A title of one of the officers present at the capture and destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (Jer 39 3). Of the various explanations of the meaning of the title, that above suggested seems most plausible.

I. M. P.

RAB-SARIS, rab-sə'ris or rab'sə- (רַב־סָרִיס, rabh-sārīs): The title of one of the three officers whom Sennacherib sent to demand the surrender of Jerusalem (II K 18 17); also of one of the officers of Nebuchadrezzar who sat in the council at the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39 3). There are different theories as to the interpretation of the word. The common meaning attached to it is that found in Dn (1 3), 'master of the eunuchs.' It may be an Assyro-Babylonian compound, rabū ša rēši meaning 'chief.' This at least would seem most nearly its significance in the case of foreign officers. Such a meaning may have been toned down in the Hebrew ideas to 'chief of the eunuchs,' who were the responsible personages about the court.

I. M. P.

RAB-SHAKEH, rab-shē'ke (רַב־שָׁקֵי, rabshāqēh, Assyr. rab-šāḫū (Zimmern), 'chief cupbearer': Title of one of the officers with the Tartan (q.v.) and Rab-saris sent by Sennacherib to demand of Hezekiah the surrender of Jerusalem (II K 18 17, 19, 26-35). He was an officer, apparently next in importance to the Tartan, for in the council over the surrender of the city he was the spokesman for the Assyrian army, and was able to speak in two Palestinian languages, Hebrew and Aramaic.

I. M. P.

RACA, rē'ka (ῥακά, Mt 5 22; abbreviated and transliterated from the Aram. rēqān, 'empty [head]'): A term expressive of contempt. Its Gr. equivalent 'Thou vain man' (κενέ) appears in Ja 2 20. The word does not occur often enough to warrant a safe generalization as to the degree or kind of feeling it expresses. It is a question whether it is stronger or weaker than 'Thou fool.' Its position in the context between mere silent anger and expressed contempt for moral worthlessness points to its signifying an intermediate feeling which is more reprehensible than suppressed anger, but less so than unbridled moral condemnation of others.

A. C. Z.

RACAL, rē'kal (רַקַּל, rākhāl, Rachel AV): A place to the leading men of which David sent presents (I S 30 29). But the LXX. reads Carmel (in Judah), which is probably correct.

RACE: This term translates Heb. and Gr. words meaning in general 'course': (1) 'ōrah, 'path' (Ps 19 5, 'course' RV); but more specifically the place in which race-contests were held; (2) mērōts, 'running' (Ec 9 11); (3) ἀγών (He 12 1); (4) στάδιον (I Co 9 24, 'race-course' RVmg.) and the contest itself. The figure of the foot-race, as representing life and its struggles and rewards, was especially expressive to those familiar with the Greek games (Ac 13 25; II Ti 4 7 f.; Gal 2 2, 57).

A. C. Z.

RACHAB, rē'kab. See RAHAB.

RACHAL, rē'kal. See RACAL.

RACHEL, rē'chel (רַחֵל, rāhēl), 'ewe': The younger daughter of Laban, and the cousin and beloved wife of Jacob. For her the patriarch served Laban seven years, and, as Leah was substituted by craft, he was compelled to serve another seven years in order to secure her (Gn ch. 29). For a period she was childless, and envious of her sister. She gave her maid Bilhah (q.v.) to Jacob as concubine, and adopted her two sons, Dan and Naphtali (Gn 30 1-8). Later, while still in Mesopotamia, she bore Joseph (Gn 30 22-25); on the way from Bethel to Ephratah she died in giving birth to Benjamin (Gn 35 16-20). When Jacob left Laban, she carried her father's teraphim, and concealed the theft with skill (Gn 31 14 f.). There are two traditions as to the location of her grave: (1) Between Jerusalem and Bethlehem (Gn 35 19); (2) N. of Jerusalem, on the borders of Benjamin (I S 10 2). In Jer 31 15 (cf. Mt 2 18) Rachel (Rahel AV), the tribal mother of the northern tribes, mourns for her sons who are carried into captivity. In the patriarchal narrative 'Rachel' undoubtedly has a tribal as well as a personal significance, for about her are grouped five northern tribes—Ephraim and Manasseh (= Joseph), Benjamin, Dan, and Naphtali. (For this point, see TRIBE, TRIBES.)

J. A. K.

RADDAI, rā-dē'ai, rad'ē, or rad'ē-ai (רַדַּי, radday): The fifth son of Jesse (I Ch 2 14).

RAFT. See FLOAT.

RAGAU, rē'gō. See REU.

RAGUEL, rā-giū'el or rag'yu-el. See JETHRO; and REUEL, 2.

RAHAB, rē'hab (רַחַב, rāhāb; also in the N T Rachab, Ραχαβ), 'broad': I. 1. A woman of Jericho who received and helped the spies of Joshua (Jos 2 1 f., 6 17 f.). That a plain woman of Jericho should have had the insight requisite for such conduct does not appear likely. But, considering the social position occupied by the class to which Rahab belonged, this improbability disappears. Women of this class came into touch with travelers from abroad, and Rahab may have easily learned of the achievements and hopes of the new people emerging from the wilderness. If so she was fascinated by the new and different life they lived and was ready to cast her lot with them. 2. The name Rahab again occurs in the genealogy of Jesus as that of the wife of Salmon and mother of Boaz (Mt 1 5). It has been debated whether this could be the same person as the Rahab in Joshua. The spelling of the name in Mt (Ραχαβ) is different from that in the LXX. and in He 11 31 and Ja 2 25 (Ρααβ), but, per contra, Josephus gives it as in Mt. Upon the whole, it seems probable that one person is meant.

II. (רַחַב, rāhāb), 'storm,' 'arrogancy' (Job 26 12, 9 13, 'proud' AV; Is 30 7, 'strength' AV): A proper name used in a literal and in a figurative sense. In the literal sense, it denotes a mythological sea-monster of the same class as the Dragon (q.v.), and is probably connected with the Semitic myth of Tiamat, the destroyer of God's order in the universe (Job 26 12; Is 51 9). In the figurative sense, it is a name given to Egypt (Ps 87 4, 89 10; Is 30 7 RV), possibly with some reference to a mythological conception of some relation between Egypt and the sea-monster Rahab (cf. Ezk 29 3 and the New Cent. Bible, ad loc.).

A. C. Z.

RAHAM, rē'ham (רַחַם, raḥam): A descendant of the Jerahmeelite Caleb (I Ch 2 44).

E. E. N.

RAHEL, rē'hel. See RACHEL.

RAIMENT. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS.

RAIN. See PALESTINE, § 19.

RAINBOW: The rainbow, as a phenomenon in nature, is referred to at the end of the Flood narrative (Heb. gesheth, 'bow,' Gn 9 14). The Babylonian parallels do not contain this feature, from which it may be inferred that it is an Israelitic addition of significance. This significance is naturally that, because the rainbow accompanies a passing shower, the calamity of the Flood may be regarded as temporary (cf. Gn 9 16). The rainbow, however, plays an important part in folk-lore generally (cf. Sayce, Expos. T. VII, 308). But no distinct traces of this are found in Israel. In Ezk (1 28) and Rev (4 3, 10 1) the rainbow (Gr. ῥαίς) is emblematic of God's glory.

A. C. Z.

RAISE FROM THE DEAD, TO. See RESURRECTION.

RAISIN, CAKES OF: The rendering of the Heb. 'āshīshē 'ānābhīm ('flagons of wine' AV). Cakes made of pressed grapes, or raisins, were used in the worship of heathen gods. The charge brought by Hosea against the Israelites that they 'love cakes of raisins' (Hos 3 1; cf. Jer 7 18, 44 19) is equivalent to saying that they worship other deities than J', or that they worship Him after the manner of the heathen cultus. See also FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 5.

E. E. N.

RAKEM, rē'kem (רַקֵּם, rāqem [in pause]; the proper form is reqem): a descendant of Machir (I Ch 7 16). See also REKAM.

RAKKATH, rak'ath (רַקַּת, raqqath): A fortified city of Naphtali (Jos 19 35). Perhaps near the site of Tiberias (q.v.).

RAKKON, rak'en (רַקֹּן, raqqōn): A city of Dan (Jos 19 46). See MEJARKON.

RAM (רָם, rām), 'exalted': 1. An ancestor of David (Ru 4 19; Mt 1 3 f., Aram AV, cf. RVmg; but in Lk 3 33 Arni RV, Aram AV, Gr. Ἀρνεί). 2. A brother of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 9). 3. The name of the family of Elihu (Job 32 2), which may be the same as the Aram of Gn 22 21.

RAM. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5.

RAM, BATTERING-RAM. See BESIEGE.

RAMAH, rē'ma (רָמָה, rāmāh, usually with the article), 'the height': The name of several towns in Palestine. 1. A city of Benjamin, on the frontier between the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel (Jos 18 25; I K 15 17 ff., etc.). Near it was the palm-tree of Deborah (Jg 4 5) and Rachel's grave (Jer 31 15; Mt 2 18 Rama AV). Map III, F 5. 2. A city in Ephraim, also called Ramathaim-zophim (I S 1 1), the home of the prophet Samuel (I S 1 19, 2 11, 7 17, etc.). Map III, E 4; identification not certain (cf. Driver, Notes on Samuel, pp. 1-4). 3. A town of Naphtali (Jos 19 36). Map IV, D 6. 4. A town of Asher (Jos 19 29). Map IV, C 5. 5. A shorter form for Ramoth-gilead (q.v.) (II K 8 23 f.; II Ch 22 5 f.). 6. R. 'of the South' (Jos 19 8 Ramath AV). A town of Simeon. Site unknown.

E. E. N.

RAMATH, rē'math. See RAMAH.

RAMATHAIM-ZOPHIM, rē'ma-thē'im zo'fīm (רַמַּת־צֹפִים, rāmāthayim tsōphīm, 'the two Ramahs'): The birthplace of the prophet Samuel (I S 1 1). Probably a late dual form of Ramah (q.v.), as the form of the present compound name is 'indefensible' (Dr. HTS). Called 'Ramathaim' in I Mac 11 34 and 'Arimathæa' in Mt 11 57.

E. E. N.

RAMATHITE, rē'math-ait (רַמַּתִּי, ramāthi), 'man of Ramah': The designation of Shimei, David's chief husbandman (I Ch 27 27).

RAMATH-LEHI, rē'math-li'hai. See LEHI.

RAMATH-MIZPEH, rē'math-miz'pē (רַמַּת־מִצְפֶּה, rāmāth hammitspeh), 'the height of the watch-tower':

A place on the border of Gad (Jos 13 26). Probably the same as Mizpah 5 (q.v.). E. E. N.

RAMESES, ram'e-siz or ra-mes'iz. See RAAMESSES.

RAMIAH, ra-mai'a (רמיה, ramyāh), 'J' is high': One of the 'sons of Parosh' (Ezr 10 25).

RAMOTH, rē'mōth (רמט, rāmōth, and רמב, rāmōth), 'heights': I. See JEREMOTH, 7. II. 1. A town of Gad in Gilead, also called Ramah (II K 8 29) and Ramoth-Gilead. It was assigned to Gad, and was probably occupied by Gadites early in the conquest-period (Dt 4 43; Jos 20 8). According to later theory, it was a Levitical city (Jos 21 38; I Ch 6 80). It was the residence of one of Solomon's prefects (I K 4 13). Later, it was seized by the Arameans of Damascus, and its recovery was the object of the campaign of Ahab in which he was mortally wounded (I K 22 3 ff.). Israel had possession of it in the days of Jehoram, son of Ahab (II K 8 28 f., 9 14), and it was here that the conspiracy of Jehu was organized (II K 9 1-13). Tho so important a place, its site has been much disputed. The identification on Map I, G 6 is not now accepted, but no proposed site has met with general approval. 2. A Levitical city of Issachar (I Ch 6 73), apparently the same as Jarmuth (Jos 21 29), or Remeth (Jos 19 21). 3. 'Ramoth of the South' (I S 30 27). See RAMAH, 6. E. E. N.

RAMOTH-GILEAD, rē'mōth-gil'a-d. See RAMOTH, II, 1.

RAMPART. See CITY, § 3.

RAMS' HORNS. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (2).

RAM'S SKIN. See TABERNACLE, § 3 (2) (end).

RANGES: This term renders the Heb. words (1) s'dhērōth, 'rows [of soldiers]' 'ranks' RV (II K 11 8, 15; II Ch 23 14). (2) y'thūr, 'stretch [of country]' (Job 39 8). (3) kīrayim, a grate with 'rows [of firepans]', designed for cooking several kinds of food at the same time (Lv 11 35, 'stewpan' RVmg.).

RANKS: The rendering of παρατά, 'a square plot of ground' covered with grass or vegetables (Mk 6 40). The crowd was regularly arranged so as to give the appearance of a number of small garden plots. See also WARFARE, § 6.

RANSOM: This word renders the following terms: (1) kōpher, 'cover' (from the Pi'el form, kipper, 'to cover over,' 'pacify,' Ex 30 12; Job 33 24; Ps 49 7, etc., and, in RV, Ex 21 30; I S 12 3). (2) pidhyōn, 'freedom' (Is 35 9; Hos 13 14; Ps 69 18; Is 51 11 RV). (3) verb gā'al, 'to redeem' (Is 51 10 AV; Jer 31 11 AV). (4) λύτρον, ἀντίλυτρον (Mt 20 28; I Ti 2 6). In the O T the underlying conception is that of release from an evil condition, under the control of another. The method of release is not clearly presented. But its essence is that of propitiating, either by a sacrificial gift or by the payment of a sum of money, him who has the power to release. If the former, the propitiatory gift may be a life, or the substitute for a life. In any case, the stress of thought is laid, not on the method of ransoming, but on the result, i.e., the release of the ransomed. In the N T the conception rises into a place of the highest importance, because it expresses the efficacy of Christ's work of redemption from sin. In Mt 20 28, Mk 10 45 Jesus describes His own mission as the giving of 'his life a ransom for many.' But in this connection 'ransom' can be neither the process of securing release nor the simple result of that process—the release itself. How this operates is not clearly indicated, and conflicting views have been propounded on the subject. See Stevens, Theol. of the N T (1899), p. 119; Weiss, The Rel. of the N T (1905), pp. 228 ff. See also PROPITIATION; and RECONCILIATION AND ATONEMENT. A. C. Z.

RAPHA, rē'fā (רפא, rāphā'): The ancestral head of a clan of Benjamin (I Ch 8 2).

RAPHAH, rē'fā. See REPHAIAH.

RAPHU, rē'fiu (רפח, rāphū'), 'healed': The father of Palti, one of the spies (Nu 13 9); perhaps the same as Rapha.

RAVEN. See PALESTINE, § 25.

RAZOR: This term is the rendering of: (1) ta'ar (Nu 6 5, 87; Ps 52 3; Is 7 20; Ezk 5 1), which means also the sheath of a sword, and (2) mōrāh (Jg 13 5, 16 17; I S 1 11), which is probably the specific Heb. word for 'razor.' The earliest razors were of flint, later bronze (see METALS) and steel came to be used. See also SHAVE, SHAVING. C. S. T.

READ, READING. See EDUCATION, §§ 8 ff.

REALIAH, ri-ē'ya or ri'ā-ai'a (רעליה, re'āyāh), 'J'' bath seen': 1. The ancestor of a clan of Judah (I Ch 4 2). 2. A Reubenite (I Ch 5 5, Reaia AV). 3. The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 47; Neh 7 50).

REAP, REAPER, REAPING. See AGRICULTURE, § 6.

REARWARD (Rereward AV): In I S 29 2 the word has no technical significance; it means simply the last part of the line to march by. But in other places (Nu 10 25; Jos 6 9, 13; Is 52 12, 58 8) the expression (from the verb 'āṣaph, 'to gather') refers to those who 'close up' the formal line of march.

REBA, ri'bā (רבי, rebha'): A petty 'king' of Midian, slain by Israel (Nu 31 8; Jos 13 21).

REBEKAH, ri-bek'a (רביקה, ribhāqāh, Rebecca, Ro 9 10): The wife of Isaac. R. was the daughter of Bethuel, Abraham's nephew (Gn 22 23), and lived in Paddan-aram until her betrothal, the story of which (ch. 24) 'is told with singular picturesqueness and grace, and presents an idyllic picture of simple Eastern life' (Driver, Com., ad loc.). The character of R., however, as revealed in subsequent chapters, is far from attractive. Of her two sons, Esau and Jacob (25 21 ff.), she favored the latter (25 28), whom she taught to deceive his blind father and assisted in his flight to her brother Laban (ch. 27). While dwelling in Gerar, Isaac unsuccessfully attempted to pass off Rebekah as his sister (26 6 ff.; apparently a duplicate of the similar story in ch. 20). Jacob speaks of his mother as buried in the cave of Machpelah (49 31), but the circumstances of her death are not mentioned. See also ISAAC. L. G. L.—E. C. L.

REBUKE: This word renders terms derived from five Heb. and four Gr. roots: (1) gā'ar, 'chide,' used of man (Gn 37 10; Ru 2 16; Jer 29 27 RV); of God (Ps 9 5 [6], 68 30 [31], 119 21; Is 17 13; Zec 3 2); 'check' or 'restrain by reprimand,' of God (Ps 106 9; Nah I 4; Is 54 9; Mal 2 3 'corrupt AV,' 3 11); g'ārāh, n., 'chiding,' used of man (Pr 13 1, 17 10; Ec 7 5; Pr 13 8, 'threatening' RV; Is 30 17, 'threat' RV); 'reprobation in act' of God (Ps 76 6 [7], 80 16 [17]; Is 51 20 66 15); 'a check' of God (II S 22 16 = Ps 18 15 [16]; Ps 104 7; Is 50 2), migh'ereth (Dt 28 20). (2) herpāh (Is 25 8 and Jer 15 15, 'reproach' RV). Elsewhere almost uniformly 'reproach.' (3) yākhaḥ in Hiph., 'judge' (Gn 31 42; I Ch 12 17); 'decide for' (Is 2 4 = Mic 4 3); 'correct' (Ps 6 1 [2] = 38 1 [2]); 'chide,' 'reprove' (Pr 9 7, 8 and Am 5 10, 'reprove' RV; Lv 19 17; Pr 24 25, 28 23); tōkhehāh in sense of 'correction,' 'punishment' (II K 19 3 = Is 37 3; Hos 5 9; cf. Ps 149 7 pl.); tōkhaḥath, 'reproof' (Pr 27 6); 'correction' (Ps 39 11 [12]; Ezk 5 15, 25 17). (4) mūšār (Hos 5 2), lit. 'I [God] am a chastisement [rebuker] AV' for them.' (5) rībh (Neh 5 7, 'contended' RV). (6) ἀμώματος (Ph 2 15, 'without blemish' RV). (7) ἐπιλαύσειν, 'chide' (I Ti 5 1). (8) ἐλέγχειν, 'convict of error,' 'refute' (Tit 1 13, 2 15; cf. 1 9); 'chide' (I Ti 5 20), 'punish' (He 12 5; Rev 3 19). 'Reprove' RV in all five passages; ἐλαγίς (II P 2 16). (9) ἐπιτιμᾶν, 'chide' (Mt 16 22; Mk 8 32, 33; Lk 9 55, 17 3, 23 40; II Ti 4 2); 'rebuke' in order to restrain (Mt 8 26, 17 18, 20 31; Mk 1 25, 4 39, 9 25, 10 48, 'charged' AV; Lk 4 35, 39, 41, 8 24, 9 42, 18 39; Jude ver. 9), in the sense of 'to keep away' (Mt 19 13; Mk 10 13; Lk 18 15). C. S. T.

RECAH, rī'ka (רִכָּה, rēkhāh, Rechah AV): The notice in I Ch 4 12 is obscure. Perhaps 'Rechaites' should be taken as the meaning.

RECEIPT OF CUSTOM. See PUBLICAN; and TAX, TAXATION.

RECHAB, rī'kab (רִכָּב, rēkhābh), 'rider,' 'horseman': 1. Son of Rimmon, a Beerothite. With his brother Raanah he murdered Ishbosheth, son of Saul (II S 4 2 ff.), and was put to death by David. 2. A descendant of Hammath, the Kenite (I Ch 2 55, 'Hemath' AV), and the father of Jehonadab (II K 10 15) the contemporary of Jehu. The special distinction of Rechab is that he founded a tribe of total abstainers called, after himself, Rechabites (Jer 35 6). The phrase 'Hammath, the father of the house of Rechab' (I Ch 2 55) seems to make the real founder of the tribe Hammath himself. This, however, is probably the result of the long residence of the clan at Hammath (the place), and the effort to fix its genealogy locally. But 'Rechab' means 'rider [on camels],' which affiliates the clan with an earlier nomadic mode of life. The organization of the Rechabites was evidently effected by Jehonadab upon the basis of zealous worship of J', and the complete prohibition of wine and of a settled city or town life. In II K 10 15 Jehonadab, evidently in the character of a Rechabite, is shown to have joined himself to Jehu, when the latter made his attack upon Baal-worship and exterminated the house of Ahab. The Rechabites came into the fullest view among the Israelites through the prophetic word of Jeremiah (ch. 35), who used the entrance of a band of them into Jerusalem at the time of the siege of the city as the occasion for holding up as worthy of emulation their loyalty to their founder's ideal. In later times the name 'Rechabite' was perpetuated, partly by the descendants of these early clansmen, and partly by imitators of their practise of abstinence from wine. They survived to N T times (Eus. HE, II 23). In modern times, they are said to exist in Syria and Arabia. But the lineal connection of these with the Biblical Rechabites is doubtful. 3. The father of Malchiah, one of the builders of Nehemiah's wall (Neh 3 14), 'Son' here may mean 'descendant,' and if so, the reference is to 2. A.C.Z.

RECHABITE, rek'a-bait, rī'kab-ait, or rek'ab-ait. See RECHAB.

RECHAH, rī'ka. See RECAH.

RECOMPENSE: This term represents (1) gāmat, 'to requite,' noun g'māl (II S 19 36; Is 35 4). (2) nāthan, 'to render' (II Ch 6 23, but 'requiting' RV; and Ezk 7 3, 'to bring upon' RV). (3) shūbh, 'to restore' (Nu 5 7 f., but 'to make restitution,' II S 22 21 RV). (4) shālēm, 'to complete' (and nouns shillām, shillim), as if a transaction in which a restitutory portion was still pending was not complete (Is 65 6; Jer 16 18). (5) t'mūrāh, 'exchange' (Job 15 31). (6) ἀποδοῖσθαι, 'to give back' (Ro 12 19), with compound ἀνταποδοῖσθαι (Lk 14 14), noun ἀνταπόδομα, and (7) ἀντιμισθία (He 11 26). The generic idea of recompense is that of restoration of an equitable status wherever it has been disturbed, whether in the relations of men with one another or with God. But an ethical, as contrasted with a commercial, notion of equity is given in the doctrine that J' is Himself the avenger of the weak, and will see that they receive just treatment. In His own conduct, He always deals according to just standards (Dt 32 35; Ro 12 7). A. C. Z.

RECONCILIATION AND ATONEMENT: The words, 'reconcile,' 'reconciliation' have almost disappeared from the O T in the RV, being retained only in Dn 9 24 and Is 29 4. In the N T 'reconcile' occurs fourteen times. Twice it is used of men who, mutually estranged, are to be reconciled (Mt 5 24; I Co 7 11). In the former case, the offender deals with his offense (cf. I S 29 4). Elsewhere, the reconciliation concerns the relations of God and man (compounds of ἀλλάσσειν being used); and in all (except Ro 11 15) Christ is directly named as the means of reconciliation. In three passages (Ro 5 10; II Co 5 18-20; Col 1 20-23) there is the same instinctive movement of thought. In each, God is said to have made a reconciliation in or through Christ which affects the race (or even 'all things'), an act of God which is precedent to human personal acts and experience, but which is realized or consummated in them. This word has come to be used in Christian thought to describe the peculiar and unique glory and effect of Christ's person and work in our world. He has established a new relation to God, which is expressed under varying phraseology throughout the N T. The experience of it made the N T possible. As to how Christ produced this immeasurable effect, the passages above referred to and many others derive it especially from His sacrificial death. Other words also are used (see PROPITIATION; and SACRIFICE), to describe the means by which God in Christ reconciled the world unto Himself. These words are said rightly by Hasting's Rashdall (The Idea of Atonement, p. 126), including also 'justification' and 'salvation' to be the aspects or stages of one and the same process.' The English word Atonement (= at-one-ment) is fixed apparently in religious and theological language, altho it does not occur in the RV of the N T and in the AV only at Ro 5 11. In the O T it is often used to translate Heb. kāphar (see PROPITIATION). The English word simply means to make two people 'at one' who have been separated. In theological discussion it is applied to the means by which reconciliation between man and God has actually been brought about. The N T asserts that the person and work of Christ, especially His sacrifice on the Cross (see SACRIFICE), was that means (Mk 10 45, 14 24; Jn 3 14 f., 10 15; Ac 3 26, 4 12; Ro 3 21-26, 8 3 f.; He 9 14; I P 3 18; I Jn 4 10). The new fact—this consciousness of reconciliation with the living and holy God—undoubtedly implies the forgiveness of sins. No other religion has ever offered this relation between man and God as something within actual reach of all men, not even the O T. It is the substance of the Gospel, the essence of Christian experience, the life of the Church. It was, as a mere matter of history, produced by Jesus Christ; it is to-day sustained by faith in His name, and so spreads over the world.

No one doubts that the N T connects this new life with the sacrifice of Christ. The problem before the theologian is a triple one; (1) How does the N T describe this connection between the Cross and the forgiveness of sins? (2) What are the principles by which theology can explain that connection in the light of those descriptions? (3) What authority has this whole view over the modern mind and will?

The historical method has led to the study of this subject in its two great stages of realization. First, in the light of the consciousness of Jesus Himself. It is clear that He looked on His death as an act of His own (Mk 10 45) establishing new relations between God and man (Mk 14 24; I Co 11 25); and that He applied to Himself the experience and influence of the Suffering Servant of J<sup>h</sup> described by Isaiah (cf. E. F. Scott, The Kingdom of the Messiah (1911), Cap. viii; A. G. Hogg, The Redemption of This World (1922), pp. 98-101). Second, The experience of reconciliation with God as apprehended and described by the Apostolic Church in its dependence upon Christ and Him as crucified.

The following classification of passages, not exhaustive, indicates the chief N T methods of describing the relation of Christ's sacrifice to forgiveness. Some passages belong to more than one group.

(a) The general idea that Christ suffered for or in behalf of persons: I Th 5 9 f.; Gal 2 20; II Co 5 14 f.; Ro 5 6-11; I P 3 18; He 2 9; Jn 3 14-17, 10 15, 12 32 f.; I Jn 3 16. (b) The special idea that His death was related in some way to our sins: Ro 4 25, 5 8; I Co 15 3; Gal 1 4, 3 13; I P 2 24; He 9 28. (c) Sacrificial allusions, in which Christ's death is likened to that of the animals sacrificed under O T laws, and generally connected directly with sins: Ro 3 24-26, 5 9, 8 3; II Co 5 21 (cf. Lev 4 21 LXX); Eph 2 13; I P 1 19; He 7 27, 9-10; Jn 1 29; I Jn 1 7, 2 2, 4 10; Rev 1 5 f., 7 14. (d) Terms implying purchase or ransom: Mk

10 45; I Th 1 10; Ro 3 24; I Co 6 20; Eph 1 7; I Ti 2 5, 6; Tit 2 14; He 9 15; Rev 5 9.

For many centuries little attention was given by theology to the problems involved here. The crude notion, founded on passages under (d), that a payment was made to the devil for man's release was never seriously worked out and perished as soon as the subject was earnestly considered. In the course of discussion, since Anselm (1033-1109) definitely opened the problem, two main classes of opinion have emerged: (a) Those, called moral or subjective theories, which hold that human dread and selfishness were the only obstacles to reconciliation, and that Christ so manifested the righteousness and love of God that men's hearts are won to faith and obedience. (b) Those, called objective, or vicarious, or expiatory, which maintain that in sin there lay an obstacle to God's offer of mercy, that this obstacle was removed by the sacrificial death of the God-man. Of course within these two main groups there are many varieties of opinions; and of some theories there is dispute as to whether they belong more properly to (a) or to (b). (For one of the best classifications of Atonement Theories see Introduction to Dr. Simon's The Redemption of Man; cf. Stevens, The Christian Doctrine of Salvation, Pt II.)

Two extremes in each direction may well be condemned at once. On one side the notion that the sufferings freely assumed by Christ and inflicted by God form a quantitative equivalent over against those due from man as penalty for sin, and that men are saved by consenting to that transaction; on the other side the notion that Christ's holy life and martyr death—as of other prophets, but more powerfully and widely—stimulates the acts of repentance and faith. The former is too shallow in its view of the problem of forgiveness for God and the latter too shallow in its view of the problem of repentance for man.

An unhelpful distinction has lately been drawn between ethical and forensic theories. The only complete opposition to 'ethical' is 'mechanical.' Punishment, substitution, vindication of righteousness, etc., are ethical facts even when expressed in terms of forensic procedure. On the other hand 'ethics' is in danger, if it be maintained that God's love does not reckon with law, that God's holiness is not involved in the forgiveness of sin.

All truly Christian theories agree in the following points: (a) God, the eternal Father in His holy love, is the source of salvation, the sender of the Son. (b) Christ in His sinless life, His complete self-sacrifice, has revealed God's holy love. (c) The contemplation of Christ in life and death moves the human heart to repentance and faith, hope and love. But the objective, vicarious theories recognize in the Scripture account elements of vital importance which must be added to these. The unique emphasis on His Cross is due to unique values in His self-sacrifice. Hence the following additional points are to be noted: (d) The sinless Son of God did actually experience the various results of sin in (1) the opposition and hatred of men; (2) His deep sorrow over human woe; (3) His submission to death; (4) the mysterious and awful clouding of the Father's face, both in His various temptations partially (Mt 4 1-11; Jn 12 27 ff.; Mk 14 32-39), and on the Cross (Mk 15 34). (e) This phase of His experience (even His death) was not an incident in His calling as the revealer of God, but the crowning work to which He had been appointed by the Father (Mk 10 45, 14 24, 36; Jn 3 14-16, 10 17, 18, 27, 15 13; Ro 3 25 f., 5 8, 8 3; II Co 5 21; Col 1 12-14, 20; He 5 5, 10; I P 1 17-21; I Jn 4 9, 10) and the ground of reconciliation on which pardon is offered. (f) The necessity for this is found in that the holiness of God must be vindicated in the very act of offering His mercy. The vindication is no mere formality, nor does it consist in setting so much offering as equivalent of so much penalty. It consists in fulfilling the righteousness which man had broken, and in doing so at all costs to God Himself in Christ His Son. To be utterly righteous among men and for men Christ must die. In a world of sin nothing short of that would be complete. But to do this was to manifest the supreme holiness of God's will. (g) This necessity existed on man's side also. In every covenant the conscience of each side judges for both sides. Man can not accept sincerely a pardon whose righteousness is not as completely assured as its love. That which breaks the heart of the penitent is not only the sight of God's love, but of that love in all its stern righteousness—a love that sacrifices all not merely for mercy but also for righteousness. The death on the Cross is therefore an act of God in which He dealt with the race as a whole, with the general and eternal principles of a righteous mercy, of a holy love. On that objective basis the message, the call comes to each soul.

On these grounds the various N T forms of describing the work of Christ are interpretable without prevarication, and an objective atonement is as directly applicable and potent to-day as in any past generation.

RECORD, RECORDER: In all Oriental countries a record was kept of the important events of the reign of each king. In Est 6 1 this is called the 'book of the records' [zikkarōn] of the chronicles' (cf. 2 23, 10 2, 'book of the chronicles,' lit. 'book of days'; Ezr 4 15, 'book of the records' [Aram. do- khrān], 6 2 'records' [dikhrōn]). Mention is often made of the 'chronicles of the kings' of Judah, or of Israel (I K 14 29, 15 31, etc.). The work of keeping these annals was entrusted to one or more officials. Many have thought that this was 'the recorder' ('chronicler' RVmg., II S 8 16, 20 24; I K 4 3; II K 18 18, 37; I Ch 18 15; II Ch 34 8; Is 36 3, 22), who acted as a state-historian. The Heb. word mazkār (from zākhār, 'to remember') means 'one who causes to remember' or 'calls to mind,' and if not the first, he was among the highest court officials (II S 8 16 f.; I Ch 18 15; Is 36 3, 22). He is distinguished in almost all the passages from the scribe (šōphēr), q.v., who prepared state papers and had charge of official and foreign correspondence; but his position seems to have been greater than would be that of a state-historian, altho he might have had oversight of the making of the annals. He was perhaps the chancellor (grand vizier), who called the king's attention to important matters of state, and acted also as counselor. In all other passages in AV where 'record' occurs the meaning is that of 'witness' or 'testimony' and is so expressed in RV.

RED DRAGON. See REVELATION, BOOK OF, § 2.

REDEEM, REDEEMER, REDEMPTION. The two Heb. terms (with their derivations) which are usually recorded by 'redeem,' 'redeemer,' etc., are (1) gā'al 'to act the part of a kinsman' and (2) pādāh, 'to ransom' (by giving an equivalent). Illustrations of (1): are Gn 48 16; Ex 6 6, 15 15; Lv 25 25 ff.; Ps 69 18, 106 10; Is 43 1, etc.; Job 19 25. Illustrations of (2) are: Ex 13 13 ff.; Nu 18 15 ff., etc. In many cases, however, the original meaning has become generalized and the distinction between the two root-ideas is no longer observed. See, in general, RECONCILIATION AND ATONEMENT; FORGIVENESS; PROPITIATION; RANSOM; SIN; and also JESUS CHRIST, § 15 (2) (f).

RED HEIFER. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 5.

REDNESS OF EYES. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 7.

RED SEA (יָם סוּף, yām sūph), 'sea of reeds' (Ex 10 19, 15 4, 22): The name of the great oceanic gulf between Egypt and Arabia, stretching 1,350 m. from Suez to the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. Why a 'sea of reeds' should be called a 'Red Sea' is difficult to understand. For some unknown reason, the LXX. and St. Jerome speak of it as the 'Red Sea'—possibly on account of its reddish waters and shells, or because of the color of the mountains of Sinai and Edom which border upon it. The Greeks extended the name to include the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean. The narrow gulfs on the W. and E. sides of the peninsula of Sinai are its most important portions for the Biblical student. Across the western, or Gulf of Suez, marched the Israelites in their exodus from the land of Goshen; while from Eloth, or Elath (the Aila of Strabo), on the eastern, or Gulf of 'Akabah (sinus Aëlasticus), Solomon sent forth his navy to Ophir for gold (I K 9 26-28). The lack of 'reeds' and the presence of numerous shells on the shores of the Gulf of Suez lead the present writer to think that the Bitter Lakes and Lake Timsah were at one time a connected part of the same body of water. G. L. R.

REED, REED GRASS: The flag, or reed (qāneh, καλαμος). Also rush ('aghamōn, gōme'), or bulrush was known to the inhabitants of Palestine as it abounds in the lowlands of the Jordan Valley and in Egypt. It is frequently referred to as a symbol of instability (II K 18 21; Mt 11 7, etc.), or of helpless weakness (Is 42 3). The reed was used as a measuring-rod (Ezk 40 3 ff.; Rev 11 1). In Jer 51 32, 'āgham, rendered 'reed,' should probably be taken in the sense of 'defenses' or possibly 'citadels.' On Gn 41 2, 18, 'meadow' AV, cf. RV, and on Is 19 7 for 'paper reeds' AV read 'meadows' with the RV. See also PALESTINE, § 21 f. E. E. N.

REELAIAH, rī'el-ē'ya (רִעְלָיָה, re'elāyāh). See RAAMIAH.

REFINER. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 10 (b).

REFUGE, CITIES OF: The designation of six Levitical cities where unintentional homicides might find asylum from the 'avenger of blood' (q.v.) until arrangements could be made for an impartial trial, and also thereafter, if judged innocent (Dt ch. 19, 4 41-43; Nu ch. 35; Jos ch. 20 f.). The positions of these cities were so chosen that a fugitive could always reach some one of them in a day's flight (not over 30 m.). It is probable that the other 'Levitical cities' also continued to exercise to some degree the right of sanctuary. We do not know to what extent these regulations were actually put into practice, but in the Greek and Roman periods many Hellenistic cities in Palestine enjoyed similar privileges.

According to the prevailing critical view of the formation of the Hexateuch, the cities of refuge were first appointed in the days of Josiah (621 B.C.), in place of the numerous sanctuaries which from time immemorial had been places of asylum, but which were now abolished by the drastic reforms of the young king (cf. Ex 21 14, 20 24 with II K ch. 23). See EB and JE, s.v. Asylum. L. G. L.—E. C. L.

REGEM, rī'gem (רֵגֶם, reghem): The name of a Calebite family (I Ch 2 47). See also the following word.

REGEM-MELECH, rī'gem-mī'lek (רֵגֶם מֶלֶךְ, reghem melekh), 'Regem is king' (?): A person mentioned in Zec 7 2. There is probably some error in the present Heb. text, the words in question not being original. Cf. ICC, ad. loc.

REGENERATION: This word (Gr παλιγγενεσία) is one of several (see ADOPTION; CONVERSION; REPENTANCE) which are used to describe the great changes wrought in a man's thought, feeling, and will, in his conscious relations to sin, the world, and God, when he enters into fellowship with God through faith in Jesus Christ.

1. In the O T. From its beginnings in Moses, the religion of Israel took its seat in the inner life of man. But at first this was an indistinct and undeveloped fact. The steady and ever-growing insistence upon 'obedience' and 'not sacrifice' (I S 15 22; Is 1 11-16; Hos 6 6; Mic 6 7, 8; Jer 7 22, 23) gradually made the fact clear that Jehovah deals with the heart and conscience. Hence the later emphasis upon the necessity for moral renovation, which appears in such fulness in the Psalms (e.g., 15, 19, 32, 51) and in the Prophets, whose supreme work was to persuade the people to forsake sin and do the will of God. It was in the deeper crises belonging to the exilic period, when the individual stood forth as never before (Jer 31 29, 30; Ezk ch. 18), that this change was seen to be itself a work of God. The very failure of all warnings under the old covenant revealed the need of a new covenant whose fulfilment should be indeed the work of man, but of a new man, upon whom the grace of God has worked a moral transformation (Jer 24 7, 31 33, 34, 32 39, 40; Ezk 11 19, 20, 36 26, 27). But in the O T we have no clear testimony to such a change as an experienced fact. Joy in God there is, and a sense of the need of moral renewal; but there is no witness to any movement in which men had brought these two together, under conditions which they could apprehend, rest on, and proclaim to others. The world waited for the conjunction of these two apparently antagonistic factors in religious feeling. When that took place, the world's redemption would have arrived.

2. In the N T. The N T describes the conditions under which it came about that men in whom the moral struggle was aroused found peace with God and called it a 'regeneration,' a 'being born again.' Ipso facto we have the absolute religion, the religion of the Divine sonship. (1) Naturally, we do not find much explicit teaching on this topic from the lips of Jesus. He, because sinless, had no such experience; and, while He was with them, the preparative but not the consummate conditions of the new life were alone presented to the minds of His disciples. Yet His call to repentance (Mk 1 15), His declaration that men must 'become as little children' to enter the Kingdom of heaven (Mt 18 2), that sin is seated 'within,' in the heart (Mk 7 21), that men are 'sick' and need a physician (Mk 2 17), that they need to 'become' sons of God (Mt 5 45, γέννησθε), His emphasis throughout His teaching alike upon the vast gulf which separates goodness and badness, faith and unfaith, rebellion and obedience, love and hate, lust and self-respect, indicates that a mighty change which goes down to the very sources of man's moral consciousness is needed, if he is to be saved. The instrument of this change our Lord does not describe; but we are made to feel that it must be forged and used by God, if the soil is to be fitted for the seed. God alone can forgive sin, He can effect moral renewals impossible for men (Mk 10 23-27), the Son of Man is to save the lost (Lk 19 10), He in the name of the Father seeks and welcomes them (Lk ch. 15). In Jn 3 3, 5 the implicit truth of the Synoptic Gospels is clearly stated to Nicodemus. (2) When we turn to the story of Acts and to the Epistles, we find ourselves in a new atmosphere. The followers have become leaders of men, the pupils have become teachers. They are filled with the consciousness of oneness with the living and holy God; and for the first time in history that consciousness is the basis of a communal life and a universal gospel. The change which has been wrought by the power of Christ through the Spirit is described in the most absolute terms which language can employ. Pauline terms are 'a new creation' (Gal 6 15; II Co 5 17), a change from slavery to sonship (Ro 8 15), from a life 'in the flesh' or 'under the law' to a life 'in the Spirit,' 'led by the Spirit' (Gal 5 16-18; Ro 8 2, 9), a life of faith for one who was 'crucified with Christ' (Gal 2 20), a union with Christ in 'the likeness' both of His death and His resurrection in which 'our old man was crucified with him' (Ro 6 3-6), and a new man has appeared (Eph 2 15, 4 24). We 'were raised together with Christ' (Col 2 20, 3 1 ff.); those who were dead through trespasses and sins have been 'made alive' (Eph 2 1-5; II Co 5 14, 15), 'once darkness' they are 'now light in the Lord' (Eph 5 8; I Th 5 4-7). Enmity has given way to peace with God, weakness is replaced by power, fear by love. 'The old things are passed away; behold, they are become new' (II Co 5 17). The same enthusiasm, if not the same variety in its expression, appears in the other writers. According to Peter, they are begotten again unto a living hope (I P 1 3, 23) as new-born babes (2 2). The contrast between the past and the new standing of Jewish Christians is brilliantly described (2 5-10). Even the Epistle of James, which seems to be least doctrinal, yet founds its practical exhortations upon this new consciousness of the Christian community (1 1, 18, 21), the instrument of whose production is the 'inborn word' (Vulg. insitum verbum). In the writings of the Apostle John we find ourselves in a realm of sharply defined contrasts—life and death, truth and untruth, light and darkness, children of God and children of the devil, righteousness and sin, love and hate, belief and unbelief. These are not named in relation to the general Christian community, as is mainly the case with Peter and James; but, as is more usual with Paul, John generally puts emphasis upon the individual experience of this change. In Jn 3 3-8, the entrance to the Kingdom of God is described as a new birth which is brought about by 'water and the Spirit,' or 'by the Spirit' alone. In his first Epistle John ascribes this act of 'begetting' directly to God (I Jn 2 29, 3 9, 4 7, etc.). He is much concerned with the fact that the righteous man proves his new birth by his very righteousness. It is not that he is righteous and so becomes a son of God. He is righteous, and therefore we know that he has been begotten of God (γεννηται; cf. the effect of the aorist in 5 1) and continues in that new relationship (μενετε εν αυτω, 2 27, etc.). This act of God is not more closely defined. It is conditioned, of course, by the person and work of Christ, the only begotten (4 7-10). Very strong expressions are used to state the fact that this new birth issues in a holy life. The begotten of God 'can not sin' (3 9), and it is in the keeping of His commandments we know that we know Him (2 3).

3. Summary. The doctrine of a new birth, of a fundamental change in man's conscious life, pervades the whole of the N T. Various expressions are used for it, and it is often described where no definitive term occurs. Certain features underlie the teaching of the N T as a whole on this point. (1) The new birth is an act of God upon the inner life of the individual. His natural structure, so to speak, is not changed. But the whole meaning of his entire active self is transformed. Much in this must ever remain inexplicable; for here each soul may find its ineffable conscious contact with the Divine. But the act is realized in varying degrees. Some have to be exhorted to realize it and to give its reality scope in their active life and conduct. Others may have hearts open to its full wonder and power and joy. Yet again, it may be in some communal act of confession that all degrees of attainment unite in using the same language, conscious that some fundamental relationship, some identical spirit, is possessed by all (I Jn 5 18-20; II Co 5 11-20; Ro 8 12-17 [where first and second persons are constantly interchanged]; I P 2 3-10). (2) This change is wrought by God not magically, upon an impersonal substance, but personally—that is, ethically—through and upon the conscience, the will, the affections. Hence it is not a good which can be received apart from, or prior to, or in addition to, the personal relations in which God's call is heard and the act of obedient faith is performed. The new birth is the change in man's personal relations with God which has been wrought by God's redemptive acts and man's amazed response to these. (3) Hence the new birth is not an esoteric experience, confined to the élite of the race or the Church. It comes to the simplest and most ignorant, who are wise enough to understand the offer of mercy and to close with it and live by it. (4) The N T does not teach that regeneration restores us to the position of Adam before the Fall. Rather is the contrast definitely drawn between the natural life with its limitations and the spiritual, whose characteristic is the indwelling of God in our personal consciousness, in and for our will. Hence it is unsafe and misleading to say with some that in the new birth we receive a new personality (cf. I Co 15 45; Jn 1 12, 13, 3 6). (5) It is in the N T associated peculiarly with the ordinance of baptism (Ro 6 3, 4; Eph 5 26; Tit 3 5; Jn 3 3-5; I P 3 21); and naturally, for baptism was the open rite by which men entered into the fellowship of the Church. And that moment was in the early Church often accompanied by experiences which were identified as the work of the Holy Spirit. But the Spirit might thus 'fall' before the rite was performed (Ac 10 44, 11 15). The solemn values of that sacrament are not removed when we insist that the new birth is an act of God, which has too often been as evidently bestowed upon human souls—as in the experience of Cornelius—apart from baptism to allow of our limiting it to the recipients of that gracious, communal observance.

REGISTER. See GENEALOGY, § 1.

REHABIAH, רִ'הַבְיָא (רִ'הַבְיָא, r'habhyāh), 'J' has enlarged': The ancestral head of a number of Levitical families (I Ch 23 17, 24 21, 26 25).

REHOB, rī'hob (רְהוֹב, rēhōbh), 'width': I. 1. A city of Asher (Jos 19 28, 30, 21 31; Jg 1 31; I Ch 6 75). Site unknown. Possibly two places in Asher have this name. 2. A city in the extreme north of Israel, probably near Dan (Nu 13 21; II S 10 8), perhaps the same as the Beth-rehob of Jg 18 28. See also ARAM, § 4 (7). II. 1. The father of Hadadezer, King of Zobah (II S 8 3, 12). 2. A prominent Levite (Neh 10 11).

REHOBAM, rī'ho-bō'am (רְהוֹבָאִם, rēhabh'ām, also Roboam, Ροβοαμ, Mt 17 AV): A son of Solomon and Naamah, the Ammonitess (I K 14 21, 31; II Ch 12 13), and king of Judah (937-920). His ascension to the throne was the signal for the expression of the unrest that characterized the last days of Solomon's reign. This was largely due to the heavy taxation and the forced labor necessitated by the public works undertaken and completed under Solomon, but also partly by the jealousy of the other tribes against Judah. An old line of cleavage (I S chs. 2-4) was thus revived, and, while Judah tacitly accepted Rehoboam, the other tribes took the occasion of the public assembly at Shechem (I K 12 1; II Ch 10 1), held for the purpose of recognizing him, to demand that this should take place only on condition that the new king lighten the burdens imposed by his father. R. took counsel first with the older leaders, and then with the younger, and ultimately followed the advice of the latter. This was that he should declare in favor of a policy of despotism with corresponding contempt of the rights of the people. The result was the secession of all but the tribe of Judah under the leadership of an Ephraimite, Jeroboam, the son of Nebat (I K 12 20; but according to I K 12 21, Benjamin joined Judah). The messenger of R. (Adoram) was stoned, and the king himself fled to Jerusalem, where he began preparations for an effort to regain control of the rebellious tribes. Two obstacles, however, thwarted him. First, the prophet Shemaiah forbade a war by Judah against his brethren; and, tho R. was disinclined to heed the prophet's words, the people accepted them as from J'. Secondly, in the fifth year of R.'s reign Shishak invaded the land and seriously crippled R.'s power. This invasion resulted in the stripping of the Temple of all the treasure accumulated by Solomon, including the golden shields. These R. replaced by brazen shields which were kept by special guards and used only when the king went to the Temple (I K 14 25-28). Rehoboam, like his father, had a numerous harem. The latter half of his reign seems to have been comparatively uneventful. A. C. Z.

REHOBOTH, rī-hō'beth (רְהוֹבוֹת, rēhōbhōth), 'open spaces': 1. A well dug by Isaac (Gn 26 22). The name survives in the Wādy Ruheibeh, near which, 17 m. SW. of Beersheba, is an ancient well which Palmer identifies with Rehoboth (Desert of the Exodus, ii, 383). 2. 'Rehoboth by the River' (Gn 36 37=I Ch 1 48). 'The river' is usually the Euphrates, and there is a Rahaba on the left bank of this river, not far below the junction of the Chaboras; but the context demands that this Rehoboth should be in Edom. It is probably Ρωβόθ of the Onomasticon (145 15), a military post in Gebolene (Lagarde, Onomastica Sacra, p. 286). L. G. L.—L. B. P.

REHOBOTH-IR, rī-hō'beth-er' (רְהוֹבוֹת־עִיר, rēhōbhōth 'ir), 'the city Rehoboth' (so AV), 'the streets of the city' AVmg.: A town built by Nimrod in Assyria (Gn 10 11). The words are not Assyrian, however, but Hebrew, and mean 'the open places of the city,' i.e., probably, the sparsely built suburbs of Nineveh. Inscriptions of Sargon and Esarhaddon mention the rēbit Nīnā, or 'open spaces of Nineveh,' as apparently an important suburb on the NE. of the city. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

REHUM, rī'hum (רְהוּם, rēhūm), 'compassion': 1. One of the leaders of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2; 'Nehum' Neh 7 7). 2. A Persian official in Samaria who wrote to Artaxerxes, charging the Jews, who were rebuilding Jerusalem, with rebellion. Empowered by a royal edict he put a stop to the work (Ezr 4 8 ff.). 3. A Levite who helped to repair the wall (Neh 3 17). 4. A Jewish family chief who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 25 [26]). 5. A Jewish priestly clan which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 3; called Harim in 12 15; cf. I Ch 24 8; Ezr 2 30 [=Neh 7 42]; Ezr 10 21).

C. S. T.

REI, rī'ai (רֵי, rē'i), 'friend': A courtier of David, who remained loyal when Adonijah attempted to become king (I K 1 8). The text here is uncertain.

C. S. T.

REINS: An archaic word for the kidneys, used in the AV to render the following two Heb. terms: (1) hālātsayim (dual only), 'loins,' so ARV (Is 11 5). (2) kēlāyōth (pl. only), 'kidneys,' as the most sensitive and vital part of man (Job 16 13; La 3 13), and figuratively, as the seat of the emotions and affections usually translated 'heart' RV (Job 29 27; Ps 16 7, 73 21, 139 13; Pr 23 16; Jer 12 2); also used with lēbh, 'heart,' the object of God's examination of character (Ps 7 9 [10], 26 2; Jer 11 20, 17 10, 20 12; cf. νεφρός (Rev 2 23, 'heart' RV). C. S. T.

REKEM, rī'kem (רֶקֶם, regem): I. 1. A king of Midian, slain by the Israelites (Nu 31 8; Jos 13 21). 2. An eponymous ancestor of a Calebite family connected with Hebron (I Ch 2 43 f.). 3. The eponym of a clan of Machir in Gilead (I Ch 7 16, Rakem EV, from the pausal Heb. form.) II. A Benjamite town (Jos 18 27), site unknown. C. S. T.

RELEASE. See SLAVERY, § 3, and SABBATH, § 5.

RELEASE, YEAR OF. See SABBATH, § 5.

RELIGION: Regard for what is believed to be deity. The idea of religion in its breadth and complexity is not anywhere in the O T expressed in a single term, but in phrases, such as 'the fear [service, worship] of J'' (Ps 2 11, 5 7, 29 2; Pr 1 7, 14 27; Jos 24 2 ff.), or of other gods (Dt 4 19, 29 26). In the N T the nearest equivalent of the Eng. term is θρησκεία 'religious profession' (Ac 26 5; Ja 1 26 f.; Col 2 18, 'worshipping' AV and RV). Of other words, σεβόμενοι (Ac 13 43, religious AV) is better rendered, as in RV, 'devout,' while δεισιδαιμονεστέρους (Ac 17 22, 'too superstitious' AV, 'somewhat superstitious' RVmg.) is scarcely intended to denote more than that single aspect of religion which consists in being awed by the belief in the existence of supernatural beings ('fear of demons'). A. C. Z.

RELIGIOUS. See RELIGION.

REMALIAH, rem'-a-lai'a (רמליה, remalyāhū): The father of Pekah, King of Israel (I K 15 25, etc.).

REMETH, rī-meth (רמֶת, remeth): A city of Issachar (Jos 19 21), also called Ramoth (q.v.) and Jarmuth. See JARMUTH.

REMISSION. See FORGIVENESS.

REMMON, rem'on (רִמּוֹן, rimmōn): A name found in Jos 19 7 AV, Rimmon RV. See EN-RIMMON.

REMMON-METHOAR, rem'-men-meth'o-ār. See RIMMON, II, 2.

REMNANT (also Residue): The term renders the Heb. and Gr. words: (1) 'ahārith, 'latter end' (Ezk 23 25), (2) serah, 'rest' (Ex 26 12 AV), (3) p'ālāh, 'escaped' (Ezk 14 22), (4) sārīdh, 'survivor' (Is 1 9), (5) yāthar (vb.), yether, 'excess' (Zec 14 2), (6) sh'ērith (Jer 42 2, etc.), sh'ār (Is 10 19, 16 14, etc.), 'remainder,' (7) λείμμα, κατάλειμμα (Ro 9 27, 11 5), (8) λοιπός, (Rev 11 13). The term has, besides its general, also a semi-technical sense. The latter arose during that period of Israel's history when the judgment of J' upon the people for national sin was announced by the prophets. A misleading impression was apt to be produced by their warning words, to the effect that punishment meant extermination. This, however, was not the prophets' conviction (cf. the name given by Isaiah to his son Shear-jashub, 'a remnant shall return,' Is 7 3). A portion of the people should survive the purging process and constitute the Remnant [Residue] (Ezr 9 8; Zec 14 2). But being rescued from destruction was only the beginning of the Remnant's career. Whereas the judgment of J' was to scatter the body of the nation among their enemies, the Remnant would be gathered together from all such places (Jer 23 3). It would then form the nucleus of a new Israel (Is 10 21, 11 11, etc.), grow into large prosperity (Zec 8 12), live in accordance with J''s holy law, become holy (Zeph 3 13), and recognize J' as its God (Zec 13 9; Jer 32 39). All this, however, was to occur as the result of the gracious control of J''s love for His Chosen People ('the zeal of J' shall perform it,' II K 19 31; Is 37 32).

REMPHAN, rem'fan. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 18.

REND THE GARMENTS. See MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 1.

REPENTANCE: The word is the equivalent of Heb. and Gr. terms as follows: (1) nōham, 'penitence' (Hos 13 14). In the majority of instances the verb is used to describe in anthropopathic language God's feeling as He views the sin and failure of men to realize His will (Gn 6 6). (2) μετάνοια (Mt 3 8, etc.), 'change of mind.' To repent is to change attitude; the test of repentance is the altered conduct (Mt 3 8; Lk 3 8). This does not exclude feeling; but feeling as the starting-point and motive for the new life in the future, not the result of that life which has been turned from. Godly sorrow leads to repentance, rather than flows from it (II Co 7 10). Repentance is the first condition of forgiveness (Ac 5 31). But it is impossible to bring this change upon one's own self, and the act is repeatedly said to be stimulated by the initiative of God Himself (Ac 11 18; II Ti

2 26). The solution of the apparent contradiction created by requiring that as a condition in man which is to be expected only as a result of Divine action is nowhere attempted in the Scriptures.

A. C. Z.

REPHAEL, rī'fā-el or ref'a-el (רפאֵל, rēphā'ēl), 'God heals': A doorkeeper of the second Temple (I Ch 26 7).

REPHAH, rī'fa (רפח, rephāh): A descendant of Ephraim (I Ch 7 25).

REPHAIAH, ref-ē'ya or ref''a-ai'a (רפחיה, rēphā-yāh), 'J' heals': 1. A descendant of David (I Ch 3 21). 2. A Simeonite chieftain (I Ch 4 42). 3. The ancestral head of a clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2). 4. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 9 43, called Raphah in 8 37). 5. One of those who repaired the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 9).

REPHAIM, ref'a-im (רפאים, rēphā'im), 'extinct aborigines,' which meaning Schwally (Leben nach dem Tode, p. 64 f.) connects with rēphā'im, 'shades,' 'ghosts'; the belief that the early inhabitants were giants came perhaps in part (W. R. Smith quoted in Driver, ICC on Dt, p. 40) 'from the contemplation of ancient ruins of great works and supposed gigantic tombs' (the AV renders by 'giants' except Gn 14 5, 15 20): It is the name for a giant aboriginal race of Canaan (Gn 15 20; Ja 17 15), of Moab and Ammon (Dt 2 11, here called Emim and in 2 20, Zamzumim); also of Bashan (Gn 14 5; Dt 3 11, 13; Jos 12 4, 13 12, 17 15). In other passages (II S 21 16-22; I Ch 20 4, 8, 8) we have the rendering 'sons of the giant' (Heb. hārāphāh, which may be taken as the name of the ancestor of the race of giants). See GIANTS; and ZUZIM.

C. S. T.

REPHAIM, VALLEY or VALE OF (רפאים בְּעֵמֶק, 'ēmeq rēphā'im): A broad and fruitful (Is 17 5) valley, SW. of Jerusalem, beginning on the SW. of the ridge separating it from the Valley of Hinnom (Jos 15 8, 18 16, valley of giants AV), and extending toward Bethlehem (II S 23 13 f.). The Philistines often invaded this valley in their contests with David, and at one time held Bethlehem, while David was in the cave of Adullam (II S 5 18 f., 23 13 f.; I Ch 11 15, 14 9 f.). He defeated them once at Baal-perazim (I Ch 14 11) and again at the mulberry-trees (b'khā'im), from which place he pursued them to the coast (II S 5 22 f.). It is modern Bak'a, a moderately large valley, or upland plain, SW. of Jerusalem.

REPHAN, rī'fan. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 18.

REPHIDIM, ref'i-dim (רפידים, rēphādīm, Ex 17 1, 8, 19 2; Nu 33 14 f.): According to P, a station of the Israelites in the desert before arriving at Sinai. The location is unknown. Advocates of the traditional identification of Sinai with Jebel Mūsa in the 'Sinaitic' Peninsula equate Rephidim with Wādī Feirān, which lies at the base of Jebel Serbāl, about 25 m. NW. of the traditional Sinai (Jebel Mūsa). A hill which rises 700 ft. above the N. side of the valley is regarded as the eminence from which Moses watched the battle (Ex 17 9 f.). Early Christian tradition identified Rephidim with Paran (whence Feirān), and the city here was made the seat of a bishopric. Numerous ruins of Christian edifices are found in the oasis. See Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, i, 158 ff. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

REPROACH: This word renders terms derived from five Heb. and four Gr. roots: (1) gādhaph, 'to blaspheme' (Nu 15 30, elsewhere rendered 'blaspheme'); giddāph (Is 43 28, 'revilings' RV; cf. Is 51 7; Zeph 2 8). (2) hezēdh (Pr 14 34), meaning 'disgrace.' (3) hārāph, the most common root, 'to say sharp things against,' 'taunt' (II K 19 4, 22 f.; Ps 42 10, etc.); herpāh, 'taunt' (I S 17 28, 25 30), 'scorn' (Neh 4 4 [3 38], 5 9, etc.), 'condition of shame' (Pr 6 33; Gn 30 23; Is 54 4, etc.), 'object of reproach' (Ps 39 8 [9], etc.; Ezk 5 15, etc.). (4) kālam, 'to humiliate' (Ru 2 15; Job 19 3); k'limmāh, 'insult' (Job 20 3, 'putteth to shame' RV). (5) qālōn (Pr 22 10, 'ignominy' RV). (6) ἀτιμάζω, 'dishonor' (II Co 11 21, 'by way of disparagement' RV). (7) ὀνειδίζω (=Heb. hārāph, in LXX.), 'to revile,' 'unjustly reproach' (Lk 6 22; Ro 15 3; I P 4 14; I Ti 4 10 AV); ὀνειδισμός, chiefly LXX. for herpāh (Ro 15 3; I Ti 3 7; He 10 33, 11 26, 13 13). (8) ὀνειδος (Lk 1 25), in LXX. usually for herpāh, three times for k'limmāh. (9) ὀβριζέω, to insult or 'treat shamefully' (Lk 11 45; cf. Mt 22 6, etc.); ὀβρις (II Co 12 10, 'injuries' RV). C. S. T.

REPROOF, REPROVE: These words render terms derived from one Gr. and three Heb. roots: (1) gā'ar, 'to scold,' 'reproach' (Jer 29 27 AV, 'rebuke' RV); g'ārāh (Job 26 11; Pr 17 10 AV, 'rebuke' RV). (2) yākhah, vb., 'chide' (Gn 21 25; Job 6 25, etc.; Pr 9 8, etc.), 'correct' (Job 13 10), 'convict of error' (Ps 50 21; Pr 30 6), 'judge' (Is 11 3), 'decide' (Is 11 4 RV); tōkhahath (Ps 38 [14] 15; 'argument' RVmg.; Hab 2 1, 'complaints' RV), usually in the sense of 'chiding' of God and man (Pr 1 23, 25, etc.), 'correction,' parallel to 'rod' (Pr 29 15). (3) yāsar, 'to correct' (Pr 9 7 RV). (4) ἐλέγχω, in the sense of rebuke (Lk 3 19; II Ti 4 2, 'bring to the proof' RVmg.) 'convict' (Jn 16 8 RV; Jn 3 20 RVmg.; Eph 5 11, 13); ἐλεγχος, 'convicting [of sin]' (II Ti 3 16). C. S. T.

REPTILES. See PALESTINE, § 26.

REReward. See REARWARD.

RESEN, rī'sen (רִישֵׁן, resen): A town in Assyria between Nineveh (on the Tigris opposite the modern Mōṣul) and Calah (the modern Nimrūd, 20 m. S. of Nineveh) on the Tigris, and according to Gn 10 12 founded by Nimrod. Site not yet found. C. S. T.

RESERVOIR. The rendering of mīqveh (Is 22 11, 'ditch' AV). The reference is probably to an additional pool for the water-supply of Jerusalem which Hezekiah was endeavoring to make more secure. See JERUSALEM, §§ 34, 35.

RESHEPH, rī'shef (רִשְׁפָּה, resheph): A descendant of Ephraim (I Ch 7 25).

RESIDUE. See REMNANT.

RESPECT OF PERSONS: This term (except in La 4 16) means 'to show partiality in judgment,' by having regard for the outward circumstances, social position, etc., of men and not for the merits of the case. It renders (1) nāsā' phānīm, 'lift up the face [i.e., person]' of another (Lv 19 15; in RV for 'accept' AV Job 34 19; Pr 18 5; Ps 82 2; in Mal 2 9 for 'partial' AV; cf. also Job 13 8, 10; Dt 10 17; and massō' phānīm, II Ch 19 7). In II S 14 14 RV reads correctly 'take away' (life). (2) Hiph. of nākhār pānīm, 'pay regard to the face' (Dt 1 17, 16 19; Pr 24 23, 28 21). (3) Various forms, προσωπολήμπτης (Ac 10 34), -λημπτεῖν (Ja 2 9), -λημπτα (Ro 2 11; Eph 6 9; Col 3 25; Ja 2 1); and (with a priv.) -λήμπτος (I P 1 17), 'accepter of,' 'to accept,' 'acceptance of persons': all from πρόσωπον, 'face,' and λαμβάνειν, 'to take.' (4) θαυμάζειν (Jude ver. 16), 'having men's persons in admiration' AV 'showing respect of persons' RV.

REST: When God had finished His work of creation (Gn 2 2 f.), He 'rested' (shābhath), or, better, 'ceased,' from activity. In the Heb. word there is evidently a reference to the 'Sabbath' (shabbāth), q.v. Refreshment is not implied in the word, altho in the same connection elsewhere such a rest (Heb. nūah) is spoken of (Ex 23 12; Dt 5 14; cf. Ex 31 17, 'rested and was refreshed'). The author of He (3 11, 4 4 f.) connects with this rest of God from creative activity the promise to Israel of an entrance into His rest (καταπαύειν, κατέπαυσας). This 'rest' (nūhāh, lit. 'resting-place') was to be in the land of Canaan (Dt 12 9 f.; He 4 1), but by disobedience they did not enter into it (Ps 95 11; cf. Dt 1 34-36; Nu 14 23, 32 10-12). The 'rest' of Israel depended upon God, into whose 'rest' they through obedience might enter (cf. Dt 28 65, mānāh). It was not obtained when they finally entered Canaan with Joshua; but was experienced in a measure under Solomon (I K 8 56). Altho the physical aspect of rest, in finding a resting-place in Canaan, unmolested by their enemies, is here uppermost, there seems to have been the deeper spiritual conception of rest, through communion with God (Ps 116 7; negatively expressed Is 28 12; the presence of J' with His people is implied in Ps 132 7, 14). The author of He renews the promise of entering into the true 'rest of God' to those who believe (He 4 1 f.). As to Israel, J' promises rest from sorrow and trouble (Is 14 3), so to those who die in the Lord there will be rest from their labors (Rev 14 13; cf. He 4 10). Christ offered men a 'rest' (ἀνάπαυσις, Mt 11 29) which was His, through service to men and communion with God.

RESTITUTION. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c); and ESCHATOLOGY, § 40.

RESTORE, RESTORATION. See CRIME AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (c); and ESCHATOLOGY, § 40.

RESURRECTION; 1. The Idea of Resurrection in the O T. The restoration of the dead to life is an idea which appears fully expressed first in the N T (ἀνάστασις, Mt 22 23; ἐξανάστασις, Ph 3 11; ἔγερσις, Mt 27 53), tho belief in resurrection appears in the later writings of the O T. The Book of Job, however, in which 19 26 f., is often taken as implying the belief, can not be cited among these. The passage referred to is very obscure, and the best interpretation excludes the idea of resurrection from it. The thought of the Book of Job seems, on the contrary, to exclude the expectation of a new life for the dead (7 8-10; 14 14). Dn 12 2 shows the belief more clearly. The circumstances in which this book was published called for encouragement to faithfulness and warning against apostasy. The persecution of the faithful and the easy escape of the lukewarm who surrendered their distinctiveness as Israelites presented a problem which could be solved only on the assumption of a bodily return of both, in order that the apparent injustice displayed by the several lots in the present life might be righted by the punishment of the one and the reward of the other. Of the resurrection of others than Israelites, however, even Dn does not take account; and resurrection, so far as expected, rests on the righteousness of God.

2. In the Intertestamental Period. In the intertestamental period Jewish thought was affected in a measure by the philosophy of Plato and the Stoics. So far as this is not the case, it is reflected in Sir, whose author distinctly denies immortality to man (17 30). This must, of course, be understood consistently with the belief in the current doctrine of Sheol (cf. ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 30, 31). In Wis, however, the traces of Hellenic influence are very clear. Immortality (2 23, 3 1), is not associated with resurrection, but with preexistence, as in the doctrine of Plato (Phædo, 70 ff.; Wis 8 20). But the legitimate successor of Dn, both as regards the definite assertion of resurrection and its basis, scope, and design, is II Mac. Here the righteous who suffer unto death are to be rewarded in a second life (II Mac 7 9, 11, 14, 30, 14 46). It was a teaching, however, which met with doubt and denial, and had to be maintained in spite of these difficulties. In the apocalyptic writings the doctrine appears finally and fully fixed. In fact, its scope is extended so as to include all men (Eth. En. 51 1), and its object is defined as judgment for the deeds done in the body (Eth. En. 22). In the Test. of the Twelve Patr. (Benj., 10) almost the very words of Dn 12 2 are echoed (cf. also the later apocalypses; IV Es 7 32, 5 46; Syr. Bar 427, 50 2). In the time of Christ the belief was a test of Jewish orthodoxy, and universally accepted. This is certainly to be gathered from the Mishna (Weber, Jüd. Theol.<sup>2</sup> pp. 369, 370). Skepticism on the subject did indeed find strong expression in the sect of the Sadducees; but the Pharisaic side of the debate had the best of the argument, as it appealed to the nature of the Messianic Kingdom and its privileges, which ought to be enjoyed by all the faithful.

3. Teaching of Jesus. Jesus, by His teaching, miracles, and resurrection, puts the subject in a new light, making the N T phase of belief in the resurrection a new departure. He takes up all that is of spiritual value in the doctrine as developed up to His time, and grounds it in the idea of immortality. But immortality itself He builds on the relation of the faithful to God (Mt 22 23 f.; Mk 12 18 f.; Lk 20 27). Yet on the questions that concern the outward details, such as whether all men shall return to life, and what the conditions of that life shall be, Jesus gives no information. Nor does He make resurrection necessary to a just distribution of rewards and punishments. Moreover, the teaching, as reported by Mt, does not go beyond postulating immortality for those whom God specially favors, whereas Lk admits of the possibility of it for all ('for all live unto him.') or with the final resurrection of all; their subjects are not introduced into a permanent and final state of being. But they illumine the subject by showing death in a new light. Until they were wrought, it was true that no one on earth had ever displayed power over death. They revealed such a one. They also illustrate the fact that life and death are alike ministers of good to those whom God loves.

4. Jesus' Miracles of Resurrection. The miracles of resurrection performed by Jesus (Mt 9 24; Lk 7 11; Jn ch. 11) occupy a peculiar position. They are not to be classed with His own return from the grave,

5. Resurrection of Jesus. But the greatest flood of light comes from the resurrection of Jesus Himself (cf. JESUS CHRIST, § 18). First, it establishes the fact that there is a vitality within the physical life of man which, when the outward forces of that life appear to be dissipated, can draw them back and reconstruct them. Since the resurrection of Jesus this may be taken to be a cosmic law of which that event was the first historic application (I Co 15 23). Secondly, it illustrates the fact that the material body of the resurrection must undergo a great change, that it must transcend some of the limitations under which the body exists before death. The exact quality of the change is not made clear, but the facts suggest the existence of a hidden power within the personality of man which, if developed, might control the bodily organism completely. Jesus seems to have had this control. He attenuated His body sufficiently to pass through closed doors; He made it unrecognizable by very close friends (Lk 24 29 f.; Jn 20 14, 21 4). On the other hand, He assimilated it to conditions of normal earthly life by eating and drinking (Lk 24 41 f.). Thirdly, the resurrection of Jesus infused vigor and stability into the whole realm of religious experience. It vitalized the faith of men in the invisible realities of the spiritual world (cf. I Co ch. 15).

6. Apostolic Teaching: Paul. In the earliest Apostolic thought, the resurrection of Jesus, with all its implications, came to occupy a place in the very center. Paul regards the faith of Christians as standing or falling with the reality or unreality of this fact (I Co 15 17; cf. also Ac 4 2, 33, 17 18). He further takes up the old question of the universality of the resurrection, and, with his characteristic breadth of thought, perceives that, in order to the application of the Gospel to all, judgment and resurrection must be predicted of all men. Hence he proclaims a twofold resurrection—of believers first and afterward of all (I Co 15 18; cf. also Rev ch. 20; yet this was anticipated in Dn 12 2). But, with equally characteristic logic, Paul interweaves the belief in the general resurrection with the resurrection of Jesus Christ. It is because Christ imparts a new and imperishable life that those who belong to Him are raised from the dead. If it be said that this makes immortality conditional, the answer is that Paul does not seem to accept this as a necessary inference from his doctrine. All shall be raised for judgment. The resurrection of others than believers must then be operated in a way which he does not undertake to explain.

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. See JESUS CHRIST, § 18; and RESURRECTION, § 5.

REU, רִ'וּ or רִּוּ (רִ'וּ, רִ'וּ), an old deity name (?): The son of Peleg in the line of Shem (Gn 11 18 f.; I Ch 1 25; Gr. Παρά in Lk 3 35, Ragau AV).

REUBEN, rū'ben. See TRIBE, TRIBES, §§ 2-4.

REUEL, rū'el (רְעוּל, rē'u'el): 1. The ancestral head of an Edomite clan (Gn 36 4-17; I Ch 1 35 f.). 2. The father-in-law of Moses (Ex 2 18; Nu 10 29 [Raguel AV]); but see JETHRO and HOBAB. 3. The 'prince' of Gad (Nu 2 14; called Deuel in 1 14, etc.). 4. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 9 8).

REUMAH, rū'ma (רְעֻמָּה, rē'umāh): The concubine of Nahor (Gn 22 24). Perhaps a clan-name.

REVELATION: 1. Biblical Terms. Broadly, this term signifies the communication of knowledge. The etymology of the English word suggests the removing of a veil, or covering, from what is hidden, thus making its existence and real nature known to the observer. This is also the strict sense of the Heb. and Gr. words: hannighlōth, 'things revealed,' Dt 29 29; ἀποκάλυψις (from ἀποκαλύπτειν); χρηματίζειν, Lk 2 28. In the O T the verb is used without any specific application to spiritual or religious knowledge (except in Am 3 7). But this is implied in the explanation of occult matters (dreams, Dn 2 10; cf. also Dt 29 29 and I S 3 7). In the N T the term χρηματίζειν, used only in Lk, indicates an oracular method of bringing information. Elsewhere the original conception of unveiling is maintained (Mt 10 26; Ro 1 17; Gal 1 12; Rev 1 1). But neither the simplicity of the terms used nor their persistent uniformity indicate a simple idea or a uniform usage; they are simply outward and verbal coincidences.

2. Definition. First of all, the term 'revelation' is applied to the act itself of imparting knowledge (as in Gal 1 12), then to the sum of the knowledge thus imparted (I Co 14 26); next, to a record or book containing such knowledge (technically 'apocalypse,' Rev 1 1), and finally, to a special method of imparting the knowledge as distinguished from other methods (Eph 3 3; I Co 14 6). From the point of view of the method of information the term is not necessarily tied to any specific connotations. Paul uses it to signify the immediate communication to his own mind of the truth of the Gospel; but he uses it also to denote the moral instructiveness of natural or cosmic law (I Ro 1 18 ff.)

3. Methods of Revelation. Revelation, then, in the typical sense, may be (1) subconscious, i.e., he who receives it may come to the conviction of the truth by a species of intuition, tho he may not feel called upon to give an account, either to himself or to others, of this process. (2) Rational or ratiocinative, i.e., by way of reasoning and inference from already known truth or observed fact. (3) Scientific, i.e., by the interpretation of nature, history, or current affairs in the light of God's existence and control of these matters. In all these three cases there is nothing to distinguish it from the way all other knowledge is attained. But it may be by some special or unusual method, such as (4) vision, or (5) theophany, or (6) dream, apart from the processes of nature, or by the manifest control and direction of those laws on the part of a power higher than the known laws. In these cases revelation may be properly called supernatural, tho the definition of this term in such usage should be strictly conventional.

4. Postulates of Revelation. The postulates of revelation include, on the one side, the existence of God, His personality, and His interest in man, or, in other words, the fundamental positions of theism. Only a spirit with life, purpose, and love subsisting behind and beneath [over] the world can be conceived as a revealer in the strict sense. But such a being is the God posited in every theistic system. Consequently, the idea of revelation is an integral part of every religion based on this conception of the universe (cf. Tiele, Gifford Lectures, I, p. 157; Pfeiderer, Philos. of Rel., Eng. transl., III, p. 305; Kaftan, Das Wesen d. Religion). On man's side, the main postulate of revelation is the faculty of spiritual perception. No matter how real the will to reveal Himself may be in God, it can never result in a revelation, unless there be in man an organ or faculty for apprehending what is communicated. In Biblical modes of expression this is best put in the proposition that spiritual endowment is a necessary condition for recognizing God's revelation. 'Spiritual things are spiritually discerned' (I Co 2 14). But the question at once arises whether such endowment is a universal gift, more or less latent in human nature, and developed in varying degrees in individuals, or a special and extraordinary talent, which only a few privileged characters in the history of the race have received. According to II Ti 3 16 and II P 1 21, the Spirit of God was breathed into the authors of the O T, and these were borne along by His power. For the N T, a typical claim is made by Paul in I Co 14 37 ('if any man thinks he is a prophet, or spiritual, let him take knowledge of the things which I write unto you, that they are the commandment of the Lord'). This means that to the authors of the Books of the Bible is attributed the power, unique either in kind or in degree, which enables them to understand God's thought as revealed to them. Not only the inspired writer, however, who perceives the revelation of God needs the spiritual faculty, but also the common man to whom he transmits it. The distinction between the first and the second has been put into the technical terms of inspiration and spiritual illumination. But the Biblical data are not clear enough, either to justify or to refute this distinction. The attitude of the revealing person to the recipient of revelation may further be conceived as one of waiting until the latter by his efforts apprehends the truth in store for him. The Biblical conception, however, is the reverse of this. It presents God as initiating the steps that lead to the recognition of him by man. 'The world by wisdom knew not God' (I Co 1 21; cf. also Job 11 7). Perfect knowledge is a gift of God's grace. Yet discovery and revelation are correlatives. The one supplements the other. But revelation is God's initiative, and underlies, stimulates, and supplements man's efforts. It is a result of God's fatherly love.

5. Revelation and Inspiration. As an action of God, working through His Spirit, the communication of a revelation to the human mind and His guidance of it to the moment of its expression in words, either oral or written, has been called inspiration. The fact of such inspiration is unmistakably presented in the Bible. In the O T the prophets claim that they are directed by J" in the delivery of their messages. (See PROPHECY, PROPHECY, § 6). But more clearly in the N T, the authoritative word of God is recognized to have been given under Divine guidance, both in its utterance (II P 1 21) and in its writing down (II Ti 3 16; cf. also Jn 10 36). The Apostle Paul further lays claim to authority for his message, and therefore to his being directed in its delivery (I Co 2 4, 13; Gal 1 12). And in a single instance (II P 3 15) one N T writer by implication attributes to another (Paul) Divine inspiration of the same kind as that which belonged to the O T Scriptures. Just what this Divine guidance secured in the delivery of the message the Biblical data do not explicitly indicate. Negatively, from Paul's disclaimer of absolutely perfect utterance (II Co 2 4), his failure of memory regarding small details (I Co 1 16), and his admission that his judgment on the subject of marriage might be wrong, even tho he had the Spirit of God (I Co 7 40), indicate that he regarded inspiration as a means of assuring himself and others of the authority of his message, rather than a process by which he became infallible in thought and expression. But, upon the whole, it may be said that the Biblical statements are neither full nor clear enough to warrant any definite theory of inspiration.

6. Occasionalism of Revelation. Another result of the dependence of revelation on the power of the human mind to apprehend it is the historical unfolding of revealed truth in parts and fragments (He 1 1 f.). Revealed truth has not come as a complete system, but as 'precept upon precept, line upon line' in concrete experiences, calling for specific guidance and instruction. This may be called the occasionalism of revelation. As need appeared and occasions offered, principles were inculcated into the minds and hearts of a few chosen men. But once received, these principles became a permanent possession, to be used whenever similar needs should again arise. Accordingly, the more important and needful lessons were given first, and again afterward in many and repeated forms, naturally with a slightly differing aspect with each repetition. The less needed, less universal and controlling thoughts appear less frequently, but both classes appear in concrete forms.

7. Progress in Revelation. But revelation shows also a unity and coherency which make it appropriate to speak of the process as a progressive one. The word 'development' applied to it is not altogether a misnomer; and even the term 'evolution,' properly defined, would describe a real aspect of the gradual and cumulative delivery of the truth of God. Moreover, not only the volume or fulness of truth and the clear enunciation of it are subjects of this progressiveness, but also the methods of its communication. In the earlier stages there was much that was simple and crude. The diviner and soothsayer found a place among those who were supposed to be privileged with special revelations. It is difficult to see much difference between visits to seers to ascertain the whereabouts of lost property (I S 9 3 f.) and visits to oracles (Delphi, Dodona, etc.) for similar purposes. To 'inquire of J"' is to seek a revelation, but about matters of ordinary and commonplace nature. Even affairs of state (I K 22 13) are scarcely of the level of importance with the revelation of truth in the Prophetic Age and in the N T. Further, in this earlier stage the most striking and cruder methods prevail. The inner and more refined are rarer. J" is consulted through ephod, through Urim and Thummim, and through dreams (I S 28 6). It is only with Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Jeremiah that the subconscious conviction of ethical truth comes into full play and takes a supreme place.

8. Revelation Through Dreams. Dreams were regarded as possible means of revelation in all stages of Biblical thought. Even in the N T they are so referred to (Mt 1 20, 2 13, 20). On the other hand, it must be noted that the Hebrews never went to the extreme of exalting oneiromancy ('dream-divination') into a legitimate feature of religious life. The professional 'dreamer,' tho known, was not conceded the position of a chosen medium of Divine communication. The artificial stimulation of dreams and their superstitious interpretation, as among the Arabs, Zulus, and others, were, on the contrary, rebuked by the prophets (Dt 13 1 f.; Jer 27 9). Dreams were merely possible vehicles of God's approach to man, and this in one of two ways, i.e., (1) by the appearance of a theophany in a dream (as to Jacob at Bethel, Gn 28 12), or (2) by the indication of His intention with reference to men and peoples in significant symbolism (Am 7 1 f.). In the latter case there was need of interpretation, and the gift of interpreting was bestowed on favored individuals by God Himself (Gn chs. 40, 41; Dn 2 28). Dreaming as a medium of revelation is thus left exactly on the same plane with all other psychological processes. It is a condition neither more nor less favorable for the awakening of spiritual impulses and the attaining to a knowledge of Divine things than the state of wakefulness. As a rule, while reasoning power is not so coherent and normal, the suprarational and infrarational activities of soul-life are quite keen, and there is no difficulty in conceiving that through these the Divine thought may find entrance into the human mind. The 'new' psychology vindicates this position in its doctrine of the subliminal self which plays such an important part in the life of the soul. (Cf. Morton Prince, The Unconscious.)

9. The Trance. Another medium of revelation in the earlier period was the trance (I S 10 6; II K 3 15; Ac 10 10, 22 17). By trance (ecstasy) is generally understood a state of the soul in which the free activity of the intellect and the initiative and control of the will are temporarily suspended. It is not a peculiarly Biblical idea that in the trance the subject comes into direct touch with, and in fact falls under, the immediate control of God. Ecstasy is found in the early period, before the prophetic method of rational control took the place of it, and again in the Apostolic Age, when the emotional accompaniments of religious experience were most vivid. It was not esteemed as of the highest value by Paul (I Co 14 23, 33), who, tho himself subject to ecstatic experiences (II Co 12 2 f.), yet does not indicate that these resulted in the preternatural addition to his fund of information regarding the spiritual world.

10. Vision. Vision differs from trance in including or presupposing the indispensable element of rational control. Its characteristic is the presentation to the eye, either physically or in imagination, of revealed truth in pictorial form. In most cases, however, the materials of the pictures were present in the seer's own mind, and whether subjective or objective, the vision does not break into the stream of the prophet's psychological movement, but rather grows out of it. Consequently, a vision may be simply an oracular or inspired conception, which the prophet realizes to be due to a Divine influence exerted on his own mind (Is 1 1, 21 2, 22 1; Mic 1 1; Hab 2 2); or it may be an objective appearance built out of the prophet's mental store and serving as a vivid picture, both to himself and to his hearers, of the truth to be imparted through him (Is ch. 6; Jer 1 5; Am 7 8); or, finally, it may be a construction more or less of his own, projected into objectivity for the sake of convenience and adding to the vividness of the impression of his message. Ezekiel's visions (ch. 1) are either of this kind or of the type just preceding; Daniel's are certainly of this class. It was this vehicle of prophecy that led to the development of Apocalypics. (See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 1.)

11. Direct Revelation. Theophany. A more direct contact with God is named in Ex 33 11 and Dt 5 4 as a speaking 'face to face.' The phrase is apparently clear, but it is found on closer examination that what it means exactly eludes investigation. It does not mean a peculiar and unique prophetic experience; for it is predicated of the whole people in the passage in Dt. On the other hand, it does not mean merely an immediate approach to God and a free and full communication with Him, for it is a privilege given to His special servant, Moses. Beyond this, the general idea of a face-to-face revelation does not evince clear characteristics (cf. also Jacob at Peniel, Gn 32 30). Finally, theophany is in a sense revelation. But it does not appear that it ever was a source of addition to the knowledge of God and of His will. The theophanies (see ANGEL, § 3, and GLORY, § 4) are manifestations of God's presence for purposes of attestation, rather than revelations of His nature. They presuppose a knowledge of Him sufficient to serve as a basis of recognition, but do not add to its fulness.

12. Revelation Through Prophets. Prophecy is not identified with any particular mode of revelation. Its characteristic in the earlier stages was heightened feeling, often culminating in ecstasy. But prophets were also given messages through dreams and oftener through visions and subconsciously formed convictions (cf. PROPHECY, PROPHECY, in general, and especially §§ 5, 12 f.). The persistent elements in prophecy are not to be found in the form in which the message comes, but in the certitude of its reality (Am 3 7 f.) and the irresistible impulse to publish it (Jer 20 9).

13. Revelation in N T. In the N T revelation is known to take place through the Spirit of Prophecy, designated more definitely the Holy Spirit, and recognized as the source of all revelation in the O T times (Mk 12 36; Ac 1 16; He 3 7, 9 8). But the nature of the truth revealed might prevent the human agents through which it was given from fully grasping the meaning of it (I P 1 11). In any case, however, the prophets appointed to communicate saving truth committed their message to writing under the controlling influence of the Holy Spirit. See CHURCH LIFE, § 6. In general, the work of the Holy Spirit in the mind is to be recognized as a means of revealing the mind of God to individuals (Jn 14 26). But there is also direct revelation from the Father (Mt 16 17).

14. Jesus Christ as a Revealer. All other forms of the revelation of God's character, mind, and will come to a climax in the life, words, and work of Jesus Christ (He 1 1 f.), who is explicitly declared to be 'the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance' (He 1 3). Jesus Himself claimed to possess and impart knowledge regarding God which no other person can have attained except through Him (Mt 11 25, 27). In the Logos idea of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 1 1 f.) this conception is worked out into the doctrine that the eternal rational principle in God finds self-expression in the incarnation. Hence Jesus can say: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (Jn 14 9). Accordingly, even Paul states that the revelation of God's love is made to himself through the vision of Jesus Christ (Gal 1 12). Christ is 'the mystery of God . . . in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge' (Col 2 3); but He does not remain a mystery permanently; for in the incarnation He assumes the form of a human person (Col 2 9), i.e., becomes the self-manifestation of God in life and action (see also Col 1 15, 19; II Co 4 6).

REVELATION OF JOHN, THE: 1. Title. The last book of the Bible, entitled in some later MSS. The Revelation of St. John the Divine. Strictly speaking, it was not John who made the revelation, but God who gave it to Jesus Christ, and He through His messenger to His servant John. This work has been known historically as the Apocalypse ('revelation'), because cast into the form of a vision, of dramatic representation, seen as if by the 'unveiling' of the eternal world before the eyes of the seer.

2. Form. The most striking feature of Rev is its literary form, that of an apocalypse, which places it in a special class of literary works (cf. APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 1). The apocalyptic form serves mainly to explain the symbolism and eschatology of Rev. Some of this symbolism is directly, or indirectly, derived from earlier apocalypses, from the books of Daniel and Ezekiel, and even from Babylonian sources (so Gunkel and Bousset). But whether borrowed from other sources or created by the author, these figures are simply the material out of which is constructed the vehicle for his thought; they are merely the alphabet of his language.

3. History of the Book. Rev was known and certainly used as early as the middle of the 2d cent. Echoes or vague evidences of its existence appear still earlier in the Apostolic Fathers (II Clem. 17 7; Hermas, Vis. I, 3 2, 4 1; II, 2 7, 4 1; III, 5 1; IV, 1 10, 2 1, 4; Mand. X, 3 2; Ign. Eph. 15 3). Papias is reported to have quoted the book in his lost writings (cf. Andreas Cæsariensis, in Apoc. 34; Sum. 12). Justin Martyr distinctly names John as its author (Dial. ch. 81, p. 308 B; Eus. HE, IV, 18). After Justin, it is frequently ascribed to the Apostle John (cf. Charteris, Canonicity, pp. 239-256). On the other hand, in consequence of misinterpretations of the book, its authority and authorship were seriously disputed. The Alogi, quite early, ascribed it, together with the Fourth Gospel, to Cerinthus. Dionysius of Alexandria, a follower of Origen, comparing the language and contents of the Fourth Gospel with that of Rev, argued that, while the former was Johannine, the latter could not be (Eus. HE, VII, 25). There were also those who, like Marcion in the 2d cent., did not hesitate to reject its authority, without disputing its Johannine authorship. In the E., the judgment of the Syrian Church was pronouncedly and persistently unfavorable. In Alexandria and elsewhere opposition was lukewarm but gradually diminished until it disappeared. The Western Church, on the other hand, from the beginning accepted Rev into its canon. Jerome occupied an anomalous position, accepting it, but assigning it to a place among the scripturae ecclesiasticae, i.e., books useful and profitable for Christians to read but not of Canonical authority. At the time of the Reformation, the attitude of Erasmus was similar to that of Jerome. Luther wavered, and at last put Rev at the end of the N T, with James, Jude, and Hebrews, breaking the connection in paging between this section and the rest of the volume. Zwingli excluded it from the Bible, and Calvin wrote no commentary on it. Since the beginning of the 19th cent. interest in Rev has centered in the questions of its Authorship, Canonicity, and Interpretation.

4. Authorship. The question of the authorship of Rev began with the investigation of its relation to the Fourth Gospel. The Tübingen critics took the ground that the book, as the product of a Jewish tendency, was certainly the work of John the Apostle. Schleiermacher and his followers on the other hand, assuming that the Fourth Gospel was written by the Apostle, regarded Rev, because of its differences from the Gospel, as the work of another man. From this discussion, implicated as it was in presuppositions, saner criticism soon extricated the work, endeavoring upon the ground of internal characteristics to reach its origin. A form of redaction theory to account for the facts was proposed by Völter (Die Entst. d., Apoc., 2 (1885) and Vischer (In TU., 1886). This view was still further elaborated by Spitta (Offenbarung Joh. Untersucht, 1889), and by P. Schmidt (Anmerkungen ü. d. Composition d. Offenb. Johannis, 1897). Gunkel (Schöpf. u. Chaos, 1894) and Bousset (Der Antichrist, 1895) found the sources in antecedent written and unwritten lore, derived from Babylonia. Reduced to this form, the question of integration or redaction becomes simply one of the extent of the use of existing material by the author, and is consistent with a large amount of independence and originality. The trend of the most recent discussion is that a certain John wrote in his own name instead of using the name of an ancient sage, as do the other apocalyptists of the general period (I. T. Beckwith, The Apocalypse of John, 1919; S. J. Case, The Revelation of John, 1919; R. H. Charles, in ICC., 1920; A. S. Peake, The Revelation of John, n.d. and Allo, Saint Jean, L'Apocalypse, 1921). Allo identifies this John with the son of Zebedee; Beckwith, somewhat hesitatingly, is inclined to do the same; while the other scholars mentioned incline to the view that he is a different person. Charles designates him 'John the Prophet.' All that can be affirmed, however, is that Rev certainly arose within a Jewish Christian setting, its author using apocalyptic symbolism and language familiar in Jewish Christendom, and perhaps incorporating fragments of apocalyptic literature current in his day. He calls himself 'John,' the 'servant' of Jesus Christ (1 1) and as 'your brother and partaker with you in the tribulation,' etc. (1 9) and as being 'in the isle called Patmos for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus' (1 9). That his own name was John is possible, but not necessary to assume. No sufficient reason can be shown why he should have departed from the rule followed by the apocalyptists that the author of an apocalypse should be unidentified, and that it was necessary for the reader only to fix his mind on the seer of the visions, whom he describes and whose experiences he reports. The author was thoroughly familiar with the O T and appreciated the honor and prerogatives of the Jews as God's first chosen people (7 1-3, 11 1-13). He felt himself called to the work of a prophet, i.e., to bring a message to God's people under the special guidance of the Holy Spirit (22 18).

5. Date. As to the date of Rev recent research and discussion point quite precisely to the reign of Domitian (94-96)—a return to the earliest tradition. Irenæus (175-200) asserted that the Apocalypse 'was seen at Patmos at the end of Domitian's reign.' Conflicting traditions, recorded by Tertullian and Epiphanius, are less trustworthy. The critical grounds for this date are: (1) the allusions to the violent persecution of the Church (6 9, 13 1, 14 9), and (2) the expectation that Nero was about to return (17 11). This expectation was popularly entertained, and served the author as a vehicle for the ideas he wished to address to his own audience. The argument based on 11 1 ff. (which passage seems to imply that the Temple was still standing), for a date before the destruction of Jerusalem, is scarcely strong enough to counterbalance these considerations, especially the fact of the vivid picture of deadly opposition on the part of the imperial government toward Christianity as such. The passage 11 1 ff. may be from one of the sources used by the author, and thus may have been written before 70 A.D. Under Nero, or at any time before the fall of Jerusalem, such opposition did not exist. Furthermore, the expectation of a New Jerusalem (21 10 ff.), to take the place of the Holy City destroyed by Titus, before the catastrophe of 70 would have been only a prophetic ideal; but after that date, it became a glowing hope intimately associated with the Golden Age (analogous to Ezk, chs. 40-48).

6. Methods of Interpretation. Rev has always puzzled the Christian reader, mainly because of its unique position as the only extensive apocalyptic production in the N T, making it impossible to compare it easily with other similar works, and master its peculiar modes of presentation. Moreover, the key to this class of literature was lost quite early. From the nature of the case there was a great risk involved in disclosing its specific references. An apocalyptic book is composed in a language intended to reveal, and at the same time to conceal, the author's mind, to make it known to his audience, but to keep it secret from others, especially the hostile powers it pictures and denounces. Its language is esoteric. While therefore it makes a definite appeal to be understood (13 18, 17 9), the reader, belonging to the special audience addressed, is supposed to have the key, of which the outsider must remain ignorant.

The methods which have been used in the interpretation of Rev are usually grouped under three heads: the Futurist, the Preterist, and the Continuous Historical. (1) The Futurist assumes that Rev is a predictive description of the events that shall immediately precede the end of the world. Just as Genesis throws before the eye in grand pictures the beginning, so Rev depicts in equally grand, and far more impressive, pictures the end of cosmic and human development. The one shows the origin of the world, especially the beginnings of sin upon the earth, the other reveals the end, giving a conception of the ultimate victory over sin, and the restoration of complete dominion to God, the Creator of all. For the author's own time, and for the intervening period, the book could be useful only as a ground of assurance, tho a very strong one, that some time God would triumph over evil and bring it to its just termination. The reader in the meantime must be in expectancy, so that when the predictions of the book shall begin to be fulfilled he may see their meanings, tho he always must have confidence that all the reverses of the Church and triumphs of the enemy are temporary, and that the cause dear to him is safe in the hands of the Almighty. Chs. 1 and 2 are excepted from this method of interpretation, as they seem to be directly addressed to existing churches. Able exponents of this view are B. Newton, J. H. Todd, C. Maitland, S. R. Maitland, I. Williams, D. Burg, and others. (2) The Preterist view is exactly the opposite of the Futurist. It assumes that the author's concern was solely with his own times. He speaks to the men of his own generation and regarding conditions then existing. He speaks with the conviction that his own generation is the last upon earth. The end is near. Jesus is about to come the second time in glory, to establish the Kingdom of God according to His promise, and what was transpiring was simply the preparation for this coming. Consequently, all the symbolism of the book is to be explained upon the basis of events and personages within the 1st cent.

Babylon is Imperial Rome; the Beast is the dynasty of the Cæsars, or some special member of it; the False Prophet is the religious hierarchy of Rome. The number 666 signifies Nero, and is to be read by gematria, נרון קסר (Nero Cæsar). The significance of the book thus becomes purely historical, tho for the author and his contemporaries it had a present value. The most eminent expounders of this view are Grotius, Bousset, Calmet, Wettstein, Eichhorn, Hug, Herder, Ewald, Lücke, De Wette, Düsterdieck, Stuart, Maurice, and Farrar, and with certain reservations more recent commentators, such as Scott, Beckwith, Peake, Case, and Charles. (3) The continuous historical view avoids the one-sidedness of both of the preceding. It assumes that, while the apocalyptic's vision is of the things that must be at the end of the world, it necessarily includes the interval between his own day and the end. Thus the exponents of this theory have attempted to identify in the symbolism of Rev historical events of cardinal importance, such as the spread of Mohammedanism, the growth of the Papacy, the Crusades, the Reformation, the discovery of the Western hemisphere, and a thousand others. The chief supporters of this standpoint are Vitringa, Bengel, Sir Isaac Newton, Mede, Faber, E. B. Elliott, Wordsworth, Hengstenberg, Ebrard, and Alford. These three methods have not always been applied exclusively. Futurists at times admit the use of symbolical forms referring to the environment of the author. Continuous historical interpreters have recognized the primacy of ideas underlying the events portrayed, and have found the fulfilment of the predictive imagery not in single events, but in a series of recurrent ones having a similar character and import. Some preterists have finally seen in the description of the historical situation of the 1st cent. an interest projected into the present and the future. But the effort has always been to identify portraiture with events, and thus all three theories have been failures. (4) Consequently, since the rediscovery of the true nature of apocalyptics a fourth method of interpretation has been tried, which may be designated the recurrent prophetic method. This method assumes that the book was composed primarily to meet a present need within its day, and was designed to be understood by the men of that generation which knew and used apocalyptic language. Its allusions are largely to the affairs of the author's time. Some of its forms are ancient, traditionally traceable back to the Babylonian mythology, some were constructed by the author himself de novo, others he found in apocalyptic fragments current in his day. But to all he attached peculiar meanings according to the demands of his own task. The need, however, which the book as a whole is designed to meet is a recurrent one. And the principles presented in it can be used upon every emergence of the same circumstances; so that, while the events with which Rev deals are imminent (1 1), their interest is permanent. They are samples and illustrations of a long series lasting to the end of time. The book does not purport to give items of historical character and importance, but an account at a glance of the whole course of the Church's experience. The futurist and continuous-historical methods fail in that they fasten on external events, rather than on the living principles illustrated and symbolized by the imagery used. Similarly, the preterist errs when it limits the author's view to the events of his environment, and makes him simply a painter in highly colored symbols of these facts. He was more than that. He was a prophet who saw eternal forces at work in the play of affairs about him and declared them to be the underlying spiritual realities of the whole course of time, whether that were to continue for milleniums or to come to an abrupt close within a generation. The Muratorian Canon, as early as the 2d cent., points to the right method of reading Rev. It says: 'John, too, in the Apocalypse, altho he writes only to seven churches yet addresses all.'

7. Contents and Expositions. The book opens with the announcement by the author of the method and purpose of his revelation (1<sup>1-3</sup>). This is followed by a series of seven messages to the seven churches. As an introduction to these, the author attaches the usual self-naming and greeting of the typical epistle (1<sup>4-5</sup>) and adds an account of the circumstances of the vision received at Patmos and of the Sender of the messages as he was seen in the vision (1<sup>8-20</sup>). This is designed to assure the reader that the Head of the Church is ever watchful over it, ready to protect it, but also to instruct, purify and strengthen it. Next come the messages: (1) To Ephesus (2<sup>1-7</sup>); (2) to Smyrna (2<sup>8-11</sup>); (3) to Pergamum (2<sup>12-17</sup>); (4) to Thyatira (2<sup>18-29</sup>); (5) to Sardis (3<sup>1-6</sup>); (6) to Philadelphia (3<sup>7-13</sup>); and (7) to Laodicea (3<sup>14-22</sup>). In these seven messages, sent to as many typical churches, the author performs in genuine fashion the function of the prophet towards God's people. He aims to purge each congregation of the evil which is hindering its life, to foster the good there is in it, and to put it in the best possible condition for the struggle in the impending crisis. The seven messages, tho addressed to separate communities, have a common interest for all of them. Underlying them is a sense of their unity. Each message contains 'what the spirit saith to the churches.' With the close of the seventh message the book takes a new turn. A picture of a heavenly court is presented, with a throne set in the midst, and four living creatures and twenty-four elders surrounding the throne, and giving glory to Him that was seated on it (4<sup>1-11</sup>). This is an impressive symbolization of the majesty and power of God, the source of all good, and the ground of the Church's hope; but the chief object of the revelation of Him as such is that He is about to commit (as He does in the immediately following scene) the knowledge of His purpose ('book') to Christ ('the Lamb') (5<sup>1-14</sup>). The book is sealed with seven seals. No man is able to open or read it until the Lamb appears, whereupon doxologies are sung in His praise. Upon the opening of the first seal a warrior, riding a white horse, appears; the second seal ushers a red horse with its rider; the third, a black horse, whose rider predicts famine; the fourth, upon a pale horse, representing death, is followed by Hades (6<sup>1-8</sup>). These four horsemen symbolize the lust for conquest with its inevitable consequences of war, famine, and death. As the fifth seal is opened, the souls of the saints underneath the altar present their complaint (6<sup>9-11</sup>). With the breaking of the sixth seal, an earthquake takes place, and the great day of wrath is ushered in (6<sup>12-17</sup>). The fifth and sixth seals deepen the impression of the ruin and devastation caused hitherto. From this devastation the redeemed are delivered and reserved for special privileges (7<sup>1-17</sup>). The opening of the seventh seal is followed after a half hour of silence (8<sup>1-5</sup>) by the sounding of seven trumpets, divided into four and three. The first four signal the occurrence of various forms of destruction upon the earth (8<sup>1-13</sup>). The fifth trumpet is followed by the plague of locusts, declared to be the first wo (9<sup>1-12</sup>). These locusts represent the agents of God in punishing his enemies. The sixth trumpet looses four angels with their destructive armies of terrible horsemen, inflicting penalties upon the unbelieving heathen world (9<sup>13-21</sup>). Then comes the vision of the strong angel and the seven thunders, the contents of which the seer is forbidden to reveal, followed by the vision of the angel with the little book and the two witnesses (10<sup>1-11</sup>), whose appearance closes the second wo (11<sup>1-14</sup>). The two witnesses here are Moses and Elijah who might be expected to return in order to lead Israel to the acceptance of Christ. The seventh trumpet is the signal for a doxology upon the revelation of the Ark of the Covenant in the heavenly temple (11<sup>15-19</sup>). The vision which follows is that of the woman with a child and the Dragon, who seeks to devour the child (12<sup>1-16</sup>). This, of course, is a reference to the first coming of Christ as the occasion and ground for the crisis envisaged in the whole book. It leads to a struggle (a war in heaven) whose result is the overthrow of the great Red Dragon identified at this point with the Devil and Satan (12<sup>17-18</sup>). In another vision there appears a Beast, coming out of the sea (the Roman Empire), followed by another Beast, coming out of the earth (13<sup>1-10</sup>), probably the heathen religious hierarchy. Again the Lamb appears, now upon Mount Zion (14<sup>1-5</sup>). His appearance is followed by three proclamations delivered by special angels (14<sup>6-12</sup>), and three minor visions symbolical of the end of all things (14<sup>13-20</sup>), i.e., the judgment and restitution of order under the Messiah. At this point the symbolism changes. Seven angels appear with seven golden bowls whose contents are plagues, symbolizing the punishment of the Roman Empire for accepting emperor-worship as its religion. The plagues are sent upon the earth, the sea, the rivers, the throne of the Beast, the Euphrates, and the air (16<sup>1-21</sup>), in other words, upon the whole world as subject to Rome. Then follows the mystery of the great and wicked Babylon (17<sup>1-18</sup>), (Imperial Rome), the woman seated on the scarlet beast, together with her condemnation and destruction (18<sup>1-24</sup>). So vivid and important is this in the seer's view that he gives seven forms to his declaration of it. Upon the completion of his announcement a fourfold hallelujah is sung in heaven and other tokens of jubilation are observed (19<sup>1-5</sup>). Satan is bound and cast into the abyss (20<sup>2</sup>), and Christ reigns for 1,000 years. This millennium is the consummation of Messiah's struggle with the world powers, but it is not the end of all things; hence upon its close Satan is loosed, only, however, to be overcome once more and cast into the lake of fire and brimstone together with his associates (20<sup>10</sup>). All enemies of God are then brought to judgment (20<sup>11-15</sup>). What now is left is the reconstruction of the world according to God's primal plan. A new heaven and a new earth are announced and described (21<sup>1-22</sup>). The book then closes with a threefold conclusion: first, the words of the revealer (Christ, 22<sup>6-7</sup>); next the seer's attestation (22<sup>8</sup>); and finally, an additional confirmation and invitation (22<sup>10-20</sup>), closing with the benediction (22<sup>21</sup>).

8. Purpose, Dramatic Character and Religious Value of Rev. From what has been said thus far it is evident that Rev was written for the purpose of encouraging the Churches of Asia at a time when they were passing through an experience of great trial. As the Jewish Church had been threatened with destruction in the persecution of Antiochus IV, and the Book of Daniel (together with the early parts of Enoch) was written to encourage and stay the faith of the Jews by the assurance of God's overruling providence which would destroy the enemy and give the kingdom to the saints (Israel); and as later when Rome instead of Syria was looked upon as the enemy of God's people and rule on earth, Jewish Apocalyptists assured their fellow-Jews that Rome would be destroyed and God's Kingdom would be manifested in the triumph of Judaism (later parts of Enoch, the Apocalypses of Baruch and Ezra, etc.); and just as in these Jewish Apocalypses the ultimate victory of God and His people is not simply a victory over a hostile world-power but over Satan and his hosts, and thus the transcendent world (heaven and hell, angels, demonic powers, etc.) and not only time but also eternity are involved; so in Rev the persecution of the Church by Imperial Rome with all of its limitless resources of power and wealth is viewed as the work of Satan, whose instrument Rome is, and the worship of the Emperor demanded of the Christians is viewed as the worship of the 'beast' to conform to which would mean that Caesar was greater than Christ. In other words, the fundamental principle of the Jewish Apocalyptists is retained in Rev, but in the place of Judaism we have the Christian Church, whose Christ is the Messiah Judaism rejected, and in the place of Rome as a wicked temporal power hostile to the Jews as a nation or people we have Rome as the representative of Satan seeking to destroy the Church of Jesus Christ.

The writer was profoundly convinced that such was the tremendous issue at stake. The persecutions and the martyrdoms (even tho these may not have been many) were to him sure indications of what was involved. The faltering faith of some, and the actual apostasy of others showed him how urgent the need was for the Church to understand the real nature of the situation. Not merely to encourage, but to instruct and lead them to understand the signs of the times, the issue involved, and to realize how glorious the future of the Church was to be—such was the purpose of the book.

In common with the general belief of the Apostolic Age the writer supposed that the end of this age was imminent. Only a brief interval was to elapse before the great judgment (long expected by the Jewish Apocalyptists as the chief feature of the Messianic Age) on the wicked world should take place, to be preceded or ushered in by signs, wonders, and calamities in the whole universe, seen and unseen, spiritual, natural and political. The program as it lay in the writer's mind was in reality a simple one: (1) The present distress (evidence of Satan's activity in attempting to destroy the Church), and the disasters, visitations, calamities, etc., that are to precede the time of crisis. (2) The great judgment (on earth) in which both transcendental and mundane forces and factors are operative. The climax of this will be the fall of Rome, the end of the domination of the 'beast,' the 'false prophet,' and all agents of Satan and their punishment. (3) The conflict in the transcendental realm between God and Satan; the overthrow of Satan and all his forces and their everlasting punishment in 'the Abyss.' (4) The glorious future of the Church 'the Bride of the Lamb.'

How to set forth this program in the most convincing way was evidently a matter of great concern to the author. He bestowed infinite care on the composition of his book with the result that his book is not only the masterpiece of apocalyptic literature, but one of the most remarkable books of the world's literature. He gave to his work (from ch. 4 on) an essentially dramatic form, almost as tho it were intended to be acted out on the stage. The author's stage is the universe—the transcendental world and its reflex or counterpart, this mundane visible world we know. At the center is the Heavenly Throne and Court, in whose control are all the forces of the world. Heaven, Earth, and Hell are all involved in the action of the drama. The Heavenly Choir, so skilfully introduced from time to time as the action proceeds reveals the meaning of movements and events as these are seen and interpreted in Heaven, tho to earthly view they may be inexplicable. The introductory scene (chs. 4 and 5) in which the Lamb (Christ crucified and glorified) is alone able to 'unseal' the book (of fate or destiny) is set forth most skilfully and suggestively. The arrangement of the great program in three successive stages—the seven seals, trumpets, and plagues: in each of which the arrangement is such that the first four are quite similar, then the succeeding two are closely connected, while the seventh has a character peculiar to itself, and the significant pause in the first two series between the sixth and seventh (cf. ch. 7 and 10 1-11 14) reveal the dramatic skill and art possessed by the author.

The action of the Apocalypse moves forward steadily toward the great culmination, the conquest and final punishment of the Devil and his agents and the Marriage of the Lamb. Only in the last three chapters (20-22) does there seem to be a serious interference with orderly development. Here it would seem that Dr. Charles' theory of the work of an editor, who attempted to add something that was really foreign to the author's plan, is to be adopted (cf. Charles in ICC, Rev of St. John, Vol. II, p. 153 f.).

Only one who was thoroughly at home in apocalyptic thought and literature could have produced such a book. His acquaintance with the O T is remarkable. Its language, especially in the form of short phrases and single words, is interwoven into almost every paragraph if not in every sentence of the book. And yet the author never quotes or specifically alludes to any other book or author. On the other hand while it is reasonable, even necessary, to suppose that he was familiar with the whole field of apocalyptic speculation, yet he very carefully refrains from using the language of such books as, e.g., Enoch.

We can not make use of his program. We know that it was not fulfilled and we know also that such a program can not be literally fulfilled. His view of the physical universe, with which so much of his symbolism is connected, is not that with which the telescope and mathematics have made us acquainted. Imperial Rome passed, indeed, but not in way he described. The Lord's Coming, which was declared to be 'at hand' (1 3, 7; 22 10, 12, 20), has not yet occurred. But we can share his faith that in the old dispensation (Israel, Temple, Ark of Covenant, etc.) God began that which was brought to completion in the new, of which 'the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world' is the central figure. Nowhere else in Scripture is the eternal character of the Church of the Crucified Christ, 'the Lamb in the midst of Throne' who alone can unseal the book of human history, so positively and confidently set forth. Against such a church no power on earth can in the end prevail. We are led by this book to realize that behind external and temporal events and crises are the operations and conflicts of spiritual and age-long principles, good and evil, and we are strengthened and comforted by its messages of assurance of the care of God for His own, of the victory over Satan, of the Marriage of the Lamb and the Church, and of the beauty and glory of the life that is to be. He who reads the book sympathetically, realizing that its symbolism is only a veil behind which great truths and principles may be discerned and that its value lies not in its program of events but in the truths on which he constructed his program will have gained, not the key to the course of events, but the inspiration and faith and hope that will prove his stay and strength in the battle of life.

REVENGER OF BLOOD. See BLOOD, AVENGER OF.

REWARD: This term renders the Heb. and Gr. words: (1) 'ahārith, 'sequel,' or that which follows what it is given for (Pr 24 14, 20). (2) 'āqebh, 'heel,' 'footprint,' hence 'consequence' (Ps 19 11). (3) shil-lām, shillāmāh, shalmōnām, 'completion [of what is in itself imperfect]' (Mic 7 3; Ps 91 8; Is 1 23). (4) 'ethnāh (Hos 2 12), 'ethnān (Ezk 16 34), both based on a doubtful text, and derived probably from the same root as matian, 'gift' (I K 13 7). (5) g'mul, g'mulāh, 'just dealing,' 'recompense' (Ps 94 2; II S 19 36). (6) mas'ēth, 'present,' 'largess' (Jer 40 6). (7) maskōreth, 'wages' (Ru 2 12). (8) p'rillāh, 'work' whose equivalent is the reward (Ps 109 20). (9) p'rē, 'fruit' (Ps 58 11). (10) sākhār, sekher, 'wages' (Gn 15 1; Pr 11 18). (11) shōhadh, 'bribe' (Dt 10 17). (12) ἀναπαύσεις, 'restoration' (Col 3 24). (13) μισθός, 'wages' (Mt 5 12).

REZEPH, rī'zef (רִזְפִּי, retseph): A city named with Gozem, Haran, and the 'children of Eden,' cities conquered by Assyria (II K 19 12=Is 37 12). Most probably the Rasappa of the inscriptions ('Ρηζάπα of Ptolemy), the modern Rasāfa, between Palmyra and the Euphrates. The inscriptions show that it was an important trade-center. C. S. T.

REZIA, rī-zai'ā. See RIZIA.

REZIN, rī'zin (רִזְיָן, retsīn; the original vocalization of the name was, however, probably ra'ison; cf. LXX. and Peshittā, supported by the Assy. ra-sun-na): 1. King of Damascus (735-732 B.C.). With Pekah of Israel, he undertook a campaign against Ahaz of Judah (II K 16 5; Is 7 1-8), probably because A. had refused to join the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance against Tiglath-pileser III. The allies planned to depose A. and place Rezin himself on the throne of Judah, if by 'son of Tabeel' (Is 7 6) R. is meant (so Winckler, Alltest. Unters. pp. 74 f.; Schrader, COT, I, p. 257). The king of Judah, contrary to the advice of Isaiah, appealed to Assyria for aid, offering rich presents (II K 16 7-9). Tiglath-pileser in 734-732 carried on a vigorous campaign against the rebels in the E. Med. and N. Syrian regions. Rezin withdrew into his fortified capital, which, however, was easily captured, resulting in the death of the king and the reduction of Syria to a province of Assyria. 2. The 'Sons of Rezin' was the name of a family of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43; Neh 7 50).

REZON, rī'zōn (רִזְוֹן, retsōn) (I K 11 23): The son of Eliada and general under Hadadezer, King of Zobah. There is some question as to the correct original spelling and vocalization of the name. It is believed by some (Klostermann, Winckler, Alltest. Unters. pp. 61 ff.) that the name Hezion (I K 15 18) was reduced, first to 'Hezron,' and then to 'Rezon.' But the grounds for this view are not convincing. Rezon was the founder of a dynasty in Damascus which ruled from 950 (the age of Solomon) to 732 B.C. To this dynasty belong the Ben-hadads, Hazael, and Rezin.

RHEGIUM, rī'ji-um (Ῥήγιον): An old Greek colony in Italy, at the entrance to the straits of Messina, here 6 m. wide. Its important position gave it great prosperity, and, notwithstanding the vicissitudes of war, it remained a large city under Greek influence during the Empire, until at least the time of Pliny, and was a center for the philosophy of Pythagoras. Owing to the dangers to navigation in those days from the rock Scylla and the whirlpool Charybdis, ships were often detained at Rhegium by unfavorable winds. Perhaps this was the reason why Paul's vessel, after waiting three days in Syracuse, spent one day at Rhegium (Ac 28 13).

RHESA, rī'sā (Ῥησα): One of the ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 27).

RHODA, rō'da (Ῥόδα), 'rose': A maid in the house of Mary, the mother of John Mark (Ac 12 13 f.). Whether she was a servant, or a member of the household, or simply one of the company assembled at the house is not known.

RHODES, rōdz (Ῥόδος): An island about 40 m. long by 20 m. wide, with a capital city of the same name, lying 12 m. off the SW. coast of Asia Minor. Its harbors and situation gave it great importance as a port of call or transshipment on the voyage from Syria or Egypt to Rome. Paul touched here on his journey from Troas to Caesarea (Ac 21 1). From 304 to 168 B.C. it enjoyed much prosperity, of which its beautiful coins are an index. Under able rulers Rhodes attained great sea-power, repressing pirates, and reaping a large trade as the fruit of wise home and foreign policy. Its magnificent, if somewhat decadent, sculpture, illustrated by the colossal statue of the sun-god at the harbor entrance—one of the world wonders—and its widely known school of rhetoric testify to its intellectual brilliance. Tho its commerce was ruined in 168 B.C. by the Romans, and later, owing to its loyalty to Julius Caesar, further reverses came upon it, its fortunes were retrieved so that in N T times it had become a large and beautiful city, probably including within its walls many Jewish colonists. To this restoration Herod the Great among others contributed. Claudius disfranchised it in 44 A.D., on account of the crucifixion of some Roman citizens, but restored its privileges in 56, and under Vespasian it became a part of the province of Asia.

RIBAI, rai-bē'ai or rai'bē (רִבִּי, ribhay): The father of Ittai (II S 23 29; I Ch 11 31).

RIBBAND: The rendering of pāthil, 'thread' or 'cord' (Nu 15 38 AV); RV correctly 'cord.'

RIBLAH, rib'la (רִבְלָה, ribhlāh): 1. A place in Hamath, where Pharaoh Necho (608 B.C.) put Jehoahaz of Judah in chains (II K 23 33; cf., however, II Ch 36 3), and where Nebuchadrezzar (586 B.C.) passed judgment on King Zedekiah and put out his eyes, etc. (II K 25 6 f., 21 f.; Jer 39 5 f., 52 9 f., 26 f.). It is the modern Ribla, on the right bank of the Orontes, in the broad valley between Lebanon and Antilebanon. Many read Riblah for Diblah in Ezk 6 14. 2. Hā-ribhlāh (with the article). A place on the E. border of Canaan, S. of Hazar-enan and N. of the sea of Chinnereth (Galilee) (Nu 34 11); probably further S. than 1. Dillmann and others, following Wetzstein, suggest harbēlāh, 'to Harbel,' and identify it with Harmel (or Hörmül) 8 m. SW. of Riblah, 1. This site does not seem probable.

RICHERS. See WEALTH.

RIDDLE. See PROVERB; and WISDOM, WISE MEN, § 2.

RIDER: As used in the O T this word may signify either the rider mounted on his horse or mule, or as in Ex 15 1, 21, one of the riders in the war-chariot. See also ARMS AND ARMOR, § 6; and WARFARE, § 4.

RIE, RYE: The AV rendering of kuṣsemeth (Ex 9 32; Is 28 25). But rye is not known in Palestine, and probably we should read 'spelt,' as in RV.

RIGHT: In most instances 'right' (in the ethical sense) in the O T is the rendering either of yāshār, 'straight,' 'even,' or mishpāt, 'judgment' (or the conduct that is according to a just sentence of judgment). Other terms occasionally rendered 'right' are: (1) 'ēmeth, 'truth' (Gn 24 48; Jer 2 21; on Neh 9 33 cf. RV). (2) kēn, root-idea 'erect,' 'upright' (Nu 27 7; Jer 23 10, etc.). (3) nākhōah, 'straight,' 'exact' (II S 15 3; Pr 4 25, 24 26; Is 30 10; Am 3 10). (4) tsedheq, ts'dhāqāh, 'just,' 'right,' 'righteous' (II S 19 28; Neh 2 20; Ps 17 1; Ezk 18 5 ff., 33 14 ff.). (5) kāshēr, 'fitting' (Est 8 5). (6) kūn, 'to be firm,' 'steadfast' (Job 42 7 f.; Ps 51 10; 78 37, etc.). The incorrect rendering of AV in Ru 4 6, Ps 45 6, and Ec 4 4 is avoided in RV. In the N T, apart from δίκαιος (ov), 'just,' EV uses 'right' for εὐθεῖς, 'straight,' 'level' (Ac 8 21, 13 10; II P 2 15), and ὀρθῶς, 'correctly' (Lk 10 28). See also RIGHTEOUSNESS, § 1; and LAW AND LEGAL PRACTISE, § 2 (3). E. E. N.

RIGHTEOUSNESS: 1. Definition. Of necessity, and always the basis of the notion of righteousness is conformity to a standard of perfection. The Biblical terms (ts'dhāqāh, δικαιοσύνη; cf. tsaddiq, δικαιος) present the conception as either a matter of recognized rule of conduct (Gr. from δεῖκνυμαι, δεικνῆναι, 'custom,' 'usage') or a quality of inherent and inalienable normality (Heb. from tsādhag, 'to be right' (i.e. 'normal,' 'according to standard').

But righteousness is not absolute perfection. Job claims for himself righteousness as a robe (29 14), and is called a 'perfect and upright man, one that feareth God, and turneth away from evil' (1 1, 8, 2 3). Some of the Psalmists similarly call themselves 'righteous,' 'innocent,' and 'pure' (Ps 7 8, 18 20 ff.). Noah, Job, and Daniel are named by Ezekiel as possessing righteousness, which would suffice 'to deliver their souls' (14 14, 20). Such expressions could mean either that the righteous men mentioned were sinless or that a righteousness was attributed to them consistently with some sins, or sinfulness, in character. The first alternative is scarcely admissible in view of the fact that David is reckoned a man of such righteousness as specially to please God and secure for himself God's sparing loving-kindness, and for many unworthy successors covenant blessings. He is, moreover, chosen as the type of the Messiah, through whom God would save His people (I K 11 4, 3 14; Is 37 35). And yet certain crimes are laid to David's account, without the least effort to palliate them or explain their consistency to this estimate of his character. Moses himself, exalted above all the prophets (Nu 12 6-8; Dt 34 10-12) did that in punishment for which he was excluded from the Holy Land.

2. The Absolute Righteousness of God. On the other hand, behind all statements imputing righteousness to men, an ideal looms into view by which as they are measured they all come short. Job, for instance, to whom is most explicitly conceded the character of a righteous man, is presently found acknowledging himself sinful (Job 7 21, 9 20, 13 26). In fact, in the judgment of the author of the book, all men are under sin (14 4). The very thought of a man being righteous seems to be self-contradictory ('What is man, that he should be clean, and he that is born of woman, that he should be righteous?' [Job 15 14; cf. also Ps 130 3, 143 2; I K 8 46]). This ideal of righteousness is, like all other perfections, given in the character of God. But as the word for justice in Heb. is the same as that for righteousness, it is not easy to discriminate between the special attribute of justice, according to which God deals equitably with all His creatures, and righteousness, which includes in its scope other perfections, and approaches in content the conception of holiness. In the preaching of the prophets, however, where the necessity of righteousness in man is urged, the righteousness of J" is also shown to be a controlling attribute of His character (Is 41 10); He speaks righteousness (Is 45 19, 62 1), and acts it in all the relations of life, calling upon His people to have confidence and hope, as He comes nigh, because He is 'the God of righteousness' (Is 51 5, 7 f.). Consequently, the key to the prophetic preaching is the Psalmist's dictum, 'J" is righteous; he loveth righteousness' (Ps 11 7). God's righteousness, however, is a quality of His which comes into view with the nation of His choice. All His dealings are illustrations of His character. His punishment of Israel is righteous, even tho it involves the apparent contradiction of the triumph over Israel of the heathen nations, which are more remote from His Law than Israel. These nations are not taken into account in those dealings, as they are only instruments in His hand for the chastisement and purification of His beloved people. Moreover, there always lies in the background the certainty of retribution for them after they have served this end.

3. Righteousness as a Religious Ideal. In the development of the idea of righteousness, therefore, an element of piety makes its appearance. The righteous man is contrasted with the unfaithful and godless. He is distinguished from the sinner, who cares little or nothing for J" (Ps 1 5, 7 9). The chief desire and motive of the righteous is to live in accordance with the will of J'', as revealed in His Law. At first, this Law was identified with the simple requirement of zeal for, and devoted adherence to, J'' worship. Of course, such loyalty to God included inner intellectual, spiritual, and moral elements. But these were held in solution and hardly differentiated from one another.

4. Righteousness as an Ethical Attribute. The prophets brought into view and laid stress on the ethical element. The essence of righteousness is in their message's conformity with the pure moral standards given in the character and the will of J''. The righteous man, is the man of upright conduct, of pure mind and clean hands. In the Assyrian period social life was corrupt and the prophets of the time condemned it (Hos 10 12); and their message was all the more distinctly spoken, because the thought of merit in ritual observance was gaining ground and overshadowing the real spiritual significance of the religion of J''. According to Amos, God would not accept sacrifice or worship of any sort ('noise of thy songs,' 5 23), but required that justice should 'run down as waters, and righteousness as an everflowing stream' (5 24 mg.), and according to Hosea (6 6), He 'desires goodness and not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings.' The most explicit and striking statement, however, is the summary of Micah (6 8): 'He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God.' This is further shown by the contrasted notions of unrighteousness which is predominantly moral. Ezekiel places over against the righteous man the wicked one (3 16-21); but both stand upon individual and personal character, without any commutation or artificial advantages inuring on account of non-moral considerations. This conception of righteousness as an ethical quality absolutely necessary in the normal relation with J'' abides through to the latest times. It is the doctrine of Zeph (2 3) and Jer (9 24, 22 3), of Ezk (chs. 18 ff.) and Deutero-Isaiah (58, 2, 60 17), and of Hag and Zec. Naturally, great emphasis is placed throughout the prophetic teaching upon the collective righteousness of the nation as a whole. For, after all, in spite of the individualism which appears incipient in Jeremiah and more clearly developed in Ezekiel, it is the Covenant People as a body that concerns J'', and it is sin as a national sin and righteousness as national righteousness that draw upon it either His condemnation or His favor.

5. Legal Righteousness. But the idea of righteousness has an administrative connotation. Righteousness is the right attitude toward an existing norm, which is God's will; but as this is expressed in the constitution of a theocracy, and becomes a legal system, righteousness, too, develops a judicial aspect. This is of extreme importance for the understanding of the later developments of the idea. It leads, on the one side, to a righteousness which is a forensic relation; and, on the other, combined with an increased emphasis on piety, or the association of righteousness with the worship of J'', it becomes the germinal center of ceremonialism, i.e., the righteousness which consists mainly in the punctilious observance of prescribed formal precepts. As a judicial notion, righteousness is sharply distinguished from holiness. It is never a question whether holiness is a transferable quality. Even when it was looked upon as consisting in the main in the observance of laws of taboo (cf. HOLINESS, § 1), it is an individual and personal affair [condition or quality]. But that righteousness was viewed as capable of availing for others than those who earned its merit is clear from Ezekiel's definite warning against this error (Ezk 14 14, 20). It is this aspect of it that gives significance to the statement made of Abraham, i.e., that 'he believed in Jehovah, and he reckoned it to him for righteousness' (Gn 15 6); i.e., a different thing (faith) was viewed as righteousness. This statement illustrates the three phases of the concept found in the O T—i.e., (1) The religious aspect, according to which he is righteous who relates himself ideally with J''; (2) the ethical aspect, according to which that is a righteous act or righteous conduct which conforms to the express will of J''; and (3) the judicial aspect according to which that is righteousness which harmonizes with the order or Law of J''; and, therefore, one act may be viewed before the Law as a substitute for another, or one person as the representative of another. On this ground it is further possible to understand the comparison of righteousness to a robe (Is 61 10), or a breastplate (Is 59 17). In the first case, it is a cover and ornament; in the second, a weapon of defense. It is not necessary that these characteristics of externality and transferability should be considered very late growths. Probably from the very earliest time righteousness was viewed as something that might in a sense be detached from one and attached to another person. In the Hasmonean period a revival of zeal for the Law brought into prominence the strict observance of it as the distinctive national constitution. Accordingly, he was regarded righteous who most strictly adhered to the Law. And the Righteous (ḥāšidīm; see PHARISEES, § 3), from whom the Assideans as a party were named, assumed more and more the rôle of the true ideal of the Jew. On the other hand, the ethical element in righteousness was felt increasingly to be the common property of all mankind, and lost its distinctiveness as a characteristic of God's people. This brought its fullest fruit in the Pharisaic ideals and teachings.

6. Jesus and the Pharisaic Ideal. Thus when Jesus Christ appeared, the Pharisaic ideal had already reduced the notion to a carefully registered conformity to scribal interpretations of the Law, involving minute details of ritual matters (Lk 11 39 f.). Such righteousness Jesus declared to be insufficient, not offensive or sinful, but utterly inadequate. It might even become the occasion of sin, if it led to the neglect and omission of the weightier matters (Lk 11 42). His own disciples must see that their righteousness exceeds that of the Pharisees (Mt 5 20). What they should be Jesus did not leave undetermined. With great clearness and emphasis He authoritatively reiterated the prophetic teaching that the true righteousness is ethical fulfillment of God's ideal. Yet as in the O T so in N T the term is often used in a relative sense. Joseph is called a righteous man (Mt 1 19); so also is Joseph of Ari-mathæa (Lk 23 50), and even Cornelius the Gentile (Ac 10 22). Jesus, too, speaks of many righteous men, who with the prophets have desired to see the things which His disciples saw (Mt 13 17). By James the term is applied to the moral or virtuous man (5 6), also to the religious-minded (5 16). By Peter it is used of Jesus (I P 3 18) and of the Christians in general (I P 4 16). In He the Pauline idea of faith is read into that of righteousness, and the quality thus conceived is predicated of Abel (11 4) and, in general, of the saints of the O T as a class (12 23). But, in spite of non-technical usage, the teaching of Jesus presents righteousness predominantly as an inner quality. Outward standing and relationship are worthy of consideration only when they correspond with the inner condition. Not only does He warn His disciples against the defective idea of the Pharisees, but He rebukes the Pharisees themselves for transferring the seat of righteousness from the inner to the outer life (Mt 23 28). It must become an object of the most earnest endeavor and search, like food and drink (Mt 5 6, 10). It must be actuated by the desire to please God (Mt 6 1, alms AV), and it must take its rule and ideal from God's character. Therefore it is called 'his righteousness,' and stands associated with His Kingdom (Mt 6 33).

7. Paul's Conception of Righteousness. The final stage in the development of the concept within Biblical limits was reached when Paul made it the kernel of his idea of religion. According to Paul, righteousness is the right or moral relation of man to God. It is the opposite of sin. But both sin and righteousness are also related to law, and while the one is the result of failure to comply with the Law, the other is secured through absolute conformity to it. But conformity must be perfect. In other words righteousness is sinlessness. But sinlessness must not be understood as primitive innocence maintained throughout, else there could be no righteousness for any one, for all have sinned. The sinlessness which Paul has in mind is freedom from the condemnation of sin in the presence of God. Such sinlessness ('guiltlessness' = 'righteousness') is secured by the transgressor of law through faith in Jesus Christ, who through His life and death works out a righteousness ample enough to cover all transgression. It is the result of a process of justification. It is rightness with God, who is in this process viewed as a judge acquitting or condemning. Those whom He acquits, upon whatever ground, are righteous. They are acquitted when they secure freedom from guilt through appropriation by faith of Christ's righteousness. Accordingly, the righteous man is the man of faith (Ro 1 17). And the peculiar character of the righteousness thus achieved is expressed in the phrase 'the righteousness of faith' (Ro 10 6). This, however, is not a new thing, but only a new name; for the true essential righteousness of all previous ages (e.g., Abraham's righteousness) was none other than this (Ro 4 13), and that of the Gentiles apart from the Law could be none other (Ro 10 30). The whole trend of Paul's thought on this subject may be called a sublimation into ethical form of the Pharisaic doctrine of righteousness.

8. The Righteousness of God. As the central kernel in the idea of religion, this is the righteousness of God, not as an attribute of God's character, but as the privilege of normal relationship bestowed by Him upon the believer in Jesus Christ (Ro 1 17, 3 5, 21-26). God's justice as a ruler of the universe and judge of men is not ignored by the appropriation of this phrase to this usage. It is rather assumed as beyond the need of an argument (Ro 9 14; II Th 1 5 f.; II Ti 4 8). The righteousness of God, from another point of view, is His administrative perfection as He deals with men. God is righteous, because He clears the innocent and condemns the guilty, enforces His law of equity toward all, and defends the weak against the strong, the widow and the orphan against the greedy and the extortioner. This involves more than the function of the modern judge, i.e., pronouncing upon the evidence placed before him. It includes the task of discovering the evidence in behalf of the helpless. God's righteousness at this point passes into His grace. With the Pauline idea of righteousness the conception has run its complete cycle. In the idea of sanctification, which is the complement of justification, the Pauline thought returns to the ethical notion of the prophets and of Jesus Himself.

RIMMONO, ri-mō'no. See RIMMON.

RIMMON-PEREZ, rim'en-pi'rez (רִמּוֹן פֶּרֶז, rimmōn peretz, Rimmon-parez AV): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 19 f.). Site unknown.

RING. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 1 f.

RINNAH, rin'a (רִנָּה, rinnāh), 'shout': The ancestor of several Calebite clans (I Ch 4 20).

RIPHATH, rai'fath (רִפְתָּח, ripḥath): A son of Gomer (Gn 10 3; I Ch 1 6, Diphath RV). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

RISE: This term is used to render a number of Heb. and Gr. words, but, with two exceptions noted below, there is nothing especially significant in this usage. (1) The Heb. verb shākhām, often rendered 'to rise up early,' means 'to load on the back [of a beast]' or 'on the shoulder [of a man]'. As this usage had special reference to the lading of beast or man preparatory to starting on a journey, and as the proper time for such a start was early in the morning, shākhām came to be the equivalent of 'to rise up early.' (2) For the use of the word in reference to the Resurrection, see RESURRECTION. E. E. N.

RISSAH, ris'a (רִסָּה, riṣṣāh): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 21 f.). Site unknown.

RITHMAH, rith'ma (רִיתְמָה, rithmāh), 'place of the juniper' (?): A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 18 f.). Site unknown.

RIVER: The Heb. and Gr. words rendered 'river' are the following: (1) nāhār, 'stream' (Nu 24 6; Job 14 11 'flood' AV; Aram. n'har, Ezr 4 10 ff.). (2) y'ôr, 'watercourse,' an Egyptian loan-word usually applied to the Nile (Gn 41 1, etc.), or its canals (Is 7 18), but also to other streams (Dn 12 5 ff.). (3) 'ābhal, 'canal' (Dn 8 2 f., 6). (4) yūbhal, 'stream' (Jer 17 6). (5) 'āphiq, 'channel,' 'stream-bed' (Ezk 6 3, 31 12, etc. AV, 'watercourses' RV; Song 5 12; Jl 1 20, 3 18 AV, 'water-brooks' RV). (6) nahal, nahālāh, 'torrent,' the equivalent of the Arab. word wādy (Lv 11 9; Jos 12 1; Ezk 47 9). (7) pelegh, p'laggāh, 'channel,' 'division' (Job 29 6; Is 30 25). (8) ποταμός, 'river' (Mk 1 5; Rev 8 10, etc.).

The great rivers known to the Hebrews were the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Nile, and the Jordan (q.v.). Of the other streams, the more important were those within Palestine itself, such as the Shihor Libnath (Jos 19 20); the Kishon, which drains the Plain of Esdraelon and empties into the Mediterranean near the foot of Mt. Carmel (Jg 5 21); the Kanah (Jos 16 8); the 'river of Egypt' (Gn 15 18); the Jabbok (Gn 32 22); and the Arnon (Nu 21 13, etc.). The importance of rivers was generally appreciated, but their use for intercommunication or as highways of navigation is very rarely alluded to (cf. Is 18 2). As boundary-lines, however, they are very commonly noted (Gn 15 18; Nu 34 5; Jos 1 4; Jg 4 13; II K 10 33, etc.). They were also regarded as sources of mysterious power, which is probably the reason for their association with supernatural visions (Ezk 1 1; Dn 10 4; possibly 'the place of prayer' in Ac 16 13 represents a trace of such a notion in N T times). Finally, the river as a source of life and blessing became the symbol of all spiritual good (Ezk 47 1 ff.). Consequently, general destruction and ruin were fitly portrayed by the pouring of a vial of wrath upon the great rivers (Rev 16 4, 12), and the final blessed state has also its 'pure river of water of life' (Rev 22 1).

RIVER, THE: Where the expression 'the river' occurs in the O T, without any explanatory statement in the context, it refers to the River Euphrates, the 'great river' of SW. Asia (Gn 36 37; Ex 23 31; Dt 1 7; Jos 1 4; II S 10 16, etc.).

RIVER OF EGYPT (נַחַל מִצְרַיִם, nahal mitsrayim, 'brook of Egypt' RV): A torrent valley or wādy, on the S. border of Judah toward the Mediterranean (Nu 34 5; Jos 15 4, 47; cf. Ezk 47 19, 48 28). It was considered the S. border of Solomon's kingdom (I K 8 65=II Ch 7 8), and on the border of Egypt (II K 24 7; Is 27 12; in Am 14, 'the brook of the Arabah' may be the same). It is identified with the Wādy el-'Arish, which runs N. and NW. from the middle of the Sinaitic peninsula, and flows into the Mediterranean about 50 m. SW. of Gaza. A long and deep watercourse, it is full only after heavy rain. It may have received its name from its location on the border of Egypt (mitsrayim). Others, who claim that Musur (mitsur) of the Assy. inscriptions and mitsrayim of the O T are frequently the name of a N. Arabian district, through which this wādy flowed, would derive the name from this country.

RIZIA, riz'ā (רִיזְיָא, ritsyā, Rezia AV): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 39).

RIZPAH, riz'pa (רִיפָּה, ritspāh): A daughter of Aiah, and a concubine of Saul, whom Abner took to himself (II S 3 7, Lucian's LXX.) after the death of Saul. Ishbosheth, Saul's son, looked upon this as an attempt to seize the royal power, and upbraided Abner for his disloyalty, who thereupon deserted the cause of the house of Saul and went over to David (II S 3 6 ff.). Much later, a three years' famine came upon Israel, and was viewed as due to the unexpiated sin of Saul in slaying the Gibeonites (II S 21 1-14). David therefore, at the demand of the Gibeonites, delivered seven descendants of Saul, among them Armoni and Mephibosheth, sons of Rizpah, to the Gibeonites to be hanged. Rizpah watched over their bodies, protecting them from birds and beasts of prey until falling rain showed that God's anger was appeased. On hearing of the mother's devotion, David had the bones of the seven, with those of Saul and Jonathan, interred in the family sepulcher of Kish, Saul's father. C. S. T.

ROAD: For 'road' in I S 27 10 AV, read, with RV, 'raid.' See WAY for roads in general; also PAL-ESTINE, §§ 5-13; and TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 2.

ROAST. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 10; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

ROBBERY: In Ph 2 6 the Gr. ἀρπαγμός means, not 'the act of seizing,' but 'the thing seized.' In N T times the classical distinction between nouns in -μός, as active in their signification, and nouns in -μα, as passive had been greatly weakened, as is evidenced abundantly in the N T itself (cf. active sense in ἀπαύγασμα, He 1 3; σύντριμμα, Ro 3 16 [from LXX.]; passive sense in θερισμός, Mt 9 37; μολυσμός, II Co 7 1) so that the RV rendering 'a thing to be grasped' is certainly better than the AV 'robbery,' if by 'grasped' be understood the selfish holding of a thing already possessed, rather than the ambitious reaching after a thing not yet secured, Paul's idea being that in His preexistent state Christ already possessed equality with God in His being in the existence form of God (ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ). On robbery as a crime see CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2.

ROBE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 4.

ROBOAM, ro-bō'am or reb'o-am (Ροβοάμ, Mt 1 7 AV). See REHOBAM.

ROCK: This word renders in the AV five Heb. and two Gr. words. (1) hallāmīsh, 'flint' (Job 28 9, 'flinty rock' RV; cf. Dt 8 15, 32 13; Ps 114 8). (2) kēphām, 'rocks,' pl. only, perhaps an Aram. loan-word, used as a 'place of refuge' (Jer 4 20), and as a 'dwelling-place' (Job 30 6). (3) mā'ōz, 'a place of safety' (Jg 6 26, 'stronghold' RV. Moore, in ICC, suggests a natural stronghold, not a fortification). (4) šela' and (5) tsūr seem to be used interchangeably. Both words are used for that which is hard, barren, unfruitful, and also for a strong and safe place of refuge. šela' is the inaccessible and lonely home of goats, eagles, and doves (Job 39 1, 28; Song 2 14). It is also a symbol of obstinacy (Jer 5 3), fragrantcy (Ezk 24 7, 8), and a figure of a razed city (Ezk 26 4, 14). tsūr is a symbol of firmness (Nah 1 6; Job 14 18, 18 4), of enduring material (Job 19 24). Both are used as a figure of God, often equivalent to J' and Elohim, to designate Him as the sure support, defense, and refuge of the godly, or as the trusty one (šela' only in Ps 18 2 [3]=II S 22 2, and Ps 31 3 [4], where it is equivalent to tsūr; also Ps 42 9 [10], 71 3); tsūr is used more often (Dt 32 4, 15, 18, 30 f.; II S 22 3, 32; Ps 19 14, 27 5, 28 1, 61 2 [3], 78 35, 89 28 [27], 92 15 [16], etc.). In Is 31 9 RV šela' is possibly a figure of the Assyrian god, as is tsūr for a heathen god (Dt 32 31; Is 44 8 RV). (6) πέτρα, 'rock,' 'ledge,' as something that is firm and enduring (Mt 7 24 f.; Lk 6 48), or unfruitful (Lk 8 6, 13); as a figure of Christ, from whom springs the living water (I Co 10 4); also metaphorically for a firm, strong man. (7) τράχτις τόπος (Ac 27 20), to be rendered as 'rocky [rough] ground' RV. C. S. T.

ROD: This term renders the following words: (1) hōfer, 'shoot,' 'twig' (Is 11 1, 'shoot' RV, a fresh growth from a tree-stump, the figure of a personal Davidic ruler; Pr 14 3 'a rod [shoot] of pride,' or 'a rod [instrument of punishment] for his pride'). (2) maqāl, 'rod,' more often 'staff'; used by Jacob in breeding his flocks (Gn 30 37 f.); a symbolic rod (Jer 1 11); a symbol of power (Jer 48 17). (3) maṭṭeh, a 'staff' or 'rod' of dry wood, and commonly carried by the Hebrews, but not always as a support in walking. It was used by shepherds (Ex 4 2, 4 f., 7 15 f.); for beating out black cummin (Is 28 27); was carried by a warrior (I S 14 27, 43; cf. 'goad' Jg 3 31; I S 13 21); Aaron (Ex 7 9 f., 8 1 f.) and the Egyptian magicians (7 12) had wonder-working rods. In Nu 17 2 f. [17f.] mention is made of rods taken from the tribes; that belonging to Aaron blossomed. It was a figure of punishment or power (Ps 110 2; Is 10 26; Ezk 19 11 f.). In Ezk 7 10, 11, a green 'shoot' is probably intended. (4) šēbhet, often equivalent to (3), a 'rod' or 'staff,' probably shorter than maṭṭeh and with one end enlarged, used for smiting (Ex 21 20; Pr 10 13, 23 13 f., etc.); for threshing cummin (Is 28 27); by shepherds (Ps 23 4; Mic 7 14). It is a figure of chastisement (Pr 13 24, 29 15, etc.), especially of Divine chastisement (II S 7 14; Ps 2 9; Is 10 24, etc.). By metonymy, both (3) and (4) are the terms for tribe (q.v.). (5) ῥάβδος, 'staff' or 'walking-stick,' the LXX. rendering of (2), (3), (4), above, and has the same variety of meanings in the N T (I Co 4 21; He 9 4; Rev 2 27, 11 1, 12 5, 19 15; cf. Ac 16 22; II Co 11 25, ῥαβδίζειν, where reference is to the Roman 'scourging' with the rod). C. S. T.

RODANIM, rod'-a-nim. See DODANIM in ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

ROE, ROEBUCK. See PALESTINE, § 24.

ROHGAH, rō'ga (רֹגַח), ro[ghāh]: An Asherite (I Ch 7 34).

ROGELIM, rō'ji-lim (רֹגְלִים, rōghēlīm): The home of Barzillai, the Gileadite (II S 17 27, 19 31). Site unknown.

ROLL. See BOOKS AND WRITINGS, § 3.

ROMAMTI-EZER, ro-mam'-ti-i-zer (רֹמַמְתִּי עֶזֶר, rōmamti 'ezer): An expression taken by the translators as a proper name, but perhaps it should be rendered 'whom [i.e., my God] I exalt, my help,' etc. (I Ch 25 4, 31). See JOSHBEKASHAH.

ROMAN, rō'man: Roman citizenship (civitas), confined originally to patricians, was extended in full to plebians in 337 B.C. The patricians and plebians constituted the aristocratic citizens, while a modified citizenship was held by freedmen (avariti), from which slaves and foreigners were excluded. The civitas conferred the rights of suffrage, of holding office, of appeal to the people (later to the emperor) against sentences of magistrates, of contracting legal marriage, of holding property, and involved the duties of paying taxes and bearing arms. It was indicated externally by the man's name (nomen, prænomen) and the white toga. This right was jealously guarded till after the 1st cent. It was obtained by birth or by manumission, or was conferred on men of wealth and position by the assembly (later by the emperor). In 212 A.D. Caracalla made all the free inhabitants of the empire citizens. Under the Empire civitas was valued because it conferred exemption from shameful punishment (Ac 22 25), the right of appeal to the emperor (Ac 25 11), freedom from direct taxation, the right to hold office, and to become a senator. In the provinces every Roman citizen was an aristocrat. Roman civitas superseded all other citizenship. Paul's family had the Roman civitas (Ac 22 28); hence it was certainly wealthy and influential, and had probably settled in Tarsus about 175-164 B.C., under Antiochus IV. Among the Jews Paul used his Jewish name, Saul, but assumed his Roman name at Paphos (Ac 13 9), as the Apostle to the Gentiles. His nomen and prænomen are not known. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

ROMAN RELIGION: The Roman religion was that of a prosaic and unimaginative people who took very seriously their relations to the supernatural (religiosissimi mortales, Sallust), and were given to deisidæmonia (lit. 'fear of gods, or demons,' i.e., superstitious), which rendered them meticulously scrupulous and rigidly formal in their worship. This formalism abetted the power of the priesthood and gave a contractual cast to their cult. They combined a tenacious conservatism with a remarkable hospitality for foreign ideas. Their unseen powers were indistinctly conceived numina, not dei, indeterminate in sex, without individuality or personal artistic forms, maintaining no intercourse with each other, and, therefore, producing no mythology, which was borrowed from Greece. Beside these numina there was a tendency to personification or deification of abstracts, e.g., Fides, Honos, Libertas, Virtus. By its own momentum Roman religion, never developed from animism to anthropomorphism, or from polydæmonism to polytheism. It differed from Greek religion also in lacking the esthetic appeal and failing to produce a great poetry or philosophy; it was an instrument of political life such as Greek religion had never been in the halcyon days of the polis. It was never marked by the local varieties of Greek cults (owing to the dominance of Rome); it never manifested the native powers of self-development as did Greek religion. Unlike the Greeks, the Romans, in their darkest hour, deserted their gods, and looked abroad —to Etruria, Italy, Greece, and the Orient—for divine help. Roman religion was not so spiritual as that of Greece, and it had no part at the Roman deathbed. The primitive religion of the farm and the hearth gave way to that of the city-state, and this again to the imperial religion of Caesar-worship. The di indigetes (native gods) retreat before the di novensides or novensiles (new or foreign gods); the ritus Romanus is supplemented by the ritus Graecus. Roman animism is displaced by Greek anthropomorphism, save in popular survivals, so that Rome first received her gods from Greece, or from the Etruscans of Greek culture. The ritual tended to increasing elaboration, and under the priestly colleges was evolved a puzzling list of bidding-prayers or Indigitamenta.

1. In the period from the earliest times to the founding of the Capitoline temple (509 B.C.) the calendar was filled with agricultural festivals and rites. Magic was in use, but mostly sympathetic nature-magic. The king was the priest, and the relations with the numina were through state officials, so that the jus divinum was indistinguishable from the jus civile, which gave a peculiar character to all subsequent Roman relations of church and state. The chief of these early numina, or divine potencies, were Jupiter, Janus, Mars, Quirinus, Vesta, Juno, together with the di penates and Lares, and vague forms of the forest and fields. There was no mythology: temple and statue were unnecessary, and the loca sacra were of the simplest character, e.g., grove or open enclosure. Already the Romans, tho imagining no underworld like that of the Greeks, evinced that reverence for the dead which later became prominent in a cult of di parentes or di Manes. Under the Etruscan kings, especially the last, innovations commenced in at least the founding of the Capitoline temple in which the trinity of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, were united in one cult, novel to Roman ideas. This temple, the center of Roman political religion, was the first step toward giving personality to Roman deities, and the first contact with anthropomorphic influence whereby the ill-defined numina yielded to Di, necessitating new modes of worship.

2. During the period from 509 B.C. to the Second Punic War in 218 B.C., a vast change came about in the Roman religion. The emotional and sensational element increased, making toward individualism, while the two great colleges of Pontifices and Augurs rose to the highest position of authority, rendering the religion more political. Foreign importations were rapidly multiplied among the di novensides. Epochal, both for Rome and for subsequent European history, was the introduction, at the beginning of this period, of the Sibylline Oracles, under the influence of which in the hands of the Decemviri, the vritus Graecus, with Greek deities and Greek ritual found entry; a temple was dedicated to the Greek trinity of Demeter, Dionysus, Persephone, under the Latin names of Ceres, Liber, and Libera. Later came Artemis as Diana and Aphrodite as Venus. Apollo himself was admitted in 431 B.C. In 399 by the same authority the first lectisternium (entertainment of deities in images upon couches) was held, and these lectisternia together with frequent supplicationes (procession with prayers) permitted to the people a participation in worship alien to the Roman idea of all being performed by the priest.

3. In the third period (218 B.C. = to the end of the Republic) Roman religion became moribund, and Rome in despair abandoned her own gods for foreign deities. Greek thought produced skepticism among the educated classes. Ennius introduced the teachings of the Greek Euhemerus which represented the gods as deified heroes, while Epicureanism, tho it denounced superstition, destroyed faith in a providence. One form of Greek religious thought, however, Stoicism, developed the best type of Roman character. On the other hand, the populace, depressed by the calamities of the Hannibalic struggle and terrified by the repeated prodigia, lost faith in native deities, gave way to superstitio, and yearned for more intimate personal worships. The baneful Divinatio of Etruria exercised a more potent spell upon the Roman mind, and it now became customary for all classes to consult the Oriental Chaldaei and mathematici. In 205 B.C. the emotionalism of Phrygia entered the West, when, on the advice of the Sibylline Oracles, the cult of the Great Mother (Cybele) was introduced from Pessinus. The door was thus opened to individualistic, mystic, and orgiastic, Oriental cults which secured a firm hold before the close of the Republic. The Bacchic (Dionysiac) rites gave rise to such a scandal as to call for drastic interference on the part of the Senate in 186 B.C., but only by way of supervision, not of suppression. Mā also came from Phrygia as Bellona. Isis invaded Italy in the 2d cent. B.C., and Mithras in 1st cent. B.C.

4. The imperial period is marked (1) by the remarkable religious revival under Augustus—a curious recognition that political stability depended on a religious basis. He endeavored to appeal to the Roman conscience by resuscitating the old forms of religion. He restored 82 temples in Rome alone, revived obsolete priesthoods, especially the Arval Brothers, and endowed new ones. In typically Roman fashion the antiquarian revival was dictated as much by political as by religious motives: it sought to utilize the universal spirit of thanksgiving by bringing it into association with the Julian house and by giving it a prominent religious character. Tho too external, inasmuch as it was by the will of a single individual, to touch the springs of spiritual life, it had an important bearing by reinvigorating paganism for the long struggle, just beginning, with Christianity. (2) The imperial cult, which was unobtrusively introduced when the murdered Julius was declared Divus in 42 B.C. The deification of dead emperors was destined to issue soon in the cult of living emperors, which was from the outset usual in the provinces and in Greece. Augustus, tho he declined divine honors during his lifetime, was deified by the Senate on his death, but in the first year of his reign he had appeared in an Oriental province as 'God of God' in succession to the Ptolemies. Tiberius refused similar honors in Rome, but encouraged the practise in the provinces. Caligula put forth the claim to be treated as a god, while Nero was the first living emperor to wear the corona radiata, symbolic of descent from the Sun-

god. Domitian arrogated for himself during his lifetime the title of dominus et deus. Diocletian demanded Oriental prostration. Even Christian emperors, to Valerian I (d. 375), were officially made Divi after death. This cult of the emperors discredited polytheism and degraded the idea of Deity, but it contributed to give cohesion to the empire, and it furthered the Man-God conception, so important in the religion of the Christian centuries. (3) Oriental mysticism, sacramentarianism, and that conception of religion which became known later as Gnosticism, laid increasing hold on the religious mind, and with them, theosophy, magic, astralism, and demonology. It was under the empire that the Oriental religions reached their apogee. Isis secured a temple on the Campus Martius in 39 A.D., and under Nero her religion became a religio licita. The Dea Syria (Atargatis), the Phrygian Sabazius, and Syrian Baals followed. Hadrian included images of Isis and Serapis in his private chapel. In 304 Mithras was declared Guardian of the empire. In 311 an edict of toleration was issued for another Oriental religion, into the faith of which Constantine was baptised in 337.

Roman religion, tho possessing only a secondary interest for Christianity compared with that of Greece, has influenced deeply the theology, practise, and worship of the West. In addition to supplying much of the vocabulary of theology, and furnishing the precedents for canon law, the legal mind of Rome gave a contractual significance to such doctrines as Justification and Atonement. The cult of the dead passed in Western Europe into that of the saints and martyrs. The religious festivals of the Roman calendar have contributed to our church festivals (as Christmas and Easter). Roman orderliness of ceremonial, scrupulosity of ritual, and elaborate symbolism are reflected in some types of Christian worship, especially in Southern Europe. The practical mind of Rome, which insisted in making all speculation a means to a 'way of life' has promoted the ideals of duty and the demands of morality. The religious sanctities of Roman family life, especially connected with birth, puberty, and marriage, have contributed to such sacramental acts as baptism, confirmation, and marriage. With the mentality of Latin Christianity coincided reverence for law and respect for authority. In no other religion did church and state stand so inseparable, a fact of immense significance in Church history. Roman religion was the extreme type of institutional religion, a feature most faithfully reproduced in Roman Christianity. Even the cult of the emperors proved an inspiration to early Christianity to claim as universal a Lordship for the Lord Christ as that cult did for the emperor, and it accentuated that exclusivism in the Christian message which was the historic safeguard of the 'new way' amid the regnant Syncretism. And the Stoic ideal, which first awakened the Roman conscience and attained its highest ancient form in Roman character, has been fruitful in Christian ethics.

ROMANS, EPISTLE TO THE: 1. Introductory. This epistle belongs to the group of Paul's uncontested letters (cf. CORINTHIANS, EPP. TO THE, § 1), standing foremost, not only in this group, but among all his writings, as the most systematically doctrinal statement which we possess from him. It is this characteristic which has made the Epistle in all ages of the Church a great field of doctrinal controversy.

2. Contents. The letter opens with a rather elaborate greeting (1 1-7), followed by a thanksgiving for the readers' faith, in which he refers to his desire to visit them (1 8-15), closing with a passage which is practically a statement of the Epistle's theme, viz.: that the only righteousness acceptable to God, i.e., the only way of getting right with God, is through faith (1 16 f.).

This theme is then taken up and worked out with great elaborateness and a skilful arrangement of argument—covering in the process fully one-half of the Epistle (1 16-8 39). It is discussed first, negatively, showing how both Gentile and Jew had failed to secure an acceptable righteousness by works (1 18-3 20). This negative argument is presented (1) by a vivid statement of the condition of the Gentile world in the Apostle's day—showing it to be one on which rested the judgment of God, and, consequently, one which evidenced this world as having failed to secure acceptance with God for such religion as it had practised (1 18-23), and (2) by an almost equally vivid and a most skilfully presented statement of the condition of the Jewish world (2 1-3 9), showing that the Jew, far from having anything to boast of as to his standing before God, compared with that of the Gentile, was really under greater condemnation in God's sight, even in his Divinely given religion of the Mosaic Law; since he had had, through the revelation of truth which God had granted him in that Law, greater opportunity to know the right and to do it; whereas he was actually guilty of the same iniquities as the Gentiles around him (2 14-16); so that the Law in which he had trusted had put him under the judgment not only of God, but even of the lawless heathen world itself (2 17-23). It is a severe arraignment of his own people. In fact, the Apostle is so conscious of its severity that he feels called upon to remind his readers that, in spite of all the Jews' abuse of God's blessings in the covenant with them into which He had entered through the Law, these blessings were real, and would be ultimately fulfilled on God's part because of this covenant in which they were involved (3 1-8). He then returns to sum up his argument so far, drawing the inference which it had rendered irresistible, that the entire human race, on the basis of its religion of works, stood guilty in God's sight (3 9-20).

Having finished with this negative treatment of his theme, the Apostle comes now to its positive treatment, which consists practically in a discussion of the righteousness which alone is acceptable to God, i.e., of the way by which one can get right with God through faith (3 21-8 39). This discussion is opened with a statement of the historical fact of the provision of such a way through the death of Jesus Christ (3 21-26), from which is drawn the necessary conclusion as to the impossibility of any self-gratulation on man's part in the matter of acceptance with God; since faith excludes all that element of self-merit on which alone self-gratulation can rest (3 27-29) while, at the same time, it does not set aside the Law itself (3 31). This last statement is then elaborated into a disclosure of the fact that even Abraham, the head and representative of the covenant of circumcision, was himself justified by faith (4 1-12), before he had received circumcision (4 13-15) and independently of the Law (4 16-18), showing what had been God's purpose in such faith on Abraham's part (4 19-21), and how that faith had manifested itself in Abraham's life (4 22-24) with the bearing of his case on the justification of the Christian (4 25-26).

After this statement of the agreement with Scripture of the principle of justification by faith, the Apostle proceeds to bring this principle to the test of the present life, showing its surety against all experience of need, both here and hereafter (5<sup>1-2</sup>), through its impartation to us of the vitalizing power of the life of Christ (5<sup>10-11</sup>). The largeness of this idea of the coming to us of the life of Christ leads the Apostle into a consideration of Christ's relation to the life of the race, in which he contrasts the results of Christ's work with the effects of Adam's sin, showing how the former, through its element of vitalizing grace, must inevitably overcome and supplant all the death which the latter has wrought (5<sup>12-19</sup>). In fact, where the Mosaic Law, which came into the history of the human race between Adam and Christ, intensified the death results of Adam's sin, there the grace of Christ intensified its vitalizing power to the destruction and removal from our life of these results (5<sup>20-21</sup>). This raises however, the practical question regarding the Christian's relation to sin in his living. This question is taken up in the form of two self-stated objections to the Apostle's argument: (1) The objection that, if grace more abounds where sin abounds, the Christian should continue in sin, in order that grace may abound (6<sup>1</sup>). This is answered from the point of view of the impossibility of such a life on the Christian's part, because (a) of the principle involved in his death to sin (6<sup>2</sup>), and (b) of the ultimate moral end of his baptism into the death of Christ (6<sup>3-4</sup>). (2) The objection that, if the Christian is no longer under law but under grace, he can afford to indulge in sin (6<sup>15</sup>). This is answered from the impossibility of such indulgence, because of the mutually exclusive laws of service to sin and to righteousness (6<sup>16-23</sup>).

From this general consideration of the spiritual and moral results of justification by faith, the Apostle proceeds to one of the most interesting portions in his letter, where, after an introductory passage illustrating the freedom from the claims of the Law which the Christian has secured by the death of Christ (7<sup>1-6</sup>), he discloses to the readers, through an introspection of his own soul's life, the spiritual conflict in which the Christian must constantly participate while the principle of the unregenerate nature (the 'flesh' ver. 5) and the principle of the regenerate nature (the 'mind' ver. 23) are at war within him (7<sup>7-23</sup>). From this conflict, however, the Christian will ultimately be delivered through the vitalizing Spirit of Christ (7<sup>24-25</sup>)—a certainty of outlook which obligates him to subject his life to the control of that Spirit, and so to realize his relation to God as son and heir of all his glory (8<sup>14-17</sup>). This mention of heirship leads the Apostle into an elaborate presentation of what is involved in the Divine inheritance for the Christian (8<sup>18-30</sup>), with which his general discussion of the Epistle's theme is brought to an end.

The three chs. (9-11) which intervene between this formal argument (1<sup>18-8</sup>) and the practical conclusions drawn from it (12<sup>1-15</sup>) offer to the student of the Epistle an interesting problem, viz.: the relation of the contents of these chs. to the argument of the Epistle. After an introductory statement of an apologetic nature (9<sup>1-4</sup>), there is given a plain affirmation of the liberty which God has exercised in His election of the spiritual Israel (9<sup>6-29</sup>), which is followed by an equally plain affirmation of the responsibility which nevertheless rests upon the unspiritual Israel in its non-election (9<sup>30-10</sup>). There is then outlined the plan God has for the unspiritual Israel, in view of its relation to Him as His Covenant People (11<sup>1-24</sup>), to which is added a closing summary review of the situation (11<sup>25-32</sup>). This closes the doctrinal portion of the Epistle.

Based upon the truths brought to light in this portion, there then follows a practical presentation to the readers of the consequent duties of character and life demanded of them, covering the fields of (a) duties to God and the Church (14<sup>1-15</sup>), (b) duties to the State (13<sup>1-7</sup>), and (c) duties to Society (13<sup>8-14</sup>). Upon this follows the general conclusion of the Epistle (15<sup>14-16</sup>)—tho the thought evidently returns in 16<sup>17-20</sup> to the urgency of the duty needful on the readers' part toward those who are causing faction and strife among them.

3. Integrity. This gives us the contents of the Epistle as it stands before us. It is obvious, however, that the study of the Epistle must be determined by what constituted its contents when it was written. On this point there has been, and is to-day, wide difference of opinion. That there is cause for this difference can not be denied. (1) The existing MSS. give evidence that very early there was considerable variety in the place assigned the doxology of 16<sup>25-27</sup>. In some it stands at the close of the Epistle, as it does in the accepted text; in some it stands between the last verse of ch. 14 and the first verse of ch. 15; in some it stands both at the close of ch. 14 and at the close of ch. 16; in some it is omitted altogether. (2) The fact that the Church at Rome had not been founded by Paul, nor even visited by him, when he wrote the letter, makes the last chapter with its long list of salutations seem peculiar and out of keeping with this situation.

There can be no question that, as far as agreement of thought is concerned, the doxology fits better at the end of ch. 14 than it does at the end of ch. 16. In ch. 14 Paul is speaking of those in the Church whose consciences are yet sensitive in the matter of eating food and observing days (14<sup>1</sup>). He urges both those whose consciences are thus bound and those whose consciences are freer in these matters to be charitable toward each other in their judgments (14<sup>8-12</sup>). Especially does he urge those who are of free conscience not to put a stumbling-block in the others' way, but, in the spirit of Christ Himself, to sacrifice their own pleasure in these things for the sake of the weaker brother (14<sup>13-23</sup>). Upon this train of thought the doxology would quite naturally follow with its ascription of praise to God, as one 'that is able to establish them' (16<sup>25</sup>); while the thought of the doxology itself would be immediately taken up by the thought of ch. 15, which in its opening verses is simply a development of this appeal to the spirit of Christian self-sacrifice on the part of those who are strong in conscience. There is no such connection of thought between the doxology and the list of names which immediately precedes it in ch. 16. There is also no question that ch. 15 closes with a benediction such as is found at the end of several of the Apostle's letters (15<sup>33</sup>; cf. II Co 13<sup>11</sup>; I Th 5<sup>23</sup>; II Th 3<sup>16</sup>; Ph 4<sup>7</sup>; see also Eph 6<sup>23</sup>; Gal 6<sup>16</sup>), and, inasmuch as the doxology at the end of ch. 16 so well agrees with a position between chs. 14 and 15, the way would be open for a removal of ch. 16, with its list of strange names, without disturbing the conclusion of the Epistle. In view of this fact, and also of the fact that some of the names in ch. 16 seem better to agree with a residence in Ephesus and the province of Asia than in Rome, it is the almost general opinion of scholars that this chapter does not belong to this Epistle, but constitutes a brief note commending Phoebe (16<sup>1</sup>) to the Church at Ephesus.

Apart, however, from the position of the doxology, there are reasons which compel us to assign this ch. to this Epistle, chief among which are: (1) There are no MSS. extant which omit ch. 16; so that, if it was not written by Paul himself in this letter to Rome, it must have been added to the Epistle before it was prepared for general circulation by the church of that place, and thus successfully foisted upon the Church at large from the very beginning. This is most unlikely. (2) Tho Aquila and Priscilla (16<sup>3</sup>) were in Ephesus not long before Paul wrote the Epistle (Ac 18<sup>24-26</sup>), it is to be remembered that these intimate companions and fellow helpers of Paul regulated their movements from place to place by the missionary plans of the Apostle (cf. Ac 18 2 with 18 18). Knowing, therefore, Paul's settled purpose of proceeding from Ephesus to Rome (Ac 19 21), they may quite naturally have returned to their home city (cf. Ac 18 2) ahead of him—as they had practically done at Ephesus (Ac 18 18-21)—accompanied by Epænetus (16 5), who, as 'the first-fruits of Asia unto Christ,' was more likely to have been their convert than Paul's. In fact, it is interesting, if not evidencing, that from inscriptions and archeological remains practically all the names in ch. 16 can be shown to be possible Roman names, while those of Prisca, Amplius, Nereus, and Apelles are connected definitely with the early history of Roman Christianity. There is no such intimate relation between these names and Ephesus, or the province of Asia, or the history of the Church in this region. (3) Paul's custom is to give more personal salutations to the churches he had not founded or visited than to those which had been established directly by his hand (contrast the closing ch. of Col and the closing verses of Phm with the concluding portions of I, II Th, I, II Co, and Ph). The fact that he was unknown to these churches made it almost necessary for him to single out for salutation such persons in their membership as he personally knew; for so only could he establish between himself and them the points of personal contact which would give influence to his message to them, or prepare the way for his visiting them. Only in an Encyclical letter like Eph would such necessity not obtain.

The fact, therefore, that Paul in this Roman letter is writing to a church to which he was a stranger leads us to expect just the personal salutations which we find in ch. 16; while the fact that there should be so many there he knew is only natural in view of his twelve years of mission work in the East and the frequency of communication between the eastern shores of the Mediterranean and Rome.

4. Composition of the Church. The city of Rome, as other cities, had doubtless received its first knowledge of the Gospel from Jewish traders and pilgrims returned from the Holy Land (cf. Ac 2 10, as interpreted by 17 21), so that such preaching of the new religion as was attempted was first within the circle of the synagog. When Paul wrote, however, the church was unmistakably Gentile in the great majority of its membership (cf. 1 5 f., 11 13, which are confirmed by such passages as 1 13-15 and 15 14-16—passages that would have no meaning for Jews). Doubtless the edict of Claudius (49-50 A.D. [?], Ac 18 2) expelling the Jews from Rome had given the Gentiles a preponderance in the church, which the return of the Jews would rather accentuate by bringing to issue the inevitable separation between the church and its previous Jewish surroundings (cf. the apparent ignorance of the Christian community on the part of the Jews in Ac 28 22). It was to this Gentile element that the church owed such organization as it possessed. Indeed, Jewish converts generally failed to appreciate the need of a church organization for their new faith. Their conviction that Christianity was to come to the world through a reformed Judaism made the existing organization of the Jewish Church sufficient to their mind; so that, as a matter of fact, in spite of the wide distribution of pilgrim converts from Pentecost over Paul's mission-field, the Apostle was compelled everywhere he went to organize the church life of the new community (cf. Ac 14 23; Tit 1 5).

In Rome, however, the organization was evidently not such as it would have been had the Apostle personally founded the church. In fact, Paul nowhere in the Epistle speaks of the local church—the fully organized ἐκκλησία—as he does in I Co (1 2), II Co (1 1), Gal (1 2; cf. I Co 16 1 and Ac 14 23), I Th (1 1), II Th (1 1), and by implication in Ph (1 1, 4 15). The exhortations of 12 5-8 are phrased in an indefinite way (especially vs. 7 and 8, as tho the church was without the distinctive officers evident in other localities (cf. Ph 1 1; Ac 14 23, 20 17); while one can not but notice the group character of the membership disclosed in the salutations of ch. 16 (vs. 3-5, 'Salute Prisca and Aquila . . . and the church that is in their house'; ver. 14, 'Salute Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermes, Patrobas, and the brethren that are with them'; ver. 15, 'Salute Philologus and Julia, Nereus and his sister, and Olympas, and all the saints that are with them'), as tho the church in its lack of official organizing had grown up through associated groups of converts scattered over the city, each under its leaders, who taught them in the truth, and instructed them in the Christian life (cf. evidences of this same group organization in Col 4 15 and Phm ver. 2).

5. Date and Purpose of Letter. To this community of Christians at Rome Paul wrote this letter during the three months of his last visit to Corinth (Dec., 55-Mar., 56, or more probably 56-57). He was then through with his work in the East and was about to enter upon the accomplishment of his long-desired journey to the imperial city (Ro 15 22-24; Ac 19 21; cf. Ro 1 8-15, 15 26, 32). His purpose in sending this letter in advance, however, was not simply to prepare the way for his coming; nor to instruct the readers, as strangers to himself and his work, in the principles of his Gospel, so that his teaching might not seem so unfamiliar to them and be hindered in its results. The presence among the leaders of the church of those who were not only the spiritual fruits of his ministry, but had been workers with him in its service (16 2 f., 7, 9, 12), is warrant that these principles of his Gospel were already known to them, and give enough significance to such statements as 6 17 and 16 25 to render it likely that these principles had been fully accepted by them.

The situation makes clear that the occasion of Paul's letter was the partizan condition of the church. The appeal in 15 1 to those who were strong among the readers to bear the infirmities of the weak; the command in 14 1 that those who were weak in the faith should be received, but not 'for decision of scruples'; the reminder in 12 3-5 that, tho many, they were yet one body in Christ and 'severally members one of another'—these all show that this partizanship consisted in the presence of a strong party, lording it over the weak, and that the strength of this party was not so much in its numbers as in the broadness of its convictions, the freedom of its conscience, and the consequent moral ease of its life. In other words, this strong party drew its followers from the Gentile majority of the church and found those whom it oppressed in the Jewish minority (cf. the rest of ch. 14 and § 4, above, but especially 11 17-20). It was animated by a spirit of hyper-Gentilism, whose tendency was to overpress Paul's Gospel in the direction of antinomianism (cf. the significant prominence given by Paul to objections which seem to arise out of his own argument, and which would be urged against it in support of just such antinomian positions as this party would naturally take, 3 5-8, 6 1-14, 6 15-23, 7 7-25), and, consequently, to ignore both in and out of the Church the Jew, with his scruples of conscience (14 1-19) and his identification with the past dispensation of the Law (11 13-28). There is, indeed, no other way to explain the addition of chs. 9-11 to the Epistle's already completed argument, except as they constitute the Apostle's reminder to the self-satisfied Gentile element in the church that even the unbelieving Jews were still the Covenant People of God and would finally be saved.

Paul's purpose in writing the Epistle was, consequently, to take up his own Gospel and show that it was not to be overpressed in the service of an antinomian living (3 5-8)—that it gave the Gentile element in the church no license against the Law (6 1-23, 7 7-25) and no liberty against the Jewish Christian (11 17-20), that it did not separate these race elements in the church, but rather united them (3 9, 28-30)—that it did not ignore O T truth (1 1-3), or the people of the O T dispensation (10 1-4, 11 1-5), but gave them their rightful place in the church, holding that even the unbelieving Jews had a certain future of salvation in the plan of God (11 25-32). This motive explains the unfavorable review of the Gentile world at the beginning of the Epistle (1 18-32), as well as the caustic warning to the Gentile Christian in chs. 9-11. Such arraignment of the Gentile element in the church could easily have been called forth by the arrogant position of this hyper-Gentile party, and must have had a humbling effect upon its pride. The corresponding arraignment of the Jews in ch. 2 is simply owing to the fact that, through his training in the Law, the Jew was always in danger of misunderstanding Paul's law-free Gospel, and so always, when questions of race difference tempted him to self-satisfaction in his covenant relations to God, needed to have its principles clearly presented to him. This motive accounts also for such irenic tone as the Epistle contains, e.g., the placing of Jew and Gentile together in their relationship to God (1 14, 16, 2 9-12, 3 9, 22, 28-30, 10 12 f., 11 32) and the apologetic attitude toward the Jew (9 1-5, 30-33, 10 1-4, 11 1-5, 11 f., 25-28); since the Apostle's effort is to bring the two elements together. Finally, it gives reason for such didactic tone as is in the Epistle, e.g., the lengthy presentation of his Gospel in its bearing upon faith and works (chs. 1-4); since the Gentile element was in need of careful instruction as to the balance of his Gospel, and both elements alike had to be reminded anew of its basis on the one condition of faith—the only condition which placed both elements equally within the scheme of redemption.

6. Relation of Letter to Paul's Work. This Epistle throws significant light on the development of conditions surrounding and affecting Paul's mission labors. It shows not only that the Judaizing propaganda in the East was not likely to reproduce itself fully and completely in Gentile regions (see CORINTHIANS, EP. TO THE, § 12, and notice that Ro 16 17-20 does not describe the principles of the Judaizing party), but that the very success of Paul's conflict with it was likely to produce a reaction to its opposite extreme in regions which, because of their dominant gentilism, were likely to be unfriendly to the Jewish element in the Church. In the Roman situation, consequently, the dualism in the Church comes to its first real serious threatening of the solidarity of the Christian brotherhood; for this situation showed, not so much a natural insistence of the original Jewish membership to the maintaining of the Church on a Jewish basis (as in Galatia), but rather the arousing of the newly admitted Gentile element into a spirit of hostility to all the historical origins of Christendom, a fatal misunderstanding of all the moral claims of Christianity, and an attitude of counter-exclusivism to the Jew which, because of its free world spirit, threatened more of a real cleavage in the Church than did the provincial propaganda of the Judaizers. It was a situation the seriousness of which is increasingly evident in the Epistles Paul wrote from the time of his arrival in Rome (see PHILIPPIANS, EP. TO THE, § 1), and which finds its most significant treatment in the theme of his Ephesian letter (q.v.).

ROME, rōm ('Ρώμη). 1. Sketch of the History of R. to Constantine. The capital city of Italy, and one of the centers of Christianity in the Apostolic Age. It is situated on the river Tiber, which was navigable in antiquity. It interests all classes of students, because it has an unbroken history from the mythical date of its founding (753 B.C.) to the present day. But prehistoric R. goes back far beyond that date. The first settlement is said to have been made by Romulus on the Palatine Hill (Roma Quadrata), distinct traces of which have been laid bare by excavations. The Quirinal Hill was next settled. The Forum, lying between the Palatine and the Quirinal, formed the political center of the city, while the Capitoline Hill was the religious center. Other hills were settled in turn. Servius Tullius extended the city limits, and enclosed the whole within the Servian walls. Tho the Tarquinian kings embellished Rome they were expelled, and a republic was formed 509 B.C. Then followed long-continued wars with the Etruscans and Veii, but Rome was victorious in 396 B.C. The Gauls invaded and destroyed it in 390 B.C. The city was hastily rebuilt with narrow streets; the houses continued to be wretched down to the time of Augustus (31 B.C.-14 A.D.). After the destruction of Carthage (146 B.C.) Rome was greatly enlarged, the streets and roads were paved (Via Appia), great buildings and tombs were erected, many of which may still be identified. Rome was further embellished by Augustus, who restored eighty-two temples, reorganized the municipal government, and introduced policemen and firemen. It was burned by Nero (64 A.D.), and rebuilt with broad streets. Nero's Golden House enclosed gardens, lakes, and lawns, and covered a vast area. The Flavian emperors (69-96 A.D.) further beautified the city with temples, arches, baths, forums, and mausoleums. The population was about 1,500,000 at this time, but after the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161-180), there followed a century of civil wars and invasions of barbarians which reduced the population to 750,000 in the time of Diocletian (284-305). Along therewith went decadence in architecture and art, as the buildings of the period still show. From the end of the Punic wars (146 B.C.), Rome remained unvalled for 400 years. It was revalled by Aurelian (270-275) in order to protect the city against the barbarians. This wall is still practically extant. The last great buildings were erected by Constantine (Basilica, Baths, Arch), the founder of Constantinople, whither he transferred the seat of government (330 A.D.). Herewith began the decline of Rome.

2. Christianity in Rome. The catacombs were the subterranean cemeteries of the early Roman Christians, until the edict of Constantine placed Christianity on an equal footing with other religions (313 A.D.). Peter is said to have founded the first church in Rome in the house of Pudens. Constantine was accredited with the foundation of several churches in Rome, among them the Lateran and St. Peter's, tho he was not baptized until 337 A.D. (on his death-bed). Constantius, and again Gratian, removed the altar of Victory, the most venerable symbol of the pagan empire, from the Senate-house. In 408 the property of the ancient religions was confiscated by Honorius. Many pagan temples were destroyed by Christian fanatics, tho many were also preserved by conversion into Christian churches. Many churches were built at this time (five patriarchal), and also monasteries. The decay of Rome had now set in, caused partly by the lapsing of the Campagna into a malarious marsh, and partly by the successive incursions of the Vandals and Goths, against whom Belisarius fought with varying success. Rome was finally incorporated into the Byzantine Empire in 552. The city was preserved from utter extinction, because it was the center of Christianity and the residence of the Pope, who was now powerful and aggressively active. The temporal power of the Pope began with the year 727, when Luitprand, King of the Lombards, gave the town of Sutri to the Pope. Next the exarchate of Ravenna was given to the Pope in 755 by Pepin, the Frankish king, who also made the papacy independent of Constantinople. The crowning of Charlemagne by Pope Leo III on Christmas day 800 A.D. marks the beginning of the Holy Roman Empire and of the Middle Ages. Greece propounded and, in part, solved the great problems in the realm of the mind; she gave to the world unrivaled treasures of literature, sculpture, and architecture. Rome's great legacy to the world is law and government. Rome taught us how to organize and govern a united state, and transmitted to us the system of our jurisprudence. R. consummated the unification of the world for Christianity. R. also proved the great intermediary in transmitting the culture, ethics, and philosophy of Greece to the West. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

ROOF. See HOUSE, § 6 (d).

ROOM. See HOUSE, § 6 (c), (g), (h), (i).

ROOT: This term renders shōresh and פֶּלֶא, and, in the Bible, is generally used of persons or people under the figure of a tree or vine (Job 14 8, 30 4, used lit.; 28 9 = lowest part, and 36 30 = bottom). As roots spread out and down into the soil, and are the channels of moisture and nourishment, the ideas of firmness and sustenance are suggested by the term (Am 2 9; Hos 9 16, 14 5 [6]; Is 14 30; II K 19 30 = Is 37 31, 5 24; Mal 4 1 [3 19]; Job 8 17, 18 16, 29 19; Pr 12 3, 12; Jer 17 8; Ezk 31 7; Is 53 2; cf. Mt 3 10, 13 6, 21, and [s]). It means also 'stock,' 'family,' from which new branches may spring (Is 11 1, 10; Dn 11 7; Is 14 29; cf. Ro 15 12; Rev 5 5, 22 16) and 'source' or 'cause' (Dt 29 18 [17]; cf. He 12 15; Job 19 28). C. S. T.

ROOT OF DAVID: A symbolic designation of Jesus Christ, used in the Apocalypse (Rev 5 5, 22 16).

ROSE. See PALESTINE, § 22.

ROSH, rosh (רֹשׁ, rō'sh), 'head': 1. A 'son' of Benjamin (Gn 46 21), not in the list of Nu 26 38 f. (cf. I Ch 8 1 f.), but necessary to make up the fourteen names of Gn 46 22. Some would correct the Heb. text by Nu 26 38, and read for 'Ehi and Rosh, Muppim' (אֶחִי וְרֹאשׁ מֻפִּיִּם), 'Ahiram and Shupham (אֶחִירָם וְשֻׁפְחָם). 2. In Ezk 38 2 f., 39 1, the RV gives 'prince of Rosh' as the rendering of n'si' rō'sh, making 'Rosh' the name of a people or country like Meshech and Tubal, but it has not yet been identified. AV renders 'chief prince.' C. S. T.

ROUND TIRES LIKE THE MOON: The rendering of the Heb. sahārōnīm (Is 3 18 AV, 'crescents' RV). See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 2.

ROWER. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

ROYAL CITY: The rendering of 'ir hamm'lakhāh (II S 12 26, but 'city of waters,' 'ir hammayim, in ver. 27) taken by Joab in his attack on Rabbah (q.v.), or, in full, Rabbath b'nā 'Ammōn, on the headwaters of the Jabbok. It was perhaps the royal castle or citadel which guarded the water-supply of the city. At the northern point of the triangular plateau, on which the city was built, and between the two wādys that are here separated only by a low neck of land, was a large cistern, hewn out of the rocks, which was connected with the castle by an underground passage (Polyb. v. 71). The place captured by Joab was probably near this tank. Joab left the capture of the city proper to David. Wellhausen would read 'tr hammayim as in ver. 27. Klostermann would read in ver. 27 'ayin hammayim, 'spring of waters,' which was within the 'royal city' captured by Joab. Cheyne suggests for ver. 26 'tr milkōm, 'the city of Milcom [the god].' C. S. RUFUS, rū'fūs (Ρούφος): 1. The son of Simon, who, according to Mk 15 21, bore Jesus' cross. The reference implies that Rufus and his brother Alexander were known to the readers of Mk. 2. The man who, with his mother, is saluted in Ro 16 13. The fact that R was a widely current name (cf. Zahn N T Introd., Vol. I, p. 392, and Vol. II, p. 504, N. 5) makes precarious the identification of 1 and 2. According to later traditions, Alexander and Rufus accompanied Andrew and Peter on their journeys (cf. Lipsius-Bonnet, Apoc. Apostelgesch. II, 117, 5; 118, 9; 119, 13; Forbes Robinson, Coptic Apoc. Gospel, p. 50). J. M. T.

RUG: The rendering of the Heb. semikhāh (Jg 4 18, mantle AV). The exact meaning of the Heb. word is not known; some sort of coverlet is the traditional opinion (cf. Moore, ICC. ad loc.). Burney, Book of Judges, p. 92, suggests 'fly-net.' E. E. N.

RUHAMAH, ru-hē'ma (רֹחַמָּה, rūhāmāh), 'compassionated': A name to be given to the daughter of Hosea's unfaithful wife (Hos 2 1 [2]) in place of her first name, 'Lo-ruhamah' (q.v.), 'uncompassionated.' The new name typified the changed relation of Israel to J' (Hos 1 10 ff. [2 1 ff.]; cf. Ro 9 25 f.; I P 2 10).

RULER: In the O T this term is used somewhat loosely to render a number of Heb. terms, most of which are of general rather than technical significance. (a) The more general terms are: (1) mōshēl (Gn 45 8; Jg 15 11, etc.). (2) nāsī', 'one lifted up' (Ex 16 22, 22 28, etc.). (3) qāṣṣān, 'a decider,' 'judge' (Is 1 10, 3 6, etc.). (4) sar, a common term for an official, frequently used of high officers and even of kings, etc. (Gn 47 6; Ex 18 21, etc.; in Ezr 10 14; Neh 11 1; Est 3 12, 8 9, 9 3, 'prince' RV). (5) rūdkeh, ptepl. of rādkhāh (Ps 68 27). (6) rōzēn, ptepl. of rāzan, 'weighty one' (Ps 2 2). (7) shūlōn and shallit (Dn 3 2 f.; Ec 10 5; Dn 2 10, 5 20). (8) rō'sh, 'head' (Dt 1 13; Is 29 10, 'heads' RV). (b) More specific terms are (1) nāghādh, a word indicative of preeminence, and usually rendered 'prince' in RV (I S 25 30; II S 6 21, etc.). (2) šāghān, 'the representative of another,' a 'deputy,' but often used loosely (Ezr 9 2; Neh 2 16, etc.; in Jer 51 23, 28, 57, 'deputy' RV). (3) māghēn (Hos 4 18) is figurative; the literal meaning of the word is 'shield.' The expression ruler of the city (Jg 9 30; II Ch 29 20; cf. I K 22 26; II K 10 1) means probably some one appointed to such a position by the king (in Jg 9 30 by Abimelech, the petty tyrant). The ancient Hebrew city was governed by 'elders,' not by one man. In the following cases RV gives 'ruler' in place of other renderings of AV: Gn 45 26; Ps 22 28, for mōshēl; Gn 49 10, 'ruler's staff' for mōshēl, 'lawgiver' AV. (This word must mean a thing, not a person, as it is parallel to 'scepter' in the preceding line; cf. also Pr 25 15; Ec 7 10; Jer 2 8; Zec 10 4.) E. E. N.

In the N T 'ruler' occurs most frequently as the rendering of the following words: (1) ἀρχων, meaning a member of the Sanhedrin (Jn 3 1, etc.), or a judge or magistrate (Ac 23 5), and ἀρχισυνάγωγος, a ruler of a synagog (Mk 5 35, etc.; see SYNAGOG). (2) ἡγεμών, a term of general significance, 'leader,' 'ruler,' 'governor' (Mk 13 9; Lk 21 12). (3) ἀρχιτεχνικός (Jn 2 9). Here the meaning is somewhat doubtful—either a chief servant or a guest chosen as the chairman of the company. (4) πολιτάρχαι (Ac 17 6, 8). See CITY, RULERS OF. (5) κοσμοκράτορες (Eph 6 12), signifying rulers of this world (as opposed to the Ruler of the universe, παντοκράτωρ). The reference is to the spiritual powers of evil, which were thought of as having sway over this darkened world. S. D.—E. E. N.

RULERS OF THE CITY. See RULER; and CITY, RULERS OF.

RUMAH, rū'mā (רֹמָה, rūmāh): The home of Pedaiah, the maternal grandfather of King Jehoiakim (II K 23 26). Josephus (Ant. X, 5 2) has Ἀρουμάς (Arumās?), which suggests Arumah (Jg 9 41), the mod. el-'Ormeḥ, not far from Shechem. There was another Rumah in Galilee mentioned by Josephus (BJ, III, 7 21). C. S. T.

RUN, RUNNER: In ancient warfare, much depended on the agility of the individual. Consequently, those who were swift of foot, like Asahel (II S 2 18), were counted most valuable soldiers. The officials who rode in chariots were attended by a company of runners (II S 15 1). Elijah seems to have assumed the position of attendant courier to Ahab after the event on Mt. Carmel (I K 18 40). Certain runners, often employed as couriers, were so well known that they could be distinguished at a distance by their peculiar manner of running (II S 18 24-26). In I S 22 17 we should read 'runners' instead of 'guard,' and it is likely that Doeg the Edomite was the swiftest of this band of runners (IS 21 7, corrected text), who were in close attendance on Saul. Paul frequently refers to the running in the race-course as symbolic of the Christian's course of life, in which he should strive to gain the prize of attainments in his own character and of good results in the lives of others. RUTH, rūth (רֹוּת, rūth, contracted from רֹוּתָהּ, rē'ūth), 'companion': The heroine of the book discussed below. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

RUTH, BOOK OF: An anonymous historical romance, which tells how a Moabitess named Ruth came to marry Boaz of Bethlehem, thus becoming the great-grandmother of David (4 13-22; cf. I S 22 3 ff.), and therefore an ancestor of Jesus (cf. Mt 1 5). The chief aim of the book is to show how a Moabite woman was cordially welcomed into ancient Israel, and became the ancestress of the great King David (1 4, 22; 2 2, 6, 10, 22; 4 5, 10, 11). This suggests that the story of this mixed marriage is told as a protest against the drastic reforms of Ezra (Ezra chs. 9-10) and Nehemiah (Neh 10 30, 13 23 ff.).

The postexilic origin of the book is shown by the following facts: (1) Its place in the Heb. Bible among the K'thūbhīm, or 'Writings,' in the third collection of the Canon; and not among the 'Former Prophets,' or early histories, where it was placed by the LXX., followed by the Vulg. and EV. (2) The dependence of the genealogy in 4 18-22 upon the Priestly Code of the Hexateuch ('these are the generations'; Ex 6 23; Nu 1 7, etc.) (3) The clan of Salmah (4 20; in v. 21 Salmon) did not come to dwell in the vicinity of Bethlehem until after the exile (I Ch 2 11, 51, 54). (4) The phrase with which the book opens: 'And it came to pass in the days when the judges judged,' points to a time long after the age of the Judges, when the period had come to be regarded as a closed whole. This conception shows knowledge of our canonical Book of Judges which was composed during the exile. (5) The custom of loosing the sandal in connection with the levirate marriage is mentioned in 4 7 as an ancient practise that had gone out of use in the author's time, but it was still in existence when Deuteronomy was written (c. 650 B.C.; Dt 25 9). SABACHTHANI, sa-bak'cha-nai. See ELOI, ELOI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.

SABAOTH, sab'i-oth. See Hosts.

SABBATH: 1. Name. The weekly rest-day of the Hebrews. Its name (shabbāth, Σάββατον, from shā-bhath, 'to break off,' 'to desist' [the derivation from shebha, 'seven,' is illusory] indicates its original nature to have been that of a time of cessation from work. But comparison with the Assyrian šabattu or šapattu shows a different and more primitive root, whose exact significance is not very clear.

2. Day of Sacred Rest. In the Biblical accounts of the institution of the Sabbath, two grounds are given for it in the two versions of the Decalog. The first (P) associates it with the creation of the world, and the example of the Creator as He completed His work in six days and rested on the seventh (Ex 20 11); the second (Dt) bases the day upon the deliverance from Egypt ('therefore Jehovah thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day,' Dt 5 12 ff.). In other portions of the legislation characteristic differences appear. In JE the notion of refreshment and recuperation lies at the foundation of, or at least accompanies the Sabbath idea (Ex 23 12). But everywhere the fundamental conception is that of cessation from labor, and the slight difference in the different codes as to the kind of labor, whether agricultural or commercial, to be abstained from on the Sabbath can not be pressed profitably. And yet, mere cessation from labor does not exhaust the idea of the Sabbath. It is not to serve solely as a convenience for man. It has a religious significance as well. It is a holy day. In the Decalog this aspect of it is put into the foreground. It is to be hallowed to J'. The pith of the idea is then the consecration of time to God. It stands parallel to the consecration of places, the setting up of shrines to J', and the offering up of gifts, sacrifices, or victims hallowed by their devotion to Him.

3. Origin of the Sabbath. This conception of it holds true only of the fully developed institution as defined in the codes. As to its origin, it has been held that the lunar month, with its convenient subdivision into four parts by the successive phases of the moon, first furnished the seven-day period as the unit for the sanctification of time and separation from labor. But more recent researches, while still showing the lunar period to be at the foundation, do not bear out the idea of the original fourfold subdivision of the month according to the moon's phases. Among the Assyrians it appears that the one day positively known to have been called ša-bat-tu is the 15th reckoned to be that of the moon at the full. Accordingly, Meinhold (Sab. u. Woche im A T, 1905) contends that the Sabbath originated with the festival of the full moon. But ša-bat-tu and Sabbath are not the same, and the conjecture that the first is the older form is not corroborated by outside considerations. The question then still remains as to how the observance of the full moon as a festival day was in itself the result of the recurrent seven-day, Sabbath. In the reign of Assurbanipal the 7th, 14th, 19th, 21st, and 28th days of each month were designated 'abstinence days,' i.e., days to be avoided in the performance of certain transactions. But the observance of these days does not seem to have any vital connection with the Hebrew Sabbath. The data are not sufficient to warrant a final judgment; but, upon the whole, it appears probable that the Assyrian abstinence days and the Hebrew Sabbath are both derived from some more primitive moon period to which religious significance was attached; and that the Assyrian usage either maintained it in its cruder form or allowed it to fall into a still cruder one, whereas the Hebrew characteristically purified, spiritualized, and settled it into the Biblical Sabbath, i.e., an institution expressive of the monotheistic religious idea and a strong help to the cultivation of a pure religious life. On the other hand, a crude primitive Sabbath, either among Semitic peoples or mankind in general, may be the root and beginning of the Biblical institution, even tho its primitive object were not that of a day of rest and worship.

4. The Sabbath in the History of Israel. With the elaboration of the ceremonial system in the Pentateuchal code, the Sabbath was also made the subject of minute restrictions. Some of these passed out of the region of strict religion, and are merely legal and disciplinary (Ex 16 23-30, 31 12-17, 35 1-3; Nu 15 32-30). To speak more accurately, these are not void of religious value, but only indirectly religious, i.e., as they influenced the Israelites toward a steadier and more systematic expression of the spiritual life. Other provisions, however, are designed to afford a more direct and uninterrupted opportunity for the cultivation of personal religion. At the same time they contain a more humanitarian regard for the refreshment and recuperation from the curse and fatigue of sustained relentless toil (Lv 23 3 f.). The contention that the Sabbath is a comparatively late development in Hebrew history (Meinhold makes it postexilic) is rendered impossible by the uniformity of the tradition which traces the observance of the day as far back as the period of the Exodus (Ex 16 23 ff.). To say nothing of its incorporation in the Decalog, it certainly appears in historical records of the 9th cent. B.C. (II K 4 23), and is associated with the new-moon festival in the preexilic literature (Is 1 13; Hos 2 11; Am 8 6). But it may be mentioned as a singular fact that the Sabbath is never alluded to in the Psalms (except in the title of the 92d), or in Job and Proverbs. It is also ignored in the Deuteronomistic legislation after its mention in the Decalog (5 12-15). By Ezekiel it is alluded to as 'Jehovah's day' (20 12 f., 22 8, 23 38, 44 24). One of the signs of a revival of national life after the Exile was the enforcement of the Sabbath laws by Nehemiah (Neh 10 31, 13 15 ff.). In the Maccabean struggle the observance of the Sabbath became the badge of distinction between the faithful and the lukewarm. From I Mac 2 39-41 (Jos. Ant. XII, 2), it appears that the literal obedience to the Law was carried to such an extreme as to prove a source of great danger to the faithful. These refused even to defend themselves against attacks of armed enemies on the Sabbath day; and as advantage was taken of the fact by the [Syrian] officials, Mattathias issued a declaration to the effect that it was lawful to engage in warfare on the Sabbath, if necessary.

5. Sabbaths. The use of the word in the plural arose in the later period and points to the inclusion of several other days besides the weekly, or seventh, day. How early this was done does not clearly appear. The first day of the lunar period was observed as a Sabbath (cf. New Moon). The first and last days of the Feast of Tabernacles, the Day of Atonement, and the first and last days of the Passover were Sabbaths. The seventh year (Lv 25 1-7; cf. SABBATICAL YEAR) and the Year of Jubilee, or Year of Release, which closed a period of seven Sabbatical years, were also regarded in their entirety as Sabbaths. See also on §§ 1-5 FASTS AND FEASTS, § 6.

6. Jesus on the Sabbath. In the hands of the Rabbis, the few laws of the O T on the subject became the nucleus of an elaborate system covering two large divisions of the Talmud (Shabbat and Erubin). Yet it was conceded that to do good, even when it required hard work, was lawful. The burdensomeness of these prescriptions furnishes the occasion for the apparently new departure of Jesus and His insistence that it should be a means of all sorts of good to men, and that it fulfilled its purpose only as it was made such a means of good. 'The Sabbath was made for man' (Mk 2 27). Consistently with this notion, the custom of meeting in synagogues for the purpose of hearing the Law and the Prophets read and expounded was followed by Him and His disciples (Mk 1 21; Lk 4 16 f., 13 10 f.), thus giving rise to services of worship on the Sabbath Day in the Christian Church (Ac 13 14, 15 21, 17 2). On the other hand, the overburdening of the day with countless restrictions He denounced as contrary to the intention of the institution.

7. The Christian Sabbath. When Christianity was established as a distinct faith, its adherents, following the example of Jesus, observed the Sabbath with the evident intention of using it as a means of spiritual edification. At the same time, the custom arose among them of meeting on the first day of the week in commemoration of the Master's resurrection (Ac 20 7; I Co 16 2). This was called the Lord's Day (Rev 1 10). For a time, the two days were observed together, but for very distinct and different reasons. They were not rival or antagonistic to each other, neither was the Lord's Day substituted for the Sabbath. And yet it was inevitable, as Christianity became more and more clearly differentiated from Judaism, that two days so nearly alike in purpose should be unified and assimilated. This took place in the early years of the 4th cent. of the Christian era when the ideal Sabbath of Jesus was identified with the Lord's Day, and the Jewish Sabbath fell into disuse, and the conviction grew that it had been abrogated. For theories as to the Heb. Sabbath see Driver's Genesis (Westminster Com.) and Exodus (Camb. Bible), and Skinner's Genesis (ICC). Also cf. Hessey, Sunday, Its Origin and Present Obligation (1889). A. C. Z.

SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2.

SABBATICAL YEAR. In the old legislation in E a sabbatic significance was attached to every seventh year (cf. Ex 21 2-7, 23 10). This is confirmed and expanded in the code of Dt (cf. Dt 15 1-5, 12-13), and still further emphasized in the legislation of P (cf. Lv 25 1-7, 18-22, 26 34, 43). The Jubilee-year—the year after each cycle of 7 Sabbatic years—was a further extension and application of the same principle (cf. Lv 25 8-17, 23 ff.). There is no instance of the actual observance of either the Sabbatical or the Jubilee year in the O T, tho Jer 34 6 ff. is evidence that the law of release of servants was known. The Sabbatic year was more strictly observed in the Greek and Roman periods as is evident from allusions to it in Josephus (Ant. III 12 3, XIII 8 1, XIV 10 4-6, XV 1 2; cf. also I Mac 6 53). See also FASTS AND FEASTS, § 6. E. E. N.

SABEANS, sa-bi'anz (שְׁבִי'אִים, shēbhā'im, Job 1 15; שְׁבִי'אִים, shēbhā'im 'men of Sheba,' Jl 3 8 RV; שְׁבִי'אִים, shēbhā'im, Is 45 14; שְׁבִי'אִים, shēbhā'im, Ezk 23 42, Qerē, 'drunkards' RV): The last of these Heb. words is a reading introduced by the Massoretes and no part of the primitive text, which reads as rendered by the RV. As to the other two terms, their resemblance in sound has occasioned some confusion in the sources and consequent division of opinion concerning their exact meaning. It seems probable, however, that the etymological difficulty of identifying shēbhā' with shēbhā', tho not amounting to an impossibility, is very great and that the solution of the problem must be sought in connecting Seba (shēbhā') with the son of Cush (Gn 10 7; I Ch 1 9) and locating the country and people in Africa in the neighborhood of Ethiopia.

Sheba (sh'bhā'), on the other hand, is called in Gn 10 28, 'the son of Joktan' and in Gn 25 3, 'the son of Jokshan.' These two designations are manifestly slightly variant ways of describing the same relationship. Sheba was accordingly a Semitic people and more particularly belonged to the Keturah group of Arabian tribes. It was located in S. Arabia and is to be identified with the Sabeans of that territory, who have left abundant traces of a unique civilization and a great empire (see Glaser, Skizze der Geschichte und Geographie Arabiens, 1890). In the O T Sheba and the Sabeans are known as a nation of merchants. Their 'caravans' (Job 6 19) brought gold, precious stones, and spices from their own country and other merchandise secured from more distant lands (e.g., India and Africa, Ezk 27 22 ff.; Ps 72 10). It seems further that they dealt in slaves also (Jl 3 8). The glory of the Sabeian Empire was still impressive when the Queen of Sheba (q.v.) made a visit of state to the court of Solomon in Jerusalem (I K 10 1-13). SABTA, sab'tā, SABTAH, sab'tā (סַבְּתָה, ṣabhtā' and סַבְּתָה, ṣabhtāh): A son of Cush (I Ch 1 9; Gn 10 7). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

SABTECA, sab'ti-kā (סַבְּתִיקָה, ṣabht'ikā', Sabtecha AV): A son of Cush (Gn 10 7). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

SACAR, sē'kar (סַכָּר, sākhār): 1. A Hararite, the father of Ahiam, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 35 = Sharar the Ararite, II S 23 33). 2. A son of Obed-edom and the eponymous ancestor of a family of doorkeepers (I Ch 26 4). C. S. T.

SACK: A bag made from a coarse fabric of goat's or camel's hair, and used for transporting grain and other goods. The word occurs especially in the account of the visit of Joseph's brothers to Egypt. In the J narrative 'amtahath is used and nowhere else in the O T (Gn 42 27b, 28, 43 12, 18, 21, 23, 44 1, 2, 8, 11, 12). E uses saq (Gn 42 25, 27a, 35; cf. Lv 11 32; Jos 9 4), and k'li occurs in Gn 42 25 as parallel to saq. C. S. T.

SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS: 1. Usage of Terms. The term 'sacrifice' is used in EV with extreme latitude. It denotes everything brought to the altars of God. Its synonyms offering and oblation, tho also used with a measure of elasticity, have more specific meanings. The first is practically limited to the designation of the gifts of flour-cakes, or other bloodless offerings (minhāh, 'gift,' 'tribute'; trūmāh, 'lifted up,' 'contribution'; qorbān, 'means of approach'; προσφορά, δῶρον). The second, so far as it is not a strict equivalent of the first, passes outside the limits of ritual usage, and is applied to gifts of all descriptions (cf. Nu 7 3, etc.; Ex 35 22, 24, etc.). Of the O T terms: (1) zebhaḥ, 'slaughter,' is the one used in the vast majority of instances, both as a verb and as a noun; but as all eating of flesh was primitively sacrificial, 'slaughter' was the equivalent of 'sacrifice.' Other words used are (2) minhāh, 'gift' ('oblation' in I K 18 29, 36 RV; Ezr 9 4 t. RV; Ps 141 2 RV-mg.); (3) hagh (Ex 23 18; Ps 118 27; Is 29 1, 'feasts' RV); (4) 'ishsheh, 'fire-offering' (Nu 28 2-24, 29 6, 13; Jos 13 14; cf. § 7, below); (5) 'āsāh, 'to make [sacrifice]' (Lv 23 19; II K 17 32). The N T usage is limited to the single term θύειν, 'to kill,' and its derivative θυσία, 'slaughter,' i.e., for sacrifice.

2. Definition In general, sacrifice is an offering made to God with the design of expressing, securing, or promoting friendly or normal relations with Him. It is based on the fundamental assumption that the worshiper and God are capable of holding personal relations, which may become closer and more intimate, or else hostile and more strained, which may, in fact, be broken by failure on the part of the worshiper to conform to God's will.

3. Sacrifice in Ethnic Religions. Outside of the Bible, sacrifice is found to be a universal element of worship. Within the circle of nations around Israel, there are from the beginning abundant traces of special forms and prescriptions on the subject. The relation of these to the system which prevailed in Israel may be variously viewed as that of dependence of one upon the other, or dependence of both upon common earlier forms. If the first of these views be assumed as true, the heathen sacrifices are: (1) either degradations of Israelite practise, or remnants of a primitive revelation which became obscured, or (2) conversely, Israel derived its system from the heathen. The first of these two possibilities is based upon precarious foundations, and for the second there is no evidence. If, however, both Israelite and non-Israelite sacrificial practise go back to more primitive forms, the essential idea of it might be: (1) the pure expression of homage; but this could be true only where a very high degree of appreciation of God's character as a righteous ruler prevailed, and such is not the case among primitive peoples; or it might be (2) a propitiatory gift; but if so, it is very difficult to understand in what sense some features of sacrifice, such as the pouring of blood on or around the altar, could be considered a desirable gift by the deity; or (3) sacrifice might be a means of expiation, in which case its chief feature is the death of the victim representing the death or punishment of the worshiper. The worshiper in such a case recognizes in the act his own sinfulness and the justice of God's wrath (cf. S. Ives Curtiss, Primitive Relig. Tradition To-day, 1902). This view, however, does not account for the many forms of sacrifice in which the sacrificial materials are taken from the vegetable kingdom. (4) But sacrifice may be a recognition, either plain or sacramental, of the household or tribal unity of the worshiper and his God. In its symbolical or sacramental form, this view assumes the development of a mystical sentiment, too elaborate to be natural among primitive races. In its direct and plain form it assumes the presence and participation of the god in a common meal. That such presence was firmly believed in by primitive races has been proved by W. Robertson Smith (Religion of the Semites, 1894, p. 269 t.) and Wellhausen (Skizz. u. Vorb., 1897). The root, then, of sacrificial practise from which Hebrew and heathen forms issued is the table-bond between the worshiper and his god. In the notion of such a bond all the other ideas, expiatory, propitiatory, and tributary, are germinally present. But the typical table-communion significance of sacrifice appears nowhere in its purity in the O T. It belongs to a stage antecedent to that pictured in the Mosaic codes. How clearly it was present in the consciousness of the Israelite of the later period, it is impossible to say. There is no doubt, however, that in human relationships a common meal was conceived of as cementing alliances and constituting a bond and a pledge of common friendship; and, in the covenant sacrifice on Sinai (Ex 24 5 ff.), as well as in the Passover festival (Ex 12 3 ff.), there is an unmistakable occurrence of the same idea (cf. Ps 50 5).

4. Kinds of Sacrifice. In the Mosaic legislation, sacrifices are broadly distinguished as of two kinds, according to the class of products offered, i.e., the vegetable and the animal (bloodless and bloody). To these may be added a third, consisting of liquid offerings ('drink-offerings'), and a fourth, whose virtue lies in the still subtler element of fragrance ('incense-offering'). In their fully developed form, these sacrifices are best given in P, representing the practise in any case of the second Temple.

5. Animal Sacrifices: Selection of Victims. The selection of victims for animal sacrifices was not left to individual predilection, but determined by some very definite principles. (1) Animal victims must be of the clean class; and in this class choice was limited to cattle (bullock, ox, cow, heifer, goat, kid, ram, lamb, calf), and certain birds (pigeon and turtle-dove). (2) They must be perfect or without blemish (Dt 15 21, 17 1; Lv 22 19-25). This qualification excludes specifically the blind, the broken, the maimed, the ulcerous, the scurried, the scabbed, the bruised, the crushed, and the castrated. All these defects are defined as blemishes. (3) As to age in general, no victim could be accepted before the lapse of seven days from its birth (Lv 22 27). The first-born were all to be redeemed under a year of age (Ex 13 15). The passover lamb, the victims in the burnt-offering, sin-offering, peace-offering, must be more than one year old (Ex 12 5; Lv 9 3, 12 6; Nu 6 12, 14, 7 15, 23, 15 27). (4) In the case of the red heifer, whose ashes were to be used in mixing the water of purification, she must have done no work nor borne any yoke (Nu 19 1-10; Dt 21 3 f.). (5) All victims must be the lawful property of the offerer (II S 24 24).

6. Classes of Animal Sacrifices: Burnt Offering. As to purpose and meaning, animal sacrifices are distinguished as burnt-offering, sin-offering, peace-offering, and guilt-offering. The burnt-offering ('olah', Lv 6 8 f.; Ex 29 33-42; Nu 28 3 f., etc.) was the most general of all sacrifices. It certainly antedates all the others, and was more generally practised by Semitic peoples. The victims of this sacrifice were to be taken from the herd or flock, in exceptional cases from among the birds. If from the herd or flock, the animal must be a male. The ritual involved the laying on of the hands of the offerer, the killing of the victim at the door of the sanctuary to the north of the altar, the flaying and cutting of the body, the washing of the entrails and legs, the sprinkling of the blood, and the burning of the whole victim on the altar. It was the sacrifice that accompanied the morning and evening worship of the people as a rule, and characterized special occasions of great importance. Its significance, adoration, is expressive of a normal or ideal relationship to God.

7. Fire-Offering. The special class of burnt-offerings offered daily was called 'the continual burnt-offering' (tamidh, Nu 28 6), because it was repeated morning and evening. This, however, was also known as 'an offering made by fire' ('ishsheh', Nu 28 6 ff., 'sacrifice by fire' AV). But either this variety differed from the ordinary burnt-offering ('olah') in being partly consumed by the priest, or else the name is more broadly used of sacrifices any portion of which was burned on the altar.

8. Sin-Offering. The sin-offering (hatta'th, Lv 4 1 ff., 8 14) was expiatory in its character, and the victim was different according to the person or persons in whose behalf it was offered. (a) For a ruler the victim was a he-goat. (b) For an ordinary person it was a she-goat, a ewe lamb, a turtle-dove, or a young pigeon, or even a meal-offering. (c) For a priest or a Levite at the time of installation (Nu 8 8) and (d) for the whole congregation it was a bullock and a he-goat. (e) On the Day of Atonement, for the high priest a bullock was offered, and for the people two he-goats. The ritual of the sin-offering included the laying on of hands, the confession of the offense, the killing of the victim by the offerer, or, in the case of the congregation, by the representatives of the congregation, the sprinkling of the blood before the veil, the smearing of it on the horns of the altar, and the pouring of the remainder at the base of the altar, and the disposition of the body. This latter was divided into three parts: one, consisting of the fat, defined as 'J''s portion,' was burned on the altar; a second, consisting of the skin and entrails, was burned without the camp; and the third, consisting of the remaining flesh of the victim, was the priests' portion, and appropriated by them, unless the sacrifice was in their behalf, in which case it was burned without the camp. The design of the sin-offering was the 'covering' or removal of minor sins (sins of ignorance, Lv ch. 4; Nu ch. 15, 'in error' RV).

9. The Guilt-Offering. The guilt-offering (trespass-offering AV) ('asham', Lv 5, 7 1-10) was like the sin-offering in general meaning and nature. Its occasion was more specifically an unwitting transgression of the ordinances of God in respect of holy things or of the rights of property (Lv 6 1 ff.). The sacrifice consisted of the offering of a ram, supplemented by the addition of a fine, or pecuniary compensation, in the case of damage done to one's neighbor. The amount of reparation was computed according to the loss in value sustained by the injured party, plus 20 per cent. (one-fifth) for the priest.

10. The Peace-Offering. The peace-offering (shelem or zebhaḥ sh'lamim, Lv 3, 7 11 f.) expressed general friendly relation with God, and not merely the celebration of the restoration of a broken peace, as the name might be superficially interpreted. There are three varieties of it described. (a) The thank-offering, (b) the vow-offering, (c) the free-will offering. In all these, however, God is recognized as the bestower of blessing. In the first, the blessing is a thing of the past. The sacrifice simply signifies its acceptance. In the second, it is looked upon as still in the future and greatly desired by the worshiper, who makes his offering as an expression of loyalty and a condition for the bestowment of the blessing. In the third, the function of the offering was auxiliary to the prayer, rather than a condition for the reception of the blessing. Victims for the peace-offering were selected, either from the herd or the flock, and might be male or female, but in either case without blemish. The animal victim was to be accompanied by an oblation of a meal-offering with oil. In the variety known as the thank-offering the ritual included, as in the burnt-offering, the laying on of hands, killing the victim, and sprinkling the blood; but in the disposition of the sacrificial material it differed. The body of the victim was in this case divided into three portions. The first was J's portion, and consisted of the fat which covered the inward parts, the tail entire, the two kidneys, and the 'caul upon the liver.' All these were burned upon the altar. The blood which was sprinkled around the altar was also a part of J's portion. The second portion was the priests'. It consisted of the right shoulder and breast of the victim as a 'wave-' and a 'heave-offering' respectively (cf. § 11, below). The third part was the worshiper's portion, and consisted of all that was left of the victim. If the sacrifice was a thank-offering, all these parts must be used on the day of the sacrifice; if a free-will or vow-offering, they must be used on the second day. Any portion of them remaining until the third day would render a sacrifice invalid, which was then called an 'abomination.' Hence, if the victim could not all be consumed at the sacrificial banquet, what was left of it must be burned 'without the camp.'

11. Wave-and Heave-Offerings. The terms 'wave-offering' and 'heave-offering' are applied to the priests' portion, and denote a peculiar ceremony consisting in the holding of the right shoulder of the victim horizontally and moving it forward toward the altar and backward away from the altar, in order to signify that the part was J's, but was given back to the priests by Him. Similarly, the term 'heave-offering' signifies the moving of the breast of the animal upward and then downward, in token of presenting it to God as His and receiving it again as a gift from Him.

12. Vegetable-Offerings. The Meal-Offering. Of vegetable-offerings, there were chiefly two, the 'meal-offering' and 'showbread.' Of the meal-offering (minhah, meat-offering AV, Lv ch. 2, etc.), it has been contended that this was never an independent sacrifice, but always an accompaniment and adjunct of an animal, or bloody, sacrifice. But this view can be maintained only upon a priori grounds. Three varieties of the meal-offering are described: The first consists in the offering of a simple unbaked fine flour; the second, of baked cakes or loaves; and the third, of parched ears of corn. In the first form, oil was mixed with the flour and salt, and frankincense put upon it (Lv 2 15). The ritual of the offering included the presentation of the materials before J', the burning of a handful upon the altar with frankincense, and the eating of the remainder by the priests, never by the worshiper; therefore, when the worshiper was a priest, no part of it could be eaten, but all must be burned. The cakes of the meal-offering must be made without leaven, for leaven, as the emblem of fermentation, was unholy. Honey was excluded from sacrifices for a similar reason. Altho the meal-offering might be presented as a complete sacrifice under stress of necessity (because of the poverty of the worshiper), usually it was an adjunct of a peace- or burnt-offering, neither of which was complete without it (Nu chs. 15, 28, 29). A special variety of the meal-offering was the oblation prescribed for cases in which a husband, suspicious of infidelity on the part of his wife (jealous), brought her to the priest with 'the tenth of an ephah of barley-meal.' A handful of this was then burned upon the altar, while, through an elaborate ritual including the use of the water of jealousy (water of bitterness RV), the woman was given an opportunity of swearing to her innocence and presumably proving it (Nu 5 14-31).

13. The Showbread. The two ways of naming the showbread ('in Ex 25 30, 35 13, 39 36, lehem pānīm, 'bread of faces,' 'presence bread' RVmg.; also called ma'arekhet, 'pile bread,' or 'bread of arrangement,' Lv 24 5 ff.; II Ch 2 4; and lehem hattānūdh, 'continual bread,' Nu 4 7) are quite different in their implication; the first has reference to the fact of its being brought into the presence of J', the second to the manner of its exhibition before Him (so as to indicate its significance). These two modes of naming are perpetuated in the LXX. and the Vulgate. The showbread consisted of twelve loaves of unleavened bread, each one made of one-fifth of an ephah of fine flour. They were laid upon a table (see TEMPLE, § 15) in the Holy Place, one upon another, in two columns (six in each). They were allowed to remain there for a whole week, at the end of which period they were removed and eaten by the priest upon holy ground, i.e., within the precincts of the sanctuary. For other persons than priests to eat of the loaves of the showbread was regarded sacrilegious (I S 21 4 f.; Mt 12 4), for they were 'holy' (hallowed bread AV). The offering of the showbread does not appear to have been an exclusively Israelitic one, tho the citation of the Greek and Roman lectisternia as parallels is scarcely admissible. The OT itself furnishes traces of the practise of making the bread to be used in idolatrous worship for the Queen of Heaven (Jer 7 18), and the Babylonian inscriptions speak of loaves of sweet, or unleavened, bread presented upon altars or tables set before the gods. These loaves numbered at times as many as three times twelve (Zimmern, Beitr. z. Kenntn. d. Bab. Rel. 1901). This number was probably astronomical in its origin and significance. Its relation to the Israelitic number of loaves is obscure. If the twelve loaves of the showbread were at one time connected with the three times twelve loaves of the Babylonian bread-offering, the connection was certainly broken before the formation of the Code, where the number twelve is made to represent the twelve tribes of Israel (Lv 24 s). The significance of such offerings among the non-Israelitic peoples is no doubt to be found in the thought that the gods were participants at the tables set before them. In Israel, by a characteristic purification and spiritualization, the showbread was made to mean the recognition of God's being the source and origin of the nourishment that sustains and strengthens the worshiper. In history, the first mention of the showbread is in connection with David's experience at Nob. At this place there was a sanctuary of J', and David and his young men were allowed to satisfy their hunger with the hallowed bread upon condition that they were ceremonially clean (I S 21 6). After this, the showbread is referred to again in connection with the construction of the Temple of Solomon, in which a special table overlaid with gold ('of gold') was provided for it (I K 7 48). In the second Temple a provision was made for the maintenance of the showbread, together with other sacrifices, through a tax levied for that end (Neh 10 33). The table of showbread is said to have been carried away from the Temple by Antiochus Epiphanes (I Mac 1 22) when he entered Jerusalem and stripped the Holy Place of its treasures. It was replaced with a new one by Judas Maccabeus (I Mac 4 49). With the destruction of Herod's Temple by Titus, it was taken along with other things as a trophy to Rome, and its image appears on the Arch of Titus in the representation of the triumphal procession.

14. Libations or Drink-Offerings. Drink-offerings (nešekh) appear in the ritual as accompaniments of the burnt-offerings, never as independent sacrifices. The chief substance to be used was wine (Ex 29 40 f.; Nu 28 7). Mention is also made of the broth of the boiled or seethed flesh (Jg 6 19 f.; Is 65 4). No ritual is specified in the legislation, but, from Sir 50 13, it appears that the offering was poured at the base of the altar. According to the Talmud (Suk. 4 9, 5 1), drink-offerings were made on the occasion of the Feast of Tabernacles. But this offering consisted of water, and the time for it was the morning of each of the seven days of the feast and, more precisely, the hour of the burnt-offering. From this it appears that it was meant to be a counterpart of the libation of wine. A unique water-libation is named in I S 7 6; but neither its particular significance nor its place in the ritual system is given.

15. Savor-Offerings. Of offerings of fragrance or odor, incense is the most striking. Some have supposed that the requirement of fresh showbread every week was meant, at least partly, as a savor-offering, since when the bread became stale and lost its fragrance its value as an offering was gone, and fresh loaves must be substituted. But this is fanciful. As to the use of incense, there is no doubt that it has played a large part in forms of worship in general. In Biblical usage, however, a distinction is made between incense and frankincense (qetōreth and l'bhōnāh). The first of these is more strictly sacrificial smoke, and does not necessarily represent the fragrance of any particular substance. The second is primarily the smoke made by the burning of the incense gum, then the gum itself. It is probable that in the earlier period the burning of incense was unknown in the service of J', that it was even against the law which required that J' should be honored only with the products of His own chosen land, and that from other lands He would accept, not their products, but their money. At all events, in the historical books there is no clear case of the offering of incense in the worship of J'; the prophets rather discourage and rebuke it as useless or as associated with idolatry (II Ch 34 25; Jer 6 20, 48 35). But in the legislation as completed in P, incense finds a clear and prominent place. The substance itself, so called in this Code, is a mixture of several odoriferous vegetable products (opobalsamum, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense) in equal portions, together with some salt. Only when thus mixed could frankincense be used in sacrifice. Incense, however, was used also as a perfume in luxurious living (Song 3 6, 4 6, 14), and was regarded as a sign of wealth and self-indulgence (Mt 2 11; Rev 18 13). See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2. In the sacrificial system it was burned upon a special altar, called the Altar of Incense, which was situated just before the Most Holy Place (cf. TABERNACLE, § 3; and TEMPLE, § 23). On the Day of Atonement the high priest took a censer with burning incense into the Most Holy Place (Lv 16 12 f.). The symbolical significance of the fragrance of incense, as far as defined, was that of prayer (Ps 141 2; Rev 8 3 f.). In N T times mention is made of incense in Lk 1 10.

16. Sacrificial Acts. Sacrificial acts were either (1) primary or (2) mediate. The primary carried the notion of the sacrifice itself; the mediate were necessary means for the completion of the primary. The mediate acts included the washing (Lv 1 9) of certain portions of the sacrificial victim, the slaying of the animals (the burnt-offering, Lv 1 6), the dipping of his finger by the priest in the blood, for the purpose of sprinkling (Lv 4 6), and the various ways of preparing the flesh of the victim, in order that it might be eaten (roasting of the passover lamb, Ex 12 8; seething, boiling RV, of the consecration lamb in the service of the consecration of the priests, Ex 29 31).<sup>1</sup> Soaking with oil (fried, Lv, 7 12 AV) of the wheaten cakes of flour in the meal-offering was also one of the mediate sacrificial acts. The killing of the victim in all animal sacrifices has long been held to be a primary sacrificial act. There is no evidence, however, to show that it was at first, or during the O T period, regarded as anything more than a means of securing the blood, which was considered to be the life of the animal (cf. BLOOD). If this view of it be correct, it must be classified with the mediate sacrificial acts. Of the primary sacrificial acts, the most important are the laying on of hands (sometimes with confession of sin, Lv 16 21), by which the worshiper symbolically signified his union with the victim, or his appropriation of it as a part of himself (Lv 3 2, 8, 4 4), the sprinkling of the blood upon the altar and on the mercy-seat, in the case of the great sacrifice of the Day of Atonement (q.v.), or the pouring of it at the base of the altar, in token of the offering of the life of the victim and of the atonement or expiation of sin thereby (Lv 3 2, 16 14), the smearing of the blood on the horns of the altar, and the pouring of the remainder at its base were likewise signs of expiation (Lv 4 18). The act of burning was sometimes, as in the case of the incense-offering, a mere means toward an end, i.e., it was designed to secure the odor, which was the real sacrifice; but in the case of the sacrifices strictly so called, it was probably the very act in which the connection of the sacrificed animal with God was symbolized.

17. Offerings and Oblations. Apart from the strict technical sense of the word offering (or oblation) as it occurs in the expressions, burnt-offering, peace-offering, etc., and the still more specific sense in heave-offering (ʿrūmah), and wave-offering (ʿnūphāh), and meal-offering (minhāh), there are two special senses in which the term is used. (1) The fire-offering (ʾishsheh, 'offering made by fire,' Ex 29 41) signified a sacrifice, or portion of a sacrifice, whether animal or vegetable, consigned to the fire from the altar (Lv 1 9; Dt 18 1; Jos 13 14; I S 2 28) to be consumed as a whole. Tho the act coalesces with the chief feature of the burnt-offering (ʾolah), the name is broader, and is applied to other sacrifices than the burnt-offering. (2) Corban, or offering in the narrower sense (qorbān, 'that which is brought near,' 'oblation' RV, except in Ezk 20 28). The term is distinctive of Ezk and P, tho in the former it is used only twice (Ezk 20 28, 40 48). Its meaning is general. It is used either of sacrifices, in the stricter sense of the word, or of pure gifts (Lv 2 12; Nu 7 12, 18, etc.) and in Neh 10 34, 13 31 with 'wood' of the 'wood-offering.' By N T times, 'corban' had crystallized into a simple equivalent of sacrificial gifts.

18. Non-Sacrificial Offerings: Gifts. Offerings which were not strictly sacrificial (gifts) were occasional, and not prescribed by the Law. The term gift, however, is, in the EVV, used with great latitude to denote also sacrificial gifts. Especially is this the case in the N T, where that which is brought to the altar is called δῶρον ('gift,' Mt 5 23 f., 23 18 f.), but the term was also applied to contributions of money (Lk 21 1). In He especially, 'gift' and 'sacrifice' are correlative and complementary terms. Together they constitute the offerings of the priest in the sanctuary (5 1, 8 3 f., 9 9). Exceptionally, things dedicated to the service of the sanctuary, but not offered as sacrifice, are further called gifts (I Ch 26 26; I K 7 51, 15 15, etc.; Nu 7 84 f. RVmg.). A wood-offering is further mentioned by Neh (10 34, 13 31), consisting of wood 'to burn upon the altar of Jehovah,' but tho this is said to be 'as it is written in the Law,' nothing more is known of such an offering.

19. First-Fruits: Firstlings. In the O T the word 'gift' means simply a contribution to the equipment or support of the sanctuary. The most notable of this non-sacrificial type of gifts are the 'first-fruits' or 'firstlings.' The distinction between these two is simply that of the sphere from which they are drawn as vegetable or animal (field and garden on the one side, and flock or herd on the other). The law of first-fruits is given in successive forms, growing in fulness, in Ex 23 18, 34 22; Dt 18 4, fleece; Lv 23 10-14; Nu 18 12-18. It may be reasonably questioned whether first-fruits and firstlings were dedicated to God, first as a tax, or as a sacrifice. Frazer (Golden Bough, II, pp. 68-90, and 373, 384) cites examples of both ideas. In any case, the offering was supposed to legalize the use of the remainder of the crop or brood by the owner, and its practical effect was the utilization of the offering as a tax, since such first-fruits and firstlings went for the support of the priesthood.

20. Sacrifice in the N T. Attitude of Jesus. The birth of Jesus Christ was signalized by the offering of the customary sacrifice of purification (Lk 2 22). But in His life and ministry, He placed the sacrificial system as a whole in a very subordinate position. As a topic of direct teaching, in fact, He completely ignored it. He alludes to it only in order to illustrate some principle of deeper and inner importance (Mt 5 23), or to rebuke the tendency to attach to its external acts and forms the significance rightly belonging to spiritual principles, especially the dominant affection of love to God (Mt 9 13, 12 7). As it was possible for the individual Israelite to go through life without being obliged to offer sacrifice for himself, even tho loyal to the O T, it is not easy to draw inferences from the silence of Jesus on the subject. As far as known, He never offered sacrifice. To what extent His conduct should be interpreted as a formal rupture with the sacrificial system, and how far, if at all, He regarded it of use, can not possibly be ascertained. It is certain, however, that by shifting the center of thought and practise from the outward to the inner sphere, Jesus effectively introduced a new view of religion, which was inevitably destined to result in the abrogation of the old system. His disciples evidently so understood his mind.

21. Practise of the Apostolic Age. In the development of N T thought upon the basis of the life and teaching of Jesus, sacrifice gradually receded into the background. The teaching and practise of the Apostles laid less and less stress upon it, and the system was evidently allowed to fall into disuse, and finally to disappear entirely. The only case on record in the N T of the offering of sacrifice by early Christians is that of Paul in fulfilment of his Nazirite vow (Ac 21 26).

22. The Work of Jesus Christ. This result was completely justified when it was realized that all the ideas embodied and expressed in the sacrificial system had found their perfect fulfilment in the life, work, and death of the Master Himself. In He the position is clearly reached that every cardinal thought of the ancient ritual, and many subordinate ones, had been brought to their full expression and, therefore, superseded by the person of Jesus. (See HEBREWS, Ep. to). Jesus Himself did not use the language of the ritual in laying before His disciples the meaning of His own work, and especially of His death. His expression with reference to giving His life 'a ransom for many' (Mk 10 45) is open to debate, but in all probability it is not drawn from the sacrificial system. The nearest approach made by Him to identifying His death with an O T sacrifice, as regards significance, is that contained in the words of the institution of the Lord's Supper (q.v.). But the Apostolic interpretation, in both the Pauline and Johannine forms, very clearly works out the meaning of the Gospel along the lines of sacrificial symbolism.

SACRILEGE: The expression 'commit sacrilege' occurs in Ro 2 22 AV as the rendering of ιεροσυλεῖν, 'rob temples' RV. The reference is not to withholding temple dues and offerings. Paul insinuates that, notwithstanding his professed abhorrence to idols, the Jew might be guilty of robbing heathen temples, perhaps simply through receiving property stolen from them. He was himself exonerated from this charge at Ephesus (Ac 19 37). For the O T prohibition, see Dt 7 25 f., and cf. Jos. Ant. IV, 8 10.

SADDLE: This is the rendering of merkābh, 'riding-place' (Lv 15 9, 'carriage' RVmg.). The verb hābhāsh, 'bind on,' is used of equipping a beast (always an ass) for riding (Gn 22 3; Nu 22 21; Jg 19 10; II S 16 1, 17 23, 19 28 [27]; I K 2 40, 13 13, 23, 27; II K 4 24). The ass was ridden without a saddle, or with a saddle-cloth. When carrying heavy burdens a thick cushion was laid on the back to relieve the pressure. For the camel's saddle (Gn 31 34 RV, 'furniture' AV) see FURNITURE. See also plate of ARTICLES OF TRAVEL, Fig. 11.

SADDUCEES, sad'yū-sīz, THE (Σαδδουκαῖοι): 1. Name and Tenets. A section of the Jewish people who, in N T times, were possessed of the high-priesthood, and in general represented the non-scribal tendency in Judaism. Their name is derived either from Zadok, the typical high priest, or from tsaddiqim, righteous ones. According to Josephus (Ant. XVIII, 1 3; BJ, II, 8 14), who was not in sympathy with their position, they held only to Mosaism, as distinct from the 'oral law' developed by the Pharisees. They were also believers in free will, and disbelievers in immortality, or, at least, in the resurrection. According to Ac 23 8, they did not believe either in resurrection or in angels and spirits.

2. Party Character. The Sadducees were not, strictly speaking, a party, but were a group of wealthy aristocrats who, in a measure, represented that phase of development in the Jewish state that the Maccabean revolt had checked. For a considerable period prior to the revolt under Antiochus Epiphanes there had been a decided tendency among the Jews toward Hellenistic culture. In this movement the high priests had been leaders. It would hardly be fair to say that they had planned the destruction of the worship of Jehovah; but they were certainly opposed to the current tendency represented by the Chasidim toward the development of the Jewish cult and the rejection of Greek culture (see PHARISEES, § 3). From the beginning of the revolt against the Syrians until the time of John Hyrcanus this Hellenistic party suffered severely at the hands of the enthusiasts for Judaism, and were plainly of the party of the opposition. Yet they came again into the possession of the high-priesthood when John Hyrcanus transferred his sympathy from the Pharisees to them. From that time, almost without exception, until the destruction of Jerusalem the high priests were from their group. Their relation with the Hasmonean house made the Sadducees objects of Herod's peculiar suspicion, and among the first acts of his reign was the execution of a number of Sadducees who were members of the Sanhedrin. Under the Romans, however, the Sadducees regained their power, and became in large measure the party favorable to the government. The Sadducees were not popular with the people, and apparently found it necessary at times to adopt the Pharisaic policy, in order to win popular favor. The revolt of 66 A.D. seems to have been directed against them, as well as against the Romans, and a number of them, including the high priest Ananias, were massacred. The importance of the priesthood was greatly diminished by the destruction of the Temple, and the Sadducees as a party lost prestige and influence. Individual Sadducees, however, continued to appear in the discussions of the Talmud, and almost invariably as opponents of what the Rabbis regarded as the true interpretation. In the rabbinical development of Judaism, however, the Sadducees had really no place. These references were hardly more than the utilization of the names of ancient enemies for the purposes of debate.

The investigations of Rud. Leszynsky, Die Sadduzäer (1912) coupled with the recent discovery of a fragment of 'Zadokite' (Sadducean) work of a date near the beginning of the Christian Era (cf. R. H. Charles, Fragments of a Zadokite work (1912), have served to put the Sadducees in a more favorable light than has hitherto been accorded them on the basis of our extant sources which are almost exclusively Pharisaic and therefore strongly ex parte in spirit.

SADOC, sē'dek (Σαδώκ): One of the ancestors of Jesus in the list in Mt (1 14).

SAFFRON: An aromatic herb, a species of Crocus, called in Heb. karkōm. It was, apparently, cultivated in the gardens of Palestine (Song 4 14). See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 3; and PALESTINE, § 23.

SAIL. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

SAINTS: In the O T this term is the rendering of two Heb. terms: (1) hāšidh, primarily, 'good,' 'compassionate.' The term came to be used in the sense of 'godly' or 'pious,' i.e., full of love and loyalty to God. It is used almost exclusively in Pss (I S 2 9 AV; II Ch 6 41; Ps 30 4, 31 23, 37 28, etc.). (2) Derivatives of qādash, 'to be holy,' and hence 'the holy one(s).' Outside of Dn the sense of the expression is general, usually referring to those (in Israel, of course) who are faithful to J'. In Dt 33 2 AV the heavenly array of holy ones appears to be meant, if the ordinary text is correct. But it is probable that we should read 'And he came from Meribah-Kadesh.' In Dn (7 18 ff.) the term refers to Israel as the head of the Kingdom of God on earth, with the emphasis probably on the loyal portion of Israel. E. E. N.

In the N T 'the saints' is the rendering of οἱ ἅγιοι, 'the holy.' Objectively, it means those who are objects of God's holy, redeeming love, His chosen and peculiar people, who are dedicated to and belong exclusively to Him (Ro 1 7; I Co 1 2; Eph 1 4, 18; Col 3 12). Subjectively, it means those who are separated from all defilement and pollution (Eph 1 4; Col 1 22), and are partakers of God's own holiness (Eph 5 3; Col 1 10-12; I P 1 16; Rev 19 8).

SALA, sē'la, SALAH, sē'la. See SHELAH.

SALAMIS, sal'a-mis (Σαλαμίς): A town on the SE. coast of Cyprus. It was founded by the Phenicians, and belonged successively to the Assyrians, Egyptians, and Persians. It became Greek in the 6th cent., and was the capital of Cyprus under Evagoras (410-374 B.C.). It fell to Ptolemy in 323 B.C., and became Roman in 58 B.C. It was evangelized by Paul and Barnabas (Ac 13 5), with what success is unknown. J. R. S. S.—J. M. T.

SALATHIEL, sa-lē'chi-el (Σαλαθιήλ): An ancestor of Jesus (Mt 1 12; Lk 3 27). See SHEALATHIEL.

SALCAH, sal'ka, SALCHAH. See SALECAH.

SALECAH, sal'i-ka (סַלְכָה, salikhāh, Salcah, Salchah AV): A city on the extreme NE. boundary of the kingdom of Bashan (Dt 3 10; Jos 12 5, 13 11; I Ch 5 11). The modern name is Salhad. See Map of Ancient Semitic World.

SALEM, sē'lem (שָׁלֵם, shālēm): The city of which Melchizedek was king (Gn 14 18; He 7 1 f.). Eusebius mentions a tradition, according to which Abram and Melchizedek met on Mt. Gerizim. Salim, a village E. of Nāblus, is the basis of this view. Jerome identified it with Salumnias, 8 m. S. of Scythopolis. Josephus and other Jewish writers generally (Ps 76 2) have regarded it as a synonym of Jerusalem. Since Uru-salim was discovered to be the ancient name of Jerusalem in the Amarna letters, Salem has very generally been identified with that city (see JERUSALEM, § 19; and MELCHIZEDEK). J. A. K.

SALIM, sē'lim (Σαλειμ): A place referred to in Jn 3 23 as near Ænon, where John the Baptist was baptizing. Its site has never been determined; it certainly lay W. of the Jordan. Eusebius and Jerome located it 8 m. S. of Scythopolis (cf. SALEM). Robinson identified it with Salim, E. of Nāblus; others have advocated a location in Wādī Suleim; others near Ain Karim. See ÆNON. J. A. K.

SALLAI, sal'i-ai (סָלַי, salay): 1. One of those chosen to dwell in Jerusalem (Neh 11 8). 2. The name of a priestly family (Neh 12 20; called Sallu in ver. 7).

SALLU, sal'ū (סָלּוּ, salū): 1. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 9 7; Neh 11 7). 2. See SALLAI, 2.

SALMA, sal'mē (סַלְמָה, salma', סַלְמָה, salma'h), and SALMON (סַלְמֹן, salmon): An individual (or family) of Calebites who are represented as having founded Bethlehem (I Ch 2 51, 54) and from whom David was descended (Ru 4 20 f.; I Ch 2 11). Called Σαλμών in Mt 1 4 f. (Σαλά in Lk 3 32).

SALMAI, sal'mai or mē (סַלְמַי, salmay, Shalmay AV): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Neh 7 45).

SALMON, sal'men, SALMA, sal'mē (סַלְמֹן, salmon): The father of Boaz, husband of Ruth, and grandfather of Jesse, father of David (Ru 4 21; = Salmāh Heb. in 4 20; = Salmā', I Ch 2 11; = Σαλμών, Mt 1 4, 5; = Σαλά, Lk 3 32). It is stated (Mt 1 5) that Rahab was his wife. If the Salma (Heb. Salmā, I Ch 2 51, 54) is the same person, then he was the 'father,' i.e., founder, of Bethlehem. See also SALMA. C. S. T.

SALMONE, sal-mō'm (Σαλμώνη): The NE. promontory of the E. end of Crete. Luke alone gives the name Salmone (Ac 27 7). Samonion, sometimes Salmonion, appears in Strabo; Samonion, in Ptolemy, Pomponius, Mela, and Pliny; Salmonis in Apollonius of Rhodes and Dionysius Periegetes; Salmonia in an inscription. It is identified with the modern Cape Sidero, or Cape Plaka, seven miles further S. J. R. S. S.—J. M. T.

SALOME, sa-lō'mi (Σαλώμη, fr. Heb. shālōm, 'peace'): 1. The grandniece of Herod Antipas (mentioned by name only in Jos. Ant. XVIII, 5 4. See HERODIAS), whose dancing before Herod led him to promise to grant any request she might make (Mk 6 17-22 and ||s). 2. One of the women present at the cross and tomb of Jesus (Mk 15 40, 16 1), and probably to be identified with the mother of the sons of Zebedee in Mt 27 56. She has also been identified with the unnamed sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, in Jn 19 25, making the sons of Zebedee Jesus' cousins (Zahn, Forschungen, VI, 338-341). But this identification is not certain. See MARY. J. M. T.

SALT: The word for salt, melah (Gr. ἄλς, ἅλας), is common to all Semitic languages. This shows how general was its use in antiquity. The Hebrews secured salt by evaporating the waters of the Dead Sea (with which process there is probably some connection in the obscure reference to Salt-pits in Zeph 2 9), or more readily from the Khashin Urdum, a cliff of rock salt, extending for 7 m. along the SW. shore of the Dead Sea (cf. 'the pillar of salt,' Gn 19 26; also Ezk 47 11, see PALESTINE, § 12, and LOT'S WIFE). S. was used in seasoning food (cf. Job 6 6) and therefore in large quantities (Ezr 6 9, 7 22) in the sacrifices (vegetable, Lv 2 13; with animal sacrifices also, Ezk 43 24; cf. Mk 9 49 mg.). The rights of protection and friendship were connected with eating together, and as salt was used in the food, we find the expression 'covenant of salt,' i.e., 'an eternal covenant' (Nu 18 19; II Ch 13 5; Lv 2 13; the fact that salt is a preservative may also add to the meaning). A salty land (Jer 17 6, meleḥāh) is a barren or desert land (Dt 29 23 [22]; Job 39 6; Ps 107 34), therefore 'to sow a city with salt' (Jg 9 45; cf. Zeph 2 9) meant to doom it to perpetual desolation. According to II K 2 20 f., salt made impure water sweet. It was a custom to rub new-born babes with salt (Ezk 16 4). In the N T the preservative and seasoning qualities of salt are used figuratively (Mt 5 13; Mk 9 50; Lk 14 34; Col 4 6; cf. also the ref. to salt as a purifier, Mk 9 49). See also FOOD, § 4. C. S. T.

SALT SEA. See DEAD SEA.

SALT, VALLEY OF (חֶלְקֵי־מֶלַח or חֶלְקֵי־הַמֶּלַח, gē-melah, gē-hammelah): This was a place where important victories were won from the Edomites (II S 8 13; read 'Edom' for 'Aram' [Syrians]) by Israel under David (II S 8 13; I Ch 18 12; Ps 60 title [2]) and under Amaziah (II K 14 7; II Ch 25 11). It was between Jerusalem and Edom, and has been identified by some with Wady el-Milh E. of Beer-sheba, where are found remains of the City of Salt and good springs; by others, with the plain just S. of the Dead Sea, in the lower part of El Ghor. SALTWORT. See PALESTINE, § 22.

SALU, sē'lu (סַלּוּ, salu'): The father of Zimri (Nu 25 14).

SALUTE, SALUTATION: These words in EV are translations of bārakh, 'bless' (cf. I S 13 10 mg.), shā'al b'shālōm, 'to ask concerning one's welfare' (II K 10 15; cf. Jg 15 15), and ἀσπάζεσθαι (ἀσπασμός), which includes both greetings and embraces. In He 11 13 ARV, and often in AV, ἀσπάζεσθαι is translated greet. See especially the unnecessary and confusing alternations of 'greet' and 'salute' in Ro 16 3-9. In Ac 20 1, ARV reads 'took leave.' Biblical salutations consisted of acts as well as words (see also KISS and KNEEL). Verbal greetings were epistolary (Ezr 4 11, 7 13; Ac 15 23, 23 25; Rev 1 4; and see also EPISTLE) or conversational. The latter included inquiries (II S 20 9) and benedictions (Gn 43 29; Ps 129 8), which sometimes shaded into encouraging assurances (Jg 6 23; I Ch 12 18; Dn 10 19). The word shālōm, as used in O T salutations (e.g., I S 1 17, 25 6; Dn 10 11), means, not 'peace' (q.v.) as opposed to war, but general well-being, including health, security, and prosperity (cf. Gn 43 27; Ex 18 7). This form of salutation (whence the Anglicized 'salaam') is still common in Palestine, but is used only between 'brethren' of the same religion (cf. Mt 5 47; II Jn 10). In N T times χαίρε hail (Mt 26 49; Mk 15 18; Lk 1 28) took the place of 'peace' as the ordinary greeting (cf., however, Lk 10 5; Jn 20 19), and λέγειν χαίρειν was equivalent to 'greet' (II Jn 10 f.). The salutation to royalty was 'Long live the king' (I S 10 24; I K 1 39; II K 11 12) or, in the Persian form, 'O King, live forever!' (Dn 2 4; cf. Neh 2 3). The manifold and reiterated salutations of modern Palestine are irksome to one engaged in pressing business (cf. II K 4 29; Lk 10 4), but are not necessarily more insincere than our curt English phrases. Every situation in life (e.g., returning from a journey, dining, shaving, wearing new clothes) has its own formulas, in which the salutation and reply differ sufficiently to indicate the speakers (cf. Ru 2 4). Besides these set greetings, extempore expressions of great beauty are prompted by the tact and courtesy which are so characteristic of even illiterate Syrians and Arabs.

LITERATURE: In JE (art. Salute) some characteristic salutations of modern Jews are given. Baedeker's Palestine and Syria, p. cix, contains a number of Syrian salutations. See also Mackie in HDB, s.v. L. G. L.—E. C. L.

SALVATION: 1. Usage of Terms. The words 'save,' 'Savior,' 'salvation,' represent in the EVV of the O T mainly derivatives from the root yāsha', 'to deliver' (cf., however, Gn 12 12: 'they will save thee alive,' from hiyyāh [Pi'el] 'to keep alive'; also Ex 1 17; Jg 21 14, etc.; II S 19 5, mālat, 'to save'; II S 19 9, nātsal, 'to snatch away,' and Job 2 6, shāmar, 'to keep' 'to preserve'). In the N T the same words represent derivatives from σώζω (σωτηρία). In all cases, the idea is that of deliverance from present or impending evil. Salvation is thus, in its most general sense, either deliverance from distress or preservation from danger. But this generic idea is narrowed in the N T to the notion of the deliverance from the penalty, power, and pollution of sin, and this by a special way of which Jesus Christ was the revealer and guide (He 12 2).

2. Historic Development of the Idea. In the O T, when the term 'salvation' is used without qualification, it has a special meaning, viz., that of deliverance from national calamity or peril. The safe crossing of the Red Sea and the destruction of the pursuing host are called 'salvation' (Ex 14 13, 15 2). Deliverance from foreign oppression wrought through the hands of 'Judges' is salvation. Othniel and Ehud are 'saviors' (Jg 3 9, 15). The exploit of Jonathan and his armor-bearer at Michmash is a 'great salvation' (I S 14 45), as are also the frequent deliverances of the Israelites from the hands of the Philistines. At the same time, not only extrication from distress or help and victory in warfare, but also the maintenance of security and the continuation of prosperity are included in the conception. This usage appears quite frequently in the Psalms (67 2); the favor of J' is thus made synonymous with salvation (cf. also Ps 91 16). These ideas are gathered up and combined into one in the Messianic eschatological notion which makes salvation summarily the expectation of a Golden Age for Israel in the future. The notion appears simultaneously, and runs parallel, with the Messianic hope (Is 52 10, 56 1, 62 11). It persists down to N T times, and is easily recognized as the thought of Simeon (Lk 2 30). But the Messianic Age is dominated by an ethical principle. It is reserved for a regenerated and morally purified people, whose character conforms to the Law of God. Furthermore, at the end of the O T period and during the intertestamental age, there arose a growing consciousness of individual participation in God's favor; and this was naturally drawn into the general idea of salvation, which, by the infusion into it of ethical content and individualistic application, was reconstituted in its technical sense above defined.

3. The O T System as a Plan of Salvation. Meantime, another development in the O T had prepared the way for thus approaching the subject from a different view-point. Communion with J' came to be regarded as the highest good (summum bonum). To enjoy His favor and live in perfect accord with His desire came to be the passion of the faithful Israelite. But the Israelite saw himself constantly thwarted in his effort to reach this highest good. He perceived also that sin was not necessarily permanent—that God out of His grace could restore him to His favor, and would do so upon certain definite conditions. This was not all expressed in the verb 'to save,' or the noun 'salvation,' but was embodied in the ethical and sacrificial system of the O T, and in the ultimate analysis that system was a means of salvation.

4. Postulates of the Biblical Doctrine. The postulates of the Biblical doctrine of salvation are: an idea of the highest good (summum bonum), conscious failure to attain it, the conviction that this failure is not final, but may be overcome by the help of Divine power, and that there is a way of enlisting that power toward this end. The correlation of these principles, with proportionate emphasis upon each, is a distinctive feature of the Biblical conception. No other race than the Hebrews succeeded in making a perfect synthesis of them. Among the Greeks and Romans, the idea of a highest good existed, but the consciousness of failure to attain it (the sense of sin) did not exist in sufficient strength. Among the Persians, while an evil principle was recognized as working in the world, it was considered eternal and independent, and the hope of overcoming it (salvation) was accordingly vague, if, indeed, it existed at all.

5. Teaching of Jesus on Salvation. But even among the Hebrews, the proper balance of thought was not always maintained. In the Pharisaic creed, for instance, the belief prevailed that the ravages of sin could not, in all cases, be arrested and counteracted. When Jesus declared that He came 'to seek and to save that which was lost' (Lk 19 10), and chose the degraded and apparently hopeless as subjects for His regenerative efforts, His motives were called into question and His character was suspected. But He definitely assumed and asserted the principles underlying salvation, i.e., the possibility of reform, and the necessity of self-sacrifice in order to accomplish it. At the same time, the soteriology of Jesus raises the question, (1) Whom did He mean by the 'lost'? and (2) How did He purpose to save them? In answer to the first, Jesus' own conduct shows that He deemed 'lost' those who lived careless and godless lives; for it was because He associated with such that He was challenged. In the Parables of the Lost He distinctly characterizes those of this class as cut off from touch or communion with God (the coin from its owner, the sheep from the shepherd—and from the rest of the flock, and the son from his father—and from his home, Lk 15 14 ff.). This involves loss in a double sense, the owner or father in each case loses something, but also what is lost is in another sense the loser, illustrated more particularly by the cases of the lost sheep and the lost son, where not only the owner is deprived of his property, but the lost is by the same act plunged into misery and despair, and must be rescued for his own sake. But this rupture with God is precisely what is elsewhere called sin.

6. Salvation by the Revelation of God. The answer to the question how Jesus purposes to save the lost is more complex. It is given partly in Jesus' attempt by social touch to lift the degraded. When He entered the house of Zacchæus (Lk 19 9), He declared that 'salvation had come' into it. In the circumstances, His own entrance into the house was in itself salvation (the means of salvation); for it meant the revelation of the true nature of God and the attraction of its inmates to God by the mere holding before them of God's fatherly love. Zacchæus was saved when he responded to this revelation just as the woman 'who was a sinner' was saved when she turned from her sin to God (Lk 7 50).

7. Salvation: Entrance into the Kingdom of God. But Jesus' conception of salvation is not exhausted in His mere coming. It has a positive, aggressive side, which, as given by the Synoptists, consists in the acceptance of the Kingdom of God and participation in its benefits. He who enters the Kingdom begins a life of loyal obedience to the fatherly reign. He does it, however, not without cost to himself. He must humble or deny himself, and become as a little child (Mk 10 16); he must risk his all, sell all he has in order to invest it in the purchase of this pearl or treasure-field (Mt 13 44, 46); he must leave all and follow Jesus, and, if necessary, hate father and mother, etc. (Lk 14 26).

8. Salvation: Realization of Sonship. Again, salvation is the complete reproduction of the image of God in the believer, because he realizes his true relation to God as his own father (Mt 5 45, 48). This realization brings the spirit of the Father into the heart (Mt 10 20), emancipates from the bondage of human authority (Mt 23 9), transforms the character, rendering men merciful and kind (Mk 11 25; Lk 6 36), creates childlike trust (Lk 12 30) and, in general, admits to all the privileges of the Father's house that had been forfeited by sin (Lk 15 22).

9. Salvation: Forgiveness of Sin. In all its foregoing phases, salvation appears in the light of a change in the human subject of it. It has another side, which may be called Godward. It is also a change of the attitude of God toward the changed man. This side is present in Jesus' preaching of forgiveness (q.v.). In forgiveness, sin disappears as a consideration in the relation with God. But in order to secure its removal, it is necessary to comply with the two conditions of forgiveness, i.e., repentance and faith. Such compliance is conversion (Mk 4 12), or return to God.

10. Jesus, the Mediator of Salvation. Jesus' own work in salvation consists in revealing to the sinner God's love, his own possibilities, and the promise of forgiveness of sin upon condition of repentance and faith. How much more is involved in it is not clearly set forth in His own words. In one of His much-disputed utterances He characterizes His death as the giving of His life 'a ransom for many' (Mk 10 45); and in the Last Supper He speaks of His blood as 'shed for many for the remission of sins' (Mt 26 28). In neither of these passages, however, is there any undoubted reference to the efficacy of His death in changing the attitude of God toward the sinner as a condition of salvation. Rather, both may be regarded as expressions of God's propitious attitude awaiting to be availed of by man.

11. Salvation: Eternal Life. On the other hand, in the Johannine representation of the teaching of Jesus there is a constant reference to the primary significance and object of His life and ministry under the quite different form of an impartation of life (Jn 10 10). This life, from the fact of the drawing of its force from the eternal sphere, of its affiliation with the eternal sphere, and of its issuing in final adoption into the eternal sphere, is called eternal life (5 24, 10 28, 6 40). But eternal life is the gift of Christ, through the spiritual process of the knowledge of, and fellowship with, Himself; it is the result of faith (3 15 f., 36, 6 47). It is, indeed, the very knowledge of God brought into view by Jesus (17 2 f.).

12. Teaching of Jesus: Summary. The conception of salvation found in the teaching of Jesus is thus fourfold. It involves: (1) Rescue from sin as a present evil since the lost are found and brought out of their misery and destitution; (2) the preservation of all the good that is found in the sinful, and the use of what was morally indifferent in building up the life of those now saved; (3) a positive blessing for the present, since the saved are put into the normal relation with God, and, therefore, have a new and large source of happiness in this life; and (4) inheritance of an abundant reward in the life to come (Mt 19 29).

13. Apostolic Teaching: General. By the Apostolic teachers and the N T writers, the doctrine of salvation was developed into an explanation, on the one side, of what God did for man through Jesus, and on the other, as to what He does in man through the Holy Spirit. The work of God for man was presented as revelation, instruction, inspiration, and atonement. Revelation and inspiration are mediated through the life of Jesus. Atonement is made through His death, whether this be viewed as a thing in itself or as the means for the complete offering up of His life in a sacrifice. What God does in man through the Holy Spirit is again either an act of transformation or a process of gradual conformation to ideals.

14. Jesus the Messiah: the Savior. Salvation is the work of Jesus Christ for man. At the very beginning of the Apostolic Age, Jesus was presented to the Jews as the Messiah and the only Savior from sin. Whether the annunciation narrative be one of the earliest or one of the latest productions in the Gospel story, it contains the belief of the days immediately following the Crucifixion and Resurrection. It proclaims Jesus as the One 'who shall save his people from their sins' (Mt 1 21). The sum and substance of the preaching of the first disciples could not have been other than it is represented in the first chapters of Acts, viz., that the Jesus whom the Jews had caused to be crucified was the Messiah predicted by the prophets; but that as the Messiah He was a spiritual Savior, and the only one through whom salvation from sin could be secured (Ac 2 38, 3 19, 4 12).

15. Pauline Conception of Jesus as Revealer. But it is in the hands of Paul that this side of the doctrine was shaped into its fullest and final form. Paul recognizes in the work of Jesus an element of spiritual illumination. The Gospel, which 'is the power of salvation unto every one that believeth,' is first the revelation of God's righteousness and His wrath against sin (Ro 1 17 f.). But it is also the expression of God's love for man and naturally comes to its fullest form in God's dealings with those who accept Christ as their Savior (Ro 5 8; Gal 6 14). There are, however, two ways of viewing the revelation of God's love in Christ, i.e.: (1) either that God reveals His love, and thus redeems men, or (2) that He redeems men through Christ, and so reveals His love. Both of these are true and are included in Paul's teaching, but they present different aspects of the subject. Christ reveals God not only as a father who may be approached in the filial spirit (Ro 8 15), but also as a perfect pattern to which the child should conform (Ph 2 5 f.).

16. Atonement and Salvation. But Paul lays the greatest stress on Christ's work for man through His death. This is the aspect of it which is commonly termed atonement. It may be well to observe that as atonement, Christ's work for man may be viewed as in his behalf or as in his stead. There can be no doubt whatever that, so far as Christ's death secures a reconciliation of man to God and is a bending of the human will Godward, Paul clearly sees it to be an effect of Christ's death on the cross. Every occurrence of the word 'reconciled' in the Epistles has reference to man's reconciliation to God, not God's to man (Ro 5 10; II Co 5 18-20). Christ's life and death so present God to man as to win gratitude and love in response to God's love. The result secured is, accordingly, without the possibility of contradiction, a work in behalf of man. It inures to the benefit of man. The question remains simply whether the doctrine of the Apostle further includes an element or part that may be looked at as an indispensable condition for the securing of God's good pleasure toward man, or, in other words, whether Christ's life or death changes the attitude of God toward the sinner from an unpropitious to a propitious one. This is not a question that can be answered with a confident categorical affirmative or negative. That Paul places great emphasis on the Crucifixion of Christ is very clear (I Co 1 17; Col 2 14). In Gal 3 13 he seems to make the very form of crucifixion, as a mode of death, pivotal in the interpretation of Christ's saving work. It is because He died on the cross and incurred the curse pronounced on that mode of death (Dt 21 23) that He was able to take Himself and those who are joined to Him beyond the reach of the Law and thus set them free. But, in general, it is not crucifixion as a mode of death, but the fact that Christ's death was consummated on the cross that gives the expression 'the cross' its meaning. And in this sense 'the cross' is certainly central in Paul's view of salvation.

17. Analysis of Paul's Doctrine. In the last analysis, Paul's view of Christ's death will be found to be clothed in terms of three different spheres of life, the forensic, the sacrificial, and the purely personal or mystical. Each representation, according to the nature of the sphere from which its materials are drawn, if carried by logical processes to the extreme limits of its application, would come into irreconcilable conflict with either and both of the other two. At least, great confusion is certain to arise from limiting Paul's thought to one of the representations. Neither is it safe to take one and carry it to its legitimate consequences, ignoring or interpreting away those portions of the others which do not completely coalesce with a doctrine constructed out of the first. The fact is that its richness and complexity forbid its being completely cast into a simple mold derived from a single department of life.

18. Forensic Atonement. The forensic formulation of the atonement puts the subject in the language of law. Sinners are offenders against God (transgressors of law). By the terms of the Law, they are subject to condemnation and penalty. The cross of Jesus represents God's plan whereby He, being just and remaining just, even as a judge, can still absolve the sinner of the guilt and penalty of his sin. The cross accomplishes this, because Christ the innocent suffers for the guilty. The requirements of the Law are satisfied, and those who have faith are united to Christ and acquitted (II Co 5 21; Gal 3 13; Col 2 14). The ethical principles underlying this formula are the least clear of any of the portraiture of Christ's work in Paul's teaching; and for this reason the formula should not be made either the exclusive or the primary basis of Paul's doctrine of the atonement.

19. Sacrificial Atonement. The sacrificial formulation is drawn from the Levitical system. It looks upon sin as a stain, and, therefore, as an absolute bar to communion with the Holy God. To remove it a sacrifice is necessary. The special sacrifice that would appear most appropriate in the circumstances could not be the burnt-offering, whose significance is the expression of adoration and praise, nor the peace-offering in any of its varieties (thank-offering, free-will offering, vow-offering); but the sin- or guilt-offering. Yet the victim of the sin-offering is a goat, whereas in Paul's mind Christ's sacrifice is that of the Passover lamb (I Co 5 7). But there is no manifest intention by Paul to be precise in the use of ritual terminology. Consequently, it must be inferred that his main purpose was to indicate the efficacy of Christ's death in removing the stain and offense of sin, and that sacrifice as a means toward this end is looked at as a composite affair comprising some general underlying principles. It is not one of the definite offerings of the ritual that represents Christ's death, but the ideas signified by them altogether. Further, in the sacrificial representation of Christ's death, it is left undecided whether the article of death in itself is what atones, or the life which is surrendered in death. This question was not present in the Apostle's mind, and if an answer to it must be secured, it will be through reversion to the O T thought of sacrifice and the meaning of the death of the victim in it.

20. Mystical Atonement. The third, personal, or mystical representation of the atonement in Paul's theology proceeds upon the assumption that sin is a principle of corruption in the heart ending in the death of the sinner. Salvation, accordingly, is a deliverance of the sinner from the power of this evil. In Christ's death and victory over death all those who are united to Him by faith die; and in His Resurrection, by force of the same union they overcome death, and are no more liable to its power. Accordingly, salvation consists in being personally ingrafted into Christ, and becoming a sharer in all the experiences of the dominant member of the whole, viz., the Head. On §§ 16-20 see also RECONCILIATION AND ATONEMENT.

21. The Johannine Doctrine. The Johannine notion of salvation and that in the Epistle to the Hebrews are different from Paul's only in leaving out of account the forensic representation, and giving attention to the sacrificial (He exclusively and Jn subordinately) and to the mystical (Jn predominantly and He incidentally or by inference). Jn specifies Jesus as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. In Rev the figure of the Lamb is in constant use as an emblem of the sacrificial nature of His work, but in all cases the significance of the language and the underlying principles are the same as those in the thought of Paul.

22. Subjective Salvation. The work of God in man through the Holy Spirit: Subjective salvation—by which name this part of the subject is commonly known—includes a doctrine of the change which brings the sinner from his darkness and ignorance and deadness to the knowledge of, and a new life in, Christ (cf. REGENERATION), a doctrine of his new relation to God (cf. JUSTIFICATION), and a doctrine of his gradual growth in the character which God desires to develop and complete, assimilating them to His own holiness (cf. SANCTIFICATION).

SAMARIA, סַמְרִיָּה (שָׁמֶר), shōm'rōn, perhaps from shāmar, 'to watch,' hence meaning something like 'outlook'; but, according to I K 16 24, derived from the individual [or clan] Shemer, from whom Omri purchased the site; in the N T Σαμαρεία: The capital of the Northern Kingdom, from its building by Omri, c. 880 B.C. (I K 16 24), to its capture by the Assyrians in 722 (II K chs. 17, 18).

During the succeeding centuries Samaria was often captured and demolished, only to be built again; and its mixed population was made still more heterogeneous through the addition of foreign colonies settled there by various conquerors. The city again became a royal residence, however, in the time of Herod the Great, who enlarged its fortifications, embellished it with many beautiful structures, and renamed it Sebaste, after the Emperor Augustus (Gr. Σεβαστός). During the early centuries of our era the city was gradually surpassed in prosperity by Neapolis (see SHECHEM); but it early became an episcopal see, which was reestablished by the Crusaders, and a Greek bishop, resident in Jerusalem, still takes his title from Sebaste.

S. lay 6 m. NW. from Shechem, and occupied a commanding position on the summit of a round, isolated hill, 300 ft. high (1,542 ft. above the sea), which is separated from the surrounding heights by rich wheat-fields and olive orchards. Westward a break in the encircling mountains allows a magnificent outlook to the Mediterranean, 23 m. away. Map III, F 3. 'It would be hard to find, in all Palestine, a situation of equal strength, fertility, and beauty combined' (Robinson).

Modern Sebastiyeh, however, is a squalid and fanatical Moslem village, whose paths and fields are cluttered with a multitude of fallen columns. The most important ancient edifice is the half-ruined crusading church of St. John, long since converted into a mosque. Several score of columns of the famous colonnade or 'street of pillars' are still in place.

During the years 1908-10 the site of Samaria was excavated by G. A. Reisner for Harvard University. Near the surface the temple built by Herod was discovered, and at a lower level the palace of Omri and Ahab. In the latter many interesting ostraca were found, written in ink with a reed pen, containing the business accounts of the palace. These add considerably to our knowledge of ancient Hebrew epigraphy. On the later political subdivision of Palestine called Samaria see PALESTINE, § 35.

SAMARITAN, sə-mar'ı-tən (pl. שַׁמְרִיִּים, shōm-rōnīm, only in II K 17 29; Σαμαρειτης, Jn 4 9; Ac 8 25); An inhabitant of Samaria or adjacent territory. The term came into use only after the population of this region had developed a unique religious and social character. The origin of the type is given in II K 17 24. Sargon, after deporting most of the population of Israel (722 B.C.), sent a colony of non-Israelites to live in the town of Samaria. These intermarried with the few Israelites left, and were joined by another group in the reign of Esarhaddon (675, Ezr 4 2), or Assurbanipal (Asnapper, Osnapper RV, Ezr 4 10) in 650 B.C. The Israelitic element, however, proved the strongest in influence and was possibly the strongest in number. At all events, the religion of the mixed race was a modified form of J' worship, tho many from among the non-Israelites reverted to their idolatry (II K 17 29 f.). Upon the return of the exiles under Zerubbabel, the Samaritans wished to help in the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem (Ezr 4 1 f.). But their offer was rejected, and the breach between them and the Jews thus became permanent. In the first part of the reign of Artaxerxes I (465-424 B.C.) they obtained permission to destroy the walls of Jerusalem just being constructed (by Ezra?). Proceeding to Jerusalem they compelled the builders to cease building (Ezr 4 7-23) and burned the gates (Neh 1 3). When Nehemiah later (444 B.C.) undertook the fortification of the city the Samaritans put every obstacle in the way of his success, but in vain (Neh chs. 4 and 6).

Samaritanism as a religious system was perfected by the adoption of the Pentateuch as the sole sacred book and the erection of a temple on Mount Gerizim near Shechem (Jos. Ant. XI, 7 2, 8 2), which was sanctioned by Darius Codomannus and finished in 331 B.C. To justify the choice of Mount Gerizim for this purpose the text of Dt 27 4 was changed from 'Ebal' to 'Gerizim.' The sect was later reenforced by the accession of converted Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, when, by denying their affinity with the Jewish religion, the Samaritans were exempted from persecution. Their temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus in 128 B.C. At the time of Jesus, hatred between Jews and Samaritans had become so acute that travel between Jerusalem and Galilee took a circuitous route east of the Jordan (Jn 4 9, 8 48; Jos. Ant. XX, 6 1 f.). The Samaritans survive to the present day as a small community, deriving their name not from Samaria but from shōm'rīm, 'keepers [of the true law]'. In addition to limiting the Canon to the Pentateuch, they teach that the Messiah is not greater than Moses, that He will live 110 years, and that He will come 6,000 years from the Creation and lead all men to the true faith. (Cf. J. A. Montgomery, The Samaritans.)

SAMGAR-NEBO, sam'gar-ni'bo (סַגְרִי-נְבוֹ, šamgar-n'bhū): A chief army officer of Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 39 3), but the text is corrupt and perhaps to be emended from ver. 13.

SAMLAH, sma'la (שַׁמְלָה, samlāh): A king of Edom, fifth in the list given in Gn 36 31 f. His home was at Masrekah (site unknown) (Gn 36 36; I Ch 1 47 f.).

SAMOS, sē'mes (Σάμος): An island in the Aegean Sea, opposite the bay of Ephesus, where Paul touched on his voyage from Assos to Patara (Ac 20 15) on his way to Jerusalem. Its earliest inhabitants were driven out by Epidaurian Greeks. It was famous in the 7th cent. for architecture, sculpture (bronze-casting), and ship-building. It carried on an extensive maritime commerce under Polycrates (532-522 B.C.), and experienced varying commercial and political fortunes under Persians, Athenians, and the Ptolemies. In 84 B.C. it was annexed to the province of Asia, and in 17 B.C. made a civitas libera by Augustus. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

SAMOTHRACE, sam'o-thrēs (Σαμοθράκη, incorrectly Samothracia AV), possibly 'height of Thrace,' or 'Thracian Samos': An island in the Aegean, off the coast of Thrace, to which Paul came on his voyage from Troas to Neapolis (Ac 16 11). Its history is unimportant. It engaged with the Athenians in their campaign against the Persians and assisted in the victory at Salamis (480 B.C.). Afterward, it became tributary to Athens. It was famous for its pre-Greek Mysteries of the Cabiri, in which there existed a confessional system. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

SAMOTHRACIA, sam'o-thrē'shi-a. See SAMOTHRACE.

SAMSON, sam'son (שִׁמְשׁוֹן, šimshōn), not derived from shemesh, 'sun,' as a diminutive, 'little sun': The name of a Danite hero, represented as one of the 'judges' of Israel (Jg chs. 13-16). The name 'Samson' may, however, have some connection with the sun-worship prevalent in the locality to which S. belonged. The city of Beth-shemesh, 'house of the sun,' for example, was not far from his native town. The equivalent of the name has also been found in Assyrian and Arabic.

The Samson stories are unique. Nothing like them is found elsewhere in the O T. Unlike Deborah, Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, etc., who all accomplished some great result for Israel, Samson is actuated by personal motives rather than by love of country or of God, has little sympathy from his countrymen, and comes to his end without having achieved any permanent success. Nothing in the stories indicates that he ever assumed to be a 'judge.'

The stories of S. relate (1) to the remarkable circumstances connected with his birth (ch. 13), (2) to his marriage to the Philistine woman of Timnah (ch. 14), (3) to his troubles with the Philistines growing out of this marriage (ch. 15), and (4) to his experiences with Delilah, which led to the loss of his strength, capture by the Philistines, imprisonment, and later his self-inflicted death (ch. 16).

It is only in the first and last of these stories that the religious element shows itself. In the first, S. is a nāzīr (Nazirite, q.v.) from his birth, i.e., 'separated' or 'dedicated' to a work, which is described in 13 5 thus: 'He shall begin to save Israel out of the hand of the Philistines.' Such was the interpretation that was put upon the career of S. in later times, tho there is little to support this in the stories themselves.

To attempt to decide the question of how much historical truth the Samson stories contain would be futile. They are fine examples of ancient Israelitic folk-lore. It is perfectly evident that the deeds of such a one as we may reasonably suppose S. to have been would be favorite topics for the local storytellers, and the temptation to embellish the original forms of the stories with entertaining details would, doubtless, be very strong. The kernel of the stories must belong to the 'Judges' period. Whether historical (as regards S. himself) or not, they are first-class historical evidence for much that relates to the social and political conditions on the western border of Israel in the 11th and 10th cents. B.C.

Evidences of mythical elements in the Samson stories are too numerous and significant to be disregarded, and the view that to the actual historical basis in the stories there have been added materials originally belonging to the solar mythology so widespread in the ancient world is probably to be accepted as true. SAMUEL, sam'yū-el (שמואל, shemū'el), 'name of God' (cf. Driver, Notes on the Heb. Text of Samuel, p. 13 f.): The great leader of Israel in the time just preceding the kingdom period. The story of S. in I S is made up from two main threads of narrative (see DAVID, § 2, and SAMUEL, BOOKS OF, § 3 f.). In one of these, S. is set forth as he was thought of by the idealizing admiration of later centuries, which, while making use of old traditions, reread and interpreted them in accordance with the views of a later age. According to this view, S. was from the first a chosen instrument, to whom even as a child God made known His purpose concerning Eli. When he had grown to manhood he assumed the leadership of all Israel, thought of as acting as a unit through tribal representatives at great public assemblies. He brought about a religious reform, then conquered the Philistines and thus freed Israel from her enemies. In the era of peace that followed he was the supreme judge of the land. In his old age he appointed his sons judges, but the people were dissatisfied and demanded a king as a judge. S. was much displeased, but at the command of J<sup>h</sup> proceeded to select a king, tho still warning the people of the fatal character of such a choice on their part. Saul was chosen, but soon proved that S. was correct in his gloomy forebodings. When Saul failed to execute fully the Divine commission to exterminate the Amalekites, S. in great anger declared that he had forfeited his right to be king. Soon after, S. privately anointed David and once, in the troublous times that followed, protected David from Saul. At his death he was greatly mourned by all Israel and buried in Ramah. The last notice in this narrative concerning S. is that peculiar story in I S 28 3 ff. where S., called from his rest in Sheol, once more pronounces upon the unhappy Saul the message of doom.

The other narrative (9 1-10 16) is simpler in character, and appears to have been written at a much earlier period when the traditions regarding S. were fresher and more accurate. In this narrative, the beginning of which has apparently been lost (I S 7 15-17 may belong to this beginning), S. appears as a local seer of considerable influence in the territory near his home, Ramah. He felt how unfortunate the condition of Israel was without a leader against the enemy, the Philistines, and was waiting from J<sup>h</sup> to show him the right man to select and commission for this work. One day Saul of Benjamin appeared, searching for his father's asses and anxious to ask the seer where they might be found. S. (in the double capacity of seer and priest which was perfectly normal in ancient times) was just about to preside over a sacrifice (and sacrificial feast to which about thirty influential persons had been invited) at the 'high place' of Ramah. S. at once discerned in Saul the Divinely sent man and, after honoring him at the feast, entertained him at his home overnight, and on dismissing him in the morning anointed him with oil to be J<sup>h</sup>'s prince or 'leader' over His inheritance. Giving Saul knowledge of certain 'signs' that would befall him on his way home, he told him to await the 'occasion' that would call him forth into public service.

In the light of this older account the later one must be judged. In some respects, especially in its representation of S. as judge of 'all Israel from Dan to Beer-sheba' (3 20, 7 3, 10 17 ff.), its view that S. was opposed to the popular demand for a king (8 6 ff.), its idea that S. made a complete conquest of the Philistines (7 13 f.), and that he took the prominent part assigned him in public affairs after Saul became king, this latter account is in conflict with the older account of 9 1-10 16. But there is no reason to discount altogether all that the later account tells us of S., and it is likely that the traditions concerning his childhood, early life at Shiloh, prominence in Ephraim, and general influence for good have a basis in actual facts. He was doubtless the one man who, more than any other, by his loyalty to J<sup>u</sup> and ardent patriotism, stirred the people of central Israel to desire to shake off the Philistine yoke and assert their independence. He thus paved the way for Saul and David. E. E. N.

SAMUEL, BOOKS OF: 1. Name. The two Books of Samuel in the EVV formed in the original Heb. canon but one book, called, according to Origen, 'Samuel' being the third of the so called 'Earlier Prophets.' In the LXX. this was divided into two books, as was done also with the following Book of Kings, and the four resulting books were called 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th 'Book(s) of the Kingdoms.' This division was not adopted into Heb. Bibles until the age of printing, the second edition of Bomberg's Heb. Bible being the first to make use of it, tho it had long been current in the Latin Bible.

2. General Character and Contents. Like most of the other historical books in the O T, I and II S should be characterized as compilations of historical material of most varied character rather than as histories in the ordinary sense of that term. Early and late sources have been made use of, in many cases placed side by side, or interwoven, in spite of their different and often conflicting points of view and contents. And to the sources so used have been added glosses and insertions, each in its way representing the view of some later editor who sought thereby either to harmonize differences between the sources or to make some part of the material a more adequate expression of his own conception of the nature of the past history.

The result is that we have a book which, while it seems at first sight to give in an orderly way the history of the period from Samuel to Solomon, proves on close analysis to be one of the most difficult and complicated books in the O T.

The general analysis of I and II S is quite simple. The book is subdivided into three main divisions: (a) chs. 1-15. Samuel and Saul, or the Origin of the Monarchy (in which ch. 15 is of the nature of an appendix to chs. 1-14). (b) I S ch. 16-II S ch. 8. David the successor of Saul as king of all Israel. (c) II S chs. 9-24. The reign of David, king in Jerusalem (in which chs. 21-24 form an appendix of miscellaneous material). It will be noticed that I S ch. 14 and II S chs. 8 and 20 each end in a summary statement, indicating that these passages once formed closing paragraphs of independent narratives.

3. Analysis and Criticism of I S chs. 1-15. The first division (I S chs. 1-15) may be analyzed as follows:

I. The Career of Samuel as Prophet and Judge, chs. 1-7.

1. The child Samuel at the sanctuary, 1 1-2 11.
  - (1) Parentage and birth of S., 1 1-28.
  - (2) S. given to the Lord by his mother, 1 24-28.
  - (3) Hannah's psalm of thanksgiving, 2 1-11.
2. The Divine judgment on Eli's house, 2 12-3 18.
  - (1) The wickedness of Eli's sons, 2 12-26.
    - a. Their sin in regard to the offerings, 2 12-17.
    - b. Samuel visited yearly by his mother, 2 18-21.
    - c. Eli rebukes his sons in vain, 2 22-28.

- (2) Judgment on Eli's house pronounced by a 'man of God,' 2 27-36.
- (3) Revelation to S. of the doom on Eli's house, 3 1-18.
3. S. becomes known to all Israel as a prophet of J<sup>u</sup> in Shiloh (3 19-4 1a).
4. Israel defeated by the Philistines, 4 1b-7 2.
  - (1) The defeat at Aphek. The Ark captured. Eli's sons slain. Death of Eli and of Phinehas' wife, 4 1a-22.
  - (2) The Ark in the hands of the Philistines. It is returned to the Israelites and kept at Kiriath-jearim, 5 1-7 2.
5. S. the leader of Israel, 7 3-17.
  - (1) The religious reform, 7 3 f.
  - (2) S. conquers the Philistines, 7 5-14.
  - (3) S. the judge of Israel, 7 15-17.
- II. The Origin of the Monarchy. Saul made king, chs. 8-12.
  1. The people demand a king. S. is displeased and warns them, but J<sup>u</sup> directs him to proceed, ch. 8.
  2. The meeting between S. and Saul, 9 1-10 16 (see below).
  3. Saul chosen king by lot at the assembly at Mizpah, 10 17-27.
  4. Saul rescues Jabesh-gilead from the Ammonites, 11 1-13.
  5. The kingdom renewed at Gilgal, 11 14 f.
  6. Samuel's farewell address, ch. 12.
- III. Saul's Reign and Rejection by God, chs. 13-15.
  1. The great victory of Saul over the Philistines, 13 1-14 46.
    - (1) Saul and Jonathan smite the Philistine garrison at Geba, 13 1-4.
    - (2) The Philistines invade Israel in force, 13 5-7a.
    - (3) Saul rebuked for violating his appointment with Samuel, 13 7b-16a.
    - (4) The Philistines overrun the land, 13 16b-23.
    - (5) Saul's first great victory over the Philistines, 14 1-46.
  2. Saul's other wars and victories, 14 47 f.
  3. Saul's family, 14 49-51.
  4. Continuous war with the Philistines, 14 52.
  5. Saul commissioned by S. to exterminate Amalek; he disobeys and is rejected by God, ch. 15.

A careful examination of the foregoing analysis will show that there are at least two parallel threads of narrative running through it, which not only differ from each other, but presuppose altogether different sets of circumstances. In addition, there are numerous minor episodes attached to these or interwoven with them which seriously disturb the orderly progress of the narrative.

In chs. 1-7 the main theme, as the book now stands, is doubtless the career of Samuel. This is given in the following passages: (a) The parentage and dedication to J<sup>u</sup> (1 1-23). On the text difficulty in ver. 28 see HANNAH. (b) The yearly visits of Samuel's mother to Shiloh to see S. (2 18-21). (c) The revelation to the child S. of the doom of Eli's house (3 1-18). (d) S. becomes recognized by all Israel as a prophet (3 19-4 1). (e) S. assumes the leadership of Israel, brings about a religious reform, and conquers the Philistines (7 3-14). (f) S. the judge (7 15-17). Attached to this main thread, perhaps as later insertions, are (1) the Song, or Psalm, of Hannah, a late composition (2 1-10) belonging to the kingdom period (cf. ver. 10); (2) the passages dealing with the wickedness of Eli's sons (2 12-17 and 22-28, one of which was probably originally connected directly with 3 1-18); (3) the message of the 'man of God' to Eli (2 27-36, a passage that is really concerned with the claims of two rival priestly families, and belongs naturally to a later time; see PRIESTHOOD, § 5 f.); (4) the long section regarding the defeat of Israel and the capture of the Ark (4 1b-7 2, in which there is no reference whatever to Samuel). All this material has been so well interwoven with the main thread (dealing specifically with S.) that no serious discrepancy is observed.

In the next main section (chs. 8-12) uniformity is not so well secured. The biographical passages that carry forward the story of those in chs. 1-7 and from the same view-point are: (1) The dissatisfaction of the people at the sons of S. as judges (8 1-3). (2) Their demand for a king 'to judge us like all the nations' (8 4-6). (3) S. protests in vain against this plan, but is directed by J" to give His disloyal people a king (8 7-22). (4) At an appointed meeting at Mizpah Saul is chosen king (10 17-25). (5) Later, S. delivers a farewell address (ch. 12, which, however, belongs logically with 10 25).

But in the midst of these passages there are two long sections, intimately related, which are of entirely different character: (1) In 9 1-10 16 Saul, the Benjamite, a young man, hunting for his father's asses, comes into the neighborhood of Ramah, the home of S. Saul apparently knows nothing of S., who is called by the old term 'seer' (cf. 9 9), but Saul's servant knows of him and advises Saul to ask S. as to the whereabouts of the asses. It is a sacrifice-day in Ramah, and Saul meets S. just as the latter is about to preside at the sacrifice (9 11-14). S. at once discerns in Saul the wished-for 'prince' who was to 'save my people out of the hand of the Philistines' (9 16; contrast 8 5), greets him heartily, gives him the place of honor at the sacrificial meal, and entertains him overnight (9 15-25). The next morning S. dismisses Saul after intimating to him what is in store for him, and tells him to 'do as occasion shall serve thee' (9 26-10 8, in which 10 8 is a gloss to make the whole harmonize with 13 8-15a). Saul returns home and tells no one what has happened (10 9-16). (2) The 'occasion' S. referred to comes soon in the summons from Jabesh-gilead (11 1 f.), and the resulting victory at once brings Saul into public notice and leads to his being chosen king. In these sections the kingdom is viewed as a blessing, S. is warmly in favor of it, the function of the king is mainly military, and the great national need is deliverance from the Philistines. The passages 10 26-27 and 11 12-15 are composite in character, and their analysis is not easy.

The next section (chs. 13-15) is also not all of the same character. Ch. 13 f. deals with Saul's wars, especially with his great initial victory over the Philistines, and ch. 15 with his final rejection by S. In the midst of the narrative of Saul's struggle with the Philistines in ch. 13 we find a story of S.'s denunciation of Saul (13 7b-15a, with which possibly parts of vs. 4-6 are to be connected). In this interpolation the scene is at Gilgal, while in the main narrative it is near Geba and Michmash (13 2 f., 16 f.). Ch. 15, tho similar in its point of view to 13 7b-15a, is a piece by itself.

The result of the foregoing analysis of IS 1-15 can be stated as follows: The compiler (of the Books of Samuel) used as one of his sources for the story of the origin of the monarchy and the reign of Saul a very old account (cf. 9 9) in which, after telling how the Philistines had gained control of Israel (ch. 4), Saul was set forth as the savior of his country, who broke the power of the enemy and led Israel to victory on all sides. Saul was the Divine choice through S., was mightily endowed by 'the spirit of J'" (9 1-10 16), triumphed first over the Ammonites (11 1-11), then broke the power of the Philistines (13 1-6, 16-14 46), then conquered other peoples (14 47 f.), the narrative concluding with a formal notice of Saul's family (14 49-51, which may be a later addition). In this old narrative the attitude toward the kingdom-idea and toward Saul is altogether friendly. See KING.

Parallel with this is another and probably much later account, which, however, made use of some old material. This account gives much space to S.'s biography; it emphasizes the virtues of S., the perfection of his administration, even falling into serious historical error in 7 13 f., and, viewing the kingdom with disfavor, points out how the kingdom in the person of its first king fulfilled S.'s gloomy forebodings. The point of view here is the 'Deuteronomic,' and the general character of certain long passages such as chs. 12 and 15 is distinctly 'Deuteronomic.'

4. Analysis of I S ch. 16-II S ch. 24. For the analysis of the remainder of the material in I and II S the reader is referred to the article DAVID, § 2, where it is given in full and where also its historical character is discussed. Here it is necessary only to point out that while with 16 14 a new source begins (called narrative A in art. DAVID), the connection between this source and the preceding story found in ch. 4, in 9 1-10 16, 11 1-11, and in ch. 13 f. (except 13 7b-15a) is very close. Both are written in the same spirit, and the second might even be considered the continuation of the first. Likewise, it will be noted that the narrative called B in art. DAVID is but a continuation of the sections in I S 11-16 13 dealing with the biography of S., the mistake of choosing a king, and the conflict between S. and Saul, or the 'Deuteronomic' sections.

It is quite possible, as a number of scholars now claim, that the older strands of narrative in I and II S are closely related to, if not identical with, the J and E material of the Hexateuch (q.v.). This involves no essential alteration of the position taken above in which the essential facts only (on which any theory must be based) are presented.

5. Authorship, Date, and Historical Value of I and II S. Since the books are compilations from older documents, little can be said concerning their authorship. The main documents used, viz., the old history of Saul (I S ch. 4, 9 1-10 16, 11 1-11, 13 1-7a, 15b-14, end) and of David (narrative A) and the history of David's reign in Jerusalem (Da<sup>3</sup>) were of quite early date (10th or 9th cent. B.C.), as was also much of the miscellaneous material in II S chs 20-24 (see DAVID, § 2 (4)). To this material a high historical value must be assigned throughout. On the other hand, the 'Deuteronomic' passages, tho embodying some older material, are as a rule of late date (7th cent. or after) and are written with a distinctively didactic or 'pragmatic' purpose. The past history is viewed in the light of the writer's present, and all persons and events judged accordingly. S. and David are idealized, the kingdom was fundamentally a great error (in spite of David; cf. I S 8 10-18), and in Saul are seen the type and fate of the king who chooses his own will against that of J'. To these passages only a moderate degree of historical value can be assigned. The kernel of historical truth they contain must be carefully distinguished from the interpretations or additions of the writer himself.

The first draft of I and II S was made probably before the Exile. But certain passages, e.g., I S 2 27-36, may be postexilic. At all events, it is probable that the books did not assume their present form until after the Exile.

SANBALLAT, san-bal'at (סַנְבַּלַּט, sanbhallat, Assy. Šin-uballit, 'the god Sin has given life'): A Horonite, possibly a native of Beth-horon, tho Josephus says he was a 'a Cuthean by birth' (Ant. XI, 7 2). He was a Samaritan of considerable influence, and unsuccessfully plotted to defeat Nehemiah's plans for rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (4 1 ff.). He then invited this Jewish governor to a conference at Ono, that he might treacherously slay him (6 1-4), but shrewdness kept Nehemiah busy at work in Jerusalem. Neither were threats of any use in his plottings (6 5-14). A grandson of the high priest Jaddua had become Sanballat's son-in-law (13 28). Josephus (Ant. XI, 7 2) tells us, tho he entirely mistakes the date, that his name was Manasseh, and that he, when given the alternative either of forsaking his wife Nicaso and remaining in Jerusalem or of accompanying her to Shechem and becoming high priest of a new temple to be built by his father-in-law on Gerizim; chose the latter, and thus established the community of Samaritans, who adopted as their Scriptures the Pentateuch. Sayce attributes Josephus' statements to an apocryphal story of the Samaritan temple.

SANCTIFY, SANCTIFICATION: 1. General Sense. To make, declare, or regard 'holy.' The Heb. and Gr. terms (qādash, 'to be separate,' and its derivatives, and ἁγιάζειν, 'to hallow') are rendered in the EVV by 'hallow,' 'consecrate,' 'sanctify.' But these represent in general a progressive movement from the outward to the inner and ethical.

2. To 'Hallow.' In the first instance, to sanctify is to regard or declare holy by separating from common usage to the service of God. The Sabbath day was thus separated ('hallowed,' Ex 20 11); so also were the vessels of the sanctuary (Ex 40 9). Solomon hallowed the inner court of the Temple (II Ch 7 7). In the N T this sense survives in the first petition of the Lord's Prayer (Mt 6 9). To hallow God's name is neither to make it holy nor to consecrate it, but simply to recognize and declare it such.

3. To 'Consecrate.' With the rise of the ritual the idea of sanctification takes on the sense of consecration. By special symbolical action that which is separated from common use and dedicated to religious purposes is given a new, tho conventional character. To turn it into any other use after such consecration is to defraud God and thereby commit a grievous offense. The priesthood acquired this ceremonial holiness by consecration. But the technical term employed to express this conception (Ex 28 41, 29 9) is to 'fill their hands,' viz., make them competent for service by placing within their hands the gift which as priests they are to bring to the altar of J'. A place or house of God was in the same way consecrated, the special technical term used being 'dedicate' (hānakh, I K 8 63; ἁγιάζειν, He 9 18).

4. To 'Sanctify.' It is only in the N T that the third, and highest, sense of the verb sanctify (sanctification) appears, and here, clearly and plainly, first in the usage of Paul. To sanctify is to make inwardly whole. And the work is the function of the Spirit of God. In the Gospels, no mention is made of inward sanctification. In the utterances of Jesus, to sanctify is to consecrate. It is the Temple which sanctifies the gold, and the altar which sanctifies the gift (Mt 23 17, 19; cf. also usage in Jn 10 36 and 17 17, 19). Paul, however, distinctly passes to the ethical sense. He sets it as the goal of God's wish for the disciples of Christ that they should be completely sanctified (I Th 4 3); and he evidently includes in his thought the control and direction of the body in purity by the spirit, the putting off of sin, and the putting on of holiness.

The agent of sanctification is the Holy Spirit (Ro 15 16). His indwelling, working from within outward, constitutes the essence of sanctification, which is, therefore, not a garment to be put on, but a spiritual principle; so that, even when one portion of the manhood is affected by it, it passes into and suffuses the whole. 'If the root be holy, so are the branches' (Ro 11 16). Sanctification is, then, neither a simple act nor a process which must be completed before it can be strictly called by that name. It is complete at the outset, and yet it is a process which admits of growth and increasingly nearer approximation to its ideal completion. How this apparent anomaly of thought arises is explained by the fact that the conception has had its static stage in its earlier form. In the O T it was the act of consecration that made the person or object holy. When the dynamic stage in the development of the conception came, it was understood as conformity to God's character, rather than separation to His service. Whenever, therefore, the thought reverts to the static aspect of the conception, sanctification appears as an already complete thing. Hence believers are holy. They are saints (Ro 12 13; II Co 1 1; Eph 1 1, etc.), but whenever the idea points to the growing or dynamic side of the notion, sanctification is progressive (a work of God's Spirit inwardly, changing the sinner into increasingly perfect conformity to God's whole image). This does not supersede in the N T writings the earlier sense of 'consecration' and 'hallowing' (cf. He 13 12; I P 3 15), but expands and completes the notion. A. C. Z.

SANCTUARY: This is the rendering of the two Heb. terms qōdhash and miqdāsh, both from qādash, 'to be holy,' and thus signifying 'holy place.' In the N T ἁγίον (He 8 2, 9 1 f., 13 11 AV) is so rendered, meaning the 'holy place' of the Tabernacle or Temple except in 8 2, where the word is plural and the sense general (see RVmg.). Tho the term 'sanctuary,' as it occurs in the EV, refers almost exclusively to the Tabernacle or Temple, it will be convenient here to discuss briefly certain conceptions expressed by such a term as miqdāsh, 'holy place.'

In primitive times the term 'holy' (see HOLINESS, § 1) was applied in a very general way to many objects as well as persons. A holy character was assigned to springs, trees, heights, etc. (see HIGH PLACE), as these were thought to be especially favorite haunts of deities (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 7). Israel, tho nominally worshipping J'' alone, easily came to think of Him as likely to be found in or near such 'holy places,' many of which had earlier been seats of the worship of Canaanite deities. Wherever He had specially manifested Himself or 'recorded' His name (Ex 20 24) was a 'holy place.'

When to such places were attached an altar, sacred stone pillar, sacred tree or wooden pillar ('grove' RV; see SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 11, 29), and some symbol of deity, the golden calves, for example, at Bethel and Dan (cf. also Jg 17 5, 31), they took on special significance. If in addition such a sanctuary had a priesthood, it had all the furnishings for a fully equipped 'holy place.' The old narrative in Jg ch. 17 f. is very valuable, as showing how such a sanctuary could be established in early days in Israel. A sanctuary was also a place of asylum, the horns of the altar in particular being considered inviolable (cf. I K 2 28 ff.). The sanctuaries of ancient Israel were numerous (cf. Am 7 9). Some places like Shiloh, Bethel, Gilgal, Beer-sheba, etc., were great centers of worship, with numerous priests, and a highly developed cultus. On Bethel cf. Am 7 10 ff. (in ver. 13 for 'chapel' AV read 'sanctuary' with RV). See also TEMPLE; and TABERNACLE, § 1.

SANSANNAH, son-san'a (סַנְשַׁנָּה, sanšannāh): A city in the south of Judah (Jos 15 31) = Hazar-susah, a town of Simeon (Jos 19 5; Hazar-susim in I Ch 4 31). Site not surely identified. C. S. T.

SAPH, saf (סַפ, saph): A son of 'the giant,' slain by David's hero Sibbecai (II S 21 18; Sippai in I Ch 20 4).

SAPHIR. See SHAPHIR.

SAPPHIRA, saf-ai-rē (Σαπφίρα, an Aram. word meaning 'beautiful'): The wife of Ananias (Ac 5 1 ff.). See ANANIAS.

SAPPHIRE. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2 (5).

SARAH, sē'ra, the later form of SARAI (סָרָה, sārāh, 'princess' according to the traditional interpretation which, however, is questionable (cf. ICC, ad loc.): 1. The wife of Abraham (Gn 11 29), and his father's daughter (20 12). She accompanied A. from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran (11 31) and Canaan (12 5). Because of a famine, they went down to Egypt, where S., as sister of A., was taken into Pharaoh's house. On finding out that she was Abraham's wife, Pharaoh rebuked him and sent them on their way (12 10-20, J). A similar adventure in connection with Abimelech (20 1-18, E) is probably a variation of the same story (cf. also 26 6-11). According to 17 17, S. was sixty-five years old when she went down into Egypt, an age which would seem to tell against the probability of the experience in the court of Pharaoh. The ages evidently belong to another document, P. Being childless (11 30) Sarai gave Hagar, her handmaid, to Abraham as a concubine. Afterward, she dealt hardly with Hagar, so that the latter fled from the house, but later returned (ch. 16). In ch. 17 (P) a son is promised to Abraham of Sarai, whose name hereafter is to be Sarah (17 15 f.). Another account of the promise is given in J (18 9 ff.). The birth of Isaac is related in 21 1-7. Moved by jealousy because of Ishmael's attitude in the house, S. compelled Hagar and Ishmael to leave. S. died in Kiriath-arba (Hebron) when 127 years old (23 1 f., P), and was buried in the cave of the field of Machpelah before Mamre (23 19; cf. 25 10, 49 31, P). In Is 51 2 S. is called the 'mother' of the true Israel. In the N T she is mentioned as the mother of 'the children of the promise' (Ro 9 9; cf. 4 19), and as an example of a good wife (I P 3 6). Her faith is referred to in He 11 11. Some scholars explain S. as being originally the name of a tribe or clan. 2. See SERAH.

SARAPH, sē'raf (סָרָפָה, sārāph): A descendant of Judah (I Ch 4 22). The reference to a dominion over Moab is obscure. It probably refers to some post-exilic event.

SARDINE. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2 (1).

SARDIS, sār'dis (Σάρδεις): One of the seven churches mentioned in Rev (3 1 ff.). It was the capital of the Lydian kingdom down to the fall of Croesus (546 B.C.), then the residence of the Persian satrap. It was situated in a fertile plain at the northern slope of Tmolus. The beginnings of S. lie beyond the limits of known history. The Acropolis rose on three sides almost perpendicularly to a height of 1,500 ft. above the plain. It was taken first by the Cimmerians, then by the Persians under Cyrus from Croesus, under whom S. had reached the zenith of her prosperity. With ordinary watchfulness the Acropolis was impregnable, but in overconfidence its weak point was left unguarded and it was taken by stealth twice: by Cyrus, 549 B.C., and by Antiochus the Great in 218 B.C. (Cf. 'Be thou watchful. . . I will come as a thief, and thou shalt not know what hour,' Rev 3 2) S. was devoted to the mysteries of Cybele (cf. 'who have not soiled their garments,' Rev 3 4). The importance of S. was due to its strategic position commanding the great eastern trade-route, aided by its fertile plains and manufactures (woolen stuffs, rugs, gold ornaments). This combination made Sardis rich, tho the ancients ascribed her wealth to the gold washed down by the Pactolus river. This was merely allegory, because S. was the first city to coin money; trade brought the gold to it, and its people were the earliest shopkeepers. Even to a late period Lydian sutlers accompanied, and enriched themselves on, every army (the so called 'Lydian market'). S. became the first gold-market, to which the Spartans sent for gold wherewith to gild the Amyclæan Apollo. S. was destroyed by earthquake in 17 A.D.

When the road-system came to radiate from Constantinople, S. began to decline, being overshadowed by Philadelphia and Magnesia. Imposing ruins remain. Excavations have produced rich finds.

SARGON (II), sār'gon (𐏊𐏁𐏂, šargōn = Assy. shargānu, sharu-kēnu, 'the king is faithful'): The king of Assyria from 722 to 705 B.C. He usurped the throne, and established the last great Assyrian dynasty. The first recorded event in his annals is the fall of Samaria, 722 B.C., which Shalmaneser (V) had begun to invest in 724 B.C. (II K 17 1-6), tho the records in Kings alone (cf. 17 3-6 and 18 9 f.) are not entirely clear. In 720 Sargon settled, among others, captive Hamathites in the cities of Samaria, and in 717 captured Carchemish, the great Hittite capital (q.v.). In 715 he brought more colonists to Samaria, received so called tribute from the king of Egypt, and conquered Judah. About 711 Sargon sent his tartan (q.v.)—i.e., general (Is 20 1)—against Ashdod to break up the coalition that had been formed by the embassy of Merodach-baladan (Is ch. 39) from Chaldea. In 710 he threw his forces against Babylon, captured it, and proclaimed himself king thereof. His first residence was at Ashur, his second at Calah (Kalhu), his third at Nineveh, and his fourth and last, in his great palace at Khorsabad, 10 m. N. of Nineveh. He met his death mysteriously in a campaign in 705 B.C., against the Kullumites on the East border of Assyria. He made several advances in military equipment that increased the effectiveness of the Assyrian army. Sennacherib, his son, became his successor on the throne of Assyria. I. M. P.

SARSECHIM, sar-sī'kim (סַרְסַחִים, sarsēkhīm): One of the princes of Nebuchadrezzar who assembled in council at the fall of Jerusalem (Jer 39 3). Various attempts have been made to read this otherwise than as in the Hebrew, but such attempts rather assume that the lists of verses 3 and 13 should be one and the same. We prefer for the present to retain the Hebrew reading. I. M. P.

SASHES. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, I, § 6.

SATAN, sē'tan (שָׂטָן, with the art., hassāfān), 'the adversary'. 1. Name. In general, one who places himself in another's way and thus opposes him. In this sense, the Heb. word occurs in Nu 22 22, 32; I K 11 25 (EVV 'adversary'); also in Ps 109 6 (RV, 'Satan' AV), but with a rather more specialized application as an accuser at law. As the proper name of one superhuman being it first occurs in Zec 3 1, where the article ('the Satan') indicates its application to a definite person. Thus it becomes a proper noun, and is used with increasing frequency (I Ch 21 1; Job 1 6 f., etc.; in the N T Σατάν, Σατανάς, Mt 4 10; Jn 13 27; Ac 5 3; I Co 5 5; Rev 2 9, etc.). The form δαίμονος (devil) primarily designates Satan as calumniator (see the general use of the word in I Ti 3 6; II Ti 2 26; I P 5 8), κατήγορος, 'accuser' simply as an enemy (Rev 12 10). Other names are significant of some special phase of his character and activity, such as 'the tempter' (ὁ πειράζων, Mt 4 3; I Th 3 5), 'the pernicious one' (ὁ πονηρός, 'the wicked one,' Mt 13 19; Eph 6 16; also the evil one, Mt 6 13; but 'evil' AV). Names are also given him from the association of his personality with some extra-Biblical conception of the origin and administration of evil, such as Beelzebub, Beliar (q.v.) (II Co 6 15), the 'prince (ἄρχων) of the demons' (Mk 3 22 and ||s), of this world (Jn 12 31), of the powers of the air (Eph 2 2), 'the serpent' (II Co 11 3), and 'the old serpent' (Rev 12 9).

2. Distinguished from Demons and Heathen Parallels. The full Biblical idea of Satan includes the notion of a superhuman personality, possessed of surpassing wisdom and malice, who accuses men of evil, tempts them to its performance, and becomes the instrument of their punishment for sin. Satan is, therefore, distinguished from demons, not simply by being greater and more powerful than they, even to the extent of ruling over them as a body, but by a special character and functions. In the N T the name 'devil' is never given to demons. The doctrine of Satan has its parallels in the mythologies of the heathen nations, such as Loki in Scandinavia, Ahri-man in Persia, and Momus (the critic of gods and men) in Greece. But no figure in any mythology is exactly like the Biblical Satan. The others are either too playful and trivial or, as in the case of Ahri-man, too independent of God's control to compare with him.

3. Development of the Conception. Historically, the conception of Satan emerges slowly. An intimation of the existence of a demon, or evil genius of the world, was to be found in the preexilic narrative of the fall of man (Gn ch. 3), in which the serpent (suggestive of the Babylonian Tiamat, the destroyer of the works of the gods) appears as the tempter of man to disobey God's will. Evil spirits ('evil spirits from J') are not unknown in the earlier days. They do men harm by their misleading influence and suggestion (Jg 9 23; I S 16 14; I K 22 22). But all these are subordinate to God and do His bidding. In Zec 3 1 Satan stands in a semi-independent attitude toward God, but is in the end subject to Him, and must have His permission to accomplish his design. Toward God's people he is not sympathetic; he is not satisfied with the misfortunes that have befallen Jerusalem, and for this J' shows His anger against him. In Job he appears submissive to God's power and authority; but underlying this attitude he entertains a lurking desire to do harm to God's righteous servants. The apparent incongruity of a person with such a frame of mind consorting with the other 'sons of God' in the courts of heaven, giving an account of himself to, and speaking on familiar terms with, God, disappears when the narrative is seen to be constructed, not as a picture of realities, but as a vehicle of moral teaching, and it does present Satan in the

S. came to the throne probably some time near 1030 B.C. It was a time when central Israel was under the overlordship of the powerful Philistine confederacy. Garrisons of these foreigners were stationed here and there over the land. The work of Samuel the 'seer' of Ramah, had led to a strong desire to throw off the Philistine yoke, but no suitable leader appeared. At last, Samuel discerned in S. the man for the times and summoned him to the task (9 1-10 16). S. was at this time a man in the prime of life with several sons, the eldest of whom, Jonathan, was one of the choicest spirits known to Israel's tradition. The appeal of the people of Jabesh-gilead roused S. to action and revealed him as a leader with the requisite courage and ability, and he was made king (ch. 11). Soon after this, the struggle with the Philistines began in earnest. Jonathan attacked and slew the garrison in Geba near S.'s home (13 3). The Philistines retaliated by an invasion in force (13 5 f., 16 f.). But Jonathan threw the garrison of Michmash into panic (14 1-15), and, thus encouraged, the Israelites attacked the Philistines with vigor and succeeded in driving them out of the country with great slaughter (14 16 f.). From this account the section 13 7b-15a is to be excluded. Its scene is laid in Gilgal, far away from Geba and Michmash. It belongs to the later strand of narrative to which 10 8 is also to be assigned.

Throughout the rest of S.'s reign the highland of central Israel was practically free from Philistine invasion, altho there was constant war on the border, the 'Shephelah' region, between the two peoples. S.'s rashness and fickleness and other elements of weakness in his character are revealed in such incidents as we read of in 14 18 f. and especially in 14 24-30, 43 f.

It was in the latter half of his reign, probably after he had achieved considerable military success (14 47 f.), that his malady, a morose melancholia, developed to such an extent that means were sought to charm it away by music (16 14 f.). Thus David was brought into contact with S., and the latter made him one of his close companions and gave him high rank in his little band of officers. But David's popularity aroused S.'s jealousy, and at last S. planned to kill him. For the period between the more violent outbreak of S.'s malady and his death, five years is sufficient to meet the demands of the narrative. In those years S.'s administration of affairs became constantly more inefficient, and at last the Philistines saw their opportunity to strike a heavy and, as it proved, effective blow. At Gilboa S. lost his life in battle with these foes against whom he had previously been uniformly successful. The best testimony to his military ability is perhaps to be found in David's lament (II S 1 22 f.).

The reign of S. accomplished much for Israel. It awoke the nation to a consciousness of its efficiency under capable leadership. It brought about a closer union between the tribes. In particular, Judah, which had been rather isolated from the rest of Israel from the Conquest, once more began to take part in the affairs common to the nation as a whole. S. was also zealous, in his way, for the national religion (14 19, 31 f.; cf. II S 21 2). At his death Israel had no desire to return to their former loose confederacy. In these respects, S. paved the way for his abler successor David.

But S. was not an organizer. He was little more than a successful military chieftain. He had no palace, no system of government, no capital city (cf. 22 6). In such matters as these he was far inferior to David, the real founder of the monarchy.

form of (1) (Est 4 11, 5 2, 8 4). (3) mēhōqēq, 'law-giver' (Nu 21 18; [Ps 60 7, 'lawgiver' AV]); and (4) the Gr. ῥαβδος (He 1 8). The scepter was used as an emblem of royalty among ancient peoples, e.g., the Egyptians (Zec 10 11) and the Persians (Est 4 11, etc.). It is described by Rawlinson (Anc. Mon.<sup>2</sup> II, 340) as 'a plain rod about 5 ft. in length ornamented with a ball or apple at its upper end, and at its lower tapering nearly to a point.' It was probably an adaptation either of the shepherd's staff or the warrior's spear, and symbolized the authority vested in him who bore it. A similar use is to be seen in the mace or club of northern peoples. Among the Israelites, its use as royal insignia appears at least as early as preexilic days (Gn 49 10; Nu 24 17; Am 1 5, 8); but, more appropriately, it is in connection with the Persian court of Xerxes (Ahasuerus) that references to the scepter and its symbolism of authority occur. A. C. Z.

SECEVA, si'vā (Σευα). The Jewish father of seven exorcists, whom Paul encountered at Ephesus (Ac 19 14). There are variations in the MSS. D has a somewhat longer text. S. is described as an ἀρχιερεύς (in D simply ιερεύς) which may mean no more than that he was a member of a high priestly family (see Schürer, GJV<sup>4</sup>, II, 276). The writer of Ac is fond of describing incidents of this character and of bringing out the superiority of Christianity in such scenes and contests. For example: Simon Magus, Ac 8 18 f.; Elymas, Ac 13 8 f.; the Pythoness, Ac 16 16. See MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 9. J. M. T.

SCHOOL: The 'school' (σχολή) of Tyrannus (Ac 19 9) was probably the lecture-room of a rhetorician, or philosopher, of that name. Some ancient texts add, after Tyrannus, 'from the fifth to the tenth hour,' i.e., from 11 A.M. to 4 P.M., generally used as a rest period. See TYRANNUS and cf. SCOFF, SCOFFER. See SCORN.

SCORN, SCORNER: These terms represent the Heb. words: (1) la'ag, 'derision'—for barbarous habits of language (stammering) (II K 19 21; Is 37 22); (2) mishāq, 'pure laughter' (Hab 1 10; cf. II Ch 30 10); (3) lātsōn, 'perversion,' 'distortion,' more particularly of the despising of sacred things; hence a scorner (Ps 1 1, 'scornful AV, scoffers RV) is one who sins by his contemptuous attitude toward J' (Pr 1 22, 'scoffers' RV [29 8]; the term is a favorite one in Pr); (4) bāzāh, 'to despise' (Est 3 6); (5) qālas, 'to scoff,' 'to mock' (Ezk 16 31). The central element in the conception is that of contempt which, however, subordinately rouses mirth. The object of scorn is always looked at as on a lower level of intelligence or power. A. C. Z.

SCORPION. See PALESTINE, § 26; also CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

SCOURGE, SCOURGING: The Heb. words so rendered are: (1) shōt, 'scourge,' 'whip,' for chastising (cf. 'whip' I K 12 11, 14 = II Ch 10 11, 14); used in a figure of 'J' chastising the nations (Is 10 26, 28 15 [K'thūbh], 18) by pestilence (Job 9 23); a figure of the 'lashing' of the tongue (Job 5 21). (2) shōtēl, figuratively of the Canaanites as a source of trouble to Israel (Jos 23 13). (3) shayit (Is 28 15) should be shōt. (4) biqqōreth (Lv 19 20) should be as RVmg., 'there shall be inquisition' = judicial trial. (5) μάστιξ (LXX. for shōt), 'scourge,' and μαστιγοῦν, μαστιγεῖν, 'to scourge.' The Jews made use of a doubled strap of cowhide, with which the bared back and breast were beaten (cf. Mt 10 17, 23 34). The Roman scourge (flagellum, Gr. φραγέλλιον) was made of cords or leather thongs, attached to a handle. The cords were often knotted or had metal rings attached to them (cf. Ac 22 24 f.; Jn 19 1, etc.). The first vb. is used (He 12 6) metaphorically of God's training of men by afflictions. (6) φραγέλλιον, φραγελλοῦν, the Roman flagellum; see preceding. Jesus made one of small cords (Jn 2 15). C. S. T.

SCREECH-OWL. See PALESTINE, § 25; and NIGHT-MONSTER.

SCREEN. See TABERNACLE, § 3 (1).

SCRIBE, SCRIBES: In the O T the term rendered 'scribe' has a generic sense as the equivalent of 'secretary' (šōphēr, 'writer' [šāphar, Aram., Ezr 4 8 etc.], Est 3 12; Is 36 3; and perhaps 'annalist' in such passages as II S 8 17, etc.), but it is also used as a designation of a man particularly acquainted with the Law (Ezr 7 6; Neh 12 26; I Ch 2 55). In the N T the term γραμματεὺς (but almost always in the pl., γραμματεῖς) means a learned person whose special field of study was the Law (Mt 2 4). Scribes in the latter sense figure in the O T uniformly as members of the priesthood. Simon the righteous was the last high priest who, according to the tradition, combined in his person the characters of the learned man and of the head of a school. After his days, side by side with the priesthood, appeared a class of men without hereditary or other connection, but drawn from among all the people, who because of their devotion to and intimate acquaintance with the Law were at once given the title of scribes. Naturally, there was from the beginning a close relationship between these and the Pharisees. In the N T this intimacy appears in the frequent conjunction of the two names (Mk 2 16; Lk 5 30; Ac 23 9). But 'scribes of the Pharisees' may also be interpreted as a phrase implying that there were scribes drawn from the ranks of the Sadducees, a conclusion which is further borne out by the fact that the Sadducees as a sect were strenuous defenders of the written Law, and must have busied themselves in the study and exposition of it. Territorially, the scribes were limited to no particular section of Judaism. The synagog of the Dispersion afforded an opportunity for the use of their learning as well as those of Palestine. Their chief occupation was the explication and casuistic application of the Law by way of oral discussion. The name 'lawyer' (νομοδιδάσκαλος), tho presenting a shade of difference in meaning, was almost indiscriminately applied to the scribes (Lk 5 17; Ac 5 34, 'doctors of the law'; and I Ti 1 7, 'teacher of the law'), as was also the title of 'rabbi' (q.v.). The scribes' familiarity with the Law led to their being given places in the judicial courts of later Judaism. In the Sanhedrin, for instance, besides the 'chief priests,' scribes also had seats (Mk 14 43, 15 1; Lk 22 66, 23 10; Ac 4 5). For such services, however, they received no remuneration. Consequently, they were obliged to earn their living in other ways in case they were not possessed of private means (Taylor, Sayings of the Jewish Fathers, p. 68). The scribes are rightly held responsible for the interpretations of the Law known under the general name of 'tradition' (q.v.). (See also EDUCATION, § 8; and LAW AND LEGAL PRACTICE, § 2 (3). A. C. Z.

SCRIP. See WALLET.

SCRIPTURE, SCRIPTURES: The term 'Scripture' occurs but once in the O T (Dn 10 21, 'writing' RV), where it refers to the Divine predetermination of all events, apparently viewed as written out in a book (cf. Driver in Camb. Bible, ad loc.). In the N T these terms render γραφὴ or γραφαί ('writing,' 'writings'), except in II Ti 3 15, where the Gr. is ιερά γράμματα, 'sacred writings,' and always refer to the O T, viewed by both Jews and the early Church as holy and inspired. See BIBLE; and OLD TESTAMENT CANON. E. E. N.

SCURVY. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (1).

SCYTHIAN, sîth'i-an (Σκυθης): The Scythians were nomads who inhabited the regions N. of the Black Sea and the Caspian and thence made their way into inner Asia. They were a people noted for their fierceness, cruelty, and injustice. Josephus says of them (Cont. Ap. II, 37) 'that they take pleasure in killing men, and differ little from brute beasts.' So proverbial was their character that their name was quite the equivalent of what we mean by the word 'barbarian.' It is with this sense, and not probably with any definite historical reference, that the term is used in Col 3 11 (cf. Gal 3 28).

J. S. R.—J. M. T.

SEA (סֵּה, yām, Gr. θάλασσα): This term is used in all its common meanings. Hence, (1) a large body of water, or the whole mass of waters in the universe taken collectively (Gn 1 10, 22 17; Ps 8 8). The sea in this sense is the inexhaustible source of all things. Monsters of evil are symbolically represented as issuing from it (Dn ch. 7; Rev chs. 12, 13, 17). (2) special seas, of which the Mediterranean, called the Great Sea, the Sea of Joppa, the Sea of the Philistines (Nu 34 6; Ezr 3 7; Ex 23 31), the 'hinder' sea (Dt 11 24, 34 2), or the 'western' sea (Jl 2 20), is the most familiar. But other seas are known, such as the Red Sea (also 'the Egyptian sea,' Is 11 15), the Dead Sea ('the Salt Sea,' Nu 34 3; 'the east sea,' Ezk 47 18; 'the sea of the Arabah,' Dt 3 17; 'sea of the plain' AV), and the Sea of Galilee ('Gennesaret,' Nu 34 11; Jos 12 3; and in the Gospels, Mt 4 15; Mk 1 10; Jn 6 1). (3) Occasionally, rivers are called seas, e.g., the Nile (Is 18 2, 19 5; Nu 33 8). But whenever the term 'sea' is used without qualifying clause, adjective, or other determinative, in the context, it designates the Mediterranean (Nu 33 8; Jos 24 6; II Ch 20 2). In Apocalyptic symbolism the sea appears as in close relation to the powers of evil, perhaps a late development of the old Semitic (or Sumerian?) myth of the dragon of the deep, Tîamat, the enemy of light and of the (good) Gods. So in Dn 7 3 the four beasts come up from the sea (cf. Rev 13 1) and in the New World to come 'the sea shall be no more' (Rev 21 1). A. C. Z.

SEA, BRAZEN OR MOLTEN. See TEMPLE, § 13.

SEA OF GLASS. An expression used in Rv 4 6 and 15 2 to describe 'the brilliant splendor of the great throne-room' of Heaven (Beckwith, Com. on Rev., ad loc.). The origin of the figure is to be sought in the ancient notion of a vast sea in the heavens (cf. Gn 1 7; also Slav. En. 3 3; Eth. En. 54 8). Compare also the conception in Ex 24 10.

E. E. N.

SEAH, sî'a. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 3.

SEAL: An instrument generally employed in antiquity for purposes of identification (Neh 10 1 f.; Rev 7 5), validation (I K 21 8; Est 3 12; Jer 32 10-12; etc.), and safe-keeping (Dn 6 17; Mt 27 66; Rev 5 1). Manufactured articles were often stamped with the manufacturer's (or proprietor's) seal, e.g., the seals on jar handles found during the past ten years in great numbers in Palestine; see PEFQ. The seal usually consisted of clay or a metal of some sort, or was in the form of a signet-ring (δακτύλιος). Since both the Heb. words for seal (hōthām, ṭabba'ath; with ṭabba'ath cf. timbu'tu of the Tell el-Amarna letters) are foreign words, the practise of sealing among the Hebrews was derived probably from Egypt, where, as attested by papyri, seals were in use from very early times. See illustrations of seals under ALPHABET, also of manufacturers' or owners' seals stamped on pottery on preceding page. In the N T σφραγίς and the verb σφραγίζω are used frequently in a figurative sense to denote the Divine assurance, approval (II Ti 2 19; Jn 3 33), or promise (II Co 1 22; Eph 1 13, 4 30). Of these ideas Christian baptism later came to be the outward sign or seal (cf. II Clem. VII, 6), just as circumcision was so viewed in the old dispensation (Ro 4 11). See also SIGNET.

SEALSKIN: The word renders the Heb. taḥash (Ex 25 5, etc.; Ezk 16 10, badger AV), whose meaning is uncertain. Of the many suggestions proposed by scholars, the most probable seem to be (1) that it refers to the dugong, an animal something like the dolphin, common in the Red Sea and Indian Ocean, the skin of which is used for leather; or, (2) that the word is really the Egyptn. thś, 'leather.' This also appears to be a suitable explanation.

E. E. N.

SEA-MEW. See PALESTINE, § 25.

SEA-MONSTER: The rendering in some instances of the Heb. tannīn, an Aram. word, which is used in the O T of: (1) Large sea-animals, such as whales, etc. (Gn 1 21; cf. AV and RV); (2) serpents (no specific variety being intended—Ex 7 9 ff.; Dt 32 13; Neh 2 13; Ps 91 13, all AV); and (3) the mythological serpent, or dragon (Job 7 12; Ps 74 13, 148 7; Is 51 3; Jer 51 34; La 4 3). In the same sense the word is applied figuratively to Egypt (Is 27 1; Ezk 29 3, 32 2). On all the above-named references cf. RV with AV. See also DRAGON.

SEBA, si'ba. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 11 and 13; and SABAENS.

SEBAM, si'bām (סבם, s'bhām, Shebam AV): A city of Moab (Nu 32 3), the same as Sibmah (q.v.).

SEBAT, si'bat. See SHEBAT.

SECACAH, si-kē'ka or sek'ā-ka (סַכָּח, s'khākhāh): A city of Judah (Jos 15 61). Site unknown.

SECHU, si'kiū. See SECU.

SECOND COMING; SECOND DEATH. See ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 34-36, and 48 f.

SECOND SABBATH AFTER THE FIRST, THE: This expression is found only in Lk 6 1 AV (Gr. δευτεροσάββατον): RV omits, following the best ancient MSS. It is most probably the result of the textual corruption of a marginal gloss which passed into the body of the text (cf. Meyer, Com. i. l.). If genuine, there are no means of attaching any definite sense to the word.

A. C. Z.

SECRET, SECRETS: In most cases the occurrences of this word in the Bible demand no explanation. Even where it is used of God the meaning is generally sufficiently evident. In a few cases the original terms present some peculiarities. (1) In Job 15 11 the expression l'at means 'gently' or 'in gentleness' (cf. the same word in II S 18 5) as in RV. (2) The term šōdh at times means 'assembly' or 'council' as well as 'secret' (so Gn 49 6; Job 15 8, etc.). In Am 3 7 the use of this word is very significant as revealing the prophetic consciousness. (3) In Jg 13 is the Heb. plī means 'wonderful' (so RV).

E. E. N.

SECT. See HERESY.

SECU, SECHU, si'kiū (שכּוּ, sēkhū): A place where Saul stopped on his way from Gibeah to Ramah (II S 19 22). H. P. Smith, I C C, ad loc. following the LXX. (B) and others, reads 'to the cistern of the threshing-floor [for 'great'] which is on the height' (sh'phā for sēkhū).

C. S. T.

SECUNDUS, si-kun'dus (Σεκουνδος): One of the representatives of the contributing churches who accompanied Paul to Jerusalem when he took the collection to the church there (Ac 20 4; cf. II Co 8 23). With Aristarchus he seems to have represented the church in Thessalonica. The name is found in CIGr. II, No. 1927, a Thessalonian inscription. J. M. T.

SEED-TIME. See TIME, § 4; AGRICULTURE, § 5.

SEER. See PROPHET, § 1.

SEETHE, siḥ (סִיחַ, siḥ): This term is an accurate rendering of the Heb. bāshal, 'to boil' (see FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 10; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16). But in Job 41 20 and Jer 1 13 ('boiling' RV) the Heb. is nāphāh, 'to blow,' and refers primarily to the fire (as 'blown,' i.e., blazing) and then to the caldron as over a hot fire.

E. E. N.

SEGUB, si'gub (סִגְבּ, si'gūbh): 1. The father of Jair (I Ch 2 21 f.). See JAIR. 2. The son of Hiel (I K 16 34). The original meaning of the notice here may have been that S. was sacrificed in connection with the ceremony of setting up the gates of Jericho. See also HIEL.

E. E. N.

SEIR, si'ir (סִיר, si'ir), 'hairy': I. The traditional ancestor of the Horites (q.v.) in Edom (Gn 36 20 f.; I Ch 1 38), but probably nothing more than the name of their country (Mt. Seir). II. 1. Seir is often used for the whole of Edom (Gn 36 30; Nu 24 18; Is 21 11, etc.), but more definitely for that part known as Mt. Seir, i.e., the mountain region that extends from near the S. end of the Dead Sea almost to the Gulf of 'Akabah, E. of the depression known as the Arabah (q.v.). See EDMOM. 2. The name of a mountain on the N. border of Judah (Jos 15 10). Map II, E 1.

E. E. N.

SEIRAH, si-ai'ra (סִירָה, si'irāh, Seirath AV): A town, apparently in the hill-country of Ephraim, where Ehud rallied the Israelites to fight against Moab (Jg 3 26 ff.). Site unknown.

SELA, si'la, SELAH, si'la (סֵלָה, śela'), 'rock'; more specifically 'crag' or 'cliff'; cf. I S 14 4: I. In only three passages do the EVV regard this term as a proper name (Is<sup>16</sup> 1, 42 11; II K 14 7; in the last instance AV incorrectly adds a final 'h' to the name). Other passages, such as Ob ver. 3; Jer 49 16; II Ch 25 12; Jg 1 36, in which it is barely possible to treat šela' as a proper name, are all doubtful. Even Is 16 1 and 42 11 are indefinite and indecisive. S. is commonly, and as the writer thinks justly, identified with Petra, the famous rock-capital of the Nabatæans, or early Arabs, since the Heb. and Gr. names both signify 'rock', and the place is so marvelously fortified by nature as probably to have early attracted the attention of the ancient Edomites. It does not follow, however, that Petra was the capital of the Edomites as early as the time of Moses, for Bozrah more probably then held first place (Wetzstein has even suggested that Sela is another name for Bozrah; cf. Del. Jes. 696 ff.); still less probably is Petra to be identified, as Stanley supposed, with Kadesh-barnea. Petra is situated on Mt. Seir, N. of the watershed in the Arabah, and about midway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of 'Akabah. Strabo (xvi) describes it 'as a city situated in a valley, decorated with gardens and fountains, but bounded on all sides by rocks.' The valley in which it lies is known to the Arabs as Wādī Mūsa. A large irregular trapezoidal area, over half a mile square, bounded by high and richly colored sandstone rocks, in which are elaborately carved dwellings, temples, and tombs, marks the site of Petra. Its appearance is that of a vast necropolis. Numerous sanctuaries also, or 'high places,' have been found in the near vicinity; in short, no other place in all the region of Mt. Seir so perfectly satisfies what is stated in the history of the Edomites. That the aborigines of Edom were Horites (q.v.), or cave-dwellers (Dt 2 12), harmonizes exactly with the conditions as found in Petra; that David put garrisons throughout all Edom (II S 8 13, 14); that Amaziah took S. by war and called the name thereof Jokteel (II K 14 7); and that toward the end of the 4th cent. B.C. the Nabatæans made Petra their capital and richly embellished it, making it a place of refuge and the center of a rich caravan trade until about 200 A.D., when it succumbed before its rival Palmyra—all this agrees, so far as we know, with the conditions as they most probably existed in Petra. Since the rise of Islam, Petra has lain in ruins, a fulfilment of the predictions in the O T (Ezk 35 7; Is 34 5-17; Jer 49 7-22; Ob vs. 1-9). See Libbey and Hoskins, The Jordan Valley and Petra, 1905. II. For 'selah' as used in the Psalms, see PSALMS, § 5.

SELA-HAMMAHLEKOTH, sē'la-ham-mā'h-lekōth (סֵלָה הַמַּחֲלֵקֶת, šela' hammahleqōth), popularly from hālaq, 'divide,' 'rock of divisions,' as signifying the place where Saul and David or their forces parted from each other; Gesenius and others, 'rock of escapes'; Oxf. Heb. Lex., 'rock of smoothness,' from hālaq, 'to be smooth': A rocky mountain or cliff on which Saul pursued David in the wilderness of Maon (I S 23 28). Conder locates it in the Wādī Malāki, between Carmel and Maon in the S. of Judah. C. S. T.

SELED, sē'led (סֵלֶד, seledh): A descendant of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 30).

SELEUCIA, sē-liū'shī-ā or sē-liū'sī-ā (Σελεύχεια): The strongly fortified seaport of Antioch (cf. Ac 13 4), situated N. of the mouth of the Orontes. It was founded by Seleucus I on the outskirts of Mt. Pieria. Its harbor was good and in a naturally strong position. S. played a great rôle in the wars between Egypt and Syria (cf. I Mac 11 8 f.). The Syrian tetrapolis consisted of Antioch, Apamea, Laodicea, and Seleucia (cf. Bevan, The House of Seleucus, Vol. I, p. 208 f.). J. R. S. S.—J. M. T.

SELL. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

SELLER OF PURPLE. See LYDIA.

SEM (Σήμ): The Gr. form of the O T Shem (q.v.) (Lk 3 36 AV).

SEMACHIAH, sem''a-kai'ā (שִׁמְחִיָּה, šemakhya'ā), 'J' sustains': A descendant of Obed-edom (I Ch 26 7).

SEMEIN, sē-mī'in (Σεμεϊν, Semei AV): One of the ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 26).

SEMITIC RELIGION

I. GENERAL SURVEY OF SEMITIC RELIGIOUS IDEAS.

1. Semitic Religion. In the strict sense of the word there was no such thing as Semitic Religion. There were Semitic peoples, Semitic languages, and Semitic religions; but there was no Semitic language, no Semitic people, no Semitic religion. Any attempt to select institutions, beliefs, or customs that were common to all the Semitic religions and to organize these into a so called 'Semitic religion' would result in a kind of thing that never had any historical existence or reality. We might as well speak of the European language. There were certain things found in most of the Semitic religions; but they were present in different proportions in each, and associated or amalgamated with different elements in each; so that each was strikingly different from every other one. It is an open question, whether or not, if the Semitic religions were carefully compared one with another, the differences between them would be greater than the similarities. 'Semitic religion' is therefore an abstract term used for convenience and representative of the various religions characteristic of the various Semitic peoples. In that sense only is it used here.

2. Semites and Their Neighbors. The Semitic peoples occupied the territory represented by the great Arabian peninsula and pushing back between the eastern end of the Mediterranean and the table-lands of Persia to the Taurus Mountains in the North. In this territory there lived in Bible times a group of peoples speaking Semitic languages and more or less closely related by blood. These peoples were the Arabs, Babylonians, Assyrians, Arameans or Syrians, Phenicians, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Canaanites (or Amorites), and Hebrews (or Jews). They were in constant contact one with another and developed a common type of civilization. No people was able to live in isolation or desired to do so. Each influenced all the rest and was in turn influenced by them all. Not only so, but other peoples like the Hittites, Egyptians, the natives of Cyprus and the Aegean Islands, the Persians, and finally the Greeks also profoundly influenced Semitic life in general and Hebrew life in particular. The striking thing about the Hebrews was their readiness to borrow ideas and customs, as well as the more concrete products of civilization, from whatsoever people came into association with them. Hebrew civilization and religion were to a considerable degree the result of an eclectic process. The remarkable thing is that the Hebrew exercised such a fine discrimination in what he took and what he rejected. These Semitic peoples each developed a characteristic religion of its own. No attempt can be made here to sketch these religions even in outline. All that can be done is to point out some of the ideas and customs common to the Hebrews and one or more of the other Semitic groups and to note the references to the religions of these related Semitic groups in the Old Testament.

3. Official and Private Forms of Religion. The 'contemporary' religions spoken of in the Bible fall into two kinds, viz., the private and the official types of religion. That is to say, there were certain objects of devotion, sometimes mere crude superstitions, and sometimes of a less material character, which were not officially recognized by the heads of the community, whether civil or religious. The distinction was from one point of view virtually that between an individual, occasional, and voluntary religious service on the one hand, and a public, regular, and prescribed cult on the other. Of grosser instances in the former class we see little in the Bible, even in the O. T. But an example, brought before us almost casually, such as the vision of primitive beast-worship in Ezk 8 6, 12 (cf. Is 66 3, 17), is a sudden revelation of habits native to the soil of Canaan and doubtless perpetuated from earliest days alongside of the more formal rites of prescriptive or established religion, such as Baal-worship with its concomitants.

4. Family Cults. Another and a less debasing form of non-official worship was the domestic or family type, based mainly upon primitive ancestor-worship (cf. § 9 (d) and Teraphim, below). The principal occasions of collective worship, apart from the gatherings at the public, local, or national shrines, were the family or clan celebrations which, like all feasts, were of a religious character (cf. I S 20 29).

5. The Part Played by Religion. Of peculiar significance is the part played by religion among the Semites and among the Israelites in particular. (1) To the ancient Semites religion was an essential part of every-day thought, feeling, and experience. It was not separable from any of the duties, or occupations, or sentiments of life, or even from the contemplation of external objects. The fundamental reason of this distinction between them and us moderns was that to them divinity was inherent and active everywhere and in everything. The conception of secondary or intermediary causes was to them unknown. (2) Relations with the deity accordingly comprehended all obligations, and there was no distinction or practical division between religion and morality.

6. The God, the People, and the Land. Equally important were the conceptions of the relations between the god, his people, and his land: (1) The god of the clan (an enlarged family group), who was supposed to be associated with each member by ultimate kinship, became the god of the several social and political communities into which the clan gradually developed—the tribe, the city, the state, or the nation. (2) Only less close than this relation between the tribal or national god and his people was that between the god and his land. Each productive region had its own native lord or Baal (§ 9 (b)). From it he was inseparable and inalienable. Yet he might become defunct even in his native seat. If the land became a desert or was deserted, his function ceased ipso facto. If his people were replaced or overcome, and absorbed by a more powerful people, he himself also collapsed. (3) It was almost inconceivable that a god could change his seat. Memorable were the exceptions in the case of the God of Israel. When the Hebrews occupied Canaan and long afterward, they were divided in their allegiance and devotion between the local Baals and their own J'. Yet He did actually make Canaan His home instead of Mt. Sinai. Again, it was thought impossible that J' could be worshiped by any of His people in exile. To 'serve other gods' (I S 26 19) was equivalent to being banished from the land of Israel. Yet the exiles in Babylonia were taught that J' not only could be worshiped far away from Jerusalem, but that the whole universe was His dwelling-place. (4) The deity was specially and preferably active where the prescribed rites of his worship were most duly and assiduously performed. But J' was always powerful and beneficent wherever He was worshiped in spirit and truth.

7. Ultimate Origin of the Semitic Religions. What, in brief, were the origin and history of the Semitic religions? All Semitic religions seem to have been alike in their ultimate beliefs and motives. The immense differences between them are due to the differentiations of environment and historical vicissitude. The primary and germinal conception was that the whole world of earth, water, air, and sky was animated, every part or feature of it being the abode of life in one form or another. Evidences of life, its modes of manifestation, and by consequence its types and varieties, were presented everywhere. Its principal tokens were movement, appearance and disappearance, sound and growth. Every real cause being divine (cf. § 5, above), when the immediate occasion of any notable change in man or outward nature was not obvious, a divinity of some kind was assumed to be actively concerned. The heavenly bodies, day or night, the wind 'that bloweth where it listeth,' the smiling or raging sea, the ever-flowing river, the leaping mountain-brook, and the gushing fountain were all invested with the attributes of deity. All forms of fresh or sweet water, water having quickening or reviving power, were revered as divine. Trees, which grew and put forth leaves and yielded fruit from the sap within them and the moisture at their roots, were the abodes of a divinity. Rocks, from which echoes and other mysterious sounds were heard, from which living water sprang or within whose recesses it was stored, were equally animated by a deity.

8. Classification of the Divinities. How are we to classify the various deities? They were either beneficent and kindly, or malevolent and unfriendly, or else either the one or the other, according to their uncertain or variable relations with their worshipers. Most of the divinities whose cults were well established were of the last-named order. There were individual gods of the heavens, such as the deities of the sun, the moon, and the seven planets; gods of the air, such as Rammān (Rimmon) or Hadad, the god of storms and thunder, and manifold individual gods and demons of the earth and sea and the regions below. In the highly organized pantheon of Babylonia there was one supreme god of the heavens, Anu; one supreme god of the waters, Ea; one supreme god of the earth or mankind, Bel. There were also among the Semites unclassified gods of inhabited or productive lands, and gods (or demons) of the desert, gods of the highlands and gods of the lowlands (I K 28 23, 28). There were, moreover, gods proper, who were akin to men, and demons like the Arabian jinn, who were the kindred of animals, usually hostile to mankind. Demonized animals also, such as serpents and satyrs, were held in superstitious regard. There were deified men, such as the greatest of kings, and family ancestors in the realm of the shades. There were bands or communities of gods larger or smaller, such as the host of heaven of the Hebrews, or the Igigi, the heaven-gods of the Babylonians; the Babylonian Annunaki, the gods of the earth and underworld. There were distinctive gods of tribes or peoples or nations, such as Yahweh (Jehovah) of Israel (in the popular view), Chemosh of Moab, the Syrian Baal, the Assyrian Asshur; and gods of individual cities, such as Melkart, the Baal of Tyre, Bel of Nippur, Marduk of Babylon, and Nebo of Borsippa. Each of the highest gods, especially the celestial had a train of divine satellites or ministers. Thus as Yahweh had his angels or messengers (also called 'sons of God' or 'Divine') against whom may be set the devil and his angels (Mt 25 41), so in the Babylonian pantheon the Igigi and Annunaki (see above) were marshaled under Anu and Ea respectively. Finally, there were goddesses and she-demons as well as gods and demons, and certain of these were assigned as consorts or mates to male divinities.

9. Development of the Several Cults. How did the several deities and their various kinds and orders come to be instituted? The answer to this question may be stated as follows: (a) General Conditions. The fundamental principles and motives are clear enough. The mysterious life which existed everywhere was thought of as superhuman and as having power over men, and the gods were necessarily devised according to the needs of men as well as after their likeness. Now the basis and condition of human existence is society; that is, concretely, the social or political unit. Hence each community, from the family group to the nation, had its own well-defined habitat, and its own god or gods; while men living in hordes had known only the demons of the wilderness. Confining ourselves to normal Semitic settled life, we see how natural it was that each community, united in one on the primary basis of blood-relationship, should have had its own tribal or national deity, the god himself as being the father of his people.

(b) Growth of Baal-, Stone-, and Tree-Worship. More special conceptions promoted a various development. The territory of each settlement was as well defined and self-contained as the community itself which was nourished and maintained from the hidden life of the soil. Of that life the god of the land was the guardian and communicator. He was its Baal ('owner and lord'), and of its varied bounty he gave freely to his people (Hos 2 5). The relation was perpetuated under conditions akin to those of political vassalage: for homage and tribute there were worship and sacrifice. In Canaan, where social amalgamation and political federation were difficult and rare, the local Baals retained their separate independence. In Babylonia, where consolidation began very early among the Semitic communities, most of the Baals or Bels were absorbed in the Bel of the central city Nippur. In Babylonia, moreover, and in the daughter-state Assyria, the many social, political, and cultural changes and the frequent annexation of outside states led to the installation of a crowded pantheon. Perhaps older still than the Baal cults in Palestine were stone- and tree-worship. So it came to pass that in the regular shrines on the high places at length there stood beside the altar of the Baal conventional memorials of these immemorial cults (see below, under ASHERAH, PILLAR, and TEREBINTH).

(c) Astral-Worship. The heavenly bodies were naturally much looked up to among a people whose ancestors had so great need of the moon and stars in their wilderness homes. In Palestine and Syria, however, their cult was not very greatly developed after the permanent settlements had been established. But at an even earlier date, the cultivation in Babylonia of astrology and of its daughter-science astronomy developed astral-worship to a degree elsewhere unknown in ancient or modern times. There, as it would seem, it was the chief promoter of a theory of the universe which reigned over the whole civilized world till the Copernican era. The sun was far less an object of adoration among the Semites, taken as a whole, than the moon, the god par excellence of nomads.

(d) Ancestor Worship. To the worship of ancestors, in the broad sense of the phrase, must be assigned a great influence in the development of Semitic religion in its early stages, tho much of its sentiment was transferred to kindred and more imposing objects of reverence. These, for example, were the tribal and national gods who were figured as the fathers of their people, the eponyms of the several races that were held to be more or less superhuman, such as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; renowned early patriarchs, such as Enoch and Noah; and the founders of memorable empires or dynasties, such as Sargon of Akkad or David of Jerusalem. Indications of primitive ancestor-worship are to be found in the sacredness of places hallowed by their residence, such as Bethel, Hebron, and Shechem; in funeral rites, which are largely tributes to departed spirits and are sometimes accompanied with actual offerings, and in the survival of casual expressions such as the term 'god' applied to the ghost of the dead Samuel (I S 28 13).

10. The conflict Between J'' and the Baalim. The land of Canaan where the Hebrews developed their characteristic social, political and religious institutions was already occupied upon their arrival by an old people and an ancient civilization. The Hebrews were a relatively untutored people at that time. They had been living the life of nomads and were therefore practically unacquainted with the arts and crafts characteristic of civilized life. These things they had to learn. The only available teachers were the representatives of that old civilization who continued to live along side of and among the Hebrews. But religion was a part of that civilization and inseparably involved in it. Consequently, as the Hebrews became 'civilized' they ran the constant danger of losing their own native religion and becoming absorbed in the religion of the subject people. It was because of their keen realization of the imminence of this danger that the prophets waged constant warfare upon the practises of the religion of Canaan. They appear almost as opponents of the progress of civilization, because of their great fear of its accompanying danger, viz., Israel's defection to the Baalism of Canaan. The struggle between Jehovah and the Baalim continued for centuries, beginning with the first entry of the Israelites into Canaan and lasting till J'' triumphed in the Deuteronomic reform, carried through by King Josiah in 621 B.C.

Baalism was primarily a farmers' religion. The Baalim were the gods of the land. They were thought of as the husbands of the soil. The growth and ripening of the crops and fruits were under their control. Without them the farmer could do nothing. The grower of small grain, the cultivator of the vine and every kind of fruit tree, the shepherd of sheep and herder of cattle, all alike looked to the Baal for the fertilization of the crops, the fruits, and the sheep and oxen. When the Hebrew learned agriculture from his Canaanite predecessor, he learned as a part of it the rites and offerings characteristic of Baalism. How long it required for the Hebrews to learn to think of J'' as the giver of all these good gifts may be seen not only from the conflict between Elijah and the priests of Baal, but also from the preaching of Hosea, the prophet of the 8th cent. B.C., who urged his people to give J'' credit for the gifts of the soil, and not to give such praise to the Baalim (Hos ch. 2).

The prevalence of Baal-worship among the Hebrews is abundantly attested by the large number of names compounded with Baal in the Old Testament, e.g., Ish-baal, Meribbaal, Jerub-baal, Baal-berith, Baal-zebub, Baal-Hermon, Baal-Peor, Baalah, Baalyada (Beeliada, I Ch 14 7), Baal-zaphon, Baalyah (Bealiah, I Ch. 12 5). Not only so, but an examination of the names found on the ostraca found at Samaria, and belonging to the times of Omri, Ahab, and Jeroboam II, shows a large proportion of them to be compounded with the name Baal. It is more and more clear that the prophets saved the Hebrews from being permanently captivated by the worship of the Baalim.

The name Baal primarily meant 'owner' or 'master of.' Then it came to be the common term for husband, since the Hebrew husband was literally the owner and master of his wife. The Baal was thought of in religion as the god of a locality. There were as many Baals as there were local sanctuaries dedicated to their worship. Even as late as the time of the exile, we hear Jeremiah saying, 'Thou hast as many gods as cities, O Israel.' The appeal of Baalism to the simple-minded Hebrews was very powerful. They were represented to them as the authors and givers of life, both animal and vegetable at least, if not also human. J'' had not been thought of by them as a God of agriculture and it was therefore easy to take on the new gods for the new sphere of operations. The appeal of Baalism was sensuous and materialistic and so correspondingly powerful. The Baalim were associated with the everyday business of life. They were indispensable to it. J'' was in danger of being left unthought of except on special occasions, such as battles and storms. The close association of Ashtoreth (q.v.) with the Baalim made the temptation to Israel more seductive. The local Baalim coalesced or combined as localities combined. Hence some Baals were relatively greater than others. For example, the Baal of Tyre attained the dignity of a proper or personal name, viz., Melkart of Tyre. In North Syria, the title Baal was applied to the god of the heavens, viz., Baalshamem. But Baalism never achieved a unified monotheism. The local Baals were all very much alike; yet they for the most part persistently maintained their individuality.

The Phoenician inscription reads as follows, transliterated into square Hebrew characters: לאדון לבעל חמן אש נדר חנא בן אדנבעל בן נרעשחרת בן אדנבעל כ שמע קלא. ברכא.

II. SPECIFIC SEMITIC DEITIES AND CULTUS PRACTISES.

11. Asherah. The Heb. 'āshērāh (pl. 'āshērīm) is translated grove in AV after the LXX. and Vulg. In RV it is given untranslated, under the assumption that it was a proper name. It is now known to have been the name of a Canaanite goddess. A goddess by this name was worshiped in Canaan and the West-land generally before the rise of Hebrew literature. This deity was a female companion of the Baalim with whom she is always associated (Jg 3 7; I K 15 13, 18 19; II K 21 7, 25 4, 17; II Ch 15 16, 19 3, 24 18, 33 3). The word 'āshērāh is also used to denote a sacred pole or post which, along with a stone pillar (see PILLAR, below), stood beside the altar of the Baals on the high places or local shrines (see § 9 (b), above, and IDOLATRY, below). That it was of wood and of considerable size we learn from Jg 6 25, 26. The natural explanation of its use is that it was a surviving emblem of the old tree-worship. It is of course, not impossible that a tree-stem might be used both as a symbol of life (cf. § 7, above) and a representation of a life-giving goddess, and this is all the more plausible because, in fact, the old goddess Asherah was, like Ashtoreth, a type of abounding fertility. Possibly, the two names were remotely of the same origin. In later Jewish times there was frequent confusion of Asherah with Ashtoreth, and this may have been due to a traditional combination of the two divinities and even to their ultimate early Semitic identity.

12. Ashima. Ashima has long been known as a deity of the people of Hamath, on the Orontes, who had been deported to the province of Samaria by King Sargon of Assyria (II K 17 30). In recent years the discovery of the Assu. papyri has revealed a name of a goddess worshiped by the Jews in Egypt which seems to be the same Ashima. This also makes it probable that the worship of Ashima is referred to in Am 8 14, ('sin' RV.).

13. Ashtaroth. The word 'Ashtaroth' is the plural form of the following Ashtoreth. It was used (as in Babylonian) by synecdoche for goddesses in general (Jg 2 13, 10 6; I S 7 3, 4, 12 10). By a sort of metonymy it was also used in the sense of 'offspring' in the phrase, 'the increase of the flock' (Dt 7 13, 28 4, 18, 51). It occurs also as a place-name.

14. Ashtoreth. Ashtarte. (1) The Name and Its Equivalents. This is the name of the principal Semitic goddess as it is given in the Hebrew text. The correct form is really 'ashtāreth or 'ashtart, as it appears in Phœnician, the vowels in 'ashtāreth having been made by late editors to conform to those of bōsheth ('shameful thing'), their epithet for Baal (see Baal, § 10, above). The Greek equivalent is, accordingly, Astarte. The Babylonian Ishtar, tho feminine, is without the feminine ending; it is the stem Ashiar, modified according to a phonetic rule. The S. Arabian equivalent, Athtar, was a god; but the N. Arabian and Aramaic Atar was probably a goddess.

(2) Seats of the Cult in the West-land. The cult of Ashtoreth, or Ishtar, was most widely spread among the Canaanites and the Babylonians, that is, among the most highly civilized of the more ancient Semites. She was, above all, the goddess of fertility; hence among the nomadic Arabs and the seminomadic Arameans, who had little productive land, her worship was not so zealously promoted. She was noted as the goddess of the Phenicians 'Sidonians,' I K 11 5, 33; II K 23 13), and many inscriptions indicate her influence both in the Mediterranean coast-land and among the Syrian colonies. The Philistines had adopted her worship and maintained her temple at Ascalon. E. of the Jordan the place-names Ashtaroth and Beeshterah (q.v.) were memorials of her worship, and Ashtar-Chemosh was the dual national god of Moab in the time of King Mesha (9th cent. B.C.).

(3) Babylonian Origin of the Cult. But neither the name nor the worship of Ashtoreth-Ishtar originated in the West-land. As we shall see, the worship of the goddess assumed various forms, some of them having only her name in common; and it was in Babylonia that the beginning of the cult must have been made. Only the more popular forms were current in the West. It is vain to look to any definite locality as the place of origin. The name Ishtar (Ashtar) is Semitic, tho the primary meaning is uncertain. A non-Semitic goddess (Nanā), with attributes similar to those of Ashtar, was worshiped at Erech (q.v.) in S. Babylonia, and there her cult was absorbed by that of Ishtar after the Semites came into possession.

(4) Primary Motive of the Cult. Like the worship of all the favorite divinities, that of Ashtoreth-Ishtar was partly terrestrial and partly celestial in its essential grounds and motives. From the terrestrial side it made a strong appeal to the sympathy, universal in the ancient world, with the mysterious processes of life and reproduction in all forms and types of animal and vegetable life, which could be accounted for only by the assumption of a world-wide formative and impulsive power, that is, an omnipotent divinity. It was equally natural that instead of one productive deity a male and a female should be thought of or devised. In the West-land the baal of each cultivated region (see Baal, § 10, above) was the native god of fertility everywhere, and through the very early predominant influence of Babylonia in the West, Ashtoreth was adopted as his feminine consort; for in Babylonia the same potent motive had already raised Ishtar to the dignity of the mother or procreatress of mankind and indeed of all living things, just as Venus, her European counterpart ((6), below), is figured in the opening of the great poem of Lucretius.

(5) Grossness and Seductiveness of the Worship. Upon this principle rests the whole fabric of the worship of Ashtoreth along with the practical deification of the sexual passion among the ancient Semites. And it is from this point of view that the Biblical attitude toward the cult has to be regarded. Wherever it prevailed, sexual indulgence was encouraged under the patronage of the great goddess and especially at her shrines, associated as they were with those of the Baals. Since such sentiments and practises were fatal to a pure religion and morality, the prophets and reformers denounced them and encouraged their extirpation (II K 23 13; cf. I K 11 5, 33). An indication of their persistence is given in Ezk 8 14 (see TAMMUZ, below).

(6) Celestial Side of Ishtar-worship. In Babylonia the celestial side of Ishtar-worship was greatly promoted by the cultivation of astronomy and astrology. Ishtar was the beautiful planet Venus, who, as leader of the starry hosts, was actually deified as a goddess of battle by the warlike Assyrians. But it was as the queen or empress of heaven that she was especially adored; and this aspect of her character gave to the purer forms of her worship in Babylonia a dignity and depth as well as a moral and sentimental value elsewhere unknown in Asia, and paralleled only among the nobler types of Greek and Roman writers. The name of the Hellenic Aphrodite and the essentials of her cult, as well as that of the Roman Venus, were an importation from Babylonia by way of the Phenicians and Arameans.

(7) The Queen of Heaven. The Queen of Heaven (Jer 7 18, etc.) was not the moon-god, but the Babylonian Ishtar, or Venus. The moon-god Sin (see Sun, Moon, and Stars, below) was a male deity, and his worship among the Semites was older than even that of Ishtar, who is therefore figured as the daughter of Sin. The worship of this goddess was popular among the Hebrew women in Jeremiah's day and seems to have dated back to an earlier era in Israel (cf. Jer 44 17 f.).

15. Bel. Bel was one of the great Babylonian gods. In Jer 50 2 he appears in association with Marduk (see § 24), and in Is 46 1 along with Nabu (see § 27), two other Babylonian gods. He was the center of the old Babylonian triad, Anu, Bel, and Ea, and continued as an outstanding figure in the Assyrian and Babylonian pantheon down to the end.

16. Calves, Golden. Calves and Calf-worship. Calf-images figured prominently in Israel, and are best known to us because of their use as images or symbols of J" by Jeroboam I at Bethel and Dan (I K 12 28 f.). They were denounced later by the prophets (Am 8 14; Hos 8 4 f.) as well as by historical writers (II K 10 28; II Ch 11 14 f.). This was one of the higher forms of religion known among the Semites, in which a divinity is objectivized by an expressive symbol or a combination of symbols in an image made in the likeness of an animal (see Idol, § 24, below). It was not Israelitic in its general conception, nor was the specific form characteristic of the Hebrews. It was not properly representative of a calf, but of a full-grown bull, and was intended to represent strength (cf. Nu 23 22, 24 8) and endurance as well as service to mankind, and was at the same time a type of the reproductive principle which the Semites regarded as one of the supreme gifts of their chief divinities (cf. Ashtoreth, § 14, above). It was really appropriate to an agricultural people, and was borrowed by the Hebrews from their Canaanitic neighbors in Palestine. It was a common type of worship, not only among the Canaanites, but also in Syria and Phoenicia, if not throughout the Semitic area. While the animal image was merely a symbol of the god, it tended always to become itself the object of adoration to its votaries, and was prohibited, at least implicitly, even in the earliest legislative code (Ex 20 23, 34 17). Its worship was the specific offense of Northern Israel, after the schism. In Judah, which was not so much exposed to purely Canaanitic influence, it seems not to have taken root. The images were normally molten, but since the precious metals were preferred, they were necessarily smaller than life-size, hence the calf instead of the bull. For local or private use they were of carved wood overlaid with gold. Possibly the calf of Samaria was of this order (Hos 8 6).

The golden calf of Aaron (Ex ch. 32) seems to have had no historical antecedents or consequents, and the narrative was probably intended as a sort of parabolic object-lesson for later conditions. There is no foundation for the once popular view that this form of worship had been learned by the Israelites in Egypt. In that country the god was a living animal. The form of the ox in the cherubic figure (Ezk 1 5 ff., etc.) has in the main a different motive from that of the golden calf, and is more akin to the Assyrian man-bull colossi (see also CHERUBIM).

17. Chemosh. Chemosh was the name of the chief god or Baal of Moab (Nu 21 29; I K 11 7, 33; II K 3 27, 23 13; Jer 48 7, 13, 46). In Jg 11 24 he is erroneously called the god of Ammon (see Milcom, § 26, below). As a consequence of political friendship, he was apparently more than once installed in Jerusalem (I K 11 33; II K 23 13). On the Moabite Stone he appears, associated with a female consort, as Ashtar-Chemosh.

18. Chiun. Chiun was a deity which we find mentioned in Am 5 28 AV ('the shrine of' RV). The name should probably be read Kaiwān, which was the name of the planet Saturn. The Babylonian has the original form Kaimān, of which Kaiwān is a later pronunciation, also current in Arabic. The LXX. here, and also Ac 7 43, have Raiphān (Rephan RV, Remphan AV), which stands for Kaiphān (from Kaiwān).

19. Cuttings in the Flesh. In Dt 14 1 it is said: 'Ye shall not cut yourselves . . . for the dead.' In Lv 19 27, 28, 21 5 (Holiness Code) the same prohibition is made with the same sanction: 'For thou art a holy people to Jehovah thy God,' and the same association with the dead, Lv 19 28, includes also tattooing, but does not connect it with the dead. With these passages must be considered I K 18 28, where it is said that the priests of the Tyrian Baal cut themselves while propitiating their god 'after their custom.' From these texts it is apparent that incisions or punctures of the flesh were made in honor either of heathen deities or of one's dead. Abundant parallels to both of these usages are found in ancient and modern times. It is reasonable to suppose that the mutilations and marks in question were made from similar motives in each class of cases. A careful collation and comparison of relevant cases make it probable that the leading motives were (1) sacrificial communion with the god or with a departed ancestor, (2) propitiation and honoring of one or the other. These two motives were, of course, originally distinct so far as the ceremony was concerned, but after it became a regularly recurring ritual, obligatory on a special occasion, the impulse to its performance was naturally more obscure and complex. Cutting oneself in ceremonies of mourning (Jer 16 9) was probably an expression of grief as well as of the enduring bond of blood-brotherhood; but it must have been encouraged by the custom of making offerings to deceased ancestors. All such practises were put under the ban in Israel by the later legislation as being inconsistent with entire devotion and consecration to J'. In the ceremony of tattooing, the name of a deity was perhaps marked on the hand or arm (cf. Is 44 5). See also BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 7, and MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 3 f.

20. Dagon. Dagon was a god worshiped at Gaza and Ashdod (Jg 16 21 ff.; I S 5 1 f.) and probably in all SW. Palestine. His name having resemblance to the words for fish (dāg) and grain (dāgān), he has been regarded by many as essentially a fish-god and by others as the god of agriculture. As his worship was not continued after the age of the Maccabees (I Mac 10 82 ff., 11 4), and no record of the ritual is extant, the question can not be definitely answered. There was a Babylonian and Assyrian deity Dagān, of which not much is known, except that he was very ancient and of a high rank among the gods. Probably, he was identical with our Dagon, and possibly, he was of Amorite (Canaanite) origin and adopted by the Babylonians. Dagān, or Dagon, occurs as one of the elements in very ancient names of persons and places in Babylonia and Palestine; and as these existed in Palestine before the Philistine invasion, Dagon was clearly an old Canaanitic divinity. The hints given in I S 5 4 in connection with the overthrow of Dagon do not favor the notion that his image resembled a fish.

21. Destiny and Fortune. Destiny was a deity to which mixed wine was offered (Is 65 11; Heb. m'nī, 'destiny' RV, 'number' AV), along with Gad, the god of Fortune. (See Gad, below.)

22. Gad. Gad was the name of the god of fortune from which the tribal name was probably derived (Gn 30 11). In Is 65 11 propitiatory offerings are spoken of as presented to him and to Destiny, instead of to J'', on Mt. Zion. Of the special shrines or rites we know nothing; but the name is found as that of a deity in Phœnician, Aramaic, Arabic, and Assyrian.

23. Images and Image-Worship. Images and Image-worship. There were two chief kinds of worship. The best known, image-worship, is the second main phase, which is sometimes called 'iconic' as opposed to the (normally earlier and ruder) 'aniconic.' Everywhere there was a series of slowly evolving types of worship, in which there was no man-made likeness of the sacred object. This phase had several stages, the principal being the following: 1. The cult of the deities or demons in their resorts or permanent abodes, which thus became sacred. Such, for example, were sacred mountains, streams, and groves. 2. A similar consecration of a single definite object, such as a rock, a fountain, or a tree. 3. An artificial grouping of typical objects in which the deity might reside, as in the various forms of rude stone sanctuaries. 4. The shaping of a single typical object into a conventional adjunct of worship. Such were the 'pillar' (see below) and the 'Asherah' (see above).

This last-named stage or type may often have served as a transition link in the evolution of the second main phase, that of image-worship, which, however, in some of its forms doubtless also developed separately. The Hebrew name for 'image' (tsalem) is not confined to figures of gods, but its application is always clear from the context. The word usually rendered 'idol' in EV (ātsābh) probably means something 'shaped' by art. Special kinds and forms of images were the 'graven image' (peṣel), of wood or stone, and the 'molten image' (maṣṣekāh). There were many other names, some of them contemptuous in their application, tho often expressed in EV by the general term 'idols.' Of this class are 'no-gods' (ēlîl), 'abomination' (shiqqûts), 'dung-god' (gillûl). All such opprobrious epithets were applied to actual images, since material likenesses of forbidden objects were most obnoxious to the party of reform.

Such images were naturally made either in a human or in an animal likeness. Perhaps, most of those current in Israel (see, e.g., Is 2 20, 30 22) before the proscription by Josiah (II K ch. 23), and more or less till the Exile, were in human form. These, however, were intended to be not exact, but typical representations like the sculptured deities of Greece and Rome. The human shape, as distinguished from the animal, was natural, and perhaps mostly inevitable, where the motive was to give expression to the conception of the character of invisible deities by visible and tangible features. Whether or not J'' was ever represented in human form is another question. He was certainly thought of in highly anthropomorphic terms (see Gen, § 2), and His worshipers constantly spoke of going to worship as 'going to see the face of J''.' But His supposed salient qualities were commonly set forth symbolically in animal form in imitation of heathen cults (cf. Calves, Golden, § 16, above). The prevailing anthropomorphic tendency was possibly helped by ancestor-worship (see Teraphim, § 36, below). On the other hand, the visible, gleaming heavenly bodies were not worshiped by images and were rarely represented by symbols (see Sun, Moon, and Stars, § 32, below).

24. Merodach (Bab. Marduk). Marduk was the patron deity of the city of Babylon, named along with Bel in Jer 50 2, and probably identical with the 'Bel' of Is 46 1 (see Bel, § 15, above). He was in many points the analog of Jupiter, both as god and planet, and played a great rôle in the Babylonian mythology and art as the successful champion of the gods, the powers of light, against the demons, the powers of darkness, and thus practically as the supposed savior of the world. His name is incorporated in that of the Babylonian King Merodach-baladan, which means 'Merodach has given a son.'

25. Milcom. Milcom was the name of the god or Baal of the Ammonites (I K 11 5, 33; II K 23 13). In I K 11 7 read 'Milcom' for 'Molech,' and in Jg 11 24 'Milcom' for 'Chemosh.' In Jer 49 1, 3, 'Malcām' should be similarly corrected. The name is the word for king (malk, milk; cf. MOLECH, below) with an obscure formative ending.

26. Molech, Moloch, Melech. (1) The God and His Worship. Molech ('Moloch' only in Ac 7 43) is the current Hebrew form of the name of a god of one of the forbidden Israelitic cults. The word should be written Melech (melekh, 'king'), of which Milcom (see § 25, above) gives the stem. The form was changed so as to suggest, by the pronunciation, the word bōsheth, the opprobrious nickname of a Baal (see § 10, above). It is always used with the article = 'the king' (in I K 11 7 read 'Milcom') and is so actually read in Is 30 33, 57 9. This Melech was the deity to whom children, preferably the first-born, were sometimes offered by fire in the later days of Israel. His name is usually not mentioned in connection with the words 'offer by fire' (or simply 'offer'), but it is always to be understood. The frequently used phrase pass through the fire should be read: 'offer or dedicate by fire,' literally, 'make to pass over' or 'transfer,' that is, from the possession of the offerer to the god. This is shown by Ex 13 12 where the deity referred to is J'' Himself, and there is no mention of fire. The translation 'make to pass,' followed by 'through' instead of 'by,' is a wrong application of the literal meaning of the Heb., and the correct sense of 'offer' was not derived from the cult of Melech. The practise is attributed to King Ahaz (II K 16 3), to Manasseh (21 6), and to the Northern Israelites (17 17), but with doubtful correctness (cf. Sun, Moon, and Stars, § 32, below), and to kings or people of Judah generally (Jer 19 5, 32 35; cf. Ezk 16 21, 20 31, 23 37). It was prohibited (Dt 18 10; Lv 18 21, 20 2 ff.) and checked for a time by Josiah (II K 23 10) by the dismantling of Topheth, where the rites had been performed (cf. Is 30 33). The exact character of these rites is not known. It is certain, however, that the offering by fire was literal and personal, not symbolical and representative, tho it is probable that the victims were previously slain (cf. Ps 106 37 f.).

(2) Origin and Nature of the Cult. The chief questions of importance concern the original source of the cult of Melech and its relation to the worship of Jehovah. Satisfactory answers are not easily obtained. 'King' or 'the king' seems to be a common epithet of various Semitic divinities, and Milcom (see § 25, above) is the actual name of the chief god of the Ammonites. Hence 'the Melech' has been thought by many to be the designation of a specific deity, either of Babylonian (Assyrian) or Canaanitic origin. This supposition probably follows the right track. It is significant that human sacrifices were prominent in Phœnician (notably Carthaginian) religion, and were offered in the city of Tyre to its Baal or chief god Melkart ('king of the city'), whose name specializes 'the Melech,' and in Moab as well (II K 3 27). Possibly there was a recrudescence of old Canaanite tendencies in Israel (cf. Dt 12 31) in the desperate times of national disaster, stimulated by the example of neighboring peoples. But human sacrifice seems to date in Israel from the earliest times (cf. the story of Abraham and Isaac which is a protest against it, and the laws regarding the offering of the first-born in the oldest codes), and it persisted down to the verge of the Exile. The cult was heathenish in the eyes of the prophetic party. But the people at large seem to have regarded the Melech as a manifestation of J', somewhat as the golden calves were regarded in Northern Israel. The disclaimer of Jer 7 31, and the pathetic suggestion of Mic 6 7, seem to justify such an inference (cf. Ezk 20 25 f.).

27. Nebo.

Nebo (Bab. Nabû, the 'declarer' or 'prophet'—Heb. nābhî') is named with Bēl in Is 46 1. He was the patron deity of Borsippa, the sister-city of Babylon, and was the god of writing, literature, and science, and, consequently, the most profoundly revered of the Babylonian deities. Mt. 'Nebo' is a witness to the long predominance of Babylonian culture and religion in the West-land up to the 17th cent. B.C.

28. Nergal, Nibhaz, Nisroch. Nergal was the patron deity of the Babylonian city of Cutha, whose exiles worshiped him in Samaria (II K 17 30). He was the analog, in great part, of the god and planet Mars, and presided over war, hunting, pestilence, and the underworld. Nibhaz was a god of the Avvites (q.v.) in Samaria. The name has not been found elsewhere. Nisroch was the god in whose temple in Nineveh Sennacherib was murdered (II K 19 37; Is 37 38). The name has not been identified. The most plausible explanation is that it has been miswritten for Marduk (see § 24, above, and cf. KAT<sup>3</sup>, p. 85).

29. Pillars. (1) Religious Usage in Hebrew. The word 'pillar' is used in EV to describe several objects of a more or less pillarlike form, such as the pillar of a temple (Jg 16 25 ff.), a grave-stone (II S 18 18; Gn 35 20), a pillar of cloud and of fire (Ex 13 21 f.), of smoke (Jg 20 40), of salt (Gn 19 26), a boundary-stone (Gn 31 45). As indicating an object of worship or reverence, it translates the Heb. matsēbhāh, which RVmg. usually renders 'obelisk.' The same Hebrew word is also used for two of the senses of 'pillar' cited above, namely, gravestone and boundary-stone. These, however, had religious associations, the one having relation to a departed spirit, the other being erected under the sanction of the deity (cf. Dt 27 17). 'Pillar' in this article is, accordingly, the equivalent of this Hebrew term or its synonyms.

(2) Pillars and Beth-els. The pillar is the chief example of Canaanitic stone-worship, whose origin and tendencies have been already indicated in a general way (§§ 7, 9, and 23, above). It means in the original 'a thing set upright,' and was in the first instance nothing more than an oblong, unshaped stone firmly fixed in a vertical position. Before it was erected it had been probably in most cases a bēth'el ('abode of divinity'), and already an object of worship or oracular consultation. Such a development of the cult and its motive is indicated in the narrative of Gn 28 11-22. These 'beth-els' were frequent in Phœnicia and elsewhere under the same name, and may sometimes have been aerolites. The fact that the stones in the Ark of the Covenant, inscribed with the 'Ten Words,' were a part of the holy oracle in the Temple points to an adaptation of the primitive conception to the worship of J', parallel to the later spiritualization of the traditional story of Beth-el.

(3) Pillars as an Institution. Such pillars were made parts of permanent shrines, partly as a symbolical form of the old stone-worship, and partly as affording a natural lodging-place for the local numen or Baal. Then the stone was shaped into conventional forms, usually into that of an obelisk, if we may judge from Phœnician examples. In the consecration of such a pillar oil was poured upon the top (Gn 28 18, 31 13), perhaps as the equivalent of sacrificial fat. We thus find them introduced into the religious service of Israel, where they were maintained throughout the preprophetic period (see Ex 24 4; Jos 24 26 f.; Jg 9 6; I S 7 12; Hos 3 4). Essentially the same, tho more elaborate, were the two brazen pillars (of Pheniciandesign) in the Temple of Solomon (I K 7 15 ff.). As assimilating the worship of Israel to other religions, and as out of harmony with the spiritual character of Jehovah, the pillars and other adjuncts of the popular cults were proscribed under prophetic influence.

(4) 'Sun-Images.' The word hammānīm (only in the pl.), 'images' AV, 'sun-images' AVmg. and RV (Lv 26 30; Is 17 8, 27 9; II Ch 14 5, 34 4, 7), were probably a variety of the 'pillar' above described; but their exact character and form are uncertain. They were cultus-objects in Phenicia, Syria and in the Baalism of Canaan. They also were to be broken up or hewn into pieces.

30. Rimmon. Rimmōn was the name of the chief god of Damascus (II K 5 18). This word is found also in the personal name Tabrimmon (I K 15 18). It is the same word as Rammān, an epithet meaning 'the thunderer,' that was applied to Adad the god of the air, of rain, of thunder and lightning. The name Hadad (Adad), occurs in several Biblical proper names as Ben-hadad, Bildad, Hadadezer, Hadarezer and Hadad-rimmon. The name and cult of Adad or Rimmōn were widespread in the West-land very early. Hadad was in general the more widely used name, tho the Bible uses the popular epithet Rimmōn (Rammān).

31. Serpent-Worship. Using the expression 'serpent-worship' in its widest application, we find two main kinds of regard for the serpent, one for actual and the other for mythological animals. (1) The quick, elusive motions of the snake, its fondness for out-of-the-way lurking-places, its ubiquity, and its power to strike and instantly kill, have given it everywhere an uncanny and often a demonic character. In the Bible also it is once viewed as an instrument of J' (Am 9 3). The episode of the brazen serpent is based not upon the belief of the healing power of the serpent, for this belief was rare in Palestine, and was perhaps confined to those living in sacred springs (cf. the 'dragon's well' in Neh 2 13), but upon the widespread notion that looking upon the image of a noxious creature was curative. (2) The chief mythological conception of the serpent, which played a great rôle in the whole of the ancient world and was most elaborately developed in Babylonia, is well illustrated in both the O T and N T. The principal source of the myth is the personification of the raging, destructive sea, the source of storm-clouds with their thunder and serpentine lightning, and the ultimate cause (and therefore Divine, see §5, above) of eclipses and all other celestial obscuration. The resultant figure was the Babylonian Tiāmat (Heb. t'hōm, the 'deep,' Gn 1 2), the original of the dragon and of leviathan or the sea-serpent. Here only the principal relevant O T passages can be cited, which naturally occur in the poetical literature: Ps 74 12-18, 89 10-12, 51 10 f.; Job 7 12, 9 13, 26 12 f.; Is 27 1. The essentials of the myth were that Tiāmat, the chief of the demonic powers of disorder and confusion, rose with kindred monsters against the gods (her own offspring), the powers of light and order, and was routed and slain by Marduk (see § 24, above), their champion, who after her destruction established the permanent order of the universe, setting in the heavens the loyal powers of light and order, to regulate the times and seasons, and to guard his supremacy (cf. Gn ch. 1; and see COSMOGONY). A combination of this rôle of the dragon with the traditional conception of the enmity of the serpent toward the human race is the literary tho not the religious basis of Gn ch. 3 and of the Biblical career of the personified serpent, the chosen emblem and most fitting symbol of the power of evil.

32. Sun, Moon, and Stars. The Worship of the Heavenly Bodies. (1) Sun, Moon, and 'Host of Heaven.' In distinction from the sun and moon, the stars are often called the host of heaven. The of the adjuncts being the horses and chariots of the sun (II K 23 11), which were driven in sacred processions to represent the sun's course through the heavens. After the first captivity of Judah there were men in Jerusalem who still prostrated themselves before the rising sun (Ezk 8 16).

(3) Early Sun- and Moon-Worship. Traces of very ancient sun-worship are found in the place-name Beth-shemesh (abode of the sun) and in the epical personal name Samson (Shimshôn), and of moon-worship in the name Jericho ('moon-city'). In remote Hebrew antiquity the moon played a very important part. Sin, the moon-god, the patron of wanderers and emigrants, was the chief god of Ur of the Chaldees, of Haran in N. Mesopotamia, of the Wilderness of Sin, and of Mt. Sinai, to the S. of Palestine. These places marked the limits of the wanderings of Abraham and his earliest descendants.

term 'host' means a well-ordered army, each soldier having his place, name, or number (Is 40 26, 45 12; Ps 147 4; Neh 9 6), and maintaining his relative position while perpetually in motion. The stars as twinkling and moving were thought, like the sun and moon, to be animated by spirits and were, therefore, divine. Their comparative spirituality was promoted by the fact that they had a living radiance of their own and required no image or idol for their worship (see § 23, above), nor were they represented by symbols in Palestine as they were in Assyria and Babylonia. Generally speaking, astral-worship had little vogue in the West as compared with the East (cf. § 9 (c), above), and it was not till the supremacy of Assyria, followed by the Chaldean era, that it had much influence in Israel. The stars there formed as a whole a sort of community or class by themselves, corresponding in the main to the Igigi or 'heaven-gods' of the Babylonians (cf. § 8, above).

(2) Astral Cults in Israel. Northern Israel is vaguely said in I K 17 18 to have 'worshiped all the host of heaven.' II K 23 12 suggests in its reference to the altars on the roof of the Temple as fitted up by Ahaz that this king had officially introduced astral-worship into Judah, with its combination of observatory and chapel after the old Babylonian fashion. Later kings further developed the cult, one

(4) The Zodiac and Planets. In the great community of the host of heaven the signs of the zodiac were the objects of special adoration and consultation (cf. the Lat. considero and contemplor). In the Babylonian religion and science they held a controlling place. They were worshiped under Manasseh by the name mazzâlôth (II K 23 5, 'planets' AV, Bab. 'stations,' i.e., of the sun in his yearly course, the 'Mazzaroth' of Job 38 32). For ancient Babylonian representations of these see Jeremias, Das Alte Testament (1904), p. 9. For the planet-gods named in the O T see above under Ashtoreth, Mero-dach, Nebo, and Nergal. In Babylonia the images of these divinities were frequently carried about in religious processions (cf. the taunting reference to this in Is 46 1 f., and the accompanying illustration).

(5) How the Bible regards the Heavenly Bodies. All astral-worship was forbidden in the prophetic legislation (Dt 4 19, etc.); and its various adjuncts, along with those of the Baal-worship of the high places, were destroyed by Josiah (II K ch. 23). This does not imply, however, that the popular belief in the animation of the heavenly bodies ceased to be shared.

33. Tamarisk. Tamarisk is the correct rendering of the Heb. 'ēshel ('grove' or 'tree' AV). It is a large tree-like shrub, its branches covered with fine scales for leaves. It was viewed as a sacred tree, marking a shrine (Gn 21 33), a burial-place (I S 31 13), and also a place of council (I S 22 6).

34. Tammuz. Among the improper rites practised in the Temple at Jerusalem as seen by Ezekiel (ch. 8) was the vision of 'women weeping for Tammuz' (ver. 14). Tammuz was a Babylonian god (originally non-Semitic) of vegetation. He was thus closely allied with Ishtar (Ashtoreth; cf. § 14, above), the goddess of fertility (sometimes figured as her husband, sometimes as her son), and is thus practically the god of productiveness. After the passing of the summer solstice, vegetation begins to decay, and Tammuz retires to the underworld. Thither he is followed by Ishtar, who would bring him back to the world which he has left loveless and desolate. This is the theme of a famous Babylonian poem usually known as the 'Descent of Ishtar' (to the underworld). The fourth Babylonian month was hence called Tammuz (July), and the sixth (Elul) was known as that of 'the mission of Ishtar' (September). The weeping for Tammuz was a lamentation by women throughout the north-Semitic world, and the myth of Tammuz and Ishtar was carried to Greece and Rome under the guise of Adonis (= 'ādhōnī, 'my lord') and Aphrodite, or Venus.

35. Tartak. Tartak was a god of the Avvites in postexilic Samaria (II K 17 31). He has not yet been identified.

36. Teraphim. The word 'teraphim' is so transcribed from the Hebrew in RV regularly, as also sometimes in AV. The word denotes a species of household god or image, mostly with a plural sense corresponding to the Heb. form, but in I S 19 13, is used of a single image. The teraphim are by many thought to have been images of the family ancestors (cf. § 9 (d), above). They play a part in the story of Jacob and his Aramean wives, Rachel having stolen away the teraphim of her father, Laban, before her flight to Canaan (Gn 31 19 ff.), and the Danites took those of Micah with them to their northern settlement (Jg 17 5, 18 17 f.). They would thus seem to have had at least some tribal significance. They are condemned in I S 15 23. But they appear to have been used as a matter of course in the time of David (I S 19 13, 16), and Hos 3 4 speaks of them as inseparable from the offices of religion. They were, perhaps, not entirely proscribed till the time of Josiah (II K 23 24). The fact that, like the ephod (q.v.), they were consulted in divination (II K 23 24; Ezk 21 21; Zec 10 2), and their prevailing domestic or private cultivation (§ 3, above) may account largely for their comparative immunity.

37. Terebinth. The terebinth was, apparently, the chief sacred tree of the early Hebrews and other Semitic peoples. According to prevailing recent opinion, it answers to the Heb. 'ēl, 'ēlā, and 'ēlōn, while oak, by which these Heb. words are always rendered by AV and RV, except in Is 6 13 ('teal-tree' AV) and Hos 4 13 ('elm' AV), would correspond to 'allōn. It has been plausibly maintained, however, that these distinctions do not exist, and that the O T uses them all in the sense of 'sacred tree.' In any case it is clear that most of the sacred trees were terebinths and not oaks. The two trees are quite distinct botanically, but the former is less common and lives to a greater age. It has a thick trunk, long branches, and abundant foliage (II S 18 9), and is deciduous (cf. Is 1 30). There is no reason why the oak should not have been (like the tamarisk; cf. § 33, above) sacred in certain cases. Either tree gives ample shade and shelter, and would make a good gathering-place, but the terebinth being rarer, and perhaps more striking in appearance, would be a better landmark; cf. 'the valley of Elah,' possibly named from some imposing specimen.

Sacred trees were in vogue up to the days of the kingdom. The living spirit within them (cf. § 7, above), communicated the will of the deity, as did the 'terebinth of Moreh' (= 'teacher' or 'director,' Gn 12 6; Dt 11 30); the 'terebinth of soothsayers' (Jg 9 37; cf. RVmg.), especially when the wind whispered in the branches (II S 5 24). For other suggestive instances see Gn 35 4; Jos 24 26; I K 13 14. The later prophetic movement aimed to abolish all forms and customs of tree-worship, especially on account of the licentious practices which it promoted. See Is 1 29, 57 5; Hos 4 13; Ezk 6 13 (cf. also Asherah, § 11, above).

LITERATURE: The best general treatises are: Baethgen, Beiträge zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte (1888), the great uncompleted work of W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites (1st ed., 1889; 2d ed., 1894), and M. J. Lagrange, Études sur les religions Semitiques (2d ed. 1905). The works on ancient religion which are perhaps most valuable for the study of Semitic religions are: Tiele, Geschiedenis van den Godesdienst en de Oudheid, 2 vols. (1896, Ger. transl., 1896-1903); De la Saussaye, Lehrbuch der Religionsgeschichte (4th ed., 2 vols., 1925). Of treatises on the early religion of the Hebrews, the Arabs, and the Babylonians, the following are very helpful: Stade, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, vol. i (1887), pp. 358-518; Wellhausen, Reste arabischen Heidenthums (1st ed., 1887; 2d ed., 1897); Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria (1st ed., 1898; 2d ed. in German, much enlarged (1912); Schrader, Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament (3d ed., 1903), Part II, by H. Zimmern; R. W. Rogers, The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria (1908); Geo. F. Moore, History of Religions, vol. I (1913), pp. 201-242; Morris Jastrow, Aspects of Religious Belief and Practice in Babylonia and Assyria (1911); P. Dhorme, La religion Babylonienne (1910). Many books and monographs on O T religion or theology also contain useful suggestions. A knowledge of the elements of anthropology is essential as a general preparation.

SENAAH, sī-nē'ā or sen'a-a (סְנַאָה, sēnā'āh): A city inhabited by a colony of returned exiles (Ezr 2 35; Neh 7 38), called Hassenaah (Neh 3 3). Its site is unknown, but was probably near Jericho.

SENATE. See COUNCIL, § 1.

SENEH, sī'nī (סֵנֶה, sēneh), 'thorn': One of the two 'rocky crags' (lit. 'tooth of the cliff') in the pass at Michmash (I S 14 4). The exact location is uncertain. See also BOZEZ.

SENI'R, sî'nîr (סִנְיָר, sēnîr): The Amorite name of Hermon (Dt 3 9), but distinguished from Hermon (I Ch 5 23; Song 4 8). It is also called Sion (Dt 4 48), and Sirion (Dt 3 9; Ps 29 6). It was probably the northern part of the Antilebanon, which was called Jebel Sanîr by Arab geographers. In I Ch 5 23 it is mentioned as one of the boundaries of Manasseh, E. of the Jordan, and was noted for its fir-trees (Ezk 27 5). C. S. T.

SENNACHERIB, sen-nak'î-rib (סַנְחֶרִיב, san-hêrîb); Assy. Sin-ahê-erba, 'the god Sin increase brothers': The king of Assyria, 705-681 B.C. His accession dates from the death of his father, Sargon II, 705. A change of rulers was a conventional signal for rebellion among the subjects of the empire. The first campaign of S. was made against the recalcitrant Chaldean Merodach-baladan (q.v.), who had once more seized the throne of Babylon. On the approach of the Assyrian army, he fled for his life, and S. put Bel-ibni on the throne. After chastising the Kossæans and the people of Ellipi, he turned his attention to his rebellious subjects in the western provinces. Hezekiah, King of Judah, the cities of Ashkelon and Ekron of Philistia, together with most of those on the E. coast of the Mediterranean, had likewise seceded from their master, the king of Assyria. S. in 701 directed his first blows against the cities of the Phœnician coast. All were plundered except Tyre, whose king, Elulaeus, fled to the island of Cyprus, and Ethbaal was made king of local Phœnicia. The apparently invincible Assyrian hosts pushed down the coast toward Egypt. Neighboring peoples hastened to assure S. of their submission by sending him tribute. Among these names we find Ammon, Moab, Edom, and the Philistine city Ashdod. The first coast cities to feel the effect of his campaign were Joppa, Beth-dagon, and Ashkelon, which soon fell. When S. reached Lachish, Hezekiah of Judah (according to II K 18 14-16) acknowledged his rebellion and sought to pay reparations. These were set at 300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold. This was paid, it appears, at once. Instead of satisfying the Assyrian king, it seems to have aroused his cupidity, and he sent an embassy to demand the surrender of Hezekiah's capital. Probably, simultaneously, tho the chronological order of events is uncertain, an army raided the country and fortresses of Judea, capturing forty-six of its strongholds and 200,150 of its population. The city of Lachish fell in face of the battering-rams of the Assyrian army before the embassy returned from Jerusalem. Libnah was the next object of their attack (according to II K 19 8). While Ekron was being besieged, S. heard of the oncoming of Hezekiah's Egyptian ally, Tirhakah the Ethiopian, with a great army. Apparently, he at once despatched another embassy to demand the surrender of Jerusalem, and raised the siege of Ekron. He seems to have mustered all his troops to meet the approaching Egyptian army. The two armies met at Eltekeh (Assyrian, Al-ta-ku-u), a city located, according to the Pal. Expl. Fund, on the SW. edge of Judah. S. claims to have been victorious, tho he abandoned any advantage which a decided victory would have given him to invade Egypt. The city of Ekron was again besieged, and its king, Padi, who had been imprisoned in Jerusalem, was restored to his throne. The close of this campaign of S. is veiled in obscurity. What he did after the capture of Ekron, and the punishment of its rebels, and the restoration of its dethroned king is still a mystery. In his annals, S. locates at this point his punishment of Hezekiah, his raiding of the country of Judah, and his disposition of the territory and cities of Judah. This order of events looks like a screen to cover up something which he does not wish to mention; for the payment of tribute by Hezekiah, which II Kings (18 14) places at the very beginning of the campaign, S.'s own annals claim to have been made after the campaign and at Nineveh. The annals of S. read as follows regarding Hezekiah: 'As for Hezekiah himself, like a bird in a cage, in Jerusalem, his royal city, I shut him up. I threw up forts against him, and whoever would come out of the gate of the city I turned back.' Following this, we have a long list of tribute that S. claims was delivered at Nineveh, accompanied by a special ambassador, whose function was to render homage to his majesty. It is at least significant that we have no specific information that S. ever made another campaign to the West, tho he ruled over Assyria twenty years thereafter.

During those last twenty years, S.'s attention was confined to Babylonia, Elam, and Nineveh. His administration of Babylonia carried with it a partial chastisement of the Elamites, a defeat of the Chaldeans, and a revengeful and devastating destruction of the city of Babylon (in 689). During the last eight years of peace he built for himself at Nineveh, on the site of the modern mound Kuyunjik, a great palace, 1,500 ft. long by 700 ft. wide, amply supplied with gorgeous halls, courts, and rooms of state. At the modern mound Nebi-Yunus he restored another palace. Nineveh itself he re-beautified, made its aqueducts more serviceable, its walls more impregnable, and its position as capital of the empire more glorious (see NINEVEH). But his long reign was not marked by the exercise of large generosity, or humane treatment of his subjects. His inhumanity on numerous occasions yielded its full fruition in his own murder, probably at the entrance of the temple of Ninurta in Nineveh; but the O T says by his two sons Adrammelech and Sharezer (II K 19 37), neither of whose names has been identified in the inscriptions, or in the four references to S.'s murder found therein. The Babylonian Chronicle mentions only one assassin. Within five months thereafter Esarhaddon was seated on the throne as his father's successor. I. M. P.

SENSUAL: The rendering of ψυχικός, 'belonging to the animal life' (ψυχή), possessed alike by man and brute. It signifies the condition of being under the influence of the passions and appetites, and not of the Spirit of God (Ja 3 15; Jude ver. 19).

SENUAH, sî-nîū'a. See HASSENUAH.

SEORIM, sî-ō'rim (סֹרִים, sē'ōrîm): The ancestral head of the fourth course of priests (I Ch 24 8).

SEPARATE, SEPARATION: Where these terms are used in a technical significance they have reference to religious ideas, either of ceremonial purity, which required the 'separation' of the ceremonially unclean, or of complete dedication, or 'separation,' to the service of Jehovah. Such ideas found expression mainly in the laws concerning purification (q.v.), the Nazirites (q.v.), and in the regulations concerning the priesthood (q.v.). E. E. N.

SEPARATE PLACE. See TEMPLE, § 20.

SEPHAR, sî'fâr (סֶפָר, sêphâr): A place given (Gn 10 30) as a boundary of the territory of the Joktanites. It is usually identified with Zafâr, either the capital of the Himyarites in SW. Arabia or a port-city in the eastern part of Haḡramaut. [C. S. T.]

SEPHARAD, sef'a-rad (סֶפְרָד, sêphâradh, or סֶפֶר, sêphârêdh): The residence of exiles from Jerusalem (Ob 20, if the text is not corrupt, as Wellhausen, Nowack, and others claim). Formerly identified with Saparda in SW. Media; now by many with Sparda (=Sardis?) in Asia Minor; the Cparada of the Persian cuneiform (cf. Winckler, KAT,<sup>3</sup> 301). C. S. T.

SEPHARVAIM, sef'âr-vê'im (סֶפְרַוַּיִם, sêpharwayim): A city from which colonists were deported to Samaria by the king of Assyria (II K 17 24, 31). It was probably the Babylonian Sippara, between the Tigris and the Euphrates, as two other Babylonian cities, Babylon and Cuthah, are mentioned. Avva and Hamath, two Syrian cities, are probably insertions from II K 19 13. A city of the same name, which was conquered by the Assyrians (II K 18 34 = Is 36 19; II K 19 13 = Is 37 13), would be too near Samaria. This latter is probably a Syrian city, Shabarain, between Hamath and Damascus, as it is mentioned with other cities of N. Syria. C. S. T.

SEPHARVITE, sî'fâr-voit: An inhabitant of Sepharvaim (q.v.) in Babylonia (II K 17 31).

SEPTUAGINT, sep'tiu-ə-jint. See VERSIONS OF THE O T.

SEPULCHER. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 5.

SEPULCHER OF DAVID. See JERUSALEM, § 24.

SERAH, sî'ra (סֶרָה, serah): A 'daughter' (probably a clan) of Asher (Gn 46 17; Nu 26 46, Sarah AV; I Ch 7 30).

SERIAIAH, si-rê'ya (סֵרְיָאֵה, sêryāh[ū] [Jer 36 26]), 'J' persisteth': 1. A scribe ('secretary' RVmg.) of David (II S 8 17; cf. 20 25, 'Sheva'; I K 4 3, 'Shisha'; I Ch 18 16, 'Shavsha'). 2. A chief priest in the time of Zedekiah. He was taken before the king of Babylon at Riblah and put to death (II K 25 18 = Jer 52 24; I Ch 6 14 [5 40]; probably an ancestor, but not the father of Ezra [Ezr 7 1]). 3. A son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, and captain of one of the bands which had not been taken by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 40 8). He came with other captains and their men to Gedaliah, who had been appointed governor of Judea, and was advised to submit (II K 25 23 = Jer 40 8). 4. A brother of Baruch and an officer of Zedekiah. He accompanied the king to Babylon in the fourth year of his reign and carried Jeremiah's prophecy against Babylon (Jer 51 59, 61); possibly the same as the preceding. 5. A son of Kenaz (I Ch 4 13, 14). 6. A Simeonite (I Ch 4 35). 7.

A priest who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezr 2 2; Neh 12 1, 12). 8. One who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 2 [3]). 9. A priest (Neh 11 11), perhaps the same as 6. 10. An officer of King Jehoiakim, ordered by him to take Baruch and Jeremiah (Jer 36 26). C. S. T.

SERAPHIM, ser'a-fim (סֵרָפִיִּם, sêrāphīm, only in pl.): Angelic, six-winged forms, represented (Is 6 2) as ministering with worship (Is 6 3) and other service (ver. 5) in the presence of J'. Their figure has been connected with the serpent-like beings of Oriental mythology (Assyr. Sarrapu [the god Nergal, according to Del. Wörterb.], and Egyptian Serref [guardian griffins]). It has also been derived from the serpentine movement of lightning ('flying serpents,' Is 14 29; burning or fiery serpent (Is 30 6). But in Isaiah's inaugural vision they can be nothing else than symbolical human figures expressing the idea of ardent devotion to God. In Eth. En. 61 10 they appear with the cherubim and ophanim as guardians of the throne of God. A. C. Z.

SERED, sî'red (סֶרֶד, sêredh): The ancestral head of a clan of Zebulun (Gn 46 14), the Seredites (Nu 26 26, Sardite AV).

SERGIUS PAULUS, sūr'jī-us pō'lus. See PAULUS, SERGIUS.

SERJEANT (ῥαβδούχος, the Gr. equivalent of the Roman lictor): Two lictors attended each pretor (σπαρτηγός, 'magistrate,' Ac 16 22, 35). After the time of Alexander the Great the σπαρτηγός was the chief civil magistrate, while the leader of the troops was the ἡγεμὼν. In times of peace the lictors cleared the street before the pretor and enabled him to execute his sentences. As to the pretor, Luke hesitates between the Greek and Latin appellations, using the common Gr. term ἀρχοντας in Ac 16 19, ('rulers' EVV), and σπαρτηγοί, the Gr. equivalent of the Lat. praetores, in Ac 16 20, 22, 35, 38 ('pretors' RVmg., 'magistrates' EVV). In both cases the pretors are meant. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT: 1. Introductory. The name 'Sermon on the Mount' has been given to Mt 5 1-7 29, at least since the date of the commentary by St. Augustine (394), entitled De sermone domini in monte (Eng. Transl. in Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers). The name presupposes that the chapters are a report of a single discourse spoken at a definite place, which since the 13th cent. has been commonly identified as the double-peaked 'horns of Hattin' (Karn Hattin), a hill 60 ft. high, two hours west of Tiberias. In fact, however, 'the mountain' (Mt 5 1) denotes the high plateau-country of Galilee, in distinction from the lowland on the shore of the lake (Mk 3 13, 6 46; Mt 14 23, 15 29, Lk 6 12; Jn 6 3, 15; cf. Gn 19 17, 19, 30, 31 23, 25). To the Sermon on the 'Mount' in Mt corresponds the discourse reported in Lk 6 20-7 1, which is represented as spoken 'on a level place' (6 17) in the hill-country (6 12). The erroneous rendering of the AV 'in the plain' (6 17) has caused the discourse in Lk to be often termed 'the Sermon on the Plain.'

Modern study of the contents of the two discourses in the light of current views of the Synoptic problem leads to the conclusion that the sermon in Mt is, at any rate in large measure, a compilation of sayings of Jesus, preserved not in their original connection, but gradually collected and massed in the present elaborate composition. As evidence for this should be studied: (1) The many parallels in Lk scattered in wholly different connections; (2) the internal analysis of the discourse itself (e.g. cf. Mt 5 21-26, 6 5-15, 7 1-12); (3) the analogy of such a collection as Mt 10 5-42 (cf. Lk 9 2-6=Mk 6 8-13; Lk 10 3-12; and other parallels in Lk) or Mt 23 1-39 (cf. Lk 11 37-52, 13 34-35, 20 45-47=Mk 12 38-40). Similar considerations with regard to the sermon in Lk are probably sufficient to justify the same conclusion there.

A satisfactory answer to the many questions of literary and historical criticism raised in trying to understand the meaning, structure, and probable origin of the Sermon on the Mount would go far to solve the great and complicated problem of the history of the Synoptic tradition of our Lord's sayings before its codification in our Gospels. See GOSPEL, GOSPELS; and SYNOPSIS PROBLEM. The view underlying the present article will be found stated below (§ 6).

2. Position in Mt. In Mt the sayings of Jesus which were not remembered as part of some conversation are chiefly presented in a series of long discourses relating to well-defined topics. Thus:

- Chs. 5-7. (Sermon on the Mount.) The life of a disciple.
- Ch. 10 4-42. Precepts to disciples for mission work.
- Ch. 11 2-19. Sayings about John the Baptist.
- Ch. 13 1-52. Seven parables on growth and the Kingdom.
- Ch. 18. Principles and precepts for community life.
- Ch. 23. Polemic against scribes and Pharisees.
- Chs. 24-25. Apocalyptic discourse and parables.

Note how Mt has expressly called attention to this arrangement by his uniform concluding formula, 7 28 (cf. Lk 7 1), 11 1, 13 53, 19 1, 26 1. See MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF.

The place of each of these discourses in the order of Mt's Gospel is partly determined by Mt's own plan for treating successive topics, partly by the occurrence of something in Mk (on whose sequence Mt was largely dependent) to which the additional material of Mt could be attached (thus cf. in contents and position Mt 13 1-53 and Mk 4 1-34; Mt 18 1-35 and Mk 9 33-50; Mt 23 1-39 and Mk 12 38-40; Mt 24 1-51, 25 1-46 and Mk 13 1-37).

The Sermon on the Mount probably owes its position as the first of these long discourses to the fundamental significance of its topic. It is a general summary of what this evangelist understands to have been Jesus' teaching about the disciple's relation to duty and to God.

3. Position in Lk. In Lk, unlike Mt, the sayings of Jesus are not systematically arranged in large masses. Only the beginnings of the working of this tendency can be traced (e.g. Lk 12 13-34, 54-59, 14 1-24, 15 1-32); so far as possible (i.e., nearly everywhere excepting in 6 20-8 3 and 9 51-18 14) Lk follows the sequence in which Mk had arranged his material.

In the present case the author of Lk for some reason, like Mt, associated the sermon with the throngs attendant upon the Galilean preaching and accordingly introduces it (6 20-49) at the point where in following Mk he found these mentioned (Mk 3 7, 8, 13). As a further, and not unfitting, consequence the Sermon in Lk thus became closely connected with the choice of the Twelve.

4. Contents of the Sermon in Mt. The general theme is 'The Life of a Disciple.' It is treated with reference to many aspects, both moral and religious, so that the titles often given, such as 'The New Torah,' 'The Righteousness of the Kingdom,' 'The Relation of Jesus' Teaching to the Teaching and Practise of the Pharisees,' are too specific and narrow.

I. The Beatitudes, 5 3-12, all in the same form (cf. Ps 1 1, 41 1, 65 4—a formula of congratulation, not of blessing) fall into three groups, each having its specific character essentially different from that of the others:

(a) i-iv (vs. 3-6), paradoxical beatitudes, explaining who are most likely to respond to Jesus' call to discipleship, viz., the people of the humble ranks of life, the lower classes,—'the poor in spirit' (i.e., those whose spirit is that of the 'poor'), 'the sad,' 'the lowly' (EV 'meek'), 'they that hunger and thirst in respect of righteousness' (i.e., those who, being in a famine of righteousness, have none to boast of). The phrases all describe the same class of persons in various ways (cf. Lk 18 9-14, the Pharisee and the publican).

(b) v-vii (vs. 7-9), emphasizing three traits of character which the disciple must foster—mercifulness, purity of heart (i.e., freedom from evil purposes), peaceableness.

(c) viii, ix (vs. 10-12), comfort for the disciple's hardships.

II. Salt and Light, 5 13-16; the duties of the disciples to the world, viz. to season and to illuminate.

III. The Righteousness of the True Disciple, 5 17-6 18.

A. The rigor of Jesus' requirements (5 17-20).

Mt 5 17-19 is held by many to be a Jewish Christian addition, not a genuine utterance of Jesus. But cf. Mt 23 2-7. In fact, the exaction even of 5 18 is required neither by Mk 7 18-19 nor by any other utterance of Jesus. He taught that some of the positive requirements of the Law had no intrinsic moral significance, but did not in consequence of that find it necessary to break with the Law of his people. The contrasts of Mt 5 21-48 are not criticisms of the Law of Moses, but intensified applications of its underlying principles; cf. Mk 10 5.

B. (5 21-48) Jesus' ideals of moral conduct in their contrast with the necessarily lax requirements of public law and legal administration.

1. Anger, vs. 21-26.

(a) Not merely murder but anger wrong, vs. 21-22.

(b) Reconciliation to brother man more important than formal worship of God, vs. 23, 24.

(c) Prudence dictates concessions, vs. 25, 26.

2. Licentious passion, vs. 27-30.

(a) Not merely adultery but lustful desire wrong, vs. 27, 28.

(b) Any deprivation whatever is better than to commit sin, vs. 29, 30.

3. Divorce, vs. 31, 32.

All divorce, except for fornication, is wrong.

4. Oaths and truthfulness, vs. 33-37.

(a) Not merely false swearing wrong, but the disciple must be so truthful as to need no oath, vs. 33, 34a, 37.

(b) All oaths equally binding, vs. 34b-36.

5. Revenge, vs. 38-42.

(a) Not merely excessive revenge such as was forbidden by the Law, but any indulgence of revengeful impulse wrong; illustrated by cases of (1) personal violence, (2) oppression by legal process, (3) impressment to service, vs. 38-41.

Do not resent such injury; but rather yield more than the injurer demands.

(b) Kindred precept on generous giving, ver. 42.

6. Universal range of good-will, vs. 43-48.

The disciple must not merely love his friends, as the heathen do, but his enemies, with the perfect inclusiveness of God.

C. Jesus' ideals of religious practise, in their contrast with prevalent abuses, 6 1-18.

'Righteousness,' used in 5:20 in the sense of right conduct generally, has in 6:1 the narrower sense of pious exercises. Almsgiving, prayer, and fasting were the three chief pious habits of the Pharisees.

1. General principle: pious exercise must be free from ostentation, ver. 1. This is illustrated by

2. Almsgiving, vs. 2-4. No almsgiving for show before men.

3. Prayer, vs. 5-16.

(a) No prayer for show before men, vs. 5, 6.

(b) Prayers to be made with rational intelligence and with brevity, vs. 7, 8.

(c) A model prayer, vs. 9-13.

(d) God's forgiveness conditioned by ours, vs. 14, 15.

4. Fasting, vs. 16-18.

No fasting for show before men.

IV. The True Disciple's Complete Devotion to God, 6 19-34.

A. Single-hearted devotion to God's service the true aim of life, vs. 19-24.

(a) Heavenly treasure alone permanent, vs. 19-21

(b) Parable of the inner light, vs. 22, 23.

As in the case of the eye, which is the lamp of the body through which light enters, so the center of illumination of the soul (viz. the 'heart,' with its thoughts and purposes) must be a clear medium for God's light, or else the soul is in darkness.

(c) Only one master possible, ver. 24.

B. Single-hearted trust in God's fatherly care a duty; to be concerned about food and raiment is to fail in devotion to God and God's Kingdom, vs. 25-34.

V. The Disciple's Attitude toward Men and toward God, 7 1-12.

A. Toward men; precepts against self-righteous arrogance, vs. 1-6.

(a) Against arrogant censoriousness, vs. 1, 2.

(b) Against looking at others' faults, ver. 3.

(c) Against officiously attempting to improve others, vs. 4, 5.

(d) Ironical warning against officiousness, ver. 6.

This is sometimes taken as a direct precept against wasteful effort.

B. Toward God; prayer, vs. 7-11.

C. The Golden Rule as comprising the sum total of right conduct, ver. 12.

VI. The Necessity of Moral Effort, Good Conduct, and Obedience to Jesus' Words, vs. 13-27.

A. The two ways, vs. 13, 14.

B. Fruits the only test, vs. 15-20.

C. Not profession but practise will secure entrance into the Kingdom, vs. 21-23.

D. Concluding parable; not hearing Jesus' words but doing them brings security, vs. 24-27.

5. Contents of the Sermon in Lk. The shorter sermon of Lk may be analyzed as follows:

I. The Beatitudes and Woes, 6 20-26.

A. Comfort for the poor, the hungry, the sad, the persecuted, in their (temporary) wretchedness, vs. 20-23.

B. Warning to the prosperous, since their prosperity is only temporary, vs. 24-26 (cf. Lk 12 15-21).

II. The Characteristics of the Disciple's Attitude, 6 27-38.

A. Universal range of the disciple's love, vs. 27, 28.

B. The disciple's character manifested in submission to personal violence and robbery, and in generous giving, vs. 29, 30.

C. The Golden Rule, ver. 31.

D. Universal range of love and beneficence, vs. 32-35.

E. The disciple must be merciful, avoid censoriousness, show a forgiving spirit, and act generously, vs. 36-38.

III. Good Character and Conduct Requisite, 6 39-49.

A. For the disciple who would guide and improve others, vs. 39-42.

B. Because source and product correspond, vs. 43-45.

C. Concluding parable; not hearing Jesus' words but doing them brings security, vs. 46-49.

6. Comparison of the Two Forms. A comparison of the contents of the two forms of the Sermon on the Mount shows the same general theme, and many of the same precepts arranged in the same general order. The resemblances between Mt 5 11, 12 and Lk 6 22, 23 point clearly to a common source, probably written. Of the material in Lk only 6 24-26, 27b, 28a, 38a, 39-40, 45 are not found, exactly or for substance, in the sermon in Mt.

There are, however, marked differences. Mt is much more systematic than Lk, and follows a more definite unifying idea in the several paragraphs and in the whole. The setting of some of the precepts gives them a very different bearing in the two sermons (cf. Mt 5 6 with Lk 6 21a; Mt 5 39 with Lk 6 29). Mt is mainly occupied with the manifold contrast of Jesus and the Pharisees, and is full of Palestinian allusions and local color; while with Lk the kernel of the whole is the general principle of universal love, the precepts are put in such form as to be generally applicable, and the conditions presupposed are rather those of the Christian world at large than of Palestine. In both Mt and Lk the traces of editorial work can be detected; each form corresponds closely with the general character of the Gospel in which it stands. Especially noteworthy is the fact that much of the material of the elaborate composition in Mt is found scattered in disconnected sections of Lk, chiefly in chs. 11 and 12. For these facts in detail reference must be had to a harmony of the Gospels.

On the whole, assuming, as is usually done, that Lk is independent of Mt, the facts seem best accounted for by supposing a written source containing a sermon shorter than that in Mt, but longer than that in Lk. The form in Mt would then give a better idea than that in Lk of the source; but has been much elaborated and expanded by the addition of cognate material. Such an original collection, must have contained at least the following parts:

Four beatitudes, Mt 5 3, 4, 6, 11, 12; Lk 6 20-23.

Prohibition of revenge, Mt 5 38-42; Lk 6 29, 30.

Universal love, Mt 5 43-48; Lk 6 27, 28, 32-36.

Against self-righteous arrogance, Mt 7 1-5; Lk 6 37-42.

Golden Rule, Mt 7 12; Lk 6 31.

Requirement of moral effort, fruits, obedience, Mt 7 18-27; Lk 6 43-49.

What other parts it would have contained of what is now Mt 5 21-48 is difficult to say.

The characteristics of the sermon in Mt, as already briefly indicated, give good grounds for believing it to represent, in the main, more accurately than does that in Lk, the original forms of the sayings which it contains. The greater 'spirituality' sometimes claimed for the form in Lk, from which greater originality is inferred, is in reality only the more general and less pungent quality of the sayings in Lk, due to the interest of the latter evangelist in making them intelligible and readily applicable to his Gentile readers.

Whether this original sermon was a real connected discourse spoken by our Savior and remembered by the disciples, or whether it was itself only a primitive collection of sayings preserved without the circumstances of their original utterance, is an unsettled question. Various considerations, such as the analogy of the later tendencies to compilation seen in Mt and Lk, the occasional and conversational character of Jesus' mode of teaching as portrayed in Mk, the relation of the main topics by which the sayings are grouped to the problems of life and apologetics in the second Christian generation, the uniqueness of this discourse in the Gospels—would lead the present writer to suppose that the earliest and briefest form of the sermon that we can recover was itself a compilation.

7. Outside Parallels. Many parallels to the precepts of the Sermon on the Mount have been found in Jewish writings (mostly later, but not necessarily dependent on the utterances of Jesus), and in Greek and Roman moralists, especially Epictetus and Seneca. Many of these will be found quoted in the Commentaries, esp. Broadus on Mt, and for the Jewish side, with great fullness and accuracy, H. L. Strack and Paul Billerbeck, Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch, vol. i, 1924. See also Lightfoot, 'St. Paul and Seneca' in Com. on Philippians. This would be expected in these highly developed systems of morals, and does not detract from the true and unique significance of the moral teaching of Jesus Christ, which lay not in its novelty, but in its singular purity and inwardness, in its solid basis of noble theism, and in its consequent power.

LITERATURE: Commentaries on Mt and Lk., esp. Broadus on Mt (1887); Lives of Christ, esp. Keim (Eng. transl. 1876-81) and B. Weiss (Eng. transl. 1883, 1884); works on N T Theology; A. SERPENT: In addition to the Biblical references to serpents which must be taken in their literal sense, there are others which must be understood differently. (1) The serpent in the Paradise story (Gn 3 1 ff.). This story is now generally interpreted as a symbolic rather than literal representation of the fall of man. The serpent serves in the story as the representative of that which opposes God and good. There was probably some basis in current legendary or mythical ideas for such symbolism. In the ancient Babylonian epic of Creation (see COSMOGONY, § 4) the negative aspect of the cosmos—i.e., chaos, the watery abyss, darkness, evil, etc.—is symbolized as a great dragon or serpent. As yet, however, no exact parallel to the serpent of the Paradise story has been found in Babylonian literature, altho parallels to other elements of the story are numerous. In later Judaism and in the N T the serpent of Gn ch. 3 was viewed as the agent of the Devil (cf. Wis. 2 24; Jn 8 44; Rev 12 9 ff., etc.). Cf. Skinner on Gn 3 1 in ICC. (2) In a few passages (Job 26 13; Is 27 1) there seems to be a direct reference to the mythological serpent or dragon, in order to show the supremacy of J" over all things (see LEVIATHAN). Perhaps in Am 9 3, a similar reference is made (cf. Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, pp. 29 ff.). See also DRAGON; NEHUSHTAN; PALESTINE, § 26; SATAN, § 1; and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 31.

E. E. N.

SERUG, s'rug (סְרֻחַ, srūgh): The 'son of Reu (Gn 11 20 ff., called Saruch in AV of Lk 3 35 Gr. Σαρύχ). Probably connected with the district Sarug, mentioned in the Assyrian records.

SERVANT. See SLAVERY.

SERVANT OF JEHOVAH (Servant of the Lord AV): In the second part of the Book of Isaiah (chs. 40-55) we find a frequent use of the expression 'servant of J"'. The passages are 41 8-10, 42 1-4, 6 f., 19 f., 43 10, 44 1-4, 21-23, 45 4, 49 1-6, 50 4-9, 52 13-53 12, those in heavy-faced type being considered the four most important ones. Closely connected with some of these passages are their contexts, e.g., 49 7-10 is in the nature of a reply to 49 1-6, but in this reply the word 'servant' is not used.

In 41 8-10 Israel is addressed as the 'Servant of J"', as 'chosen' by Him, and not rejected, and is encouraged by the recommendation not to fear, for J" will uphold him by His righteousness. In the next passage (42 1-4) the Servant is described (1) as the one in whom J" delights, (2) as endowed with the spirit of J", and (3) as appointed to a great work, involving not only Israel itself, but the nations, a work of judgment, of instruction and enlightenment. The work is to be done in a quiet, gentle spirit. In this the Servant is not exactly identical with Israel, for he has a work to do for Israel. In 42 19 ff. and 43 8-10, it is Israel as a whole, rather than idealized, that seems to be mainly in the prophet's mind, tho in 43 10 there is some idealization. The same is true of 44 1-4, 21-23 and 45 4. But in 49 1-6 the idealization is again prominent. Here the Servant is the speaker, confessing the failure of his past work, at the same time conscious of his high mission as a prophet, to restore Jacob to J" and to be a light to the nations. In 50 4-9, the Servant is again the speaker, representing himself as taught by J", especially in connection with the severe discipline of suffering, in order that he might teach others. In these sufferings the Servant is sustained by his faith in J", and is confident that J" will vindicate him. In 52 13-53 13 the idealization reaches its climax. The passage may be analyzed as follows: (1) The Servant's astonishing exaltation (52 13-15). Tho he had been considered marred, disfigured, and despised, now even kings were startled at his exaltation. (2) Next the Servant's historic past is set forth as involving something wonderful. His early growth was unobserved and lowly, he was despised, rejected, subjected to sufferings, which nevertheless were vicarious—for 'us,' and these sufferings were crowned with death and burial with the wicked, tho he was innocent (53 1-9). (3) But in all this a great Divine purpose was being fulfilled, and after all the Servant is 'to see his seed,' 'prolong his days,' and 'shall be satisfied.' Many through him will be made righteous, and victory will crown his career (53 10-12).

The true interpretation of these remarkable passages (which, one must remember, are poetry, and are to be interpreted as poetry, not prose) is to be found in the view that while the prophet derived elements of his delineation from the experience of Israel, there is an idealization here which neither Israel as a whole nor any part or individual of Israel known to the prophet ever completely realized. The prophet is setting forth principles—principles of the Divine method in realizing the supreme Divine purpose among men. Israel was, in part, an illustration of these principles. But there was more to them than Israel had been able to grasp or express. One figure alone in all history has fully met the ideal sketched by the prophet here. Yet it is neither necessary nor possible to hold that the prophet foresaw His actual career, His life, His cross, and His resurrection. The prophet grasped certain of those great essential elements which, just because they are necessarily true, must have been realized in Him who came to fulfil all righteousness. Chief among these is the principle of vicarious suffering as the only means whereby transgression may be atoned for, but there are others of almost equal importance. For theories and discussions the reader may consult Skinner in Camb. Bible, ad loc.; G. A. Smith in Expos. Bible, ad loc., and Davidson in his O T Prophecy, chs. xxi-xxiv.

SERVICE (עֲבוּדָה, ʿābhōdhāh): Commonly designates all manner of work done for another (Gn 30 26; Ex 1 14). But in the O T the word developed a specific meaning in connection with the ritual; so that the term signifies work done in the course of offering worship in the sanctuary of J" (Ex 30 16; Nu 4 4, etc.; cf. also He 9 1, 8, 9). Naturally, it was first applied to the labors of the Levites employed to take care of the vessels and furniture of the sanctuary; afterward, to the higher work of the priesthood in the performance of official duties at the altar. From this to the more spiritual sense of worship without ritual the transition was easy. This last sense is represented in Paul's exhortation to present the body as a living sacrifice, 'a reasonable service' (Ro 12 1, 'spiritual service' RV and RVmg. Gr.). In the more general sense of plain ministration to a need, the word occurs but rarely (Ps 104 14, 'labor' RVmg.), which is illustrated by Paul's use of it to designate help in the form of money (Ro 15 1, 31 AV; II Co 9 12, 11 8 AV).

SET BATTLE IN ARRAY. See WARFARE, § 4.

SETH, SHETH (שֵׁת, shēth, Gr. Σῆθ): 1. A son of Adam. In Gn 4 25 f. (J) he is the third son and the name is derived from shāth in sense 'he hath appointed [me another seed].' In Gn 5 3 f. (P; cf. Lk 3 38) he is the first son of Adam, and ancestor of the so called Sethite line. See CAIN, § 1. 2. A name for the Moabites (Nu 24 17 AV), but probably not a proper name. Gray, ICC, ad loc., with others, suggests sē'eth, 'pride,' RV and others, shē'th, 'tumult.'

C. S. T.

SETHUR, sē'thūr (שֵׁתוּר, sē'thūr): One of the spies (Nu 13 13).

SETTINGS. See OUCHES; and PRIESTHOOD, 9 (b).

SETTLE. See TEMPLE, § 20.

SEVEN, THE. See CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 3.

SEVEN, SEVENTY. See NUMBERS, SIGNIFICANT AND SYMBOLIC, § 7.

SEVEN CHURCHES. See REVELATION, BOOK OF, § 7.

SEVEN STARS: The AV rendering of the term kēmāh, Pleiades RV (Am 5 8). See ASTRONOMY, § 5.

SEVENEH, si-ven'a (סֵנֶה, sēwēnēh, Syene AV and RVmg.): A town on the E. bank of the Nile, just above the first cataract and opposite the island of Elephantine. Its position at a point where the river is difficult to navigate, on account of rocks and swift currents, made S. an admirable site for a fortress and at the same time a boundary landmark. But for the earlier part of the history of Egypt, Elephantine, on account of its still stronger situation, occupied this place of frontier fortress. In Ezk (29 10, 30 6) the reading is doubtful, but the marginal rendering 'from Migdol to Syene' of AV and RV is the most satisfactory. If we are to read tower (Heb. mighdōl), the fortified castle of the town is probably intended. The modern town is called Assuan (Aṣwān). Recently (1900 and later) a number of Aramaic papyri belonging to the Persian period have been discovered at Elephantine, showing that there was at that time (500-400 B.C.), a flourishing colony of Jews at this place, having their own temple to J" and in correspondence with their brethren in Palestine. See also ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, § 3.

SHAALABBIN, shē'a-lab'in (שְׂאֵלֲבִין, sha'ālabbīn), and SHAALBIM, sha-al'bim (שְׂאֵלִים, sha'albhīm): A town assigned to Dan (Jos 19 42), long retained by the Canaanites (Jg 1 35), but held by Israel in Solomon's day (I K 4 9). It was on the southern slope of the hills of Ephraim. Conder identifies it with Sebīt (Jerome's Selebi), 2 m. N. of Emmaus ('Amwās'), map III, D 5. Eusebius and Jerome identify it with Salaba, near Samaria. Possibly the Shaalbonite (II S 23 32; I Ch 11 33) was from this town. C. S. T.

SHAALBONITE. See SHAALABBIN. E. E. N.

SHAALIM, shē'a-lim, THE LAND OF (שָׂאִלִּים, 'erets sha'ālim), shalim AV: A district which Saul passed through when seeking his father's asses (I S 9 4). It was evidently not far from the N. boundary of Benjamin. Some find here a textual error for 'Shaalbin'; others connect it with 'the land of Shual' (I S 13 17), which lay N. of Michmash. C. S. T.

SHAAPH, shē'af or -af (שָׂאֵף, sha'aph): 1. A descendant of the Jerahmeelite Caleb (I Ch 2 47). 2. Another of the same family (I Ch 2 49).

SHAARAIM, SHARAIM, shē'a-rē'im (שָׂאֲרָאִים, sha'arayim): 1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Jos 15 39), near the Philistine territory in the Wādy es-Sant (I S 17 52, where Wellhausen reads 'in the gateways' of Ekron; cf. RVmg.). Conder identifies it with Khirbet Sa'ireh, W. of Beit 'Atāb. 2. A town in Simeon (I Ch 4 31 = Shilhim, Jos 15 32; and Sharuhēn, 19 9) between Gaza and Beersheba. Map II, C 3. C. S. T.

SHAASHGAZ, shē-ash'gaz (שָׂאֲשָׁגָז, sha'ashgaz): The chamberlain to whom Esther was entrusted (Est 2 14).

SHABBETHAI, shab'1-thai, -thē, or sha-bech' a-ai (שָׁבֶּתַי, shabbethay), 'born on the Sabbath' (?): A Levite, prominent in the days of Ezra (Ezr 10 15; Neh 8 7, 11 16).

SHACHIA, shā-kai'a or shak'1-a (שָׁכִיָּא, shākh-yāh): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 10).

SHADOW OF DEATH: This term is the literal rendering of the Heb. tsalmāweth. RVmg and most moderns render 'deep darkness,' from a different pointing of Heb. (tsalmūth or -mūth). It means 'darkness' (Am 5 8; Job 3 5, etc.), is descriptive of Sheol (Job 10 21 f., 38 17), and a figure of danger and distress (Jer 2 6, 13 16; Is 9 2 [1]; Ps 44 19 [20], 107 19, 14, 23 4; Briggs, continuing the figure of vs. 1-3, here suggests 'gloomy [dark] ravine [valley]'). C. S. T.

SHADRACH, shē'drak (שָׁדְרָךְ, shadrakh), perhaps the Babyl. Šudur-Aku, 'command of Aku': The Babylonian name given to Hananiah, one of Daniel's Jewish companions (Dn 1 7, 2 49, etc.). With Meshach and Abednego he was cast into the fiery furnace because he would not worship the golden image set up by Nebuchadrezzar. C. S. T.

SHAFT. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 1.

SHAGEE, shē'gī (שָׂגִי, shāghē), Shage AV): The father of Jonathan, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 34). See also HARARITE.

SHAHARAIM, shē'hā-rē'im (שָׁהָרָאִים, shahārayim), 'double dawn' (?): The father of several Benjamite families (I Ch 8 8). The text here is corrupt (see ICC, ad loc.).

SHAHAZUMAH, shē'hā-zū'mā (שָׁהָזֻמָּה, shahātsūmah), or SHAHAZIMAH, shā-haz'1-mā: (שָׁהָזִימָה, shahātsūmah) as in AV: A town of Issachar (Jos 19 22). Site unknown. E. E. N.

SHALEM, shē'lem (שָׁלֵם, shālēm, 'peace'): A city near Shechem (Gn 33 18 AV), but probably RV 'in peace' correctly represents the original text (b'shālēm).

SHALIM, shē'lim. See SHAALIM.

SHALISHA, shē-lai'she or shal'1-she (שָׁלִישָׁה, shālīshāh): The 'land of Shalisha' appears to have been N. or NW. of the 'hill-country of Ephraim' (I S 9 4), perhaps near Baal-Shalisha (q.v.).

SHALLECHETH, shal'h-kefth, GATE OF. See TEMPLE, § 6.

SHALLUM, shal'um (שָׁלֻם, shallūm), 'recompensed' (?): 1. The ancestral head of a clan (a) of Simeon (I Ch 4 25), (b) of Naphtali (I Ch 7 13, called Shillem, Gn 46 24), the Shillemites (Nu 26 49), and (c) of a Jerahmeelite family (I Ch 2 40, 41). 2. The murderer of Zechariah, King of Judah, slain by Menahem (q.v.), after a reign of one month (II K 15 10 ff.). 3. The father of Jehizkiah (II Ch 28 12). 4. The uncle of Jeremiah (Jer 32 7). 5. The father of Hilkiah the priest (I Ch 6 12 f.; Ezr 7 2). 6. The husband of Huldah (II K 22 14). 7. A son of King Josiah (I Ch 3 15; Jer 22 11), also called Jehoahaz (q.v.) (II K 23 30-34). 8. The father of Maaseiah (Jer 35 4). 9. The ancestral head of a family of porters (Ezr 2 42 = Neh 7 45; cf. I Ch 9 17, 19, 31), probably the same as Shelemiah (I Ch 26 14), Meshelemiah (I Ch 9 21, 26 1), and Meshullam (Neh 12 25). 10. A porter (Ezr 10 24). 11. One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 49). 12. The son of Hallohesheh, and one of those who helped on the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 12). 13. (Also spelled Shallun). The son of Colhozeh, and ruler of the district of Mizpah, who repaired the fountain-gate of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 15). E. E. N.

SHALLUN. See SHALLUM, 13.

SHALMAI, shal'mai, -mē, or shal'mā-ai. See SALMAI.

SHALMAN, shal'mān (שָׁלְמָן, shalmān): The name of the destroyer of Beth-arbel (Hos 10 14), which is commonly held to be a shorter form of 'Shalmaneser,' the name of several kings of Assyria. Wellhausen, ad loc., identifies him with Shalmaneser II, and considers the passage a later insertion. Schrader (COT II, 138 ff.) identifies him with a Moabite king, Salamanu, mentioned in the great triumphal inscription of Tiglath-pileser III, in which case he would have been a contemporary of Hosea. C. S. T.

SHALMANESER, shal'mān-i'zōr (שָׁלְמַנְאֶסֶר, shalman'ešer; Assyr., Shulmanu-asharidu, 'The god Shulman is chief'): Of the five Assyrian kings of this name, the third and fifth are mentioned in the O T. Shalmaneser III ruled 859-825 B.C. He came directly into contact with Ahab and his allies at the battle of Karkar in 854 B.C., and collected tribute of Jehu in 842 B.C. The latter event was commemorated by extensive bas-reliefs on the so called Black Obelisk discovered by Layard at Nimrud in 1845. Shalmaneser V (727-722 B.C.) succeeded the great Tiglath-pileser III (II K 17 3, 18 9). This king, of whom we have no known inscriptions, showed great activity, according to Josephus (Ant. IX, 14, 2), in campaigning against Phœnician and Palestinian cities. Hoshea, the last ruler of the Northern Kingdom, at first paid him tribute under his oath to Tiglath-pileser III, but ultimately formed an alliance with So, the King of Egypt, and refused payment. This defiance brought on war, Hoshea was taken captive, and Samaria besieged three years (II K 17 3-5). Some time during this siege Shalmaneser dropped out of sight, and Sargon II assumed the throne and concluded the long siege by capturing the city in Dec., 722 B.C. I. M. P.

SHAMA, shē'mā (שָׁמָא, shāma'), 'he hears': One of David's heroes (I Ch 11 44).

SHAMARIAH, sham'ā-rai'a. See SHEMARIAH, 2.

SHAMBLES: The Eng. word 'shambles' (from the Lat. scamellum, a 'stool,' or 'bench') meant originally the butchers' stalls, or benches, on which meat was laid for sale. The Gr. μάκελλον used in I Co 10 25 is really the Lat. word macellum, a 'meat or provision market.' E. E. N.

SHAME: This term renders (1) bōsh, 'put to shame,' and derivatives. (2) hārāph, 'reproach,' 'shame,' and derivatives. (3) kālam, 'humiliate,' and derivatives. (4) qālōn, 'ignominy.' (5) erwāh 'nakedness,' 'pudenda' (rendered 'shame' only in Is 20 4). (6) hāzadh, 'be reproached' (Pr 25 10). (7) hāphēr, 'to be abashed,' 'ashamed' (Pr 13 5; Ps 71 24, 83 17 (18); Is 54 4). (8) shimtsāh, 'whispering' (Ex 32 25, 'derision' RV). (9) aisxōros, 'dishonorable' (I Co 11 6, 14 35; Eph 5 12); αἰσχρόν, the 'sense of shame' (Lk 14 9), 'ignominy,' visited on one (He 12 2) which should arise from guilt (Ph 3 19), 'a thing to be ashamed of' (Rev 3 18; Jude ver. 13); καταίσχύνειν, 'to dishonor,' 'put to shame' (I Co 11 22). (10) ἀτιμάζω, 'dishonor' (I Co 11 14). (11) ἐντρέπειν, 'to arouse sense of shame' (I Co 4 14), ἐντροπή, 'shame' (I Co 6 5, 15 34). (12) παράδειγματίζειν, 'to expose to public disgrace' (Heb 6 6).

The term 'shame' is used for the subjective feeling, either for oneself or for another, expressed by 'ashamed,' 'put to shame,' etc.; and also for the objective cause. The feeling of shame may be awakened by sins of various kinds and degrees (Ezk 16 27, 54; Pr 10 5, 29 15, 13 5; Jer 2 26; Pr 11 2; I Co 4 14; II Co 4 2, etc.); by unconventionalities (I Co 11 6, 14 35; Eph 5 12); by exposure of the body (II 6 20; Is 20 4; Mic 1 11; fig. Rev 3 18, 16 15; also, where 'shame' stands for the parts uncovered, Is 47 3; Jer 13 28; Nah 3 5); by reproach, insult, contumely, or actual maltreatment of the person at the hands of another (Jg 18 7; Is 50 6; He 12 2; I S 20 34; Ps 69 7 [8]; II S 13 13; Mk 12 4; I Th 2 2; He 6 6, etc.); by the disgrace or act of another closely related to the individual (Pr 12 4, 10 5, 29 15); by betrayal, disaster, disappointment (Jer 2 36; Is 20 5; Ps 83 16 [17], 'confusion' RV; Jl 1 11, 'confounded' RV; Ps 119 118). It is especially as a punishment of individuals or nations by God for sin that shame comes, and the righteous desire to be avenged by having the ungodly be made ashamed (Ezk 16 52; Is 22 18; Ps 132 18, etc.). In Hos 9 10; Jer 3 24, 11 13, bōsheth, 'shameful thing' RV, has evidently been substituted for the deity name ba'al, (which in earlier times was often used even of J " [cf. Hos 2 16]). Cf. the similar substituttion in proper names (Jerubbesheth, II S 11 21 = Jerubbaal, Jg 6 32; Ishbosheth, II S 2 8, 10 = Eshbaal, I Ch 8 33, 9 39); see BAAL, and these names.

C. S. T.

SHAMED, shē'med. See SHEMED.

SHAMER, shē'mar. See SHEMER.

SHAMGAR, sham'gar (שָׁמְגָר, shamgar): The son of Anath, and the first of the six minor judges (Jg 3 31) who smote 600 Philistines and delivered Israel. In Jg 5 6 no mention is made of such a deliverance, and here the foes are the Canaanites. The name S. is foreign, perhaps Hittite or Philistine, and Anath is the name of a Canaanite goddess. His deed is analogous to that of Samson (Jg 15 15) and Shammah (II S 23 11 f.). Jg 3 31 seems to be a late insertion, as 4 1 follows 3 30, and many think that Shamgar was put in, in order not to have Abimelech counted among the twelve judges. C. S. T.

SHAMHUTH, sham'huth (שָׁמְחֻת, shamhuth): An Izrahite, one of David's captains (I Ch 27 8); probably the same as Shammah (II S 23 25) and Shammoth (I Ch 11 27).

SHAMIR, shē'mar (שָׁמִיר, shāmīr): I. A Levite of the sons of Micah (I Ch 24 24; shāmūr (K'thūh)). II. 1. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 48). It is identified with Khīrbet Sōmara, SW. of Hebron, a ruin with walls, caves, graves, and cisterns. 2. A town of Issachar in the hill-country of Ephraim and the home of Tola (Jg 10 1 f.); probably in the NE. near the Plain of Jezreel. C. S. T.

SHAMMA, sham'ma (שָׁמָא, shammā'): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 37).

SHAMMAH, sham'a (שָׁמָה, shammāh): 1. A son of Reuel, the son of Esau, and an Edomite chief (Gn 36 13, 17; I Ch 1 37). 2. The third son of Jesse (I S 16 9), and father of Jonadab, the friend of Ammon (II S 13 3, 32, Shimeah, shim'āh) and of Jonathan, who slew a giant (II S 21 21, Shimei, shim'eī, (Q'rī shim'e'a); I Ch 20 7; cf. 2 13, Shimea, Shimma AV, shim'e'a). He followed Saul to battle (I S 17 13). 3. The son of Agee the Hararite, one of David's three chief heroes (II S 23 11), and father of Jonathan, one of David's thirty (II S 23 32 f., read Jonathan, son of Shammah; cf. I Ch 11 34, 'J., son of Shagee'). 4. A Harodite, one of David's thirty (II S 23 25; the same as 'Shammoth the Harorite,' I Ch 11 27, and 'Shamhuth the Izrahite,' I Ch 27 8, the captain of the fifth monthly course under Solomon). C. S. T.

SHAMMAI, sham'a-ai or sham'e (שָׁמַי, shammay, contracted form of 'Shemaiah'): 1. The ancestor of a Jerahmeelite family (I Ch 2 28, 32). 2. The ancestor of a Calebite family near Maon (I Ch 2 44 f.). 3. A descendant of Caleb, son of Jephunneh (I Ch 4 17).

SHAMMOTH, sham'oth. See SHAMHUTH.

SHAMMUA, sha-miū'a, (שָׁמְוָא, 'shammū'a'), 'heard': 1. One of the spies (Nu 13 4). 2. A son of David (II S 5 14 Shammuah AV; I Ch 14 4; called Shimea in 3 5). 3. The head of a course of priests (Neh 12 18). 4. A Levite (Neh 11 17); see also SHEMAIAH.

SHAMSHERAI, sham'shi-rai, -rē, or sham''shu-rē'ai (שָׁמְשֵׁרַי, shamsh'ray): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 26).

SHAPHAM, shē'fām (שָׁפָחַם, shāphām): A Gadite clan (I Ch 5 12).

SHAPHAN, shē'fān (שָׁפָחַן, shāphān): 1. A son of Azaliah, a scribe of Josiah's time. It was Shaphan who received the Book of the Law from the hands of the high priest Hilkiah (II K 22 8 f.) and conveyed it to the king. Afterward, he was sent to Huldah the prophetess, to consult her regarding some of the contents of the book. 2. The father of Ahikam (Jer 26 24, 29 34) possibly, but not probably, the same as 1. 3. The father of Gemariah (Jer 36 10) and Jaazaniah (Ezk 8 11), probably the same as 1. 4. The father of Elisah (Jer 29 3), probably the same as 2. E. E. N.

SHAPHAT, shē'fat (שָׁפָחַת, shāphāt), 'He has judged': 1. One of the spies (Nu 13 5). 2. A Gadite clan (I Ch 5 12). 3. One of David's herdsmen (I Ch 27 29). 4. The father of Elisha the prophet (I K 19, 16, etc.). 5. A late descendant of David (I Ch 3 22).

SHAPHER, shē'fir. See SHEFER.

SHAPHIR, shē'fir or shaf'ir (שָׁפִיר, shāphīr, Saphir AV): A town of Judah (Mic 1 11). Map II, C 1.

SHARAI, shā-rē'ai, shē'rē, or shar'a-ai (שָׂרַי, shāray): One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 40).

SHARAIM, shā-rē'im or shar'a-im. See SHAA-RAIM.

SHARAR, shē'rar (שָׂרַר, shārār): The father of Abiam, one of David's heroes (II S 23 33), called Sacar in I Ch 11 35.

SHARE. See FLOW.

SHAREZER, shā-rī'zōr (שָׂרְזֵר, sar'etser): 1. One of the sons of Sennacherib (II K 19 37=Is 37 38). The Assyrian form of the name may have been shar-utsur, 'protect the prince.' With Adrammelech (Assyr. Adar-malku), his brother, he slew his father while he was worshipping in the house of his god Nisroch (Akkad. Nusku), tho neither name has been identified in the cuneiform records of the event. The Babylonian Chronicle and the records of Nabonidus agree that Sennacherib was slain by one of his sons, but no name is given, tho the place was probably at the entrance of the temple of Ninurta (see SENNACHERIB). 2. A contemporary of Zechariah the prophet (Zec 7 2, Sharezer AV) who was sent from Bethel to Jerusalem to inquire of the priests whether the returned exiles should still persist in observing the fasts which were instituted in commemoration of the dates of the disasters that had befallen Jerusalem and the Jewish people about 588-586 B.C. I. M. P.

SHARON, shār'on (שָׂרֹן, shārōn), probably from a root meaning 'plain' or 'level country': 1. The undulating plain extending from Joppa and Ramleh northward along the Mediterranean coast to Mt. Carmel; about 50 m. long and varying from 6 to 12 m. in breadth. Map III, C 4, D 1, 2, 3. It is unusually fertile (Is 65 10; Song 2 1). The oak still flourishes in the northern portion as probably in the days of Isaiah (35 2); the southern portion is richly cultivated. In early spring the luxuriant grass and richly colored flowers render this plain the garden of Palestine. Unfortunately, the sand-dunes along the sea are persistently encroaching upon it. Shitrai the Sharonite (I Ch 27 29) was over David's herds that fed in Sharon. It is once mentioned in the N T (Ac 9 35, Saron AV). See also PALESTINE, § 11. 2. A region E. of the Jordan (I Ch 5 10), which, however, is better identified with the elevated plateau or table-land in Gilead between the Arnon and Heshbon (cf. Dt 3 10). G. L. R.

SHARONITE, shār'an-ait. See SHARON.

SHARUHEN, shā-rū'hen (שָׂרְהֵן, shārūhen): An ancient city in S. Palestine whither the Hyksos fled when expelled from Egypt. Counted as a city of Simeon (Jos 19 6), the same as Shilhim (15 32) and Shaaraim (I Ch 4 31). See SHAA-RAIM.

SHASHAI, shē'shai, -shē or shash'a-ai (שָׁשַׁי, shāshay): One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 40).

SHASHAK, shē'shak (שָׁשָׁק, shāshaq): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 14, 26).

SAUL, shē'ol or shōl (שָׁאֻל, shā'ul), 'asked for'; cf. Saul: 1. The ancestral head of a Simeonite clan of mixed blood (Gn 46 10; Ex 6 15, etc.), the Shaulites (Nu 26 13). 2. A king of Edom, from Rehoboth by the River' (Gn 36 37 f., Saul AV; I Ch 1 48 f.). perhaps of Aramean origin. 3. A descendant of Levi (I Ch 6 24, called Joel in ver. 38). See also SAUL.

SHAVE, SHAVING: This is the translation of (1) gāzuz (only Job 1 20), usually 'shear.' (2) gālah, 'shave,' for which ḥupān is used in LXX. and N T. (3) The AV rendering of a phrase (Nu 8 7) which is given more literally in RV, 'cause a razor to pass over.' Shaving was a means of purification from plague (Lv 13 33), leprosy (Lv 14 8 f.), defilement (Nu 6 9, 8 7). A captive female slave was to shave her head before her marriage, as a sign that her forlorn condition was at an end (Dt 21 12). An Arabian widow terminates her period of mourning by a similar act. The shaving of the head and beard as a sign of mourning (Dt 14 1; Jer 41 5) was forbidden the priests (Lv 21 5; Ezk 44 20). When the vow of a Nazirite was fulfilled, he shaved his head (Nu 6 18; Ac 21 24). In II S 10 4=I Ch 19 4 the shaving of the beard was to put the men to shame. Cf. HAIR; RAZOR. C. S. T.

SHAVEH, shē've (שָׁוֶה, shāwēh), 'level': A 'vale' (i.e., a broad open valley) where the king of Sodom met Abram returning from the rescue of Lot (Gn 14 17). It was probably the place near Jerusalem called the 'King's Dale' (q.v. and cf. II S 18 18).

SHAVEH - KIRIATHIAM, -kir''i-a-thē'im (שָׁוֶה יְרִיאתִיָּם, shāwēh qiryāthayim), 'the level [place] of Kiriathaim': The locality where Chedorlaomer smote the Emim (Gn 14 5). Probably the same as Kiriathaim. Map II, I 2.

SHAVSHA, shav'shā (שָׁוְשָׁה, shavshā): A person mentioned in the list of David's chief officials (I Ch 18 16) as scribe, or secretary. He was the officer entrusted with all the state papers. The name is Aramaic, and it is quite probable that foreign correspondence necessitated the employment of an alien. In I K 4:3 Solomon's scribes, Elihoreph and Abijah, are called sons of Shishai, who is to be identified with Shavsha (the Old Latin version reads 'Shavsha'). In the two lists of David's officials in II S Seraiah is the scribe in 8:17, and Sheva in 20:25. These are scribal errors for 'Shavsha.' J. A. K.

SHAWL. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 6.

SHEAF. See AGRICULTURE, § 5.

SHEAL, shi'el (שֵׁאֵל, shē'āl): One of 'the sons of Bani' (Ezr 10:29).

SHEALTIEL, she-al'ti-el (שֵׁאֲלִיֵּאל, shē'al'ti'el), 'I have asked God': A son of the captive King Jeconiah, and the father of Zerubbabel, according to Ezr 3:2, 8:5; Neh 12:1; Hag 1:1, 12, 14, 2:2, 23. But I Ch 3:18 says that Zerubbabel was the son of Pedaiiah, brother of S., and good grounds have been urged for the correctness of the text of Ch (see Kittel, Hand-Kom. 2. A T, ad loc.; and Curtis in ICC). In the LXX. and the N T (AV) S. takes the form Salathiel (Mt 1:12; Lk 3:27). E. E. N.

SHEAR. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, § 7.

SHEARIAH, shi'a-rai'a (שִׁיֵּאֲרִיָּה, shē'aryāh): A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8:38, 9:44).

SHEARING-HOUSE. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, § 7.

SHEAR-JASHUB, shi'er-jash'ub or -jē'shub (שִׁיֵּאֲרָאֲשׁוּב, shē'ar yāshūb), 'a remnant shall return': A son of Isaiah (Is 7:3; cf. 8:18, 10:20 f.).

SHEATH. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 2.

SHEBA, shi'ba (שֵׁבָא, shēbā): I. 1. The ancestral head of a Gadite family (I Ch 5:13). 2. A Benjamite who led a revolt against David soon after Absalom's death. The motive was, doubtless, jealousy on the part of the Benjamites (Saul's tribe) of David's success in quelling Absalom's rebellion, which they had hoped would end in dethroning David's dynasty. S. was unsuccessful and, besieged at Abel in N. Israel, he met his fate at the hands of the inhabitants (II S 20:1-22). II. 1. A region in Arabia; see ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 11, 13; and SABEAN. 2. A town in Simeon, according to Jos 19:2, but this is probably a textual error for Shema (Jos 15:26; the same as Jeshua [q.v.] Neh 11:28). E. E. N.

SHEBAH, shi'ba. See SHIBAH.

SHEBAM, shi'bām. See SEBAM.

SHEBANIAH, shēb'a-nai'a (שִׁבְנִיָּה, shēbhan-yāh), and שִׁבְנִיָּה, shēbhan-yāh, 'J' has brought me back': 1. A Temple musician (I Ch 15:24). 2. A Levite who assisted Ezra (Neh 9:4 f.; possibly also 10:12). 3. Another Levite (Neh 10:10; but many MSS. read here Shechaniah). 4. A priest (Neh 10:4, 12:14, called Shechaniah in ver. 3).

SHEBARIM, shēb'a-rim (שִׁבְרִים, shēbhārīm), 'broken [pieces]': Possibly 'the quarries' rather than a place-name; exact site unknown (Jos 7:5).

SHEBAT, shi'bāt (שִׁבָּט, shēbhāt, Sebat AV): The eleventh month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3.

SHEBER, shi'bār (שִׁבָּר, shēbher): A son of the Jerahmeelite Caleb (I Ch 2:48).

SHEBNA, shēb'nā (שִׁבְנָא, shēbhnā'), SHEBNAH, shēb'nā (שִׁבְנָה, shēbhnāh) (II K 18:18, 26): The steward of King Hezekiah's house, and, apparently, a foreigner and man of wealth (Is 22:15-18). He looked upon himself, however, as permanently identified with Judah, since he had a magnificent mausoleum built for himself. The prophet Isaiah rebuked him, and predicted that he should not rest in this sepulcher. His retirement from office took place in 701, when Eliakim was given his place. But, in a passage of subsequent date (Is 36:3, 11, 22, 37:2), he is spoken of as 'secretary,' which may mean either that the office of scribe was a degradation from that of steward, or that the dating of the passage is based upon an error. A. C. Z.

SHEBUEL, shi-biū'el or shēb'yu-el (שִׁבְיֹוֹאֵל, shēbū'el): 1. The ancestor of a family of Gershonite Levites (I Ch 23:16, 26:24, Shubael in 24:20). 2. The ancestor of a family of singers (I Ch 25:4. Shubael in ver. 20).

SHECANIAH, SHECHANIAH, shēk'a-nai'a (שִׁכְנִיָּה, shēkhan-yāh), 'J' hath taken up His abode': 1. The head of a family descended from David (I Ch 3:21 f.; Ezr 8:3, 5). 2. A priest to whom the tenth lot fell (I Ch 24:11 = Shebaniah, Neh 10:4, 12:14), the representative of a priestly family which returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12:3). 3. The son of Jehiel. He confessed the sin of having a foreign wife (Ezr 10:2). 4. The keeper of the east gate and father of a wallbuilder (Neh 3:29). 5. The father-in-law of Tobiah (Neh 6:18). 6. A priest in charge of apportioning the free-will offerings for the priests (II Ch 31:15). C. S. T.

SHECHEM, shi'kom (שִׁכֶּם, shēchem), 'the neck and shoulders,' or 'the back': I. An important city in the hill-country of Ephraim, situated in the narrow valley (100 yds. wide) between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, on the great highway between Judea and Galilee (Jos. Ant. IV, 8:44). Map III, F 3. According to Eusebius (Onom.), the city owed its name to Shechem, 'the son of Hamor the Hivite, the prince of the land' (Gn 34:2, 33:18, 19). More probably the name, which means 'shoulder' or 'back,' was assigned to this place because it lay on the watershed between the Mediterranean and the Jordan Valley. Jerome (Ep. Pan. xvi) identified it with the modern Nāblus, the same as the Flavia Neapolis of Vespasian. Josephus (BJ, IV, 8:1) knew it by the ancient name Mabortha or Mabartha, signifying 'pass' or 'crossing.' S. is frequently mentioned in the O T. Abram, on entering Canaan, built an altar there (Gn 12:6, 7). When Jacob returned from Paddan-aram 'he bought the parcel of ground, where he had spread his tent,' and erected an altar (33:18-20). Jacob gave to Joseph 'one portion,' literally, 'one shēchem' (Gn 48:21, 22). From the heights of Ebal and Gerizim the laws of Dt were promulgated (Dt 27:12-14; Jos 8:33-35). By the inhabitants of S., Abimelech, the son of Gideon, was made king; and when they rebelled against him he captured their city and sowed its site with salt (Jg ch. 9). At S. the northern tribes revolted against Rehoboam (I K ch. 12), and Jeroboam the son of Nebat 'built,' i.e., added something to the city's walls or fortifications (I K 12 25). When Samaria was made the capital of N. Israel in Omri's time, S. naturally declined in political importance. Two centuries later it became the chief city of the Samaritans (Sir 50 26; Jos. Ant. XI, 8 6). In Nehemiah's time these built a temple on Mt. Gerizim which was destroyed by John Hyrcanus (129 B.C.). To-day the remnant of the Samaritans—the smallest religious sect in the world, numbering not more than 140 souls—resides in S. and continues to worship on Mt. Gerizim.

Shechem and Its Environs.

S. is the center of hallowed associations. About 1½ m. E. from the city on the main road to Jerusalem is Jacob's well (Bir Ya'qub), at which Jesus met the woman of Samaria (Jn 4 5 ff.). Less than ½ m. N. of Jacob's well is the traditional tomb of Joseph (Kabr Yusuf). About midway between these and the city is the village of Ballata, the name of which seems to preserve the Aramaic word for oak (ballat) and perhaps also gives a hint as to the location of the 'oaks of Moreh,' under which Jacob buried the idols of his household (Gn 12 6, 35 4; Jos 24 26; Jg 9 6). The site of S. was excavated by the Germans in 1913-14. On the basis of Ac 7 16, a tradition grew up in the early Church that Jacob's twelve sons were buried at S., but Josephus says they were buried at Hebron (Ant. II 8 2). The present population of Nablus is approximately 25,000. Its altitude above sea-level is 1,870 ft. Copious fountains supply it with good water.

G. L. R.

II. 1. The son of Hamor, a Canaanite prince, who because of his treatment of Dinah, daughter of Jacob, was attacked by her brothers Simeon and Levi, and with the men of Shechem (the town) put to death (Gn 33 18-34 31). This story symbolically (Shechem, the individual = the town, etc.) portrays some ancient struggle or struggles between Israelite tribes and the Canaanite city, rather than as between individuals. Its exact interpretation is beset by apparently insuperable difficulties (cf. Skinner in ICC, Gn, p. 421 f.). 2. The eponymous name of a clan or family of Manasseh, the Shechemites (Nu 26 31; Jos 17 2). 3. A son of Shemidah (I Ch 7 19).
E. E. N.

SHECHEMITE, shi'kem-ait. See SHECHEM, II, 2.

SHEDEUR, shed'i-ur (שְׁדִיעִיר, sh'dhē'ūr): 'Shad-dai is light': A chief of Reuben (Nu 1 5, 2 10, etc.).

SHEEP, SHEPHERD. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 10; PALESTINE, § 24; and NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, §§ 4 ff.

SHEEP - COTE, SHEEP-FOLD. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, §§ 4 ff.

SHEEP-GATE. See JERUSALEM, § 38.

SHEERAH, shi'i-ra (שֵׁרָא, she'rah, Sherah AV): An Ephraimite clan inhabiting Beth-horon (both Upper and Lower) and Uzen-sheerah (I Ch 7 24). The location of Uzen-sheerah is unknown.

Types of Shepherds' Crooks.

SHEET: (1) The pl. 'sheets' is the AV rendering of the Heb. ṣ'dhūm in Jg 14 12 f., correctly rendered 'linen garment' in RV. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 2. (2) The rendering of the Gr. ὀθὺν, 'linen,' or, 'fine linen' (Ac 10 11, 11 5). In postclassical Gr. ὀθὺν was used of sails and sail-cloth, and this is probably its signification here.

SHEHARIAH, shi'hə-rai'a (שְׁהַרְיָא, she'haryāh), 'J' is the dawn': A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 26).

SHEKEL. See MONEY.

SHEKEL OF THE SANCTUARY. See MONEY, § 3; and WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4.

SHEKINAH, shi-kai'na, shi-, shek'e-na, or she-kai'na: A late Jewish term denoting the idea of God's abiding presence among His people through His glory. It is derived from a root, shkn, meaning 'to dwell,' and may be translated 'that which abides.' From this comes the word mishkān, one of the terms used for the Tabernacle. The Biblical antecedents of the conception begin with God's revealing His presence through the symbol of light (as in the burning bush, q.v.). In the account of the approach of Moses to Him on Mount Sinai a thick cloud is pictured as resting on the top of the mountain, an within it the glory of J' in the form of a devouring flame (Ex 24 16-18). And in the finished Tabernacle the presence of God was signified by day through a cloud, which by night was either seen to go up or was supplanted by fire (Ex 40 34, 38). But in the intertestamental period, first, the name 'Shekinah' is fixed, and, secondly, its meaning is changed from that of a symbol of the Divine presence to that of an aspect of divinity embodied and made visible to the physical eye. A distinction, moreover, is drawn between the Shekinah and the glory. The glory is the visible form of the Shekinah; and, conversely, the Shekinah is the substance of the glory. Thus in the Targums, all the instances where J' is reported as moving from one place to another are rendered by the substitution of the word 'Shekinah' for the Divine name. Likewise, where God is said to dwell at any place, in the Heb. text the Targums render 'cause His Shekinah to dwell' (cf. Gn 28 16; Ex 25 8; I K 8 12; Zec 8 3). The motive for resorting to the creation of such an intermediate being between the Godhead and His glory was undoubtedly the growth of the idea of transcendence, which tended to exalt God as far as possible by removing Him from the possibility of immediate touch with coarse matter and sinful man. This tendency was brought to its fullest development by Philo, who attributed to God an absolutely abstract being and an eternal, unchangeable substance (cf. Drummond, Philo, II, 23-30).

In the N T, neither the doctrine nor the name appears. But the influence of the Jewish view may be seen in the different concepts given to the term 'glory.' The glory is, for instance, enumerated by Paul along with the covenant, the Law, the ritual, and the promises as constituting the privileges of the Jews, which scarcely leaves room for doubting that by the term 'glory' the Shekinah is meant (cf. also He 1 3, 9 5). Traces of the same conception are to be found in Ro 6 4; I P 4 14 and Ja 2 1. See also GLORY.

SHELAH, shi'la: 1. (שֵׁלָה, shēlāh). A son of Judah (Gn 38 5 ff., etc.), the ancestor of the Shelanites (Nu 26 20). 2. (שֵׁלָה, shēlāh). A son of Arpachshad (Gn 10 24, 11 12-15, Salah AV; I Ch 1 18, 24; Lk 3 35, Sala AV, Gr. Σαλα).

SHELEMIAS, shēl'i-mai'a (שֵׁלֵמְיָא, shelem-yāh[ā]): 1. A Levite doorkeeper of the Tabernacle (I Ch 26 14). 2, 3. Two of the 'sons of Bani' who had foreign wives (Ezr 10 39, 41). 4. The father of Hananiah, a repairer of the wall (Neh 3 30). 5. A priest, appointed a treasurer by Nehemiah (Neh 13 13)=3 or 4 (?). 6. A son of Cush (Jer 36 14), probably of Egyptian origin. 7. A son of Abdeel, commanded by Jehoikim to take Baruch and Jeremiah (Jer 36 26). 8. The father of Jehucal (Jer 37 3, 38 1). 9. The father of Irijah (Jer 37 13).

SHELEPH, shi'lef. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

SHELESH, shi'lesh (שְׁלֹשׁ, shēlesh): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 35).

SHELOMI, shi-lō'mai or shel'o-mai (שֵׁלֹמִי, shē-lōmī): The father of Ahihud, prince of Asher (Nu 34 27).

SHELOMITH, shi-lō'mith or shel'o-mith (שֵׁלֹמִית, shē-lōmīth), 'peacefulness' (?): 1. The mother of the Israelite who blasphemed the name of J' (Lv 24 11.) 2. A Levite (I Ch 23 9, Shelomoth RV). 3. The head of a Levite family (I Ch 23 18, Shelomoth in 24 22). 4. A descendant of 3 (I Ch 26 25-28, Shelomoth RV). 5. A son of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 20). 6. The ancestor of a postexilic family (Ezr 8 10). 7. A daughter of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 19).

SHELOMOTH, shē-lō'meth or shel'o-meth. See SHELOMITH, 2, 3, 4.

SHELUMIEL, shi-liū'mi-el (שֵׁלֻמִּיֵּל, shē-lūmī'ēl), 'God is conciliated' (?): A chief of Simeon (Nu 1 6, 2 12, etc.).

SHEM, shem (שֵׁם, shēm, in Lk 3 36 AV Sem, Gr. Σημ): The eldest son of Noah (Gn 5 32, etc.). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, §§ 2, 5, 8-11.

SHEMA, shi'ma (שָׁמָא, shāma), 'he has heard' (abbreviated from Shemaiah): I. 1. A Jerahmeelite clan (I Ch 2 43 f.). 2. A Reubenite (I Ch 5 8). 3. A Benjaminite clan (I Ch 8 13). 4. One of Ezra's assistants (Neh 8 4). II. A city of Judah (Jos 15 26), or Simeon, perhaps the Sheba of 19 2. See JESHUA, II.

SHEMAAH, shi-mē'a or shem'a-a (שֵׁמָא, shēma-āh): The father of Ahiezer and Joash, two of David's warriors (I Ch 12 3).

SHEMAIAH, shi-mē'ya (שֵׁמַיָּה, shēma'yāh[ā]), 'J' hath heard': 1. A prophet who counseled Rehoboam not to war against Israel (I K 12 22=II Ch 11 2). He also brought Rehoboam and his people to repentance, when Shishak attacked Jerusalem (II Ch 12 5, 7). He is said to have written histories of his time (II Ch 12 15). 2. The father of Uriah the prophet (Jer 26 20). 3. The Nehelamite, a false prophet, deported to Babylon, who answered Jeremiah's letter to the Babylonian exiles with a complaint concerning him to the priest Zephaniah. Jeremiah prophesied that for this he would die in exile (Jer 29 24-32). 4. The father of Delaiah (Jer 36 12). 5. A son of Shecaniah and the father of Hattush (I Ch 3 22). 6. The head of a Simeonite family (I Ch 4 37). 7. The head of a Reubenite family (I Ch 5 4). 8. A Levite (I Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15). 9. A Levite (I Ch 9 16=Shammua, Neh 11 17). 10. A Kohathite chief (I Ch 15 8, 11). 11. A Levite, the son of Nathaneel, who recorded the allotment of priestly offices in the time of David (I Ch 24 6). 12. A son of Obed-edom (I Ch 26 4, 6, 7). 13. A Levite sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (II Ch 17 8). 14. A son of Jeduthun, who helped to cleanse the Temple in the days of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 14). 15. A Levite in charge of the distribution of the free-will offerings in the cities of the priests (II Ch 31 15). 16. A chief Levite under Josiah (II Ch 35 9). 17. A son of Adonikam who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 13). 18. One sent by Ezra to Iddo to ask for ministers for the house of God (Ezr 8 16). 19. A man with a foreign wife (Ezr 10 31). 20. A builder of the wall (Neh 3 29). 21. One who tried to intimidate Nehemiah (Neh 6 10 ff.). 22. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 12 6, 18, 35) and sealed the covenant (Neh 10 8). 23. A prince of Judah who took part in the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 34). 24. A priest who also assisted in the service of dedication (Neh 12 36). 25. A priest who gave thanks at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 42). 26. A priest with a foreign wife (Ezr 10 21). C. S. T.

SHEMARIAH, shem''a-rai'a (שְׁמַרְיָהוּ, shemariyāhū), 'J' guards': 1. One of David's warriors (I Ch 12 5). 2. A son of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 19, Shame-riah AV). 3. One of 'the sons of Harim' (Ezr 10 32). 4. One of 'the sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 41).

SHEMEBER, shem-i'ber or shem'i-ber (שְׁמַעְבֶּר, shem'ebher): The king of Zeboim (Gn 14 2), conquered by Chedorlaomer (vs. 9 ff.).

SHEMED, shī'med (שְׁמַד, shemedh, Shamed AV; many Heb. MSS. read 'Shemer'): A Benjamite clan inhabiting Ono and Lod (I Ch 8 12).

SHEMER, shī'mer (שְׁמֶר, shemer): 1. The ancestral head of an Asherite clan (I Ch 7 34, in ver. 32 called Shomer). 2. The owner of the hill which Omri purchased for his capital, Samaria (I K 16 24). 3. A Levite (I Ch 6 46). 1 and 3 are given as Shamer in AV. See also SHEMED.

SHEMIDA, shī-mai'de (שְׁמִידָה, shemīdā): The ancestral head of a Gileadite clan, the Shemidaites, counted as of Manassite descent (Nu 26 32; Jos 17 2; I Ch 7 19, Shemidah AV).

SHEMINITH, shem'i-nith. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (4); and PSALMS, § 3.

SHEMIRAMOTH, shī-mir'a-mōth (שְׁמִירָמוֹת, shemīrāmōth): 1. A Levite musician (I Ch 15 18, 20, 16 5). 2. A Levite teacher (II Ch 17 8).

SHEMUEL, shī-miū'el or shem'yū-el (שְׁמוּאֵל, shemū'el), 'name of God' (see SAMUEL): 1. The 'prince' of Simeon (Nu 34 20). 2. The ancestral head of a clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2). On I Ch 6 33 AV, see SAMUEL (the prophet).

SHEN, shen (שֵׁן, shēn), 'tooth': Samuel is said to have set up a stone between Mizpah and 'the Shen' (I S 7 12). The LXX. indicates that the original reading was 'Jeshanah,' a place mentioned in II Ch 13 19. See also EBENEZER. E. E. N.

SHENAZZAR, shin-az'zār (שְׁנַצְצָר, shen'atstsar): A son of Jeconiah, the captive king of Judah (I Ch 3 18). The name is probably of Babylonian origin (perhaps Sin-ušur or Sin-shar-ušur). The identification with Sheshbazzar (Ezr 1 8, 11) is possible, but not certain. E. E. N.

SHENIR, shī'nur. See *SENI*R.

SHEOL, shī'ōl. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 3; and ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 18-21, 38.

SHEPHAM, shī'fām (שְׁפָחָם, shephām): A place on the N. border of Canaan (Nu 34 11). Site unknown.

SHEPHATIAH, shef''a-tai'a (שְׁפַתְיָהוּ, shephat'yāh), 'J' has judged': 1. A son of David by Abital (II S 3 4; I Ch 3 3). 2. A Haruphite, one of David's warriors (I Ch 12 5). 3. The ruler of the tribe of Simeon (I Ch 27 16). 4. A son of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 21 2). 5. A noble who opposed Jeremiah (Jer 38 1). 6. The ancestral head of a postexilic family (Ezr 2 4, 8 8; Neh 7 9), and 7 of a family of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59). 8. The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 9 8). 9. The ancestor of a Judahite family (Neh 11 4).

SHEPHER, shī'for (שִׁפּוֹר, shepher, Shapher AV), 'beautiful': A mountain (Nu 33 23 f.). Site unknown.

SHEPHERD. See NOMADIC AND PASTORAL LIFE, §§ 4 ff.

SHEPHI, shī'fai, SHEPHO, shī'fō (שִׁפּוֹ, shephā [Gn], שִׁפּוֹ, shephō [Ch]): A Horite clan (Gn 36 23; I Ch 1 40).

SHEPHUPHAM, shī-fiū'fām (שְׁפֻחָם, shephūphām), and SHEPHUPHAN, shī-fiū'fān (שְׁפֻחָן, shephūphān): The ancestral head of the Shuphamites (Nu 26 39), a clan of Benjamin (Nu 26 39, Shupham AV; I Ch 8 5). Cf. Gn 46 21 and see MUPPIM.

SHERAH, shī'ra. See SHEERAH.

SHERD. See POTSHERD.

SHEREBIAH, sher''i-bai'a (שְׁרֵבְיָהוּ, shērēbhyāh): A prominent Levite in the days of Ezra (Ezr 8 18, 24, where 'priests' should be corrected to 'Levites'; Neh 8 7, 9 4 f., 10 12, 12 8, 24).

SHERESH, shī'resh (שֵׁרֶשׁ, sheres): The ancestral head of a Manassite clan (I Ch 7 16).

SHEREZER, shī-r'zōr. See SHAREZER.

SHERIFF: The rendering of the obscure term שִׁרְיָה, tiphāyē' (Dn 3 2, 3), the meaning of which is uncertain.

SHESHACH, shī'shak (שֶׁשַׁךְ, shēshakh): A name for Babylon (Jer 25 26, 51 41, where it is parallel to Babylon), a form of Babel obtained by means of the so called Athbash, whereby the last letter of the alphabet is used for the first, the next last for the second, etc. C. S. T.

SHESHAI, shī'shai or -shē (שֶׁשַׁי, shēshay): One of several Canaanite clans or families, reputed to have been descended from 'Anak,' and of gigantic stature, who occupied Hebron. They were conquered by the Calebites (Nu 13 22; Jos 15 14; Jg 1 10). E. E. N.

SHESHAN, shī'shān (שֶׁשָׁן, shēshān): A Jerahmeelite who, having no sons (v. 34, apparently in conflict with v. 31) gave his daughter in marriage to an Egyptian, Jarha (I Ch 2 31 ff.). It is likely that clan-relations are reflected in these statements.

SHESHBAZZAR, shesh-baz'ar (שֶׁשֶׁבַצְצָר, shēshbatstsar): The personage with whom Cyrus at Babylon entrusted the sacred vessels of the former Temple in Jerusalem, when the Jews first returned from the Exile in 537-536 B.C. (Ezr 1 8, 11). He is also credited with having laid the foundations of the house of God in Jerusalem (Ezr 5 14, 16). The significance of his name and the identity of his person are much disputed. In Akkadian we find such names as Shesh-ba-tuk, Shesh-ki-lu-la, accounting for the first element of the name. He is also identified with Shenazzar of I Ch 3 18, which would make him an uncle of Zerubbabel. Still another theory would wholly identify him with Zerubbabel, making the word 'Sheshbazzar' a cryptogram, such as 'Leb-kamai' for 'Babylon' (Jer 51 1), and other instances in later times.

I. M. P.

SHETH, shēth (שֵׁת, shēth): A term rendered as a proper noun in Nu 24 17 AV. In RV, on the basis of a comparison with Jer 48 45, it is rendered 'tumult.' Some would read שֵׁת, 'pride.' E. E. N.

SHETHAR, shī'hār (שֵׁתָר, shēthār): One of the seven princes mentioned in Est 1 14. See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

SHETHAR-BOZENAI, -bez'i-nai (שֵׁתָר בִּזְנַי, shēthar bhōz'nay): One of the opponents of the returned exiles who tried to prevent the rebuilding of the Temple (Ezr 5 3, 6, 13). 'The real name was probably Shethar (as Est 1 14), and bhōz'nay is the unknown or corrupted title of his office' (so Batten in ICC, ad loc.). E. E. N.

SHEVA, shī'vā (שֵׁבַע, shēwā): 1. A Calebite clan (or individual?). inhabiting Machbena and Gibea (1 Ch 2 49). 2. David's scribe (II S 20 25). See SHAWSHA.

SHEWBREAD. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 13.

SHIBAH, shai'ba (שִׁבְעָה, shibh'āh [for שִׁבְעָה, Shebah AV), 'swearing'; but perhaps the original reading was שִׁבְעָה, shibh'ah, 'abundance' (see Skinner in ICC, ad loc.): The name of the well near Beer-sheba (Gn 26 33).

SHIBBOLETH, shib'o-leth (שִׁבְבוֹלֶת, shibboleth), 'stream': The test word of the Gileadites for the defeated Ephraimites at the Jordan (Jg 12 6), since the latter could say only shibboleth, wherein ש (s) represents a different order of sibilants from sh (sh). Parallels are found in the Sicilian Vespers, March, 1282, and the Flemish revolt, May, 1302, when the inability of Frenchmen to pronounce foreign phrases was the signal for their slaughter.

SHIBMAH, shib'ma. See SIBMAH.

SHICRON, shik'rōn or shai'krōn. See SHIKKRON.

SHIELD. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 7.

SHIGGAION, shi-gē'yōn, SHIGIONOTH, shig'-i-ō'nef or shi-gai'o-nef. See PSALMS, § 3.

SHIHON, shai'hōn. See SHION.

SHIHOR, shai'hōr. See NILE.

SHIHOR-LIBNATH, shai'hōr-lib'nath (שִׁחֹר לִבְנָת, shihōr libhnāth): A river on the border of Asher, possibly the Nahr ez-Zerkā S. of Mt. Carmel and just N. of Caesarea (Jos 19 26). C. S. T.

SHIKKRON, shik'i-rōn (שִׁכְרֹן, shikkārōn, Shicron AV), 'drunkenness': A town on the NW. border of Judah (Jos 15 11). Site unknown.

SHILHI, shil'hai (שִׁלְחִי, shilhī): The father of Azubah, the mother of Jehoshaphat (I K 22 42).

SHILHIM, shil'him (שִׁלְחִים, shilhīm): A city in the SW. of Judah (Jos 15 32), called Sharuhin (19 6) and Bhaaraim (I Ch 4 31). Site unknown.

SHILLEM, shil'em, SHILLEMITE, shil'em-ait. See SHALLUM.

SHILLING. See MONEY, § 9.

SHILOAH, shi-lō'a. See JERUSALEM, § 13.

SHILOH, shai'lō (שִׁלֹּחַ, shilōh): I. A place of considerable importance in Israelitic history. Its location is explicitly given (Jg 21 19) as being 'on the north of Bethel, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Bethel to Shechem,' and it has been identified with the modern Seilūn. Map III, F 4. With Tabernacle and Ark, Joshua moved his headquarters from Gilgal to Shiloh (Jos 18 18); it was here that the Benjamites secured wives by carrying off the virgins at a vintage festival (Jg 21 16 ff.). Under Eli and Samuel it figures prominently as a sanctuary, but the old Tabernacle seems to have given place to a permanent structure, called a temple (hēkhāl) in I S 19. It was probably destroyed by the Philistines at the time of the capture of the Ark (I S ch. 4; cf. Jer 26 6-8). Jeremiah predicts that the Temple at Jerusalem will meet a similar fate (Jer 26 8, 9). The city was rebuilt at a later period (Jer 41 5). In the 4th cent. Jerome refers to it as lying in ruins. Shilonite is applied to Ahijah the prophet as a dweller of Shiloh (I K 11 29, 14 2) and to a Judahite family (Neh 11 5; Shiloni AV is an error). Excavations at Shiloh in 1922 by the Danish Society seem to indicate that the site was not occupied until the conquest of Canaan by Israel and appear to confirm the O T statements as to its destruction (cf. Bul. ASOR, Feb., 1923).

II. 'Shiloh' occurs in the phrase 'until Shiloh come,' an enigmatical clause in Gn 49 10, which has taxed the ingenuity of interpreters in all ages. The context runs: 'The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the obedience of the peoples be.' This passage clearly assigns a position of preeminence to the tribe of Judah, and attributes to it a sovereignty over the nations, but the phrase 'until Shiloh come' does not convey an explicit idea to the reader. The following are the chief explanations suggested: (a) 'Shiloh' is taken as a personal name of the Messiah—'the Peaceful or the Peace-bringer.' Etymologically, these renderings are indefensible; historically, this interpretation is late, first occurring in a Talmudic tractate (Sanh. 98b), and the first version to incorporate it is that of Sebastian Münster, 1534. Further, the history of Messianic prophecy runs counter to this view, for the figure of a personal Messiah for the first time flashes across the mind of Isaiah. This exegesis has been universally discarded by modern scholars. Here may be mentioned the view which has been propounded recently by the modern eschatological school (Gunkel, Gressmann). They regard this passage as a proof-text for a preprophetic eschatology which looked forward to the advent of a great ruler, the founder of a world empire. With his coming Judah would relinquish his supremacy among the tribes. This view fails to explain how Judah's abdication would be a climax of blessing. (b) The readings of the ancient versions which point to the Hebrew word shilōh (short for 'asher lō, 'that which is to or for him'). The LXX. reads 'until there come that which [or he who] is his'; the Syriac and some MSS. of the LXX. 'till he come whose it [i.e., scepter] is' (cf. RVmg.). Consequently, we have a prophecy of the Davidic dynasty as sovereign in Israel and conqueror of the nations. These renderings are not strictly grammatical as the text now stands. (c) Till he—i.e., Judah—come to Shiloh (cf. RVmg.). This is an exact translation of the original, and has been adopted by some of the greatest modern exegetes. The meaning is that after the Conquest Judah will come to Shiloh, the capital of the tribes, and abdicate his position of leader which he has held during the wanderings and the Conquest. It is taken to refer to an assembly of Israel (Jos 18 1-10). The objection to this view is that Judah is not known to have occupied such a position in that period. It is possible to determine only the general significance of the phrase; it is a Messianic prophecy in the broad sense, promising preeminence to Judah in Israel and the obedience of the nations.

SHILONI, shai-lō'nai, SHILONITE, shai'lo-nait or shi-lō'nait. See SHILOH, I.

SHILSHAH, shil'sha (שִׁלְשָׁה, shilshāh): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 37).

SHIMEA, shim'i-a, SHIMEAH, shim'i-a: 1. (שִׁמְעָה, shim'āh). A Benjamite (I Ch 8 32), called Shimeam in 9 38. 2. (שִׁמְעִי, shim'āh). A brother of David (II S 13 3, 32, 21 21; Shimei RV; I Ch 2 13; Shimma AV, 20 7), elsewhere called Shammah (I S 16 9, etc.). 3. (שִׁמְעָה, shim'āh). (a) A son of David (I Ch 3 5; called Shammua [h] in II S 5 14). (b) A Merarite Levite (I Ch 6 30). (c) A Kohathite Levite (I Ch 6 39).

SHIMEAM, shim'i-am. See SHIMEA, I.

SHIMEATH, shim'i-ath (שִׁמְעָה, shim'āth): An Ammonitess, the mother of Jozachar (or of Zabad, according to II Ch 24 26), one of the conspirators against Joash, King of Judah (II K 12 21).

SHIMEATHITES, shim'i-ath-aits. A family of Scribes, of Kenite descent through 'Hammath, the father of the house of Rechab' (I Ch 2 55). This passage is obscure and its real significance is uncertain (see Curtis in ICC, ad loc.). E. E. N.

SHIMEI, shim'i-ai (שִׁמְעִי, shim'āi, also Shimi, Ex 6 17 AV): 1. The second son of Gershon (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18, etc.). The Shimeites (Zec 12 13; also Shimites, Nu 3 21 AV) are named after him; but they were neither a large nor a very coherent body. 2. A son of Gera, of the house of Saul (II S 16 5 ff.), a typical malcontent of the tribe of Benjamin during the reign of David. 3. A son of Ela and officer under Solomon (I K 4 18). During the last days of David, when Adonijah rebelled, he remained faithful to David (I K 1 8). 4. A Ramathite (I Ch 27 27). 5. A brother of David (also called Shimeah, II S 21 21). 6. A brother of Zerubbabel (I Ch 3 19). 7. A grandson of Simeon (I Ch 4 26). 8. A son of Joel, a Reubenite (I Ch 5 4). 9. The ancestral head of one of the main subdivisions of the Merarite Levites (I Ch 6 29). 10. A son of Jahath, also a Levite, ancestor of Asaph (I Ch 6 42, 25 17). 11. A Benjamite chief (I Ch 8 21, Shimhi AV, and Shema RVmg.). 12. An assistant superintendent of the treasury under Hezekiah (II Ch 31 12). 13. A Levite of the sons of Heman (II Ch 29 14). 14. A Levite who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 23). 15. One of the 'sons of Hashum' (Ezr 10 33). 16. One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 38). 17. A Benjamite, ancestor of Mordecai (Est 2 5). 18. See Shimeah 2.

SHIMEON, shim'i-on (שִׁמְעוֹן, shim'e'on): One of 'the sons of Harim' (Ezr 10 31).

SHIMHI, shim'hai. See SHIMEI.

SHIMI, shim'ai or shai'mai, SHIMITE, shim'ai. See SHIMEI.

SHIMMA, shim'a. See SHAMMAH.

SHIMON, shai'men (שִׁמְעוֹן, shim'on): The head of a Judahite family (I Ch 4 20).

SHIMRATH, shim'rath (שִׁמְרָת, shimrāth): A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 8 21).

SHIMRI, shim'rai (שִׁמְרִי, shimrī): 1. A Simeonite (I Ch 4 37). 2. The father of Jediah, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 45). 3. A chief of the Merarites and head of a family of doorkeepers (I Ch 26 10). 4. A Levite who helped cleanse the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 13). C. S. T.

SHIMRITH, shim'rith (שִׁמְרִית, shimrīth): A Moabitess (II Ch 24 26); see SHOMER.

SHIMRON, shim'ron (שִׁמְרוֹן, shimrōn): I. The fourth son of Issachar (Gn 46 13; Nu 26 24; I Ch 7 1), and ancestor of the Shimronites (Nu 26 24). II. A royal city of the Canaanites (Jos 11 1). It joined the confederacy formed by Jabin, King of Hazor, to withstand the advance of the Israelites into the region later called Galilee. Its site is a matter of conjecture. All that is certain is that it lay in the territory later assigned to the tribe of Zebulun, and probably in the northern portion of the same (19 15). Neubauer, following the Talmud, identifies it with the modern Semānīeh, 5 m. W. of Nazareth. It has an artificial hill with remains of a fortified city. It is also identified with es-Semeiriyyeh, near Acre. Cf. the following article. C. S. T.

SHIMRON-MERON, -mī'ron (שִׁמְרוֹן מֶרֶן, shimrōn-mērōn, Kethibh; sh-mēr'ōn, Qere): A Canaanite town W. of the Jordan, conquered by Joshua (Jos 12 20). It is possible that the names of two towns are intended, but it may be the fuller name for 'Shimron' (q.v.). C. S. T.

SHIMSHAI, shim'shai, -shē, or -shā-ai (שִׁמְשָׁי, shimshay): A Persian official (designated as 'the scribe') in Syria who with others made complaint to Artaxerxes I regarding the rebuilding of the walls (not the Temple) of Jerusalem by the Jews, probably after Ezra's arrival and, therefore, c. 450 B.C. (Ezr 4 8 ff.).

SHINAB, shai'nab (שִׁנָּב, shin'āb): King of Admah (Gn 14 2).

SHINAR, shai'nār (שִׁנְאָר, shin'ār): This term seems originally to have stood for the district of Babylon (Gn 11 2, 9, 14 1, 9). Later, it was extended to include the whole of Babylonia (Gn 10 10; Is 11 11; Zec 5 11; Dn 1 2). It has been identified by many with Sumer, the ancient name of S. Babylonia; but against this view is the fact that Babylon lay in Accad, or N. Babylonia. Others have proposed to identify the name with Egypt. Sangar, the Shanhar of the Tell el-Amarna letters. See ACCAD; and BABYLONIA, §§ 8, 10, 13. J. F. McC.—L. B. P.

SHION, shai'an (שִׁי'אן, shā'ōn, Shihon AV): A city of Issachar (Jos 19 19). Map IV, D 7.

SHIPHI, shai'fai or shif'ai (שִׁפְי'א, shiph'i): A Simeonite (I Ch 4 37).

SHIPMITE, shif'mait (שִׁפְמַיִת, shiphmā): Zabdi is called 'the Shipmite' (I Ch 27 27), i.e., a native of Shephem, of Shipmoth.

SHIPRAH, shif'ra (שִׁפְרָה, shiphrah): One of the two Hebrew midwives mentioned in Ex 1 15.

SHIPHTAN, shif'tan (שִׁפְתָּן, shiph'tān): The father of Kemuel, 'prince' of Ephraim (Nu 34 24).

SHIPMASTER, SHIPMEN. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

SHIPS AND NAVIGATION: 1. Historical. As long as the Israelite tribes were limited to the highland of Palestine, they concerned themselves little with ships and navigation. The oldest notices (Jg 5 17; Gn 49 13) speak only of the smaller tribes Asher and Zebulun as having their abode on the coast of the sea, and indicate nothing as to their participation in navigation. On the other hand, the charge brought against Dan in Jg 5 17 is to be understood in the sense that the people of this tribe were engaged in the service of the Phœnician shipowners instead of partaking in the holy war in the name of J'. It was only when David and Solomon needed the help of the Phœnicians in their building operations that navigation came to have some importance for Israel. For the messengers who passed back and forth between Tyre and Jerusalem, for the carpenters and stone-masons who were sent by Hiram to Jerusalem, for the workmen who were sent by Solomon to Lebanon, as well as for his contributions of wheat and oil to Hiram (II S 5 11; I K 5 1-12, 9 11, 14), during the favorable season of the year, the journey by sea was more convenient than by land. The Chronicler (II Ch 2 2-15; Ez 3 7) supposed that the timbers procured from Hiram were brought in rafts to Joppa and thence overland to Jerusalem, but since the older source (I K 5 9 f.) leaves the choice of the port to Solomon, and since this monarch, according to Jg 1 27 f., Jos 17 11, had something to do with the well-known harbor Dor, S. of Carmel, it is very probable that the trade between him and the Phœnicians made use of this harbor. The second port which was in possession of Solomon and his successors (until 845, and, later, until 735) was Elath (Eloth, q.v.), on the Red Sea. From this place Solomon not only made claim to his share of the commerce with Arabia, but from here also he once undertook to send an expedition to the gold coast of Ophir. The harbor of Dor served him for the undertakings which he carried on in common with the Phœnicians on the Mediterranean. The destination of the latter voyages was Tarshish (Lat.

Tartessus), that is, the region, famed for its natural resources of silver and gold, of the city Tartessos at the mouth of the Guadalquivir in southern Spain. The two undertakings should be distinguished. It is only to the voyage to Tarshish that the three year period refers (I K 10 22; II Ch 9 21). In later times the harbor of Dor belonged to the Northern Kingdom, two of whose tribes, Zebulun and Issachar, were famed (Dt 33 18 f.) in that they enjoyed the treasures of the sea. Consequently, navigation was not altogether unknown to both parts of Israel before the Exile, and that the case was not otherwise with the Jews after the Exile is evidenced in many places in the later literature (Jon 1 3 ff., where the prophet is mentioned as paying a regular fare; Ps 107 23-32; Pr 31 14; Ec 11 1; Is 33 21-23). About 145 B.C. Simon the Hasmonean made Joppa a harbor for Judea (I Mac 14 5). The Roman edicts (Jos. Ant. XIV, 10) contain many references to the overseas connections of the Jews, and Hyrcanus accused his brother Aristobulus before Pompey of being guilty of piracy (Ant. XIV, 3 2). In the times of Jesus there were many fishing-boats (πλοῖα) on the Sea of Gennesaret, Josephus making mention of 330 small boats which he had assembled at Tarichea (BJ, II, 21 8).

2. Terminology. The most common word for ship in the O T is 'ōnī (nomen collectivum), rendered navy ('navy of ships' RV) in I K 9 20 f., etc., and galley in Is 33 21. For a single ship the term is 'ōnīyyāh (nomen unitatis). These terms are used as well for the little reed or papyrus boats common on the Nile, made of bundles of reeds woven together, similar to mere floats (Job 9 26; cf. Is 18 2; Pliny, HN, 13 21 ff.; Erman, Aegypten, p. 635 f.), as for the large merchant-ships which sailed the open sea (Pr 31 14; Ezk 27 9; Ps 107 23). The expression ships of Tarshish meant originally such ships as made voyages to Tarshish (see above, § 1) (I K 10 22; II Ch 9 21, 20 35 ff.). Then it was used in a wider sense for large seagoing ships in general (Is 2 16; I K 22 49; Ps 48 8). The word tsī, according to Spiegelberg (ZDMG, 53, 638), came over into the Canaanite speech from the Egyptian about the time of the New Empire. In Nu 24 24, Dn 11 30, Is 33 21 ('gallant ship' EV) it means war-ships.. In Ezk 30 9 it is used of the swift-sailing Nile boats. The word s'phīnāh is found only in Jon 1 5 (here in conjunction with innermost parts)

Of the different parts of a merchant ship the following find mention in Ezk 27 1-24, 25-26: the 'double planks' (lūhōthayim), i.e., the outer and inner planks (or boards AV), made of cypress from Mt Senir (Hermon); the calkers are mentioned; the mast (tōren), made of the cedar of Lebanon; the oars (mishshōt, ver. 6; māsōt, ver. 20), of the oaks of Bashan; the deck (qeresh, benches EV, possibly only a roofing or pavilion for the rear deck), of pine (v'ashshūr) from the coasts (isles) of Kittæans; and the sail (mīphrās), of costly Egyptian material (shēsh, byssus) adorned with 'brodered work,' as was fitting for the wealth of Tyre. This decorated sail served also as an ensign (nēs) for the ship, as, e.g., in the battle of Actium the ship of Antony and that of Cleopatra each carried a purple sail, indicative of its rank as the admiral's ship. Of flags or pennants there is no evidence on the representations of Phœnician ships found on the monuments (cf. Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, 1853, Plate 71). For protection against the rays of the sun, over the after-deck an awning of blue or purple material was stretched (ver. 7, mikhshēh). The shipmen (so I K 9 27) or mariners were called in general mallāh (Ezk 27 9, 27, 29, cf. the Babylonian malāhu); the steersmen, shāḥīm (rowers RV), vs. 8, 26; while the term hōbhēlīm (pilots EV) originally designated the sailors who had to do with the tacking (hebbel, σχευή, both as a sing. noun [Ac 27 19], and as the pl. of σχεύος). The shipmaster (Jon 1 6) was both the owner and sailing-master.

In the time to which the account of Paul's voyage to Rome belongs (Ac ch. 27 f.) there were sailing-ships of considerable size, which carried, in addition to the large mainmast, also a foremast at the bow. We find no mention of a third mast, that is, mizzenmast. Ships were distinguished as carrying a single sail, two sails, or three sails, that is, according as the ship had only the original large sail or also a sail on the foremast (ἀντέμων, foresail Ac 27 40, mainsail AV), or, along with these, also the three-cornered supparum of the Romans above the mainsail. The sails with their accompanying yards, etc., are all comprehended under the term gear (σχεύος, Ac 27 17). On the stern (πρόμνη), alongside of the flag-staff which carried the pennant, probably stood images of deity (Wis 14 1). The bowhead was shaped so as to represent the sign of the ship (παράσημον, Ac 28 11), which in the case of the ship used by Paul, consisted in the image of the Dioscuri (twin brothers) Castor and Pollux. The rudders (τὰ πηδάλια) hung by straps or ropes from the after-part of the ship. There the steersman (κυβερνήτης, master, Ac 27 11; ἐπόνοων, governor AV, Ja 3 4) sat and held the rudder or helm with his right hand, consequently the distinction was made between the starboard (the steering-board) and the larboard (the 'empty' board). When the steering-oar was not used, as, for example, when the ship was in harbor or at times in a storm, it was made fast either on the side of the ship or on deck (Ac 27 40). For holding the ship at anchor originally large stones were used, but in Roman times small anchors, of which usually several were carried on board (Ac 27 29 f.). The seams of the ship were calked, if the rendering calkers (Ezk 27 9, 27) is correct. But the term probably means only 'ship's carpenter.' It was customary, when necessary, to sound the depth of the water by means of a lead or other weight attached to a line (Ac 27 28).

3. Navigation as a Science. On the basis of records of observations, navigators' coast- and sailing-charts (periptus, stadiasmus) were constructed. Through long experience sailors learned to estimate correctly distances and the speed of a ship, but when on the open sea they were able to ascertain their direction and the place where they were only by means of the stars, consequently only with a clear sky (Ac 27 20). As a result, navigation was carried on, as a rule, only from spring to fall

(cf. the mention of the 'fast' in Ac 27 9, by which is meant the fasts connected with the great Day of Atonement in the fall, Lv 16 29, 23 26 f.). Sailors were acquainted with and made use of the currents, e.g., Paul's ship which worked northward from Sidon with a contrary W. wind, in order to be carried westward by the coast stream which flows through the sea near Cilicia and Pamphylia N. of Cyprus (Ac 27 4 f.). As in Ezk 27 28 the E. wind is mentioned as destructive of the large ships upon the open sea, so in Ac 27 14 it is the εὐρακύλων ('Euraquilo'), the ENE. wind, that proved dangerous to the ship of Paul. By the expression 'they used helps undergirding the ship' (Ac 27 17), we are to understand either, with Breusing, that strong cables were placed around the ship lengthwise from stem to stern above the water-line; or, with Balmer, that the cables were placed under the keel amidships and thus encircled the vessel. Another way of girding the ship was, according to T. A. Köster, used by the Egyptians.

SHISHA, shai'sha. See SHAVSHA.

SHISHAK, shai'shak (שִׁשָּׁק, shāshaq): The Masoretic spelling for 'Sheshonk' I, the founder of the 22d Egyptian dynasty, who, after having befriended Jeroboam (I K 11 40), invaded Palestine, c. 926 B.C. He not only sacked Jerusalem (I K 14 25; II Ch 12 2-4), but ravaged both the Northern and Southern Kingdoms. Sheshonk later built the great court of the Karnak temple (at Thebes), upon whose walls 156 Palestinian towns are represented as paying him tribute. See Breasted, Hist. Egypt (1905), pp. 527-531. See also EGYPT, § 10; PHARAOH (6).

SHITRAI, shit-rē'ai rē, shit'rai, or -rai (שִׁטְרַי, shitray, but שִׁטְרַי, shitray, should probably be read): One of David's overseers (I Ch 27 20).

SHITTAH, shit'a, SHITTAH-TREE and -WOOD. The Acacia (the tree and the wood from it). See PALESTINE, § 21.

SHITTIM, shit'im (שִׁטִּים, shittim), 'acacias': The camping place of the Israelites before they crossed the Jordan (Nu 25 1; Jos 2 1, 3 1; Mi 6 5). The identification, Map II, H 5 is probably right.

SHITTIM, VALE OF (שִׁטִּים הַנָּחַל, nahal hash-shittim), 'torrent-valley [or ravine] of the acacias' (JI 3 18): Some dry, thirsty valley where acacias (a desert plant) were known to flourish is meant, possibly the Kidron (cf. Ezk 47 8 ff.), and not, probably, the old camping-ground of Israel E. of the Jordan (Nu 25 1, etc.). See Driver in Camb. Bible, ad loc. E. E. N.

SHITTIM-WOOD. See SHITTAH.

SHIZA, shai'zə (שִׁיזָּא, shīzā): The father of Adina, a Reubenite chieftain (I Ch 11 42)

SHOA, shō'a (שׂוֹא, shō'a'): The name of a people, probably the Sutū of the Assyrian inscriptions (Ezk 23 28), E. of the Tigris.

SHOBAB, shō'bab (שׂוֹבָב, shōbhābh), 'rebellious': 1. A son of David (II S 5 14; I Ch 3 5, 14 4). 2. A Calebite family or clan (I Ch 2 18).

SHOBACH, shō'bak (שׂוֹבַח, shōbhakh): A captain of Hadadezer, King of Zobah. He led the Syrian forces against David, and was slain with many others at Helam, E. of the Jordan (II S 10 16, 18; cf. I Ch 19 16, 18, where he is called Shophach). C. S. T.

SHOBAL, sho-bē'ai, shō'bē, or shō'bē-ai (שׂוֹבַל, shōbhay): The ancestor of a family of porters (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45).

SHOBAL, shō'bal (שׂוֹבַל, shōbhāl): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Horites (Gn 36 20-23), spoken of also as a clan-chief (ver. 29). 2. A Calebite clan inhabiting Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 2 50, 52). 3. The ancestral head of a clan of Judah (I Ch 4 1 f.). Probably 2 and 3 refer to the same person or clan.

SHOBEEK, shō'bek (שׂוֹבֵק, shōbhēg): One who signed the covenant in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 10 24).

SHOBI, shō'bai (שׂוֹבִי, shōbhī): A son of Nahash, an Ammonite king of Rabbah. With Machir and Barzillai he brought furnishings and food to David, who had fled from Absalom to Mahanaim (II S 17 27 f.). Rabbah had been taken by David (II S 12 29 f.), and it is possible that he had made Shobi viceroy of Ammon (so H. P. Smith, ad loc.). S. A. Cook (AJS, xvi, p. 164 f.) reads 'Nahash . . . brought,' omitting 'Shobi, the son of,' and places II S 17 27 before chs. 10-12. C. S. T.

SHOCO, SCHOCHO, shō'ko, SHOCHOH, shō-ko. See Soco.

SHOE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 7.

SHOHAM, shō'ham (שׂוֹחָם, shōham), 'beryl' (?); cf. Gn 2 12, Heb. and see STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2 (11): The ancestral head of a family of Merarite Levites (I Ch 24 27).

SHOMER, shō'mar (שׂוֹמֵר and שׂוֹמֵר, shōmēr), 'keeper' (?): 1. The head of an Asherite family or clan (I Ch 7 32, called Shemer [Shamer AV] in ver. 34). 2. The father of one of the conspirators against King Joash (II K 12 21); in II Ch. 24 26 it is the mother, called Shimrith, and designated a Moabitess, who is mentioned, perhaps to show the evil results of intermarriage with foreign women.

SHOPHACH, shōfak. See SHOBACH.

SHOPHAN, shō'fan. See ATROTH-SHOPHAN.

SHOSHANNIM, sho-shan'im, SHOSHANNIM-EDUTH, -'iduth. See MUSIC, § 6.

SHOVEL. See TEMPLE, § 16; and TABERNACLE, § 13.

SHOWBREAD. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 13.

SHRINES: The rendering of the Gr. ναὶ, 'temples' in Ac 19 24. Miniature reproductions of the facade of the Artemisium or Temple of Diana, usually of terra-cotta, but also of marble and of silver, representing Artemis seated in the pronaos holding her symbols (tympanum, phiale) in her hands and with a lion (lions) beside her. The more artistic 'temples' omitted the symbols, and depicted the goddess caressing a lion which climbs to her knee or lies in her lap. Such 'temples' (see Athenische Mittheilungen, II, Plate III, p. 49) were dedicated by pilgrims in the temple, or taken home and placed on the graves of beloved dead. J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

SHROUD: The word hōresh, rendered 'shroud' (Ezk 31 3 AV), means 'forest' (cf. RV), but the text here is uncertain.

SHUA, shū'a, SHUAH, shū'a, SHUHITE, shū-hait: 1. (שׂוּא, shū'a). A Canaanite (clan?) whose 'daughter' Judah took for a wife (Gn 38 2, 12; I Ch 2 3). 2. (שׂוּאִי, shū'a'). An Asherite clan (I Ch 7 32). 3. (שׂוּאִי, shū'a'). A 'son' of Keturah, i.e., an Arabian tribe (Gn 25 2; I Ch 1 32; see also Job 2 11, 8 1, etc.). See also ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13. 4. See SHURAH.

SHUAL, shū'al (שׂוּאֵל, shū'al), 'fox': I. A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 36). II. The 'land of Shual' (I S 13 17) was a district N. of Michmash in the direction of Ophrah. See Map III, F 4.

SHUBAEL, shū'bā-el. See SHEBUEL.

SHUHAH, shū'ha (שׂוּחָה, shūhāh, Shuzh AV): A name in the genealogy of Judah (I Ch 4 11).

SHUHAM, shū'ham, SHUHAMITE, shū'hām-ait. See HUSHIM.

SHUHITE, shū'hait. See SHUAH and BILDAD.

SHULAMITE, shū'lām-ait (שׂוּלָמִית, shūlammith, 'native of Shulem,' by which, perhaps, Shunem (q.v.) is meant: Apparently the Shunammite women (Song 6 13) were noted for their beauty (cf. I K 1 3).

SHUMATHITES, shū'māth-ait (שׂוּמָתִי, shū-māthī): One of the leading families of Kiriath-jearim (I Ch 2 53).

SHUNAMMITE, shū'nām-ait (שׂוּנָמִית, shūnam-mith), 'a woman of Shunem': 1. Abishag, David's nurse (I K 1 3, etc.). 2. A woman of wealth, who showed great kindness to Elisha. The narrative (II K 4 8-37) throws light on many details of social life in ancient Israel. Some time after the events there narrated the woman left Israel during a famine, and in her absence her property was seized by others. Upon her return, the king ordered it all restored to her, being influenced thereto mainly by the fact of her former friendly relations with Elisha (II K 8 1-6). E. E. N.

SHUNEM, shū'nem (שׂוּנֵם, shūnēm): A town assigned to Issachar (Jos 19 18), and the place where the Philistines encamped before their victory over Saul in Mount Gilboa (I S 28 4). The modern name of the place is Sālem (the interchange of n and l being not uncommon), which is situated on the SW. slope of Jebel Dahi (Little Hermon), about 5 m. S. of Tabor and 3 m. N. of Jezreel. Map IV, C 8. The view from the gardens above the village is extensive. The Shulamite, the heroine of the Song of Songs (6 13), probably came from Shunem; indeed, she may have been identical with Abishag mentioned in I K 1 3 ff. Probably, at this same Shunem also Elisha found his kindly hostess the 'great woman' of II K 4 8, tho her home has been located by Eusebius and Jerome (Onom. 295, 86; 153, 18) 'within the border of Sebaste in the region of Aerabattine'—i.e., in Samaria. G. L. R.

SHUNI, shū'nai, SHUNITE, shū'nait (שׁוּנִי, shū-nī): The ancestral head of the Shunites (Nu 26 15), a clan of Gad (Gn 46 16).

SHUPHAM, shū'fām, SHUPHAMITE, shū'fām-ait. See SHEPHUPHAM.

SHUPPIM, shup'pim. See MUPPIM.

SHUR, shūr or shōr (שׁוּר, shūr), 'wall': A desert district on the NE. border of Egypt (I S 15 7, 27 8), where the angel found Hagar (Gn 16 7). Abraham dwelt between S. and Kadesh (Gn 20 1), and contiguous to S. was the territory occupied by the Ishmaelites (25 18), into which the Israelites entered after crossing the Red Sea (Ex 15 22). It received its name very probably from the wall across the isthmus, which in very early times was constructed by the Egyptians as a defense against their Asiatic foes. G. L. R.

SHUSHAN, shū'shān (שׁוּשָׁן, shūshan): The ancient capital of Elam (later Susiana), the Susa of the Greek historians (cf. Add. to Est. 11 3). Its convenient and central location gave it an advantage in the race for the first place among the cities E. of Babylonia. As early as the 23d cent. B.C. it is referred to as already in existence ('the old city'). The old Susa was practically destroyed by Assurbanipal (c. 645 B.C.). It was restored and made a royal residence by Darius I of Persia (522-484) who made it one of the three royal residences of the Persian monarchs (Xenoph. Cyrop. VIII, 6 22; Herod. III, 30, 65, 70), the others being Persepolis and Ecbatana (cf. Ezr 6 2). The palace of S. is mentioned in Dn 8 2. The story of Esther, placed as it is in the days of Xerxes ('Ahasuerus,' 486-465), is also enacted in this palace (Est 1 2-7). Alexander the Great made a triumphal entry into S. (Arrian, Exp. Alex. III, 16), but under his successors the city dwindled away and fell into ruin. The site was excavated by Loftus (Chaldea and Susiana, 1857). Cf. also Dieulafoy, La Perse, la Chaldée et la Susiane (1887); L'Acropole de Suse (1890); Billerbeck, Susa (1893). The Shushanchites (Ezr 4 9, Susanchites AV) were colonists from Shushan, transported by Assurbanipal ('Osnappar') to Samaria. A. C. Z.

SHUSHANCHITE, shu-shan'kait (שׁוּשָׁנַיִם, shū-shankhāyē' [Aram.], Susanchite AV): Colonists in Syria whose original home was Shushan (q.v.) (Ezr 4 9b-10a, a later gloss, the original text containing only vs. 7-9a and 10b.) E. E. N.

SHUSHAN-EDUTH, shū'shān-ī'dūth. See MUSIC, § 6.

SHUTHELAH, shu-ḥī'la or shū'thi-la (שׁוּתֵלַיִם, shūthelāh): 1. Ancestral head of the Shuthelaites (Shuthalhites AV), a clan of Ephraim (Nu 26 35 f.; I Ch 7 20). 2. An Ephraimite family (I Ch 7 21).

SHUTTLE. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 12.

SIA, sai'a, SIAHA, sai'a-ha (שִׂיחָא, sī'āhā' [Ezr], שִׂיחָא, sī'ā' [Neh]): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47).

SIBBECAI, SIBBECHAI, sib'ī-kē'ai or -kē (סִבְכַּי, sibb'khay): One of David's heroes, a Hushathite, who slew a giant (II S 21 18; I Ch 11 29, 20 4) and an officer in his army (I Ch 27 11). He is wrongly called Mebunnai (corrupt text for 'of the sons of') in II S 23 27. See HUSHAH.

SIBBOLETH, sib'o-leth. See SHIBBOLETH.

SIBMAH, sib'ma (סִבְמָה, sibhmāh): A city of Moab, assigned to Reuben (Nu 32 3 [here called Sebam, Shebam AV], ss [Shibmah AV]; Jos 13 19); it was famous for its vintage (Is 16 8, 9; Jer 48 32). The site on Map II, J 1 may be too far north.

SIBRAIM, sib-rē'im or sib'rā-im (סִבְרַיִם, sibh-rayim): A city on the (ideal) NE. border of Israel (Ezk 47 16). Site unknown.

SICHEM, sai'kem. See SHECHEM.

SICK, SICKNESS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE.

SICKLE. See AGRICULTURE, § 6.

SIDDIM, sid'im (סִדִּים, siddim), VALE OF: A place mentioned only in Gn 14 8-10, where it is said to have been full of bitumen pits (ver. 10) and apparently is identified with the Dead Sea (ver. 3). The reference, however, may be only to the southern part of the sea, below the peninsula el-Lisān, where the water is very shallow (less than 11 ft. deep, as against 1,310 ft. in the northern basin). It is possible that this end of the Dead Sea may have been dry land in the time of Chedorlaomer and Abram, or at least a salt marsh, like the present es-Sebkha just to the south. See DEAD SEA and PAL-ESTINE, § 12 (b), and cf. the illuminating excursus in Driver's Genesis, pp. 168-173. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

SIDES: The rendering of the pl. of the Heb. yarkāh (Jon 1 5 AV). The RV rendering 'innermost parts' is much more accurate.

SIDON, sai'don. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13; and ZIDON.

SIEGE, SIEGE-WORKS. See BESIEGE.

SIEVE. The correct rendering of סִבְכָּה, sebhārāh in Am 9 9. See illustration in Plate of Agricultural Instruments (No. 7). Nāphāh in Is 30 28 is more general in meaning and may signify one of several winnowing implements (root-idea 'to shake'). See AGRICULTURE, § 7.

SIGN. See WONDER; and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

SIGNET: In antiquity, when the art of writing was confined to professional scribes, the signet performed the important function of authenticating all documents whether public or private. Archeologists have recovered numerous specimens of those used in Babylonia and Egypt; some of these signets have been referred to as early as 4500 B.C. The Egyptian signet was in the form of a scarab, while the Babylonians preferred the cylindrical shape. The first mention in the O T is in the story of Judah and Tamar, where it serves as a pledge (Gn 38 18, 25[J]). The Hebrew signet was either oval or conical in shape; sometimes the stone was set in a ring, at other times worn around the neck on a cord, as is the case with the modern Arab. Some had a simple inscription of the owner's name, others were ornately decorated. In the excavations at Gezer many specimens of scarabs have been recovered, and some rude Canaanitish seals, as well as jar handles stamped with Hebrew seals. The materials were various—amethyst, crystal, steatite, glass, paste, etc. See also SEAL, and for illustration, DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 1. J. A. K.

SIHON, sai'hēn (סִיחֹן, שִׁיחֹן, shihōn): A king of the Amorite kingdom between the Arnon and the Jab-bok (Nu 21 21; Dt 1 4, 2 26 f., etc.); also called king of Heshbon, his capital city (Dt 2 30; Nu 21 26, etc.). 'Sihon' is used as parallel to 'Heshbon' (Nu 21 28; Jer 48 45). He refused to let the Israelites pass through his kingdom, and as a result was slain at Jahaz, and Israel took possession of his territory (Nu 21 21 ff.). In Nu 21 26 it is said that S. conquered his kingdom from Moab, and an old poem is quoted in the following vs. (27-30) as commemorating this conquest. This passage, however, probably refers to a conquest of Moab by Israel at a later date. C. S. T.

SIHOR, sai'hōr. See NILE.

SILAS, sai'lās, SILVANUS, sil-vē'nus (Σίλας, Σιλουανός): A companion and friend of Paul. The original name was probably Silas, a word of Semitic, not Greek, origin (cf. CISem. II, No. 101, shilā; also, in Palmyrene inscriptions, sh'ilā). Only this form of the name is found in Ac (15 22 ff., 16 19 f., 17 4 f., 18 5). But there is little doubt as to the identity of Silas with the Silvanus of Paul's Epistles, since the two play almost exactly the same rôle in the second missionary journey (cf. Ac 17 4 f., 18 5 with I Th 1 1 and II Co 1 19). If, as seems to be the case, Silas is included in the 'we' (us) of Ac 16 37 f. he was a Roman citizen, and Silvanus, like Paulus, may have been an adopted name. He seems to have been one of the leading men (ἡγεμόνες, Ac 15 22) in the Jerusalem church, which accounts for his having been sent with Judas Barsabbas as a messenger to the churches in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia (Ac 15 23-28). It may have been Silas' familiarity with the details of the history of the Palestinian church that led Paul to take Silas with him on the second missionary journey (Ac 15 40). Silas possessed prophetic gifts (cf. Ac 15 34 [according to D], 32, 17 15 [according to D]). Whether the Silvanus 'through whom' the author of I P wrote (I P 5 12) is to be identified with the companion of Paul depends upon conclusions as to the date and authorship of this Epistle (see PETER, FIRST EPISTLE OF). J. M. T.

SILK: (1) The Heb. meshī (Ezk 16 10, 13) means 'silk' according to rabbinic tradition, otherwise its exact meaning is unknown. In any case, it must have been cloth of fine texture. (2) On Pr 31 22, see FINE LINEN. (3) In the N T σερίκον (Rev 18 12) is the classic word for silk (from Σῆρ, the people of India who first supplied the West with silk). See also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 5. E. E. N.

SILLA, sil'a (Νῆδ, shilla): A place near Jerusalem (II K 12 20). Site unknown.

SILOAH, si-lō'a, or sil'o-a, SILOAM, SILOAM, POOL OF. See JERUSALEM, § 13.

SILOAM, si-lō'am or sil'o-am, INSCRIPTION: An inscription in the old Heb. script (discovered in 1880) recording the completion of the underground conduit from Gihon to the Pool of Siloam. It is incised into the E. wall of the tunnel about 25 ft. from its exit at the Pool of Siloam. It is generally held that it dates from the reign of Hezekiah (cf. II Ch 32 4, 30). For a transcription of this inscription see ALPHABET and for the translation see JERUSALEM, § 34. E. E. N.

SILVANUS. See SILAS.

SILVER. See METALS, § 2, and MONEY.

SILVERLING. See MONEY, § 1.

SIMEON, sim'i-on; in the O T שִׁמְעוֹן (shim'eōn), 'heard'; in the N T Συμεών (also Symeon, Συμεών, in RV of Lk 3 30; Ac 13 1, 15 14): 1. The O T Patriarch and the tribe named after him (Gn 29 33, etc.). See TRIBE, TRIBES, §§ 2-4. 2. One of the ancestors of Jesus (Lk 3 30). 3. An alternate form of 'Simon', which was also the name of the Apostle Peter (Ac 15 14; II P 1 1 in some MSS). 4. A spiritually minded man who, according to the infancy narrative (Lk 2 22-39), was supernaturally illumined, and thus empowered to recognize in the child Jesus the expected Redeemer of Israel. His conception of the true work of the Messiah was clearly molded by the picture of the servant of J' in Is 42 7 and 52 12-53 13. This he embodies in the poetic address known in liturgical lore as the Nunc Dimittis, and in the supplementary words to Mary (ver. 31). S. was one of the 'Pious,' who were 'looking for the consolation of Israel.' They almost constituted a party at this time, tho unlike the Zealots, they were without political aims and, submissive to the will of Jehovah (and they were spoken of frequently as 'the meek,' 'the humble'), they waited for His salvation. This devout element had persisted in Israel from the time of the earlier prophets (Am 2 9), altho it finds recognition especially in the Psalms and later prophets (Ps 22 26, 35 10, 68 10; Is 41 17), where the 'poor'—i.e., the godly poor—tho grievously oppressed by a cruel aristocracy or a foreign enemy and forming only a small minority, represent the ideal Israel, and hope for speedy deliverance by Jehovah. See also MEEK. 5. An aggressive member of the first Christian community, mentioned among the prophets and teachers (Ac 13 1), who bore also the surname 'Niger.' He is numbered by Epiphanius (1:337) among the seventy-two disciples. R. A. F. (§ 4)—A. C. Z. (§§ 1-3, 5).

SIMON (Σίμων): 1. Simon Peter, see PETER. 2. Simon the Canaanite, one of the Twelve, see CANAANITE. 3. One of Jesus' brethren (Mt 13 55=Mk 6 3). 4. A leper in Bethany (Mk 14 3). 5. A Cyrenian, who was compelled to bear Jesus' cross (Mk 15 21 and ||s). 6. A Pharisee in whose house Jesus was anointed by a woman (Lk 7 36 ff.). 7. Simon Iscariot the father of Judas, the betrayer of Jesus (Jn 6 71, 13 26). 8. A tanner at Joppa with whom Peter lodged (Ac 9 43, etc.). 9. A sorcerer of Samaria; see SIMON MAGUS.

SIMON, sai'mon or -mon [MAGUS], mē'gos (Σίμων[Μάγος]): An important figure in the heretical history of the early Church. In the earliest sources (Ac and Justin Martyr) he is called simply Simon;

'Magus' is a later addition used to distinguish this Simon from others having the same name (e.g., Simon Peter).

1. In the N T. The earliest reference to S. is found in Ac 8 9-24. Here he is mentioned incidentally,<sup>1</sup> the passage being merely an episode in connection with the story of the spread of the gospel in Samaria. The essential points in the description of S. in Ac are (1) the strong influence which he exerted upon the Samaritans,<sup>2</sup> and (2) his practise of magic (μαγείων, ver. 9). Opinion concerning him (ostensibly Samaritan opinion) is crystallized in the phrase, 'This man is that power of God which is called great.' 'Power of God' is hardly to be understood in a Gnostic sense, as by the Church Fathers (see § 2, below), as if it implied a claim to divinity on the part of S.; it gives rather the impression made by his words, i.e., they are such as seem to be wrought by the power of God. This is the usage elsewhere in the N T (cf. Mt 13 54; Mk 6 5; Jn passim). The phrase that follows, 'which is called Great,' may be one of those explanations of which Luke is fond (cf. Ac 1 19, 9 11, 10 1, 27 14), or it may be an attempted transliteration, or even a transliteration (so Klostermann, Probleme im Aposteltexte, pp. 15 ff.), of an Aramaic (or Samaritan) word, possibly one of S.'s esoteric names<sup>3</sup> (cf. ver. 9, λέγων εἶναι τινα αὐτὸν μέγαν, and see BAR-JESUS). While the passage in Ac is too episodic to enable us to draw conclusions as to the nature of the teaching of S., the connection of the same with the profession and practise of magic is beyond question, if indeed this be not the reason for its introduction by the writer.<sup>4</sup>

2. In the Church Fathers. Overmuch dependence is not to be placed upon the statements of Justin Martyr (Apol. I, 26, 56; Dial. 120). (1) His purpose is rhetorical (cf. Apol. I, 26). (2) In one particular at least Justin is known to be in error. The statue in the Tiber to which he refers in Apol. I, 26, was not one dedicated to Simon Magus by imperial decree, but probably one dedicated by a private individual to the Sabine god, Semo Sancus. It is likely that Justin's mention of a Roman visit by Simon was suggested by the statue, and is without basis in fact. On the other hand, it must be admitted that Justin's account contains statements about the Samaritan Simon which there is no good reason to question, <sup>1</sup> For this reason Schmiedel (EB, art. Simon Magus) is wrong when he makes the writer's failure to complete the history of Simon an argument against the genuineness of the passage in Ac.

<sup>2</sup> It will be noted that the term used is ἔθνος, not πόλις (ver. 10a), as if the influence of S. were more than local. For the presence of Samaritan magic in Egypt, compare the alleged letter of Hadrian to Servianus (Vopiscus, Vita Saturnini, ch. 8).

<sup>3</sup> The use of this term in magical formulas is evidenced. An interesting parallel to Ac 8 9, cited by Deissmann, Bible Studies, p. 336 (2d Eng. ed.), is found in Pap. Par. Bibl. nat. 1, 1275 f. (Wessely, I, 76), where the following is found in what seems to be a love incantation: ἐπιχαλούμαι σε τὴν μεγάλην δύναμιν τὴν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ (v. l. τὴν ἐν τῇ ἄρκτῳ) ὅπου κυρίου θεοῦ τεταγμένην.

<sup>4</sup> Luke shows a tendency to bring the gospel and its representatives into victorious conflict with magicians and their arts, notably in the case of Soesva (q.v.) in Ac 19 14 (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul, p. 271 f.). Elsewhere also he shows himself familiar with the technical language of magic (cf. πνεῦμα πύθωνας, Ac 16 16; περιεργα, Ac 19 19).

especially in view of Justin's own Samaritan origin. Thus, Gitta (Justin, Γίττων), the name of the native village of S., Helene, the name of his wife, and Menander, one of his followers, suggest actual tradition. (3) Justin's representation of the teaching of S. is hardly consistent with the statements of Ac. He represents S. as worshiped as the 'first God' (δὲ πρῶτος θεός, Apol. I, 26) and described as 'God above every principality and authority and power' (Dial. 120). These are clearly Gnostic terms, not the language of magic like that of Ac. The use of the former by Justin is natural in view of the fact that he himself wrote a treatise against all heresies (Apol. I, 26). While his account is based upon actual traditions, it is undoubtedly colored by his own antiheretical tendencies.

Irenæus' notice of S. (Adver. Hær. I, 23) is very little more than an expansion in the light of 2d-cent. Gnosticism of Justin's account, which is apparently quoted (dictur) in connection with the supposed statue in honor of S. In Irenæus, S.'s wife, Helene, becomes the Gnostic ἔννοια, the eon dwelling in humanity. S. is no longer represented as claiming to be merely the supreme God, 'who descends in Samaria as the Father,' but also the delivering eon, who 'descends among the Jews as the Son.' He is represented as the founder of a sect called Simonians, who are charged with practise of magic and immorality. Hegesippus (Eus. HE, IV, 22 4), Tertullian (De Anima, 34 1), Clement of Alexandria (Strom. VII, 17), Origen (Contra Celsum, V, 62), Eusebius (HE, II, 13 14), add practically nothing new, but Hippolytus (Refut. V, 14) gives what purport to be quotations from a work by S. concerning 'the Great Revelation.' A complete Gnostic system is ascribed to him, which Hippolytus declares to have been the starting-point of the system of Valentinus. From these passages it is clear, (1) that there existed in the 2d cent. a sect calling themselves Simonians, and (2) that the origin of this sect was traced back, not only by writers on heresy, but by the sect itself to one S., and (3) that remnants of this sect seem to have survived to Origen's time, altho at this date it had practically disappeared (Contra Celsum, I, 57). For the possible relation of this S. to the S. of Ac 8 9-24, see below, § 4.

3. In Gnostic and Ebionitic Literature. A somewhat different representation of S. meets us in the so called Gnostic Acts and the Ebionitic literature of the 3d and 4th cents. In the Acta Petri cum Simone we have a fanciful representation of a contest between Peter and S. before the Emperor Nero, but this takes place after Paul's departure from Rome. In the Acts of Peter and of Paul, Paul appears as the companion of Peter. There is nothing in these Acts to indicate opposition between Peter and Paul (against Schmiedel in EB, art. Simon Magus, who makes S. and Paul identical). On the other hand, in the Clementine Recognitions and Homilies, Paulinism is clearly attacked under the guise of a contest between Peter and S. (cf. Letter of James, prefixed to the Homilies, ch. 2; Recog. I, 70). But there are other passages (cf. especially the history of S. given in Recog. VII-XVIII) which can not be explained as concealed references to Paul. The most natural explanation is that the attack on Paulinism, while real, is incidental to the main object of the work, viz., a romantic description of its hero Peter (against Baur, Tüb. Zeitschr. 1831, p. 116 f.; Lipsius, Die apok. Apostelgesch. 1883; Schmiedel, loc. cit.).

4. Critical Conclusions. There is no sufficient reason for doubting the historical character of S. On the other hand, it may well be questioned whether his relation to 2d-cent. Gnosticism is that claimed by Hippolytus and Irenaeus (see Gnosticism). S. was confessedly a Samaritan, but all that we know of Samaritan religious conceptions from the historians and later liturgies (cf. Cowley, Samaritan Conceptions of the Messiah, Expositor March, 1895, pp. 161-174) is remote from the teachings of 2d-cent. Gnosticism. The Messiah in Samaritan conception was simply the 'revealer' (Jn 4th) or 'restorer,' tu'ebh, not the 'great God' (Justin, Apol. I, 26), or 'standing one' (Clement of Alex., Strom. II, 11; Hippolytus, Refut. VI, 4). Neither are the patristic representations of S. as the founder of Gnosticism self-consistent. While all sorts of Gnostic teachings are attributed to him, it is noteworthy that in all the representations of the sect of Simonians only their practise of magical arts and rites are spoken of (cf. Justin, Apol. I, 26; Irenaeus, Adv. Har. I, 23; Hippolytus, Refut. VI, 15; Celsus, quoted by Origen, Contra Cel. I, 62). It is not an infrequent occurrence for those writing against heresy, and even for heretical sects themselves, arbitrarily to connect their teachings with well-known personalities. A case in point is that of Nicolaus in Ac 6th, who, without sufficient reason, is made the founder of the sect of Nicolaitans (Rev 2nd, 10; cf. Irenaeus, Adv. Har. I, 26; Hippolytus, Refut. VII, 1, 24); notably also Cerinthus, whose original propaganda had little or nothing to do with Gnosticism. In the same way, the name of the Samaritan S. might have been easily associated with a heretical Gnosticism, particularly if a sect known as Simonians actually existed in the 2d cent. Or it is even possible that a purely magical sect, such as might have arisen from the conditions suggested in Ac ch. 8, afterward developed along Gnostic lines. But at the time of Ac ch. 8 this development had certainly not yet begun.

SIMPLE, SIMPLICITY: In the O T this term 'simple' is used, mainly in Pr, as the rendering of pethā, which expresses the idea of being easily led, persuaded and usually to wrong-doing, and which is almost a technical term in the Wisdom literature. In one passage 'simplicity' renders the Heb. tōm, 'completeness,' 'integrity,' i.e., with no knowledge of Absalom's plan (II S 15 11). In the N T ἀναστος, 'not bad,' is rendered 'simple' (Ro 16 18 AV, 'innocent' RV), and in the succeeding verse (Ro 16 19) the word so rendered is ἀνέμικτος, 'unmixed.' 'Simplicity' (Ro 12 8 [AV]; II Co 1 12 [AV], 11 3) is the rendering of ἀπλότης, 'singleness' or 'sincerity' (cf. Eph 6 5, 3 22, where the same Gr. word is used). E. E. N.

SIN<sup>1</sup> 1. Usage of Terms. The O T terms rendered 'sin' are ḥaḥā'ah, ḥaḥā'āh, ḥā'ā'ah, hā'ah, 'missing the mark'; āwōn, lit. 'crooked' (contrasted with yāshār, 'straight' as in Eng.; or as wrong [from 'wrung'], contrasted with right), hence iniquity; pesha', 'disobedience,' 'rebellion'; resha', 'wickedness.' The N T words are ἁμαρτία (ἁμαρτημα), 'error' (lit. 'missing the mark'), παράβασις, 'passing over,' 'stepping aside' (across) a normal line (or path); παράπτωμα, 'falling aside' (hence both these last convey almost exactly the idea of transgression); παρακοή, 'disobedience'; ἀσέβεια, 'impiety'; ἀδικία, 'injustice,' 'unrighteousness'; ὀφειλόμενα, 'debt' (cf. also ἀνομία, 'lawlessness,' Jn 3 4).

2. General Nature of Sin. The kernel of the conception as given by the etymology of these terms is that of deviation from a line given or standard. If the standard be viewed as a goal to be reached, sin consists in missing it; if it be a norm authoritatively set (a law) with a command to conform to it, sin is disobedience. If it be an ideal perceived by the moral sense, sin is a failure. In any case it is what ought not to be. And whether looked at as missing the mark, departing from the line, or disobeying a command, its main feature is that it offends God.

3. National Sin: Development of the Conception. In the O T the idea of sin emerges in the consciousness of God's Chosen People as early as the revelation of God Himself, and the revelation of His will. But inasmuch as the covenant of J' was from the beginning with the people as a whole, the first conception on the subject is associated with the corporate or national consciousness. It is the people that sin. And the sinfulness of the people is largely that of their kings or leaders in the conduct of public affairs. But even personal offenses on the part of a prominent man do not remain matters between himself and God, but are shared in by the community at large; they are an abomination, bringing down the anger of God on the whole body. But if the essence of sin is offense against J', it follows that the gravest particular sin is preeminently the prevalence among the people of the spirit of departure from J', i.e., the tendency to offer worship to idols. But as J' is the Righteous One, the prophets associate with this fact practices alien and offensive to the character of Jehovah (common vices, such as disregard for life, purity, property). Hosea views sin as the estrangement of the heart of Israel from its God; Isaiah, as insensibility to the holiness and majesty of J'. All the prophets regard it as moral disease and corruption in some part or aspect of communal life. This social or corporate consciousness of sin is embodied in the sacrificial ritual which provides for the removal and expiation of guilt contracted by the people as a whole (Lv 4 13 f.; cf. also the ritual of the great Day of Atonement, Lv 16 15 f.). The collapse of the national organization with the Exile brought the individual into the foreground, and sin was seen to be rooted in the individual (Ezk 33 7 ff., 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die'). At the same time, the whole effect of the preaching of the prophets had emphasized the ethical side of religion and revealed the identity of transgression of religious ceremonial law with transgression of moral law, and thus completed the idea of sin as moral evil in the eyes of God. But this was always an ideal; for as ceremonial purity became more and more a goal to be aimed at for itself, sin also came to be viewed as violation of ceremonial prescription. In the N T age, those who lived in disregard of ceremonial prescription were called sinners, and separated into a class clearly distinguishable, on a par with publicans (Mt 9 10; Mk 2 15). From this point of view the Gentiles were all sinners (Gal 2 15). It was only by the teaching of Jesus that the further growth of this tendency was arrested, and the conception was restored to its purely ethical place, where it is afterward uniformly held by the Apostles and other N T writers.

4. Sin Offense Against God. Thus in its fullest and clearest Biblical conception sin is moral evil as an offense against God. The conception includes lower views of it, such as emphasize the element of folly in sin, and such as make it a source of distressing results, or of the deprivation of the rights of other men; but except as incidentally introduced, all these are subordinated to the main idea that the evil of sin consists in its displeasing God. In the earliest legislation [the Book of the Covenant] oppression and wrong are brought under the head of sin (Ex 22 23). The wickedness of man grieves God, and calls out for judgment and punishment at His hands (Gn 6 5-7, 4 10). In the hearts of upright men like Abraham and Joseph (Gn 22 11, 39 9) it is the fear of displeasing God that serves as the motive of avoiding sin, and not regard for consequences, or the bare fact that sinful conduct was viewed by custom as improper. The preaching of the prophets derived the impetus and vehemence which characterized it from the conviction that God was opposed to sin. Conversely, penitence is not sorrow for sin per se, but arises from a recognition of God's right to judge and avenge evil. This is predominantly the trend of thought in the Psalms (50, 51, 130, 143; 'Against thee, thee only have I sinned,' 51 4).

5. Sin: Voluntary Violation of Law. In harmony with this view, sin is regarded as a voluntary departure from God or disobedience of His law. It is not an eternal, indestructible principle, inherent in the nature of things (as in Zoroastrianism) and entangling its human victim in its meshes. Nor does it grow by an innate necessity out of the nature of matter, or of life, or of individuality, as in the Hindu Vedanta or the Platonic philosophy. It is a choice of free will of man, a violation of the law of God. The law which is violated is not physical, working apart from the conscious acceptance of it by the creature. It must be presented to the moral nature and must secure the surrender of the will to it. Its operation, however, does not depend upon its acceptance or non-acceptance, but simply upon its recognition. The willing adoption of the law by the conscience is obligatory. Once recognized, it can not fail to operate. Conformity to it is moral good; transgression of it is sin and brings all sin's consequences. Where there is no knowledge of God's will, there is error but no guilt (Ro 5 13; Jn 15 22, 24)—or at least guilt exists only as far as this ignorance is wilful (Lk 12 14 f.). Accordingly, the more clearly the moral creature knows the will of God and the wrong of standing in opposition to it, the greater is his guilt (Mt 11 21, 12 41 f.). Hence the greatest sin is that against the Holy Spirit, because it is sin against the greatest amount of light.

6. Sin as an Indwelling Principle. But tho sin is a creature of the will at its inception and at each of its repetitions, it is not limited to mere action. It is a principle or power governing the life from within (Ro 7 13-25). Inclinations and dispositions that lead men to sinful actions are grouped together under the general name of sin and condemned as such (Jer 13 23; Is 48 4-8; Jn 5 43-44; II P 2 14; Mt 12 34, 36). This is the difference between sin and sins. The former term applies to the principle or power within, the latter to the act in which it is manifested. And as these are centered in one predominant quality, that of disregard for the will of God and preference of self, sin is identified with lawlessness (I Jn 3 4, the nearest approach that the Bible has to a definition of sin).

7. The Essence of Sin. But if the essence of sin is disregard (lack of love or fear) of God, it follows that sinful acts are the result of self-love (self-preference, Is 53 6), and the source and seat of all sin is in self-will. As bodily appetites furnish the most common and easily discerned impulse toward the choice of what one wishes as opposed to what God prescribes, the flesh is viewed as the seat of sin. This conception, however, is scarcely present in the O T, where the flesh appears merely as a synonym of weakness (Gn 6 3; Ps 78 38), calling forth pity. In the Apocrypha the notion of the inherence of sin in the physical nature begins to assert itself (Sir 23 6; Wis 12 10; IV Mac 7 18; cf. Slavonic Enoch, 30 16), and grows into the rabbinical doctrine of an evil heart (yetsar hāra') and the Pauline idea of the flesh as the seat and instrument of sinful tendency (see FLESH). Whether sin be a negative or positive reality is not a question that emerges distinctly in the province of Biblical thought.

8. Guilt and Punishment: Death. The attitude of the sinful man in view of God's law is represented in the term 'guilt' (q.v.), and the just and natural treatment of guilt is condemnation by the moral sense of every personal being, and punishment by the just and sovereign Ruler of all creation. Accordingly the converse proposition that suffering is due to sin and may be regarded as its penalty in every instance found wide acceptance (Jn 9 2). The theme of the Book of Job is, in fact, the solution of the problem presented by this assumed relationship between sin and suffering. Guilt both as blameworthiness and as punishableness is assumed and implied in every case of censure of sinful actions and inclinations, and in every threat of righteous indignation and vengeance in behalf of the offended law. The great and ultimate penalty of sin is death (Ro 6 23, 5 12). But death assumes and carries with it the displeasure (wrath and curse) of God. As the penalty of sin, however, death is not simply the dissolution of the physical tie between body and soul. There are intimations that even in the sinless condition the human frame was to be no exception to the law that every living organism must ultimately be dissolved. When death is called the penalty of sin, it is viewed as already affected by the existence of sin in the world. It has a sting which it derives from sin (I Co 15 56). Apart from sin death has no penal significance.

9. Origin of Sin: The Fall. The origin of sin in the world is traced to the first man. The account of the temptation and sin of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden (Gn ch. 3), tho not alluded to again in the O T, was naturally interpreted as involving the corruption and fall of the whole human race (Wis 2 24; Ro 5 12 f.; I Co 15 22). In the hands of the Apostle Paul, it received a careful elaboration, because it filled a special and logically legitimate place in his system of thought. The correspondence of the Fall to the redemptive work of Jesus Christ in respect to the extent of the influence of each, to the number affected by each, to the place and relation of the mediator of each to the rest of mankind, and the consequences of each, were such that he must needs show them in their fulness of meaning and thus exalt Christ as a revelation of God's wisdom, power, and grace. The Paradise narrative itself betrays a certain consciousness of the important place the affair occupied in the mind of Israel. The figure of the serpent suggests the monster Tiamat of Assyrian mythology, the great opponent of the gods and undoer of their work. This conception is so much like that of Satan in the subsequent history as portrayed both in the O T and in the N T that the reading of a satanic influence into the action of the serpent by the earlier Christian theology is not as unhistorical and unscientific as it was once supposed to be. This account of the Fall has thus all the appearance of aiming to show how sin entered into the world of mankind. It does not explain the emergence of sin in the universe as a whole. That must have been the work, not of a tempter, but of an original creator of an evil propensity. The account represents evil as already existing outside the earthly world and making its entrance there. The passage, however, could never have been taken in the strictest literal sense. The essential element in it is not that the body of a snake was possessed for a time by an evil spirit, and spoke without the use of vocal organs, or that the first man and woman partook of the fruit of a mysterious tree, but that in some way, either crude and vague, or explicit and consciously present to the moral sense, the first human beings received the suggestion of a departure from the known good (the will of God), and that they yielded and made this suggestion the law of their action. Of the extra-Biblical accounts of primitive man the great majority are void of interest and significance both from the historical and from the religious point of view. Some contain portrayments of a state of primeval innocence, or golden age of prosperity and peace, followed by deterioration and decline (cf. Baring-Gould, Legends of O T Characters, 1:26-39). But the closest parallel, as on all kindred subjects, is the Assyro-Babylonian legend, which, however, is so imperfectly preserved that its decipherment and translation are matters of dispute among specialists. It therefore yields very little light on the subject (cf. Davis, Genesis and Semitic Tradition, p. 65; Boscawen, Bab. and Oriental Records, IV, 251; Sayce, Anc. Mon. pp. 65, 104). In general, its relation to Gn ch. 3 is the same as that of all similar Babylonian parallels to the O T on other subjects. In all these the Hebrew is a purified and spiritualized form, either derived from or cognate with the Mesopotamian, and made the vehicle of some great truths of revelation.

10. Transmission of Sin. That all sin in the world is an outgrowth of the Fall is assumed in those passages which refer to the matter. In IV Es 4:30 the first sin is compared to a grain of evil seed sown in the heart of Adam, and its subsequent course is called 'much wickedness that it hath brought forth to this time.' (Cf. Sir 25:24: 'From a woman was the beginning of sin, and because of her we all die.') But it is only the Apostle Paul who most emphatically and explicitly asserts this connection. Two separate questions are involved in the subject, viz.: (1) Is the guilt of Adam's first sin shared by all his posterity? and, (2) in what manner is sin transmitted and diffused through the generations of the human race? The first of these questions must be answered by a definite affirmative. The second has been the subject of an extended controversy. (1) From very early times there have been those who have held that Paul's language implies the real existence of all men in the first man, and their participation in that first act by which he fell from his primitive sinlessness. Upon this ground they have based the development of sin in each individual descendant of Adam. But the language of Paul does not easily bear the construction necessary to deduce from it this doctrine. The translation 'in whom' (Ro 5:12, AVmg.) 'all sinned,' which seems to support it, has been eliminated from the discussion as a misunderstanding (cf. AV and RV text). Inherently, too, this explanation meets with the objection that no one is conscious of having been in Adam and of having sinned with him; and apart from such consciousness the imputation of guilt seems ethically irrelevant. (2) A rival view is that which accounts for the effect of the Fall on subsequent mankind by the doctrines of representation and federal headship. When Adam fell, it was not as an individual, but as a representative of the race. Hence, because he was the appointed head of all his posterity, those represented by him are accounted sinful, given sinful natures, and allowed to develop sinful lives. It is deemed a fatal objection to this explanation that the idea of representation is precisely the point that does not appear in Paul's discussion of the subject. It is certainly in harmony with the Pharisaic juridical thought that the action of a representative head is binding on those represented in all legal matters, but the Apostle nowhere applies the principle to the sphere of religious life. (3) The third view on the subject calls into the service the principle of heredity, assuming that as all men inherit from their ancestors natures with tendencies and dispositions, so the race has inherited from Adam a nature inclined toward sin. Under temptation this inclination is developed into actual transgression in every case. This is little different from the realistic transmission theory and is too dependent on modern scientific knowledge regarding the law of heredity to be historically identifiable with Paul's underlying idea as to how sin passes from Adam to his posterity. In the present stage of the investigation it seems as tho Paul had not cared to trace the nature of the connection between Adam and the race, but was content to assert and use the existence of such connection in explaining the nature and extent of redemption through Christ. The nearest approach to his thought is through the study of the analogy between Adam and Christ. As he uses the mystical union with the Redeemer to explain the efficacy of the redemptive work, so he may be assuming a mystical union with Adam accomplished by the surrender of the individual will to sin as the ground of the sinner's participation in Adam's sin.

11. Forgiveness. But clear and prominent as the doctrine of sin is throughout the whole range of Biblical teaching, its presentation is neither an end in itself nor a means toward gratifying a philosophic interest in the nature and constitution of man. It is given only in order that a hatred for moral evil may be aroused, that the love of God in providing means for its removal may be appreciated, and that these means may be effectually used to secure its forgiveness. See also FORGIVENESS.

SIN<sup>2</sup>, sin (יִנּוֹ, šin); perhaps = Egypt. 'mt, 'clay' (cf. 'Pelusium,' from πηλός, 'mud'): The name of an Egyptian fortress (Ezk 30 15, 16), usually identified with Pelusium, a stronghold on the NE. border, surrounded by marshes. It was an important battle-ground for several centuries, as it was the key to Egypt for armies coming along the coast from the north. To-day it lies about a mile from the sea, and the whole region is a waste of sand and marshes. Cornill and Toy read יִנּוֹ, i.e., š'wān = Syene (q.v.). C. S. T.

SIN, WILDERNESS OF (יִנְיָרָה, mīlḥar-šin): According to Ex 16 1, this wilderness lay between Elim and Sinai; but according to Ex 17 1, there was one station between it and Sinai. In Nu 33 11, 12, one encampment on the Red Sea between Elim and the wilderness of S. and three stations between the wilderness and Sinai are mentioned. C. S. T.

SINAI, sai'nai, sai'm-ai, or sai'nē (יִנּוֹ, šinay) The mountain on which the Law was given, also called Horeb (in Ex 3 1, 17 6, 33 6; Dt 1 6, 4 10. 'Sinai' in Ex 19 11, 34 4 and in Ex 16 1, 24 16; Lv 25 1). From very early times it seems to have been regarded as a sacred mountain, perhaps as dedicated to the Babylonian moon-god Sin. S. is usually identified with a conspicuous group of mountains in the center of the peninsula embraced between the gulfs of Akabah and Suez; more specifically with the peaks known to the Arabs as Rās Sufsāfeh ('peak of the willow,' where Moses cut his rod) and Jebel Musa ('Mt. of Moses,' where he is supposed to have received the Ten Commandments). These peaks are over 6,000 ft. high. At the base of Rās Sufsāfeh, a broad plain extends toward the NW., known as er-Rahah, where the Israelites may easily have encamped. In a valley called Wādī ed-Deir, on the NE. of the same mountain, stands the famous convent of St. Catharine. There are two other valleys in the same vicinity, both of which are comparatively fertile and well-watered. Along the base of the group, on the side of the plain er-Rahah, runs a natural mound or barrier, suggesting the 'bounds' mentioned in Ex 19 23. The rocks of this region are steep and jagged and richly colored. They are composed of granite, porphyry, diorite, and gneiss. A path of stone steps leads up from the convent to the summit. Holy places marked by crosses cover the mountain. Near the top of Jebel Musa stands a chapel dedicated to Elijah (I K 19 8).

The tradition identifying this location with Sinai is as old as Justinian (527-565), who built here a Christian church in honor of the Virgin. But the most ancient tradition, that of Eusebius, points to Jebel Serbal, 6,750 ft. in height and difficult to climb, situated one short day's journey NW. of Jebel Musa. On its N. side there is the small but well-watered and luxuriant oasis of Wādī Feiran, usually thought to be Rephidim (Ex 17 8). But there is scarcely space in the vicinity for any considerable camp. Tischendorf, Robinson, Ritter, Laborde, Palmer, and Stanley, therefore, rightly reject this identification in favor of the first. Other views of Sinai are: that of Sayce and G. F. Moore, and many other modern scholars who follow Beke (1874) in advocating a location in Arabia (cf. Jg 5 5; Dt 33 2); and that of Winckler and Cheyne, who insist that the name 'Sinai' is a mere cosmological conception. Both views are highly improbable. Petrie and Currelly explored the Peninsula somewhat thoroughly in 1905-06.

SING, SINGERS, SINGING MEN, etc. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 4.

SINIM, sai'nim (יִנְיָרָה, šinim): The 'land of Sinim,' perhaps better 'of the Sinites,' is mentioned (Is 49 12) as one of the countries from which the exiles are to return. From the context, it apparently lay to the S. or E. of Palestine, and at a great distance. The LXX. translates 'Persians.' Of countries to the S., Sin Pelusium, the wilderness of Sin, and Syene (š'wēnīm) are suggested. Gesenius, among others, claims that China is here mentioned, but Dillmann and Duhm contend that this name was first known after the 3d cent. B.C., and was written by the Arabs and Syrians tsin. Others mention the tribe 'Sina' at the foot of the Hindu-Kush. It has also been identified with 'Sinite' (Gn 10 17), a tribe of N. Phenicia. C. S. T.

SINITE, sai'nait or sin'ait (יִנְיָרָה, šinai): The inhabitants of a city or district, probably Sin (Gn 10 17; I Ch 1 15), to be identified with the Siannu of the Assyrian inscriptions, and located near Arka (see ARKITE), about 80 m. N. of Sidon. E. E. N.

SIRAH, sai'ra (הַסִּירָה, ḥasṣirāh, with the article), WELL OF: The cistern of Sirah was the place not far from Hebron whence Joab's messengers recalled Abner (II S 3 26). The identification on Map II, E 2 is probable, but not certain. E. E. N.

SIRON, sir'i-an. See SENIR.

SISAMAI, sis'a-mai, -mē, or si-sam'a-ai. See SISMAI.

SISERA, sis'e-rā (סִרְיָא, šīr'ā, prob. of Hittite origin): 1. A Canaanite chieftain who assumed the post of general of Jabin's hosts (Jg 4 2 f.) in the war against Deborah and Barak. It appears, however, that Sisera was an independent king of superior standing to that of Jabin (Jg 5 28, 30; I S 12 9). Jabin, king of Hazor was overthrown by Joshua (Jos 11 1-9), consequently there seems to be some confusion in the account in Jg; Sisera, a later opponent of Israel being connected by error with Jabin of an earlier date. 2. The family name of a class of Nethinim in the postexilic period (Ezr 2 53; Neh 7 55).

SISMAI, sis'mai (סִמַּי, šīm'ay, Sisamai AV): A descendant of Jerahmeel (I Ch 2 40).

SISTER. See, in general, FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, especially §§ 3, 5, 6, and 8.

SITH: An old English word meaning 'since' (Ezk 35 6 AV).

SITHRI, sith'rai (סִתְרִי, šithrī, Zithri AV), 'my protection' (?): The ancestor of a family of Levites (Ex 6 22).

SITNAH, sit'na (סִתְנָה, šitnāh), 'hostility': One of the wells of Jacob (Gn 26 21), probably in the Wādy Shuṭnet about 20 m. SW. of Beer-sheba.

SLAVERY: 1. General Place in Ancient Heb. Society. The basis of primitive Heb. society was the family or clan (see FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 2.). In their nomadic state, before the conquest of Canaan, the Heb. family consisted of the father, wife or wives, sons and daughters, and servants. Such servants were, in those early times, probably captives in war or their descendants, or persons acquired by purchase from other tribes or their descendants. As primitive Semitic warfare was often characterized by the 'devotion' to death of the living spoil, it is likely that such captives were more often women and children than men, since the latter would be more likely to be put to death. When Israel came into possession of Canaan, the main change, as regards slavery, was that in the more complex conditions of life after the Conquest there was a greater likelihood of Israelites themselves coming into such unfortunate circumstances as to be compelled to sell themselves, or to be sold by process of law, as servants or slaves to another, a condition which, we may well believe, was rather rare in the nomadic stage.

Servants or slaves formed a large element of the 'working classes' in ancient Israel. The Heb. householder and his sons constituted something of an aristocracy. It is likely that every well-appointed estate (like that of Boaz, for example, cf. Ru 2) had numerous male and female slaves by whom the greater portion of the harder work was done. And when town and city life became more developed, all the more substantial families had their servants who were slaves, not 'hired servants.' Altho the last-named class became more numerous in the later kingdom-period, it never assumed the proportions of the slave-class. The 'stranger' and 'sojourner' were not slaves (see GENTILES), and could possess property and own slaves, even Hebrew slaves, just as the Israelites themselves. It is probable that the great majority of slaves of foreign blood in Israel, at least until the 8th cent., were descendants of the conquered Canaanites (cf. Jg 1 28, 33, 35; I K 9 20 ff.). Later, Phœnician slave-dealers found a ready market in Israel (cf. Am 1 6, 9).

2. Terminology. The three most distinctive terms for servants in Heb. are: (1) 'ebhedh (from the root עבד, with the primary significance of 'to work' or 'to do'), the most generic term, expressive of various kinds of subjection (e.g., nation to nation, subject to a monarch, an inferior toward a superior, and of man to God). The 'ebhedh was thus one who 'worked' for another. The term is variously rendered 'servant,' man servant, bondman, and bond-servant in EV. (2) 'āmāh, used for a female servant, rendered handmaid, maid, or maid servant. (3) škipphāh, also a female servant and rendered handmaid or maid, sometimes woman servant or maiden. Each of these three terms implies a state of actual servitude or bondage. It is otherwise with na'ar (fem. na'ārāh), often rendered 'servant,' which properly means only a 'young person,' but is frequently used as a synonym for 'ebhedh or 'āmāh. The sākhār, hired servant, i.e., one who served for wages (sākhār or maskōreth), was not a slave. The pīlēghesh, 'concubine,' was, doubtless, generally a slave, but the term itself connotes rather a phase of ancient marriage conditions than anything in reference to slavery. The word 'slave' occurs in RV only in Dt 21 14, 24 7 and Jer 2 14 (see § 3, b, below), and in the AV only in Rev ch. 18 (for the Gr. σώματα, 'bodies'). For freedom in Ac 22 28 the RV has more correctly 'citizenship' (q.v.).

3. Legislation Regarding Slavery. The status of the slave or servant class in ancient Israel can be presented most suggestively, possibly, by examining the legislation in the codes on the subject, and also noting the supplementary evidence of the customs revealed incidentally in various narratives. Such legislation as is preserved in the codes relates more particularly to servants who are Hebrews and only incidentally to those of foreign blood. The condition of the latter was less fortunate than was that of the former.

a. In the old code in Ex chs. 21-23, the term of service for a Heb. slave ('ebhedh) is limited to six years (21 2 ff.). We must suppose that a servant of foreign blood was a slave for life. At the end of six years the Heb. servant could go out free (hophshī hinnām). If he was married when he entered the service, his wife (and children also, without doubt) went out with him. If, however, during his term of service he had been given a wife by the master, she remained the property of the master. But the servant then had the option of continuing to live with his wife and children as a life-slave. As the seal to this, he was brought 'before God' (i.e., the local sanctuary or the household altar), and there at the door his ear was pierced with an awl (21 2-6). The condition of the Heb. woman who had been sold (by her father) to be an 'āmāh was carefully guarded. It was understood that a woman thus sold became a wife of the master. If she did not please him, she was not to be summarily dismissed, but guaranteed certain rights. She could be redeemed by her family. Above all, she could not be sold to an alien. If given as an 'āmāh to the master's son, she was to be honored as a daughter. So long as she stayed under the master's roof she was to be treated justly. If not, she had the right to go out free, with no stain attached to her name. In general, the female slave was the master's concubine.

Heb. law and custom, unlike Roman, did not give the master unlimited power of life and death over his slaves. In case a master beat his servant (male or female) and the servant died under his hand, the master was to be punished. But if a day or two passed before death ensued, the loss of the servant was counted a sufficient penalty (21 20f.). If a master caused the loss of a servant's eye or tooth, the servant there by gained his liberty free of cost (21 26 f.). If a servant was gored (to death) by a neighbor's ox, the owner of the ox had to pay the master 30 shekels of silver (about $18), which was, therefore, the average price of a slave at the time (21 32).

Some additional information regarding the status of servants in early O T times can be gleaned incidentally from the O T narratives. Eliezer, the servant of Abraham, of foreign blood, but born in Abraham's household, was trusted implicitly by his master and it was Abraham's intention to make him his heir in case he had no son by Sarah (Gn 15 2-4). Jacob, in relation to Laban, was hardly an 'ebhedh in the ordinary sense, since he was not sold to Laban, but put himself voluntarily under Laban's control and for stipulated wages. Yet the three terms of service, seven years for each of the two wives and six years for the cattle, bear a close resemblance to the six-year term of the law in Ex 21 2 f. And Jacob's case may be taken as an illustration of stipulated terms of service for wives or property, during which time the servant was completely under the control of the master. Further examples of friendly or intimate relations between masters and slaves may be found in I S 9 6 f., 25 14 f.; II S 9 1 f., 16 1 f.; I Ch 2 34 f.

How a Hebrew might become a servant of a fellow Hebrew is well illustrated in II K 4 1 f., where we see that after the death of an insolvent debtor his sons could be taken by the creditor for the debt. Such cold-hearted tho formally legal proceedings the prophets severely denounced (cf. Am 2 6, 8 6). See also Ex 22 3.

In speaking of female servants the old narratives do not distinguish sharply between the 'āmāh and the shiphphāh. Hagar, Zilpah, and Bilhah, the maids of Sarah, Leah, and Rachel, are designated sometimes by one term, sometimes by the other. While shiphphāh, from its etymology, probably originally designated the concubinal relation in which the female servant stood to the master, the two terms eventually came to be used as synonyms. The attempt of Whitehouse in HDB, IV, p. 466, to show a distinction made by Abigail in her address to David (I S 25 23 f.) must be declared unsuccessful, in view of ver. 27. From such statements as we read in Gn 16 6, 21 10, etc., it may be inferred that in many cases the handmaid was the exclusive property of the master's wife, and it was her authority rather than his to which she was subject.

b. The later codes (D, HC, and P) show strongly the presence of two tendencies: (a) To distinguish more sharply between the Hebrew servant and the alien in favor of the former (the view in Lv 25 39 f. is that no Hebrew should be the slave of his fellow-Hebrew, or 'brother'), and (2) to introduce a more humane spirit into the whole. In Dt 15 12 f. the older law is supplemented by the provision that at the expiration of his term of service the servant is to be furnished liberally with a supply of the necessities of life. While the Decalog puts the servant on a level with the free man in his right to the Sabbath rest, D adds the provision that the servant is to share and enjoy sacrificial festivities as well as his free master (Dt 16 11). It is probable that from very early times the servant of foreign descent was considered as having renounced his allegiance to the god of his fathers and as subject to J', altho it must have been necessary for him to be circumcised in order to be entitled to partake fully in the religious observances (cf. the later law in P, Ex 12 44). Other notes of the humanitarian tendency of D are its prescription that runaway slaves are not to be returned to their master (23 15 f.), the provision for the considerate and kindly treatment of the female captive (21 10 f.), especially in case she does not please her master (ver. 14, where instead of 'deal with her as a slave' we should read 'deal with her brutally' or 'in an overbearing, unfeeling manner'), and the merciful enactment regarding the wages of the 'hired servant' (24 14; cf. Lv 19 13 [HC]). The Holiness Code also touched the case of the 'hired servant' in prohibiting him to eat of 'holy things' (Lv 22 10). In this case the sākhār is presumed to be a foreigner, but a priest's 'purchased servant' can eat of the priest's food (Lv 22 11), presumably, after having been circumcised. In the case of the seduction of a female slave (a shiphāh) already betrothed to a man, but not yet 'redeemed' (i.e., the marriage-price not yet paid), this code prescribes that the case is to be investigated, the man fined, and compelled to bring his guilt-offering to the sanctuary.

The postexilic code of P sought to enforce its conception of the (theoretically) holy status of every Israelite by the provision that the poor Hebrew who had to sell himself to a fellow Hebrew was not to be counted an 'ebhedh' (which term P would thus restrict to foreigners), but as a sākhār ('hired servant') or tōshābh ('sojourner'; see GENTILES). His term of service was to end with the year of Jubilee, when he and his family were to return to the ancestral estate (Lv 25 39-46, probably a late insertion in HC). Evidently, it had been found impossible to enforce the old law of a six-year term of service (cf. Jer 34 8-22 for an instance of the flagrant abuse of this law). The same conception of the fundamental distinction between the Israelite and the alien underlies the further provision in P that if a Hebrew became the servant of a 'stranger, or sojourner,' he was to be redeemed by some member of his family (Lv 25 47-55). The necessity of such legal protection for the poorer Israelites, if the ideal character of the community was to be conserved, is evident from Neh 5 5 f., where Nehemiah found himself obliged to intervene on their behalf by authority, persuasion, and personal example, to save a large element of the community from being reduced to the condition of serfs (bondage).

4. Slavery in the N T. The tendency of all later Jewish legislation and rabbinical teaching was in the direction of greater humanity toward the servant-class. In this respect Jewish law compares most favorably with the Greco-Roman law, the severity of which in regard to slaves the Jews themselves had many sad opportunities to experience. Perhaps, it was just such experiences that influenced them in their own more merciful legislation. The Essenes (q.v.) repudiated slavery altogether.

While such terms as δοῦλος, διάκονος, παῖς, ὑπηρέτης, οἰκέτης etc., all rendered 'servant,' appear frequently in the N T, there is nothing specially distinctive in them, at least in the Gospels, except in Jn 15 15, where Jesus tells His disciples that they are His 'friends' rather than 'servants.' The prodigal asked his father that he might become a μικτός ('hired servant'), perhaps as expressive of a less intimate relationship than παῖς or δοῦλος. Paul often uses δοῦλος in the religious sense of himself (and Christians in general) as the 'servant of' (owned by, controlled by) the Lord Jesus Christ.

Slavery was the great blot upon the Greco-Roman civilization. The number of slaves was immense,—in Italy, e.g., far outnumbering the free inhabitants. While many slaves were highly educated and entrusted with important duties, they were still slaves and, in general, absolutely under the control of their master, in the eyes of the law his property, not persons. See ERE., Vol. XI., pp. 612-618 and 621-630.

The relative importance of the slave-class in the Greco-Roman world of Paul's day is seen in the classification into two great classes, bond and free (I Co 12 13, etc.). Regarding slavery as an institution, Apostolic teaching had nothing to say theoretically. Practically, the Epistles of Paul and Peter counsel servants to be content with their position, to obey their masters, and also counsel masters to be considerate of their servants (I Co 7 21 f.; Eph 6 5; Col 3 22, 4 1; I Ti 6 1; Tit 2 9; I P 2 18). In his Epistle to Philemon Paul deals with the case of the runaway slave Onesimus not by discussing slavery per se, or from the point of view of Roman law, but by seeking to influence Philemon to make the common brotherhood in Christ of both himself and his converted slave Onesimus the determining factor in his treatment of the restored slave.

SLIME: Bitumen or asphalt, not ordinary clay, is what is meant by the Heb. hēmār (probably from hāmar, 'to boil') in Gn 11 3, 14 10; Ex 2 3. It was much used in the ancient world for just such purposes as are mentioned in Gn 11 3 and Ex 2 3. The old bitumen pits at Hit on the Euphrates are still a source of supply to the boat-builders of that region. The cement of bitumen furnished a protection to the unburned bricks which rendered them much more indestructible. It abounds in some of the wādys near the Dead Sea, which was called the Asphalt Lake by the ancients, and the pits whence it was dug for commercial purposes were probably at one time quite numerous (Gn 14 10). SLING. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 4.

SLUICE: A very doubtful rendering (Is 19 10 AV) of a Heb. word sekher usually meaning 'reward.' RV translates, 'they that work for hire' ('they that make dams' RVmg.). But the context is better suited by the rendering in AV. A. C. Z.

SMITH. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 10.

SMYRNA, smŭr'nə (Σμύρνα): A city, founded 1100 B.C. by Æolic Greeks at the NE. corner of the Bay of Smyrna. It was seized by the Ionic Greeks of Colophon before 688, when it joined the Ionian League. The acropolis of this S. (so called Tantalus), with the adjacent tomb of Tantalus, lies across the bay N. of modern S. It early attained to wealth and prominence, because it was situated in the path of commerce, and was the outlet for trade between Lydia and the West. Coveted by Gyges and destroyed by Alyattes about 600 B.C., it remained a mere village until the capture of Sardes by Alexander, who in a dream was exhorted by the Nemeses (deities of S.) to rebuild Smyrna. Alexander selected the present site, and his plans (involving paved streets crossing at right angles) were carried out by Antigonos and, later, by Lysimachus. (Cf. indirect ref. in Rev 2 8: 'was dead and [yet] lived.') S. soon became (and has remained) one of the most important commercial cities of Asia, famous for its wealth, temples, buildings, schools of medicine and science. It had a fine, safe harbor, on the site of which the bazaars of the city now stand; for during the siege of S. by Timur (1402) the harbor was partially filled in for siege purposes, so that the modern quay is about 100 yards beyond the ancient shore-line. S. was a faithful ally (cf. Rev. 2 10: 'faithful unto death') of Rome during the Mithridatic wars. In the Provencia Asia S. was the seat of a conventus. Its claim to the titles of 'Metropolis' and 'First City of Asia' was disputed by Ephesus and Pergamum. S. was styled Neokoros ('Temple-Sweeper' or 'Warden') because of its 'temple' (built 26 A.D.) to Tiberius and Julia (hence the 'tribulation' Rev 2 9 arising from the attitude of the Christians to the imperial cult), and was permitted by the Romans, from Augustus to Gallienus, to coin its own money, tho the first coins of S. are those of Lysimachus. The early evangelization of S. was due to the presence there of a Jewish colony. Polycarp (the first bishop of S. was burned (155-156 A.D.) with eleven Philadelphians, near the stadium, where his tomb is still shown. Smyrna's trade was destroyed by the discovery of America and the Cape route to India, but revived gradually from the 16th cent. onward. The city is now a shipping-center for the interior and the adjacent islands. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

SNAIL. See PALESTINE, § 26.

SNARE. For the literal meaning see HUNTING. The various terms rendered 'snare' are frequently used in a figurative sense especially of evil or evil-minded persons, as putting temptation to sin, etc., in the way of the good (e.g., Ex 23 23; I S 18 21; Pr 7 23, etc.), and of death which is represented as laying its snare or net and thereby getting its hold on a man (e.g., II S 22 6. So the 'snare of the devil' is spoken of in I Ti 3 7; II Ti 2 26). E. E. N.

SNOW: The most striking thing about snow to the Oriental is its white color. Consequently, snow is the standard of comparison for whiteness, as in leprosy (Ex 4 6; Nu 12 10), and in cleanness (Mt 28 3; cf. Ps 51 7), and, therefore, figuratively, of purity or innocence (La 4 7; Is 1 18). See also PALESTINE, § 19. A. C. Z.

SNUFFER, SNUFF-DISH. See TEMPLE, § 16, and TABERNACLE, § 3 (3).

SO, sō (סו, sō): A so called 'king of Egypt' to whom Hoshea of Israel 'had sent messengers' (II K 17 4), and thus furnished ground to Hoshea's overlord, Shalmanezzer of Assyria, for the suspicion that a conspiracy was being planned. In the list of Egyptian Pharaohs no name appears capable of being identified with So. Shabakah (Shabataka) the Ethiopian of the 25th dynasty belongs to a later date. Moreover, Shabakah and So can not be etymologically connected. Accordingly, Winckler's argument identifying So with Sib'a, tartan (i.e., general or viceroy) of Pir'u, King of Musri in N. Arabia, has been widely accepted (cf. Mittheil. d. Vorderasiat. Gesellschaft, 1898, 5). Kittel (SVI, 41921) thinks So was one Egyptian Official the Sib'u of Sargon's inscriptions, who was in command of Egyptian troops assisting the petty kings of Palestine against Assyria and who is called king in II K 17 4 by mistake. A. C. Z.

SOAKED. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 16.

SOAP (Sope AV): Soap is a compound of fatty acids with either potash or soda, which was not known in ancient Palestine tho the materials were present and much soap is made in that country now. The substance used by the fullers (bōrith, Jer 2 22; Mal 3 2) was apparently a cleansing preparation of vegetable alkali, made from the ashes of certain plants which are abundant in Palestine, notably the saltwort (Job 30 4, Salsola kali; see PALESTINE, § 22). In Jer 2 22 this vegetable alkali is differentiated from the mineral alkali (see NITER). L. G. L.—E. C. L.

SOCKET. See TABERNACLE, § 3 (1) and (2).

SOCO, sō'ko, SOCOH, sō'kō (סוכו, sōkhō, and סוכה, sōkhōh; spelled variously in AV Socho, Sochoh, Shoco, Shochō, Shochoh; the ARV, following the Heb., has Socoh, except in I Ch 4 18; II Ch 11 7, 28 18): 1. A city in the lowland of Judah (Jos 15 35; I S 17 1), now Khīrbet Suweikeh, a ruined village in a commanding position on the S. side of the Wādī es-Sunf (Valley of Elah; cf. I S 17 1 f.), 2 m. NW. of Adullam. Map II, D 1. 2. A city in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 48), also now Khīrbet Suweikeh, a large ruin on a low hill 10 m. SW. of Hebron, near Eshtemoa and Zanoah (cf. I Ch 4 17 f.). Map II, D 3. L. G. L.—L. B. P.

SOD, SODDEN: The past participle of 'seethe,' 'to boil.' In all instances the ARV reads 'boiled.'

SODA. See NITER.

SODERING. See SOLDERING.

SODI, sō'dai (סדי, sōdhī): The father of Gaddiel, one of the spies (Nu 13 10).

SODOM, sōd'am, SODOMA, sōd'o-mā (סדום, sōdhōm, Σόδομα): A city mentioned, with Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, 'cities of the plain,' which were destroyed by 'fire from Jehovah out of heaven' (Gn 19 24). It was a royal city (Gn 14 2). Lot dwelt in it after he had chosen the Plain of the Jordan (Gn 13 11 f.). It was destroyed because of its wickedness, described in Gn ch. 19 (cf. Gn 13 13, 18 20). These cities are mentioned with Zoar (q.v.), which is usually located SE. of the Dead Sea. The four cities were in a plain, which was shaken by an earthquake. This caused a sinking of the earth and an eruption of gases and petroleum, which ignited and burned the cities, that were then covered by the waters of the Dead Sea. The old plain is the modern es-Sēbkha, a morass S. of the Dead Sea. Sir G. Grove, Tristram, Conder, and others locate the cities at the N. end of the Dead Sea, and uphold their view by Biblical passages. The cities were visible from Bethel (Gn 13 3, 10), from Mt. Nebo (Dt 34 3, Zoar), and lay to the N. of the Amalekites (Gn 14 7). In the O T and N T Sodom is often used as a warning example of sin and Divine punishment (Dt 29 23; Is 1 9, 3 9; Jer 50 40; Ezk 16 46; Mt 10 15; Ro 9 29, and often). See also PALESTINE, § 12 (c). C. S. T.

SODOM, VINE OF: A vine whose juices and fruits were corrupt like the people of Sodom (Dt 32 32). It is a figure of the moral corruptness of Israel's enemies (so Dillmann, Driver, et al.). According to others, it is a figure of Israel's corruptness, the cause of all her disasters. C. S. T.

SODOMITE, sed'am-ait. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c).

SOFT RAIMENT. See, in general, DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, §§ 2, 5.

SOLOMON, sel'o-man (שְׁלֹמֹה, shēlōmōh, Gr. Σολομών), 'peaceful,' 'pacific': 1. Sources. The son of David by Bath-sheba (II S 12 24); also named by the prophet Nathan, Jedidiah (ver. 25), 'beloved of J'. He succeeded his father upon the throne, and was the last king of the united nation. The Biblical account of the reign of S. is found in I K chs. 1-11 II Ch chs. 1-9; cf. Sir 47 12-22. Josephus (Ant. VIII, 1-8) adds nothing reliable, but, in harmony with later tradition, makes S. play the rôle of sorcerer.

2. Accession. S. came to the throne about 971 B.C. (see CHRONOLOGY OF THE O T, table). Little of his youth is known, but it is probable that his education was in the hands of Nathan the prophet. He began his reign as a mere youth (I K 3 7)—according to Josephus at the age of fifteen, but two passages (I K 11 42, 14 21) imply that he was probably not quite twenty. Bath-sheba persuaded David to appoint her son his successor. Thus the rights of Adonijah (q.v.), the heir apparent after the death of Amnon and Absalom, were set aside. The accession of S. to the throne was hastened by the conspiracy of Adonijah, who was supported by Abiathar, the priest, and Joab, the veteran commander. Bath-sheba, supported by Nathan, Zadok, and Benaiah, gained the support of the aged monarch. At David's command, S. rode to Gihon on the royal mule, escorted by the king's body-guard, and was there anointed by Nathan. The conspirators, assembled at En-rogel in the vicinity of Jerusalem, hurriedly dispersed (I K 1 5-53). Their connection with this movement involved Joab and Abiathar in disaster (I K 2 26-34). Shimei, David's old enemy, also lost his life through his disobedience (I K 2 36-46; cf. II S 16 5 ff.).

3. Extent and Organization of His Kingdom. S. inherited a kingdom which had been conquered by the military genius of his father. It stretched from Tiphshah (Thapsacus) on the Euphrates to Gaza (I K 4 24); two of its outposts were Tamar (usually identified with Tadmor), in the Syrian desert, and Ezion-geber, at the head of the Red Sea. His task was to weld this empire into a unity. As far as Israel was concerned, he accomplished this by blotting out the ancient tribal lines in his division of the land, and by redistricting the territory into twelve prefectures for the purposes of taxation (I K 4 7 ff.). With the institution of these administrative units many ancient tribal rights were swept away, and the vicious Oriental system of forced work, the levy, was introduced. We read of 30,000 at work in Lebanon, in monthly relays of 10,000; 70,000 who bore burdens, 80,000 hewers, and 3,300 overseers (I K 5 13-18). A very large part of these laborers was taken from the Canaanitish elements of the population (I K 9 20 ff.). The list of the king's cabinet officers (I K 4 1-6) indicates considerable organization. Jehoshaphat, son of Ahilud, was vizier, or chancellor (Heb. mazkēr); Elihoreph and Ahijah had charge of the state papers and correspondence (Heb. šōpherīm); Azariah was at the head of the twelve prefectures, and hence chancellor of the exchequer. Zabud was called the 'king's friend,' a designation of unknown significance, but also mentioned in the Amarna letters (104). Adoniram had the unpopular office of supervisor of the inhabitants who had been reduced to forced labor. S., altho traditionally portrayed as a man of peace, had a large standing army. Besides organizing a cavalry force of 12,000, he equipped 1,400 chariots (I K 10 26) to supply which he established royal stables, with 4,000 stalls (the 40,000 of I K 4 26 is an error; cf. II Ch 9 25). Making a rough estimate on the basis of the cavalry, we conclude that Israel's fighting strength was 300,000 men, when all branches of arms are considered. The national defense was further provided for by the fortification of Jerusalem, and other cities (I K 9 15 ff.) (cf. JERUSALEM, § 31). In the North, Hazor and Megiddo were strongly garrisoned in order to prevent any uprising on the part of the Canaanites, while Beth-horon, Baalath, and Gezer on the W., frowned down upon the Philistines. Tamar, located either in the wilderness of Judea or to the SE. of the Dead Sea on the route to Ezion-geber, was established as an outpost for the protection of caravans (I K 9 18, but Heb. margin and II Ch 8 4 read Tadmor). The wisdom of this policy soon became evident. Rebellion broke out in Edom, and, altho Hadad is said to have ascended the throne, he was kept in check (I K 11 14-22). The narrative (I K 11 23-25) implies continual warfare between Israel and Rezon of Damascus. Jeroboam sowed the seeds of rebellion and civil war, which bore bitter fruit for the successor of S. (I K 11 26 ff.). This conspirator found an asylum with Sheshonk I of Egypt. In all this S. changed the conception of the kingdom from that of an ideal, theocratic realm, where the ruler represented J', to that of an Oriental world-power, in which the monarch practised aggrandizement and oppression for his own selfish ends.

4. His Buildings. As a builder on a magnificent scale, S. was a true Oriental monarch. His fame in this respect is usually associated with the building of the Temple. This sanctuary, however, was only a part of a pile of royal buildings erected on Mt.

Zion. The Temple was located on the northern and highest eminence (Jer 26 10). Situated on the southern end of the hill was the House of the Forest of Lebanon, which was probably an assembly-hall for the elders and nobility of Israel. Next to this edifice, on its northern side, stood the Porch of Pillars, which led directly to the Throne Porch, or Hall of Judgment (7 7). Beyond the Throne Porch and nearest to the Temple stood his house, the royal residence, and the harem (I K 7 8). The entire group of structures, Temple included, was surrounded by a court. (For a detailed description of these buildings see JERUSALEM, §§ 25-30, and TEMPLE, §§ 3-17.)

Outside of Jerusalem S. laid out gardens and vineyards (Ec 2 4-6), and he must have provided a system of water-works, altho nothing definite is said of this in the O T. To carry out such a building program required a large force of workmen and a well-filled treasury. This last was secured, partly by an oppressive system of taxation, and partly by the development of commerce. Forced labor furnished the workmen and artizans.

5. Foreign Policy and Commerce. S. was a diplomat rather than a soldier, and succeeded in forming several alliances with advantage to himself. Probably, at the very opening of his reign he made a treaty with Pharaoh (Pusukamme or Pasebchaun, of the 21st dynasty). It was ratified by the marriage of S. to the daughter of the Egyptian monarch, who captured Gezer (q.v.), and gave it as a dowry to his daughter. The ulterior purpose of this league was to foster close commercial relations between the two nations, and upon S. devolved the task of keeping open the caravan route to Mesopotamia (I K 3 1, 7 8, 10 26 ff.). Another confederate of S. was Hiram of Tyre (I K 9 10 ff., 26 ff.). The latter found it to his interest to secure the friendship of the new power, through whose territory ran the caravan routes to Arabia and Egypt. Phenicia furnished both the material and the skilled workmen for the many building enterprises of the Israelitish monarch (I K 5 9-12). In return S. paid an annual tribute (I K 5 11) and ceded twenty cities in Galilee (I K 9 11 ff.). The visit of the queen of Sheba was due to commercial and political reasons. The aggressive commercial policy of S. aroused anxiety in the Sabeian kingdom. The Ophir commercial fleet (I K 9 28) might be the precursor of vessels of war. It was to settle such questions, as well as to satisfy herself as to the wisdom and glory of S., that the Arabian queen visited Jerusalem (I K 10 1-10). These alliances were the basis of his wealth and commerce. His possession of Gezer, Dor, and Megiddo (Jg 1 27b; Jos 17 11; I K 4 11) gave him command of the caravan route from Egypt to the East, and enabled him to levy toll on caravans. Hiram's sailors manned the ships of the fleet which sailed from Ezion-geber, bringing gold and other products from Ophir on the E. coast of the Persian Gulf (I K 9 26 ff., 10 11 ff.). S. was also interested with Hiram in the Phoenician voyages to Tarshish (10 22). In addition to what flowed through the ordinary channels of industry, taxes, and tribute, his commercial enterprises are said to have brought S. 666 talents of gold annually. However, the phrase 'in one year' (10 14) can scarcely mean annually, but must refer to the most prosperous year of his reign. The Biblical writer describes the wealth of S. in hyperbolic language (10 27). The income derived from trade was supplemented by oppressive taxation (I K 4 22 ff.), to support his pomp and splendor.

6. Personal Life and Character. S. was a true Oriental in his love of splendor. The poet recalls the magnificence of his palanquin and his escort (Song 3 6-11). His harem was large; the figures of Song 6 8 (60 queens, 80 concubines) refer to the inmates of the harem at one time, while those of I K 11 3 (700 wives and 300 concubines) cover his entire reign. Political reasons prompted many unions with foreign princesses, which led him to the toleration of strange cults. This laxity is condemned in the O T (I K 11 1-8), and later the Rabbis looked upon these marriages as the beginning of disaster for Israel (cf. Sir 47 19 ff.).

In the O T 'wisdom' is a technical term, signifying a knowledge of the principles and laws according to which God governs nature and the lives of men. S. is looked upon as supremely gifted with such wisdom (Lk 11 31). He received this in answer to his prayer at the opening of his reign (I K 3 7 ff.; cf. Sir 47 13 ff.). His wisdom manifested itself in a shrewd administration of justice (I K 3 16 ff.) and in his knowledge of plants and animals (I K 4 32 ff.). Of the men with whom he is compared in his possession of this gift we know nothing (I K 4 30 ff.). He is the hero of the Song of Songs, is impersonated in Ecclesiastes, and is, without doubt, the author of many of the Proverbs contained in the canonical book of that name (I K 4 32). He probably laid the foundation for that side of Hebrew literary activity which flowered in the books of the Wisdom literature. Tradition ascribes Pss 72 and 127 to him. The apocryphal Book of Wisdom (7 17-21) attributes encyclopedic knowledge to S., representing him as well versed in cosmology, demonology, astronomy, zoology, anthropology, botany, etc. The author of this work makes him philosophize after the manner of the Alexandrian schools, and puts into his mouth expressions which show an acquaintance with the Platonic and Stoic systems (8 20, 9 15, etc.). The so called Psalter of Solomon is really a collection of Pharisee psalms. Later generations looked upon S. as a man of fervid piety, for his prayer at the dedication of the Temple (I K ch. 8), in the Deuteronomic version as we possess it, is 'one of the grandest devotional utterances to be found in prechristian devotional literature.' His practical religion was not lived upon the lofty plane of this prayer. Altho he never formally forsook the worship of Jehovah, the national God, he tolerated and took part in the worship of foreign deities. He was certainly not an absolute theoretical monotheist, after the manner of the later prophets, and, while without the serious faults of his father, David, he nevertheless lacked also the latter's intense devotion to Israel's God.

7. Solomon in Later Legend. The Solomon legends form a vast subject, which can be only touched upon. Josephus (Ant. VIII, 2 5) attributes to him the power of expelling demons, makes him the author of incantations for alleviating distempers and diseases, and derives from him the method of exorcism as it was practised in the days of the historian. According to rabbinical tradition, he had power over the demons by means of a talismanic ring, upon which the name of God was inscribed, and it was the theft of this ring which enabled Asmodeus, the chief of the demons, to usurp the throne of S. The relation of Israel's great monarch to Asmodeus has been a favorite theme with both Jewish and Mohammedan writers. By a misinterpretation of I K 4 33 the Rabbis ascribed to him full knowledge of the speech of birds and beasts. (See JE.) S. appears in the Koran in suras 21, 27, 28, 34, 37, 38. The story of S., Queen Bilqis, and the Hoopoe (sura 27) is really borrowed from the Targum of Esther (1 2). See Hughes, Dict. of Islam. The fame of Israel's great monarch has been spread far and wide through Oriental lands in the literature which Islam has produced.

SOLOMON'S SERVANTS ('abhdhē shēlōmōh): Among those who returned with Zerubbabel are mentioned the children of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 55, 58; Neh 7 57, 60), who afterward dwelt in the cities of Judah (Neh 11 3). They are mentioned with the Nethinim (q.v.) in all these passages, and are probably to be included with them, tho not named in Neh 3 26, 31, 10 28 [29]. The Nethinim were 'those given' to the service of the Temple, and are traced back to Solomon (I K 9 20, 21; cf. Jos 9 23), if not to David (Ezr 8 20). Solomon levied bond-servants (I K 9 20 f.) from the old inhabitants of Canaan, and probably gave some of them to the lower service of the Temple, as 'Nethinim.' Their descendants seem to have formed a separate class, and to have maintained their identity until after the Exile. C. S. T.

SONG OF SONGS (שִׁיר הַשִּׁירִים, shīr hash-shīrīm), ('Song of Songs,' Song of Solomon AV): The full title reads: 'Song of Songs, which is Solomon's.' The common title Canticles is from the Vulg. Canticum Canticorum.

1. Name and Place in the Canon. 'Song of Songs' is a superlative expression signifying the best or greatest of songs (cf. 'holy of holies,' 'vanity of vanities'). The second half of the Heb. title clearly points to Solomon as the supposed author.

In the Heb. Canon the book belongs to the third division (the 'Writings' or Hagiographa); and is the first of the five Megilloth or 'Rolls' (Song, Ru, La, Ec, Est) which were read publicly at the great annual feasts, Song being assigned to the eighth day of the Passover.

At the Council of Jamnia (90 A.D.) Rabbi Akiba made high claims for the book, saying that 'no one in Israel ever doubted that the Song of Songs defiled the hands [i.e., is canonical], for the whole world is not worth the day on which the Song was given.' At this time the book had apparently already been placed among the sacred writings, and it may have been considered canonical before the beginning of our era<sup>1</sup>; but the very extravagance of the language used by its admirers seems to indicate that for a long while there was dispute as to its canonicity, and it is a singular fact that the Song is never referred to in the other O T Books, the O T Apocrypha, the N. T., Philo, or Josephus. The admission of the work into the Canon was based upon two assumptions: (1) its Solomonic authorship, and (2) the existence of a veiled religious meaning, which could be brought to light through an allegorical interpretation. We shall see later, however, that both of these assumptions were groundless.

2. Interpretation. At first glance, the Song is simply a poem concerning affection between the sexes, sometimes rather too frank in expression for our Western ears, but culminating in a matchless panegyric upon true love, which atones for any previous coarseness. The work gives a vague impression of unity, altho its structure seems rather confused. It is clear that more than one person speaks, but it is difficult for the English reader to disentangle the various utterances, or to discover a coherent plan running through the book.

Those who maintain the unity of the book differ as to the number of speakers introduced. The traditional view among both Jews and Christians (supported in modern times by Keil and Delitzsch) was that there are but two principal characters, Solomon and a Shulammitte maiden (6 13), and that the poem is made up of mutual expressions of love and admiration.<sup>3</sup>

Widely differing hypotheses have been put forth concerning the meaning of the poem. All the theories worthy of serious discussion, however, may be considered as variations of one or another of the three now to be presented.

<sup>2</sup> The fact that in Heb. the pronouns usually indicate the gender removes a good deal of the uncertainty which is inevitable in our translations. Even in the Eng., however, a clue may be found by remembering that 'my love' (e.g., 1 7, 16, etc.); not, however, 'my love' in 1 7, 3 5, 8 4) always refers to the woman, while 'my beloved' (e.g., 1 13, 14, 16) indicates the man. The mention of the 'daughters of Jerusalem' (1 5, 2 7, etc.) is also suggestive.

<sup>3</sup> The analysis of the poem according to this scheme, as well as that which follows, will be found in Driver's LOT. The Modern Reader's Bible (part entitled 'Biblical Idylls') arranges the complete text very attractively in accordance with the traditional view.

(1) The Allegorical Theory. As has been said already, the introduction of the Song into the Canon was based upon an allegorical interpretation. Such an exposition presupposed the traditional view of the structure of the work. The bride was the Jewish people, the bridegroom, Solomon, was God, and the progress of the poem embraced the entire history of Israel from the Exodus to the coming of the Messiah.

The allegorical interpretation was taken over by the early Christians, except that for Jehovah and Israel they substituted Christ and His Church. With slight modifications, this view was accepted practically exclusively until the end of the 18th cent., and is indicated in the chapter-headings of the Authorized Version. The book has always been a favorite among those of a mystic turn of mind,<sup>4</sup> and the allegorizing has often been carried out in elaborate, not to say offensive, detail. It need hardly be said that the poem itself does not contain a single indication that there is any such cryptic meaning.

The self-indulgent autocrat with a harem of 'threescore queens, and fourscore concubines, and virgins without number' (6 8; cf. I K 11 3) would have been a poor type of God.

There is no justification for the efforts, still not infrequently made, to combine the literal and the allegorical interpretations, even to the extent of admitting that the love here described may be typical of a higher love. Of course it may! So may any record of human affection (e.g., 'Sonnets from the Portuguese') be cited to make more vivid our conception of the depth of love which His people ought to bear to God. But the Song of Songs does not mean this; and when both O T and N T abound in unmistakable and sometimes elaborate comparisons between Divine and human love (e.g., Is 54 4 ff.; Jer 2 2, 3 1; Ezk ch. 16; Hos chs. 1-3; Mt 9 15; II Co 11 2; Eph 5 31 f.; Rev 21 2), it seems unnecessarily confusing to search for further types in this poem. It is significant that when the Bridegroom of the Church at length appeared, neither He nor His disciples ever found it necessary to apply to the Christ the words of the Song of Songs.

Isolated protests were raised against the allegorical method from early times. Theodore of Mopsuestia (360-429 A.D.) contended for a literal interpretation of the book, with the result that his commentary was condemned by the Second Council of Constantinople (553 A.D.). Ibn Ezra and Joseph Kimhi, in the 12th cent., mention literal interpreters in their day. Castelli in 1544, declared that the Song was an expression of Solomon's love for the maiden Shulamith, but these voices were lost in the universal chorus of approval, Jewish and Christian, of the traditional conception.

(2) The Dramatic Theory. The Protestant Reformation, with its rejection of allegory, and its insistence upon the grammatico-historical interpretation of Scripture, led inevitably to a literal interpretation of the Song; and the earliest efforts in this direction assumed that it was a drama of the familiar Greek type. First suggested by Wachter in 1722, this was developed by Jacobi in 1771, and was given currency by Ewald. According to Ewald, there are three chief characters, viz., Solomon, the Shulamite, and her shepherd lover; and from various hints we can reconstruct a background of incidents which will explain the utterances of this dramatic or semi-dramatic poem.

The story, briefly, is this: A beautiful country girl from Shulam (i.e., Shunem, 5 m. N. of Jezreel) was surprised by the king on one of his journeys to the north (6 11 f.), was brought to Jerusalem and placed in the royal palace (1 4b, 5), where, as the poem opens, the ladies of the harem ('daughters of Jerusalem') are singing the praises of Solomon. The king himself makes great efforts to win the affection of the Shulamite (1 9, etc.); but she remains faithful to the memory of her shepherd lover (1 7, etc.), who at last appears, and is allowed by the magnanimous monarch to return to his mountain home with his bride (8 5 ff.).<sup>5</sup>

According to this conception of the book, it contains a clear and helpful ethical teaching. It is a glorification of true love, which, in spite of all the imagined seductions of a rich and sensuous Oriental court, remains faithful to its plighted troth, and repels every tempting allurements like a virgin fortress guarded by walls and towers (8 10). Not Solomon in all his glory could banish from the heart of the exiled country maiden the image of her absent lover. The Shepherd wooer who found his heart's desire resting beneath the apple-tree inspired in the maiden the sweet love lines (8 1 f.) which are both the text and the climax of the poem.

'Set me as a seal upon thy heart,
As a seal upon thine arm:
For love is strong as death;
Jealousy is cruel as Sheol:
The flashes thereof are flashes of fire,
A very flame of Jehovah.
Many waters can not quench love,
Neither can floods drown it:
If a man would give all the substance of his house for love,
He would utterly be condemned.'

This theory was given wide popularity by Renan (1860), and has received the support of critics of the first rank, such as Dillmann, Bruston, Martineau, Driver, and Andrew Harper in the Cambridge Bible (1902); but it does not remove the difficulties of the book. The drama is elsewhere unknown in Hebrew literature, or in Semitic literature; and, granted that the Song is dramatic, we must suppose that it was intended to be read or sung rather than acted. Furthermore, in the Song there are none of the usual indications concerning the dramatis personæ, scenes, etc., so that a great deal must be read between the lines. Those who hold this view of the structure of the poem are not always in agreement as to the assignment of the various speeches, and it is often necessary to interrupt the dialog with supposed musings, dreams, and apostrophes to the absent which seem awkward and far-fetched. In particular, there is a difference of opinion as to whether, in passages such as 4 7-15, the shepherd lover actually appears upon the scene, or is only imagined to speak by his distracted sweetheart. These difficulties have led more recent critics to abandon the dramatic theory, and to adopt a new theory which is more in accord with Oriental life and Oriental literature.

(3) The Folk-Song Theory. This view was first clearly formulated by Budde<sup>6</sup>, who based his arguments largely upon descriptions of modern Syrian marriage customs first published in 1873 by J. G. Wetzstein,<sup>7</sup> then Prussian consul at Damascus. According to this theory, the book contains a number of poems (Budde distinguishes twenty-three) sung during the week following a wedding, when the bride and groom presided over elaborate ceremonies and were honored as 'king' (Solomon) and 'queen' (Shulamith, cf. I K, 1:3 ff.; 2:17 ff.). These particular songs may have been written down by an interested spectator or, more probably, formed the repertoire of some professional musician.

This theory has received additional support by the publication of G. Dalman's Palästinischer Diwan (1901), which gives six modern Syrian wedding songs closely similar to the Song of Songs. Similar material is gathered by H. H. Spoer, AJSL, xxii, 1906, pp. 292-301; and by E. Littmann, Neuarabische Volkspoesie, 1902. Old Arabian parallels are given by C. J. Lyall, Translations of Ancient Arabic Poetry; Old Egyptian parallel, by W. M. Müller, Die Liebespoesie der alten Aegypter. See L. B. Paton, 'Love (Semitic and Egyptian),' in ERE, viii, pp. 180-183. For Bab. parallels, see T. J. Meek in JBL, xliii, 1924, pp. 245-252.

3. Authorship and Date. As to authorship, place of composition, and date, the one thing upon which all modern scholars are agreed is that Solomon could not possibly have written the Song which now bears his name. The statement of the title is of little value, as this is plainly by a later writer (the relative, 'asher, 'which,' of 1:1 is never used in the body of the book). According to the dramatic theory of the Song mentioned above, the great king could never have composed a poem which sets him in so unfavorable a light. But the denial of Solomonic authorship does not depend upon any particular theory concerning the interpretation of the work. The coupling of Tirzah (cf. I K 15:21) with Jerusalem (6:4) points to a time later than the division of the kingdom of Solomon. Above all, the diction exhibits several peculiarities, especially in the uniform use of the relative she for 'asher, and in the recurrence of many words found never or rarely besides in Biblical Hebrew, but common in Aramaic, which show either that it must be a late work (postexilic), or, if early, that it belongs to North Israel, where there is reason to suppose that the language spoken differed dialectically from that of Judah' (see Driver, LOT, p. 448 f., for a list of such words).

The latter alternative is preferred by Driver himself, largely because of the freshness of the recollections of Solomon and his court and the general purity and vigor of the style, which seem to indicate a comparatively early date. The prevailing tendency of recent critics, however, is to place the poem in the Greek period (3d cent. B.C.). The evidence of the local coloring is not conclusive. The majority of the allusions seem to refer to N. Palestine (tho this also is disputed); but there is no reason why a Judean should not have been familiar with this part of the country. SONS OF GOD (בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים, b'nē hā-'ēlōhīm): A designation of supernatural, godlike beings, angels (q.v.). 'Sons of' means 'belonging to the class of.' In Gn 6:2-4 they are represented as existing before the Flood, and from their union with women sprang the 'mighty men of old.' Some interpret this passage by making 'the sons of God' men of the pious descendants of Seth, and 'the daughters of men,' the wicked descendants of Cain; but this is impossible. Similar beings are mentioned in Job 1:6, 2:1, 38:7; Ps 29:1, 89:6 [7], where b'nē hā-'ēlōhīm or 'ēlīm' is used. C. S. T.

The wādī begins to the NW. of Jerusalem and reaches the sea as the Nahr Rabin ('Reuben river'), 9 m. below Jaffa. Altho mentioned by name only in Jg 16:4, this valley was doubtless also the scene of the battles of I S chs. 4-7. The 'camp of Dan' (Jg 13:25 mg.) lay on the N. slope of the valley, opposite Beth-shemesh. See G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 218-226.

SOSIPATER, so-sip'a-tār (Σωσιπατρος): Mentioned in the postscript (see QUARTUS) of Ro ch. 16 (vs. 21-23), with Lucius and Jason, who are described as kinsmen—i.e., fellow countrymen—of the writer (cf. Ro 9 3). It is possible that this Sospater is to be identified with the Berean Sopater mentioned in Ac 20 4. The name occurs in CIGr., II, No. 1927. J. M. T.

SOSTHENES, sos'thi-niz (Σωσθένης): The head of the Jewish synagog in Corinth at the time of Paul's arrest in that city (Ac 18 12 ff.), and probably the successor of Crispus, after the conversion of the latter (Ac 18 8). When Gallio refused to listen to the charges against Paul, 'all' (the Jews, apparently: NAB omit αἱ Ἑλληνες 'Greeks' AV in ver. 17) turned upon S. and maltreated him, evidently because of his weak prosecution of their case. If this S. is the same person as the one mentioned in I Co 1 11, he subsequently became a Christian. Later tradition makes the S. of the latter passage one of the Seventy (Eus. HE, I, 12 1 f.). J. M. T.

SOTAL, sō'tai, sō'tē, or sō'ta-ai (סֹטַי, סֹטֵי, sōtay): The ancestral head of one of the families of 'Solomon's servants' (Ezr 2 55; Neh 7 57).

SOUL. See MAN, DOCTRINE OF, § 6.

SOUND, TO. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

SOUTH, (as a point of the compass). See EAST.

SOUTH, THE: To the S. of Judah lay the region known by the Heb. name נֶגֶב, neghebh (i.e., 'dry' or 'waste'), rendered in AV by 'south' (as tho a mere point of the compass), in RV by 'the South' (as a proper noun), except in those cases in which it is used solely for a point of the compass. The exact boundaries of this region can not be given. It was thought to begin in the Calebite possessions near Debir (cf. I S 30 14). It extended to Kadesh-barnea, about 60 m. SSW. of Debir, with a breadth of about 40 m., Map II, 5. It included such places as Arad, Beer-sheba, Rehoboth, Sibnah, Kadesh-barnea, and probably others, the exact location of which can not now be recovered. Its designation neghebh, 'dry,' was only comparative. It had fewer springs and was less fruitful than Judah, but was not a desert like much of the region farther S., e.g., the wilderness of Sin. It was the home of many tribes, Amalekites, Jerahmeelites, Calebites, etc., some of whom became incorporated into Judah, while others, more hostile, were later driven out or exterminated. This whole district was considered a part of the land of Israel, and was assigned to the tribes of Judah and Simeon. The Simeonites were incorporated later into Judah, but the memory of their original possession is reflected in such passages as Jos 19 1-9. See also PAL-ESTINE, §§ 6 and 15, and cf. Cheyne in EB, art. Negeb, with map. Cf. also HGHL, chs. II and XIII. E. E. N.

SOW, SOWER. See, in general, AGRICULTURE, § 5.

SPAIN (Σπανία): S. is mentioned in the Bible only in Ro 15 24, 28, but is identified usually with the Tarshish of the O T, whose rich mines attracted the Phenicians. The N. and W. portions of this wealthy peninsula were not subjugated by the Romans until the time of Augustus, but the rest enjoyed an abundant trade with Rome by sea and by good roads. 'Roman civilization pervaded S. earlier and more powerfully than any other province' (Mommsen). A native Latinity, represented by the Senecas, Lucan, Martial, and Quintilian, gave S. a high place in the literature of the 1st cent. It was popularly regarded as the western limit of the world (cf. I Clement, v, 7; ἐπὶ τὸ τέταρτον τῆς οὐρανόθεν). For Paul's visit see TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO.

SPARROW. See PALESTINE, § 25.

SPARTA, spār'ta (Σπάρτη), also called Lacedæmon: The capital of Lacedæmonia or Laconia, peopled at first by the Leleges, Minyæ, Phenicians, then in turn by Æolians, Achæans, and the Dorians, who held sway in historical times. Two kings of the old native royal families (Agidæ and Eurypontidæ) exercised conjointly the supreme authority in war and religion. Associated with them were five Ephors and a Gerousia of twenty-eight men above sixty years of age. The state was a democratic monarchy; matters of great moment were decided by the town meeting. S.'s conservative constitution was based on the laws of Lycurgus (circa 820 B.C.). The people formed three classes: sovereign Dorians (few in number), the subject Achæans (Periæcōi), and the serfs (Helots). The mode of life was simple; the youth belonged to the state, not to the family, and were drilled in the use of arms from infancy. S. came to be regarded as the leader of Greece in war. Thebes (Epaminondas) was the first to break S.'s power (362 B.C.), which was finally crushed by Antigonos Doson (of Macedonia) and Philipæmen (an Achæan general) at Sellasia (221 B.C.). S. became prominent again for a time under the tyrant Nabis (died 192 B.C.). It is difficult to see any historical importance in the message of Jonathan to the Spartans (c. 146 B.C.; cf. I Mac 12) seeking their friendship on the strange plea of kinship. I Mac 12 7, 20-23 implies that Areus I, of Sparta (309-265 B.C.), had shown great friendship for the Jews in the days of Onias I (c. 323-300 B.C.). But little is known of the reasons and circumstances of these relations between Judea and Sparta. See ONIAS.

SPIDER. See PALESTINE, § 26.

SPIES: The practise of using spies to obtain desired information ('spy out' or 'search') as to an enemy's land, condition, or plans must have been widely current in the ancient East. References to it in the O T are fairly numerous (Gn 42 9 ff.; Nu 13 1 ff., 21 32; Jos 2 1 ff.; Jg 1 23, 18 2; I S 26 4; II S 10 3). Of these the most noted instances are those of the twelve spies whom Moses sent from Kadesh to examine the land of Canaan (Nu ch. 13 and Dt 1 22 ff.) and the two whom Joshua sent to ascertain the condition of Jericho (Jos 2 1 ff.). In the first instance, the narrative in Nu ch. 13 appears to be composite, a fusion of two distinct accounts. In one (P), twelve men are selected by Moses at the command of J' and sent from the wilderness of Paran to go through the entire length of Canaan, even to its extreme N. boundary. They were gone forty days and returned with an evil report which greatly discouraged the people (Nu 13 1-17a, 21, 26a, 32a). According to the other account (JE), it was the people at Kadesh who requested that spies be sent. Moses agreed, selected twelve men, and sent them into 'the South' (q.v.) and into the 'hill-country' as far as the Valley of Eschol (near Hebron) to examine the land very carefully and bring back specimens of its fruit. This was done, but the majority of the spies were so terrified by the gigantic inhabitants and the strong cities that they discouraged the people from attempting the conquest (Nu 13 17b-20, 22-24, 26b-31, 33, and Dt 1 22-33). It also seems likely that in JE's account Joshua was not thought of as one of the spies, since Caleb alone is mentioned (Nu 13 30; Dt 1 36; cf. Nu 14 24). In P's account Joshua is named in the list (Nu 13 8). There can be no doubt that the tradition as found in JE is the more trustworthy. A tentative analysis of this into its original elements (J and E) is possible (Nu 13 17b, 18a, 19, 22, 27, 28, 30c = J; 17 f., 18b, 20, 29, 33 = E), but the differences here are not great.

The account of Joshua's spies (Jos ch. 2) is also composite. In one strand emphasis is laid upon the fact that Rahab's house was on the city wall so that she could let the spies down through a window which was to be designated by a scarlet thread in order that she could be rescued when the city was captured (see especially vs. 12, 14, 15, 17-21, and the sequel in 6 21, 25). In the other strand, the location of Rahab's house is not given, and in the sequel, while the wall has fallen flat (6 20), the spies go into the city to rescue Rahab (6 22 f.).

SPOON. See TEMPLE, § 16; and TABERNACLE, § 3 (3).

SPOUSE: The translation of the Heb. term kal-lah (Song 4 8-12, 5 1; Hos 4 13 f., all AV), which is more accurately rendered in RV by 'bride.'

SPRING: The geological formation of Palestine and the climate with its long dry season give an exceptional value and importance to springs, especially to those that are perennial (see PALESTINE, §§ 14-16, 19 f.). It was due to this that springs were venerated with sincere reverence and often thought of (especially in very early times) as abodes of deity (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 7), a mode of thought that persisted down to comparatively late times. Names of places located near springs were often compound, the first syllable, En ('ayn'), meaning 'spring.'

STACTE, stak'ti or -tē. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2 (1).

STAFF: This term renders the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) badh, 'bar of wood.' Such bars were used in the building of the sanctuary (Ex 25 13 f.; Nu 4 6 f.; I K 8 7). (2) hēts, 'ēts, 'etsāh, 'tree,' 'wood'; but, more particularly, the shaft of a spear (I S 17 7; II S 21 19). (3) mōl, mōlāh, 'pole,' which two persons might use in carrying a load on their shoulders (Nu 13 23; I Ch 15 15). (4) matteh, 'rod,' 'cane,' carried about as a badge of dignity or personal convenience (Gn 38 25); also figuratively (Ezk 4 16, 5 16). (5) maqgēl, the same as (4) (Gn 32 10). (6) mish'eneth, mash'enāh, 'stay,' 'support' (Jg 6 21; Ex 21 19; Is 3 1). (7) pelekkh, 'a distaff'—to lean upon (II S 3 20). (8) shēbhet, 'cane,' 'reed' (II S 23 21). (9) ξόλον, 'bludgeon,' used in attack or defense (Mt 26 47). (10) ῥάβδος, 'cane,' the same as (4) (Mt 10 10).

STEERSMAN. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

STEPHANAS, stef'a-nas (Στεφανός): One of the first converts in Achaia, whom, together with his family, Paul baptized (I Co 1 16, 16 15). With Achaicus and Fortunatus, he seems to have come to Ephesus with messages from the Corinthian church, probably also with the letter to which our I Co is a reply. These messengers were probably also the bearers of the latter Epistle.

STEPHEN, sti'ven (Στέφανος, 'crown'): One of 'the seven' prominent disciples in the early Church who were chosen to see to the distribution of food, etc., to the needy members of the community (Ac 6 5 f.). His Gr. name indicates probably that he was a Hellenistic Jew. He was noted for his faith and spiritual gifts (Ac 6 5, 8). His activity in the new cause brought him into conflict with the zealous Hellenistic Jews of Jerusalem, who, angered by his eloquent presentation of the new faith, at last brought him to trial before the Sanhedrin, on the formal charge of blasphemy. In spite of his character, his defense of his faith in Christ was not heeded. He was rudely interrupted, condemned to death, and stoned, Saul of Tarsus consenting to the act and holding the garments of the chief witnesses against Stephen (Ac 6 11-18, 22 20).

Stephen was not only the first Christian martyr, but he was also the first of the early primitive Apostolic Church to perceive the logical consequences of Jesus' teaching, viz., that the existing Jewish cultus, with its traditions and its Temple, was of a temporary character, and that with the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah a new era had dawned in which these things were of secondary value. We have only a fragment of his speech preserved, but this, with the charge that was formulated against him, shows the general drift of his thought. He thus anticipated Paul in asserting the larger, more universal scope of Christianity. It was a remarkable fact that Saul of Tarsus, who held the garments of Stephen's executioners, was destined to become the chief exponent of the principles for which Stephen died. E. E. N.

STERN. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

STEWARDSHIP: In the O T 'steward' is not the rendering of a simple Heb. term (except in I Ch 28 1 AV, where the Heb. is sar, 'prince' or 'ruler'). In Gn 43 16, 19, 44 4, the Heb. means 'one who is over the house.' In Gn 15 2, 'steward' AV, the literal rendering is 'son of the possession of my house,' i.e., 'possessor of my house'; cf. RV. But the text here is suspicious. In Dn 1 11, 16 the Heb. word melzar (Melzar AV) is probably the title of the officer who had charge of Daniel. The RV renders 'steward,' but this is little more than a guess. In the N T ἐπίτροπος is a general term for a caretaker and is well rendered 'steward' in Mt 20 8; Lk 8 3. But in Gal 4 2 ('steward' RV), 'guardian' or 'governor' (AV) is equally preferable. The other N T terms οἰκονόμος, οἰκονομῶν, οἰκονομεῖν (all derived from οἶκος, 'house,' and νέμειν, 'to manage') are well rendered by 'steward,' 'stewardship,' the plain reference being to the management of a large property by an overseer. Paul (I Co 4 1 f.; Tit 1 7) and Peter (I P 4 10) use the term οἰκονόμος figuratively of the Christian ministry. E. E. N.

STOCK, STOCKS. The rendering of (1) terms indicating the stem or stock of a tree which, as connected with the root, has life in it, e.g., geza' (Job 14 8; Is 40 24); 'ēger (Lv 25 47). (2) γένος, 'race,' 'racial stock' (Ac 13 26; Ph 3 5). (3) mahpekhet (Jer 20 2 f.), ṣadh (Job 13 27, 33 11), tsinōq (Jer 29 26), 'ēkhes (Pr 7 22, 'fettlers' RV) and ξύλον 'wood' (Ac 16 24), all instruments of punishment. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENT, § 3 (b). (4) 'ēts, 'tree' and bāl, the result of a tree's growth, i.e., wood—both meaning the wooden image used in idolatrous worship (Jer 2 27, 3 9, 10 8; Hos 4 12; Is 44 19). See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 11.

STOICS, stō'iks (οἱ Στωϊκοί): One of the philosophic schools of Greece (Ac 17 18, 'Stoicks' AV).

The Stoics were so called because Zeno (331-264 B.C.), the founder of Stoicism, lectured in the Στωϊκὴ πύλη ('colonnade decorated with paintings'); the literary founder was Chrysippus (280-207). Zeno started with the Cynicism of Crates, on which he constructed a system that went far beyond the limits of Cynicism. Zeno established the logical criterion and laid the ethical basis of Stoicism, while Cleanthes developed its pantheism. The founders of eclectic Rom. Stoicism were Panaetius, who made Stoicism a 'way of life,' and Posidonius, who gave to it the enthusiasm of a religion. The moral teachings of Stoicism were austere, and their practical, cosmopolitan character deeply influenced men of the period. Stoics postulated the ideal wise man, who is guided by reason, regulates his emotions or passions in accordance with the assent given by the mind to its perceptions, is unmoved by joy or grief, and submits uncomplainingly to necessity. He alone attains to virtue, the chief end of man, and brings his actions into harmony with nature and the universal reason inherent in nature, that is, he subordinates the human to the Divine will. Action (business and politics) is a necessity for man. Virtue insures happiness, but happiness is not the chief end of man; tho without passion, the wise man is not without feeling. He is not indulgent, but just to himself and others. He alone is free, a king and lord, the peer of Zeus himself. The world arose from fire; so did mind, which is an attenuated corporeity, and into fire they resolve themselves again by effluxion. The universal reason that moves all things acts in accordance with fixed laws. This working formative force in the universe is God, whose existence is proved by the dispensations of providence, divination, and the allegorical interpretation of popular beliefs. Stoicism was taught by Seneca, and lived by Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. After the Antonine days it came into the general movement of religious Syncretism. In epistemology the Stoics were empirics. Stoicism was the ally of Christianity in its 'enthusiasm of humanity,' its message of the divine kinship of man, its furtherance of personality by the emphasis on will and duty, and in its beneficent influence on Roman jurisprudence. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

STOMACHER, stom'ak-ər: The rendering of the Heb. p'thūghāl (Is 3 24 AV, 'robe' RV). The exact meaning of the Heb. word is unknown. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 6.

STONE: The Heb. and Aram. 'ebhen and Gr. λίθος are the common words thus translated. In addition, tsār (Job 22 24), 'rock,' ts'ôr (II S 17 13), 'pebble,' and ῥῆπος, 'a small worn stone,' are translated 'stone' in RV. In the following passages the AV rendering 'stone' is changed in RV: ṣela', 'rock' i.e., 'cliff' (Ps 137 9, 141 6); paḥadh, 'thigh' (Job 40 17); heres, 'potsherd' (Job 41 30); πέτρος, 'Peter' (Jn 1 42). The natural stones served as a pillow (Gn 28 11, 18); as a sacred pillar (matstsēbhāh; see PILLAR) (Gn 28 18, 22, 35 14, etc.); as a memorial (Jos 4 3 ff.); as a witness (Gn 31 45 f.; Jos 24 26 f.); as a seat (Ex 17 12); as a well-covering (Gn 29 2 f., 8 ff.); or, heaped up, as a covering for dead bodies (Jos 7 26, 8 29; cf. 10 18, 27; II S 18 17); and also for sealing tombs (Mt 27 60, 28 2; Jn 11 38 f.). The Law was inscribed on stones (Dt 27 2 ff.; Jos 8 32). Unhewn stones were used for altars (Jos 8 31; Ex 20 25; Dt 27 5 ff.; cf. Jg 9 5, 18, and I S 14 32; I K 18 31 ff.; I S 6 14 ff., also as the resting-place of the Ark; cf. ver. 18 RV). Stones on the land were thought to injure it (II K 3 19, 25; cf. 'stony ground,' Mk 4 16, etc.), were dangerous to the traveler on foot (Is 62 10; Ps 91 12 = Mt 4 6; cf. the figurative use of 'stone of stumbling,' Is 8 14; I P 2 8). Ore is called 'stone' (Dt 8 9; Job 28 2). For 'stone' (Is 34 11 AV), RV has 'plummet.' Small stones were used as weapons (Ex 21 18; Nu 35 17, 23); they were hurled by engines (II Ch 26 15) or by slings (Jg 20 16; I S 17 40 ff.; I Ch 12 2 ff.; Job 41 28). Stones were thrown as an expression of hatred (II S 16 6; cf. Jn 8 59, 10 31), where the use of stones as a punishment for certain crimes is perhaps also intended, as often in the O T and N T. Cf. the verbs sāgal, rāgham, λίσσιν, καταλίσσιν (Lk 20 6), λίθοβολεῖν, 'to stone.' Death by stoning was the punishment, among other things, for idolatry (Dt 13 10, 17 5; cf. Lv. 20 2); for possession of familiar spirits (Lv 20 27); for cursing (Lv 24 23); for unchastity of certain forms (Dt 22 21, 24; cf. Jn 8 7); Naboth was stoned (I K 21 13); also a hated taskmaster (I K 12 18); as a material, stone was used for vessels (Ex 7 19), tables (Ezk 40 42), tablets (Ex 24 12, etc.; Dt 4 13, etc.; I K 8 9), idols (Dt 4 28, etc.). Stones served for pavements (II K 16 17, etc.) and walls (Pr 24 31); great and costly hewn stones were used in buildings (I K 5 17 f., 6 7, etc.), as foundations (Is 28 16), as walls (Lv 14 40 ff.); for the capstone (Zec 4 7; cf. 3 9), the corner-stone (Job 38 6); the term is a figure of honor (Jer 51 28; cf. Is 28 16) and of the Messiah (Ps 118 22; Mt 21 42). Stones were set up as topographical marks (Jos 15 6, 18 17; I S 7 12, 'Eben-ezer,' 'ebhen hā'āzer; I S 20 19; I K 1 9). Precious stones (q.v.) were largely used in the Temple (II Ch 3 6, etc.). Hailstones are mentioned (Jos 10 11). Characteristics of a stone occur in similitudes—heaviness (sinking) (Ex 15 5; cf. Neh 9 11; Jer 51 63), immobility (Ex 15 16), strength (Job 6 12), firmness (Job 41 24), commonness (I K 10 27; II Ch 1 15, 9 27, etc.), dumbness (Hab 2 19; cf. Lk 19 40). In metaphors—men become stones (are petrified) through fear (I S 25 37; Ex 15 16); are hard of heart (Ezk 11 19, 36 26).

STONES, PRECIOUS: 1. General Character of Allusions to Precious Stones in the Bible. The collective expression 'precious stones' (Heb. and Gr. in the sing., 'ebhen yqārāh, λίθος τιμῆος, II S 12 30; Ezk 28 13; Rev 21 19, etc.) is used in the Bible in a non-technical and practical rather than in a precise and accurate sense. Variant expressions are 'pleasant stones,' Is 54 12 AV; 'stones to be set,' I Ch 29 2; Ex 25 7; 'glistening stones,' I Ch 29 2 AV; 'stones for inlaid work,' I Ch 29 2 RV. These all designate roughly defined groups of minerals (exclusive of the simple metals) which on the ground of real or imaginary qualities had come to be regarded as extremely valuable. Gems seem to have been chiefly imported rather than indigenous to Palestine (I K 10 11; Ezk 27 22; cf. I K 10 2, 10). The art of engraving stones for signet-rings was known from the earliest times (Ex 28 11; cf. Gn 38 18; I K 21 8). Jewels were also inset in crowns (II S 12 30) and were types of beauty, rareness, and costliness (Job 28 16 ff.; Pr 17 8); but the statement that Solomon garnished the Temple with 'precious stones' (II Ch 3 6) which had been gathered for that purpose by David (I Ch 29 2, 8) shows that the Jews did not make our modern distinction between rare gems and ornamental stones, such as onyx and agate. The term jewels in the EVV does not represent strictly gems or precious stones, but designates any articles, either manufactured or as found in nature, which may serve as ornaments or ornamental utensils. The Heb. words which it renders are k'li (Gn 24 53; Ex 11 2; Nu 31 50), hālī, heliyāh (Song 7 1; Hos 2 13), nezem, 'nose-ring' (Is 3 21; tho nezem is oftener an ear-ring, cf. Ex 32 2; cf. DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 1), and š'ghullāh (Mal 3 17; cf. PECULIAR PEOPLE).

The most important Biblical references to precious stones are in the following passages: Ex 28 17-20 = 39 10-13 (the high priest's breastplate), Job 28 16-19 (the value of wisdom), Ezk 28 13 (the covering of the king of Tyre), Rev. 21 11, 18-21 (the new Jerusalem).

2. The Stones of the Breast-plate. On the breastplate of the high priest there were twelve stones each having the name of one of the twelve tribes engraved upon it. In the description of the covering of the king of Tyre the Heb. text contains only nine gems, but in the LXX. the number and names are precisely the same as in Ex.

The identification of the stones of the high priest's breastplate is a problem of great difficulty. In modern times stones are classified according to chemical composition and method of crystallization, while in ancient times they were classified merely by general appearance. Some of the ancient names indicate color, but a red stone might be any one of four or five gems. Such stones as the diamond, ruby, sapphire, and topaz must be excluded at once because they were too hard to be engraved by any methods known to the ancients, even if the stones themselves had been familiar, which is doubtful in some cases.

The Greek as well as the English translations often render the same Heb. word by several different equivalents. Jos. gives the list twice (Ant. III 7 5; BJ V, 5 7), but his lists do not agree with each other nor with the LXX. It is quite possible that the stones may have been different from time to time, because of the destruction of the breastplate in some of the many captures of Jerusalem. Several of the identifications proposed below are hardly more than guesses.

The twelve stones were:

(1) 'ōdhem, the 'red' stone (Ex 28 17; Ezk 28 13), sardius; 'ruby' EVmg. Probably the carnelian; the ancient sard included both the sard and carnelian of the present day. The same as N T 'sardius' (Rev 21 20) or sardine stone (Rev 4 3 AV). (2) pārdhāh (Ex 28 17; Job 28 19; Ezk 28 13) = τοπάζιον (Rev 21 20), topaz. Probably modern chrysolite, commonly called peridot. (3) bāreqeth, the 'flashing' stone (Ex 28 17; Ezk 28 13), carbuncle; 'emerald' RVmg. The same stone as N T σμάραγδος, emerald (Rev 21 19; cf. 4 3). Presumably rock-crystal, tho emerald is not impossible. (4) nōphekh (Ex 28 18; Ezk 27 16, 28 13), emerald; 'chrysoprase' AVmg. in Ezk 28 13; 'carbuncle' (a clear red garnet) RVmg., which is doubtless correct. (5) šappūr (Ex 28 18; Ezk 28 13; Is 54 11; La 4 7, etc.) = N T ἀσπερος, sapphire. The modern sapphire, however, was unknown in ancient times, so this stone must be the lapis lazuli (Rev 21 19 RVmg.). (6) yahdōm, the 'hard' stone (Ex 28 18; Ezk 28 13), diamond, which is out of the question (see above). RVmg. renders by 'sardonyx.' Perhaps by this the onyx is meant. (7) leshem (Ex 28 19), ligure AV; jacinth RV; 'amber' RVmg. Possibly the yellow jacinth, tho the identification is very doubtful. (8) shēbhō (Ex 28 19), agate, seems correct. (9) ahlāmāh (Ex 28 19) = ἀμέθυστος (Rev 21 20). Without doubt the modern amethyst. (10) tarshish (Ezk 28 13), beryl; 'chrysolite' AVmg.; 'chalcedony' RVmg. (Ex 28 20), 'topaz' (Song 5 14), 'stone of Tarshish' (Ezk 10 9). Some golden-yellow stone, perhaps the same as the 'chrysolite' of Rev 21 20. (11) shōham (Gn 2 12; Ex 28 9, 20; Job 28 16; Ezk 28 13, etc.), onyx; 'beryl' RVmg., probably malachite. As Prof. J. L. Myres suggests, this is opaque enough to account for the translation 'onyx,' and green enough to account for the translation 'beryl.' Beryl is also mentioned in Rev 21 20. (12) yāsh-phēh (Ex 28 20; Ezk 28 13). The EVV are surely right in identifying this with the N T ἰάσπις (Rev 4 3, 21 11, 18, 19), the modern jasper.

The arrangement of the stones on the breastplate was probably as indicated in the following diagram:

3 Rock-Crystal? (transparent)	2 Chrysolite (yellow)	1 Carnelian (red)
6* Onyx? (black and white)	5 Lapis Lazuli (blue)	4 Garnet (red)
9 Amethyst (purple)	8 Agate (red?)	7 Jacinth? (yellow)
12* Jasper (green?)	11 Malachite (green)	10 Tarshish stone (yellow)

* Nos 6 and 12 are interchanged in the LXX.

3. Other Precious Stones. The following precious stones are mentioned in the O T in addition to those which are upon the breastplate: (1) bdēlāh (Gn 2 12; Nu 11 7); may be a gem (? pearl), but more probably is bdellium (so EV), a fragrant, resinous gum. (2) ra'mōth (Job 28 18; Ezk 27 16); may be some kind of coral. (3) p'nīnīm (Pr 3 15, 8 11, etc.), rubies; RVmg. has 'corals' (La 4 7), 'red coral or pearls' (Job 28 18). Probably the red coral, which was highly prized by the ancients. (4) shāmīr, diamond (Jer 17 1), and adamant (Ezk 3 9; Zec 7 12), was a hard cutting-stone, probably the modern emery. (5) gābhish (Job 28 18), pearl AV; crystal RV. Probably the rock-crystal. (6) kāhkhōdh, the 'sparkling' stone (Is 54 12; Ezk 27 16), agate AV; 'chrysoprase' AVmg.; ruby RV; the identification is doubtful. (7) z'khūkhūth (Job 28 17), crystal AV, is probably glass (RV), which was rare and precious in ancient times.

Besides those already mentioned (see above, § 2, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5, 9, 10, 11, 12), the following gems are named in the N T: (8) χρυσόπρασος (Rev 21 20), chrysoprase RV; chrysoprasus AV, an apple-green chalcedony. (9) χαλκηδών (Rev 21 19), chalcedony, was a green stone from the copper-mines near Chalcedon, probably diopside (emerald copper). (10) μαργαρίτης (Mt 7 6; I Ti 2 9; Rev 17 4, etc.) is, of course, the pearl. (11) κρύσταλλος (Rev 4 6, 22 1; cf. 21 11), crystal, i.e., rock-crystal. (12) ὑάκινθος (Rev 21 20; cf. 9 17), jacinth AV and RV (hyacinth in 9 17); 'sapphire' RVmg. is doubtless correct. (13) σαρδόνυξ (Rev 21 20) is rightly rendered sardonyx (red and white onyx).

4. The Stones of the New Jerusalem. In Rev 21 the names of the twelve tribes are to be written upon the gates of the city, while the names of the twelve apostles are written upon the twelve precious stones which form the foundation of the wall. Charles (ICC, Revelation, II, 164-170) has an ingenious theory to account for the order of the stones which is much different from that in the O T. Express statements of Philo and Josephus show that the connection of each of the twelve precious stones in the text with one of the signs of the Zodiac was well-known to the Jews. Placing the stones in the order suggested by ver. 13 we find that we have exactly the reverse order of the path of the sun thru the signs. This is done, Charles thinks, for the purpose of deliberately disconnecting the Holy City from the idea of the city of the gods as held among many ancient nations.

STONE-SQUARER. See GEBAL.

STONING. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, §§ 2 (c), 3 (a).

STOOL: (1) The rendering of 'obhnyayim in Ex 1 16. The word means literally 'potter's wheel' (cf. Jer 18 3) and was applied, because of similarity of form, to a kind of stool, used in midwifery as a support to a woman at childbirth ('birth-stool' RV). See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 8. (2) kīṣṣē, i.e., a seat of some sort (II K 4 10, 'seat' RV). The word is commonly used for 'throne.' E. E. N.

STORE-CITIES. See PITHOM.

STOREHOUSES. See AGRICULTURE, § 7.

STORIES. See COSMOGONY, § 3.

STORK. See PALESTINE, § 25.

STRANGE FIRE, GOD, etc. Two Heb. words zār and nēkhār, both having the same fundamental meaning of 'strange' or 'foreign' were frequently used to designate religious customs or deities that were not allowed in the worship of J'. Thus 'strange fire' (Lv 10 1; Nu 3 41, 26 61) was the burning of incense that was not compounded according to the Law, or was in some other way contrary to the Law (cf. Ex 30 9). And a 'strange god' was a deity other than J" who alone was to be worshiped in Israel.

E. E. N.

STRANGERS AND SOJOURNERS. See GEN-TILES.

STRANGE WIFE, STRANGE WOMAN. See GEN-TILES.

STRANGLED (THINGS): In the letter sent by the Apostolic Council to the Gentile Christians, the latter were recommended, according to the text usually followed, to 'abstain from things sacrificed to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled and from fornication; from which if ye keep yourselves, it shall be well with you' (Ac 15 29). But some ancient witnesses omit 'strangled' in ver. 20, which has led some scholars, e.g., Harnack, to hold that 'strangled' was not in the original letter; cf. vs. 20, 25. 'Strangled' things (πνικτά) were animals put to death without shedding their blood. To eat such animals was intensely repugnant to Jewish feeling (cf. Lv 17 13; Dt 12 16, 23; which illustrate the general attitude, tho they do not specifically treat of 'strangled' things). The Jewish Christians of Jerusalem felt that in regard to such things Gentile Christians ought to conform to the standards of Judaism, evidently thinking of them as moral rather than ceremonial requirements. E. E. N.

STRAW: The rendering of the Heb. tebhen, which means the stalks of the grain in their broken or 'chopped' state after threshing (see AGRICULTURE, § 7). This finely broken straw was used both as fodder (Gn 24 25, 32; Jg 19 19, etc.) and in the manufacture of brick (Ex 5 7 ff.).

E. E. N.

STREET. See CITY, § 4.

STRENGTH OF ISRAEL: A designation of J", Israel's God, in I S 15 29. The Heb. word nētsah, rendered 'strength,' means 'brilliance' or 'fame,' and probably 'glory' would be a better rendering than 'strength.'

E. E. N.

STRIPES. See CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 3 (b).

STRONG, STRONG MAN. See MAN, (5), (6).

STRONGHOLD. See CITY, § 4.

STUBBLE: The rendering of the Heb. gash (from a root meaning 'dry'), designating the dry stems of grass, or grain, that remain in the field after harvesting (cf. Ex 15 7), quick to burn (Is 5 24), and easily blown about by the wind (Job 21 18). The word is frequently used as a symbol of that which is light, unstable, and passes quickly away (Is 33 11, 40 24, etc.).

E. E. N.

STUD: This word occurs only once (nēquddōth, Song 1 11), in the pl., as the name of an ornament consisting of small silver points, sprinkled over a gold surface, which in this case is either in the form of a ball or of a plait (RV).

A. C. Z.

STUFF: This term is the AV rendering of kālī (twelve times), mīlā'khāh (only Ex 36 7, lit. 'work'), and αρεῖος (only Lk 17 31, 'goods' RV; cf. Mt 12 29; Mk 3 27) in the sense of 'goods,' often household furniture and utensils (Gn 31 37; Neh 13 8, etc.).

The RV has 'baggage' (I S 10 22, 25 13, 30 24) for impedimenta of an army or a company of travelers.

C. S. T.

STUMBLE, STUMBLING-BLOCK: Life, in its moral or religious aspects, being often likened to a walk, or progress in a way or path, the terms 'stumbling' and 'stumbling-block' are often used figuratively of practises or conceptions that are detrimental to religion and morals. Such O T expressions as are found in the Prophets (Is 8 14, 28 7, 57 14; Jer 6 21, 18 15) are frequently applied in the N T, both by Jesus (Mt 5 29; Mk 9 42, 14 27, etc.) and by Paul (Ro 14 13, 21; I Co 8 9 ff.), in a general sense, and also with special reference to the difficulty the Jews found in believing on Jesus as the Messiah (Ro 9 32; I Co 1 23; see also I P 2 8).

E. E. N.

SUAH, sū'a (סוּא, śūah): A descendant of Asher (I Ch 7 36).

SUBTLE, SUBTILE: This term renders, in the AV (1) hākhām, 'wise'; the context of I S 13 3 gives it an evil meaning. (2) mirmāh, 'guile' as RV (Gn 27 35). (3) nākhāl (in Hithpa'el), 'deal knavishly' Ps 105 5. (4) nātsar, 'secretive,' 'wily' as RV (Pr 7 10). (5) 'āqābhāh, 'insidiousness' (II K 10 10). (6) 'ārōm, to be 'crafty' (I S 23 22). In Pr in a good sense 'shrewd.' (7) 'ārām, 'crafty' (Gn 3 1); with a good meaning in Pr. (8) 'ormāh, 'prudence' as RV (Pr 1 4, 8 5, 12), a true knowledge of the principles of life. Also in a bad sense (Ex 21 14; Jos 9 4). (9) ḥāḥāḥ, from a vb. meaning 'catch with a bait' or 'line' (Mt 26 4; Ac 13 10, 'guile' RV). (10) πανουργία, 'craftiness' as RV (II Co 11 3), in LXX. for 'ormāh in a good sense.

C. S. T.

SUBURBS: A term (tr. of Heb. mighrāsh) meaning properly open or common land (for pasturage, etc.) adjoining a city. It is used exclusively in the later portions of the O T (P in the Hex., and Ezk and I and II Ch) of the Levitical cities or of Jerusalem (and the Temple, once, Ezk 45 2). See also PARBAR.

E. E. N.

SUCATHITES, sū'kath-aits (סוּכַתִּיִּם, sūkhāthīm, Suchathites AV): One of three families of 'scribes' (i.e., persons learned in the Law, etc.) who lived at Jabesh in Judah (locality unknown) and who reckoned their descent from the Rechabites (I Ch 2 55). The statement implies postexilic conditions.

E. E. N.

SUCCOTH, sok'eth (סוּכּוֹת, sukkōth), 'booths': 1. A place near the Jabbok, at which Jacob on his return from Paddan-aram built booths for his cattle (Gn 33 17). By some it is identified with Tell Deir 'Alla, 1 m. N. of the Zerka, or Jabbok (Map III, H 3); by others it is located somewhere on the S. side of the same stream. According to Jos 13 27, it was within the territory of Sihon, King of Heshbon; according to Jg 8 4 ff., Gideon, in pursuing the kings of Midian, crossed over the Jordan and came to Succoth. Near it were the foundries of Solomon (I K 7 46; II Ch 4 17). E. Robinson proposed as a possible site 'Ain es-Sakāt, a place 9 m. S. of Bethshan, on the W. side of the Jordan, but this is very improbable. Driver locates it 'on the route between Penuel and Shechem,' on the east of the Jordan near the ford ed-Dāmiyeh. 2. The camping-place at which Israelites first halted after starting from Egypt (Ex 12 37; Nu 33 5), probably to be located near the modern Ramesses, in Wādī Tumilāt, in the NE. portion of the Delta. Tho the name is good Hebrew, Naville and Brugsch derive it from Thuku, or Thuket, a district in ancient Goshen. See map under ISRAEL, § 3 (2). G. L. R.

SUCCOTH-BENOTH, suk'eth-br'noth (סֻכּוֹת בְּנוֹת, sukkōth b'nōth): The name of an idol introduced into Samaria by the Babylonians (II K 17 30). It may be either a corruption of zarpanit, the consort of Marduk, the tutelary deity of Babylon (so Rawlinson and Schrader), or it may be the Hebraized form of the Assy. sakut binūti, the 'supreme judge of the universe' (so F. Delitzsch). Amos probably alludes to the same deity in the phrase 'the tabernacle [sikkūth] of your king' (5 26), which was an image carried in procession. G. L. R.

SUCCOURER. See PHCEBE.

SUCHATHITES, sū'kath-its. See SUCATHITES.

SUITS OF APPAREL: The rendering of the Heb. maḥlālātsōth in Is 3 22 AV ('festival robes' RV). Garments of costly material are probably meant. The same word is rendered 'rich apparel' in Zec 3 4.

SUKKIIM, suk'-im (סֻכִּיִּים, sukkiyyim): A people who, with the Lubim and Ethiopians, accompanied Shishak, King of Egypt, against King Rehoboam (II Ch 12 3). The LXX. has 'Troglodytes.' Wiedemann suggests the inhabitants of the land of Succoth (Ex 12 37) in Egypt (Thuku), near Pithom. C. S. T.

SUMMER. See PALESTINE, §§ 17-20; and TIME, § 4.

SUN. See ASTRONOMY, § 2; and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 32.

SUN AND SUN-WORSHIP. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 32.

SUN, HORSES OF. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 32 (2).

SUN-IMAGES. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 29 (4).

SUN, SMITING BY. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5.

SUNRISING: A part of the phrase 'toward the sunrising,' which correctly renders mizrah shemesh (Nu 21 11, etc.; without shemesh 'sun' Nu 34 15). It means 'the East.' C. S. T.

SUPERFLUOUS PARTS. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 5.

SUPERScription: In the NT ἐπιγραφὴ is used (1) of the inscription on a coin designating the authority under whom it was minted (Mk 12 16 and ||s). (2) Of the designation of the crime for which a criminal was crucified. This was written in brief form on a board and nailed to the cross above the head of the sufferer, after being suspended from his neck or carried before him on the way to the execution. Mt calls it the ἀτις (accusation, 27 37), while John (19 19 ff.) designates it as a τίτλος, title. Mk and Lk use ἐπιγραφὴ ('superscription,' Mk 15 26; Lk 23 38). The wording of the accusation is not reported in exactly the same terms by the different evangelists. John tells us that it was in three languages (since Palestine had such a mixed population). Common to all the Gospels are the words 'King of the Jews,' which expressed the actual charge. Possibly, the wording varied slightly in each of the three languages. E. E. N.

SUPH, sūf (סֻף, sūph): A name which, with others, aims to define the place where Moses delivered his farewell (Dt 1 1). The names are all somewhat puzzling, and no satisfactory explanation is at hand. Some would identify Suph with Suphah (Nu 21 14); but as the site of this is also unknown the difficulty remains. The AV in both instances reads 'Red Sea' (Heb. yam sūph), but the omission of yam, 'sea of,' makes this rendering certainly wrong. E. E. N.

SUPHAH, sū'fā (סֻפְיָה, sūphāh, Red Sea AV): A locality celebrated in a fragment of ancient song (Nu 21 14). It was somewhere among the upper valleys of the Arnon, but its exact site is unknown. See also SUPH.

SUPPER. See MEALS, § 1.

SUPPER, LORD'S. See LORD'S SUPPER.

SUR, sūr or sūr (GATE). A gate of the Temple or possibly of the palace mentioned only in II K 11 6 (called 'gate of the foundation' in II Ch 23 5). It is not known to what gate the statement refers. See JERUSALEM, § 38. E. E. N.

SURETY. See PLEDGE.

SURFEITING: The term κρετάλη, rendered 'surfeiting' (Lk 21 34), means literally the headache and nausea following a debauch, from which it came to be used sometimes to signify the intemperate revelings themselves. S. D.—M. W. J.

SURNAME. See NAME.

SUSA, su'sa. See SHUSHAN.

SUSANCHITE, su-san'kait. See SHUSHANCHITE.

SUSANNA, su-zan'a (Σουσάννα; from the Heb. shōshannāh, 'lily'): 1. One of the women who befriended Jesus (Lk 8 3). 2. A character from which an apocryphal document is named. See DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS TO, § 2.

SUSI, sū'soi (סֻסַי, sūšai): The father of Gaddi, a Manassite (Nu 13 11).

SWADDLE, SWADDLING-BAND: These words render in the AV: (1) tāphah, 'dandle' (cf. La 2 22 RV), lit. 'to carry on the palms of the hands,' denominative from tephah, 'handbreadth.' (2) hāthal (in Hoph.), 'enwrap,' 'swaddle,' used (Ezk 16 4) of Jerusalem under the figure of an infant. (3) hāthullāh, 'swaddling-band,' used (Job 38 9) figuratively of dark clouds enveloping the sea. (4) παργανεύω, 'wrap in swaddling-bands' (Lk 2 7, 12). The infant was placed diagonally on a square piece of cloth, the ends of which were turned over the body, the feet, and under the head, and fastened by bands tied around the child thus wrapped up. C. S. T.

SWALLOW. See PALESTINE, § 25.

SWAN. See PALESTINE, § 25.

SWEAR. See OATH.

SWEAT, BLOODY: The expression occurs in Lk 22 44, a passage whose right in the text is very much disputed. Whether it is intended to denote the actual exudation of blood with water in the perspiration is also a question. If this is not the meaning, the drops of sweat alluded to somehow must have resembled blood. The occurrence of the escape of blood with perspiration is attested by historical instances (cf. Plummer, ICC, ad loc.). A. C. Z.

SWEET CANE: The rendering, in Jer 6 20, of gāneh haṭṭōbh ('good'), gāneh being a general term for reed, cane, and at times meaning 'calamus' as here (and Ex 30 23; Is 43 24; Ezk 27 19; Song 4 14). See also OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 1; and PALESTINE, § 22. E. E. N.

SWEET INCENSE, ODOR. See OINTMENTS AND PERFUMES, § 2; and SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 15.

SWIFT BEASTS, SWIFT STEEDS: These words render in the AV: (1) kirkārōth (Is 66 20, 'dromedaries' RV), (2) rekhes (Mic 1 13), 'steed.' The term rekhes was probably used of a special breed of horses in the service of kings because of their swiftness. RV reads 'swift steed' (1 K 4 28 [5 8], 'dromedaries' AV; Est 8 10, 14, 'mules' AV). See also PALESTINE, § 24. C. S. T.

SWINE: The Heb. term hāzīr refers to the undomesticated wild boar of Palestine, which was used by the Canaanites and Syrians both for food and sacrifice. The Israelites were specially forbidden to eat swine's flesh (Lv 11 7, etc.), and came to look with abhorrence on such a practise. Both the flesh and blood of swine were thought to be exceptionally repulsive to J' (Is 65 4, 66 3, 17). Tho loyal Jews would have nothing to do with swine, they were acquainted with their habits, which served to give point to popular proverbs (Pr 11 22; Mt 7 6). See also PALESTINE, § 24. E. E. N.

SWORD. See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 2.

SYCAMINE, sik'-a-min, SYCAMORE. See FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 5; and PALESTINE, § 21.

SYCHAR, sai'kār (Συχαρ, Jn 4 5): A village in Samaria identified by its nearness to the well of Jacob. A tradition, based probably on Gn 33 19 and 48 22, represents the patriarch as giving the site of it to his son Joseph. S. was the residence of the Samaritan woman with whom Jesus engaged in the conversation recorded in Jn ch. 4. In spite of some difficulty in identifying the modern site (cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL, pp. 367 ff.), there is practical unanimity in finding the equivalent of the name 'Sychar' in El-Askar, a village, with a spring and some ancient rock-hewn tombs, about ½ m. N. of Jacob's well. See art. SHECHEM for a map of the region. A. C. Z.

SYCHEM, sai'kem. See SHECHEM.

SYCOMORE. See SYCAMINE, SYCAMORE.

SYENE, sai-i'ni or -m (or SEVENEH), TOWER OF. See SEVENEH.

SYMEON, sim'i-on. See SIMEON.

SYNAGOG, THE (συναγωγή, 'an assembling together,' used frequently in the LXX. for the congregation [qāhāl] or the assembly ['edhāh] of Israel; in later times, the equivalent of the Heb. bēth hak-kōnēseth, 'the house of assembly').

1. Origin. The local organization common in later Israel, for the purposes of worship, education, and for the supervision of the social and civil life of the community. That an institution of such importance in the history of Judaism as the synagogue should be invested by Jewish tradition with great age is not surprising. The fact is, however, that we are quite in the dark as to its beginnings. These beginnings were, doubtless, in the time of the Captivity, when the loss of the Temple worship and the conditions of exile emphasized the need of worship and instruction. The return of the exiles, with their desire deepened by suffering, to keep the Law and be faithful to their God, opened the way for the development of synagogal services alongside of the Temple cultus. As there is no mention of the synagogue in the O T Apocrypha, we are without means of tracing its development. This development, however, must have been steady and substantial, for in the times of the N T we find the synagogue widely established and exercising a weighty influence in Jewish life.

2. Constitution. In considering this phase of the subject, we must distinguish, as Schürer indicates, between towns in which there was a mixed population of Jews and Gentiles and those which were wholly Jewish. In the former an independent organization for religious matters would be necessary, if the Jews were not greatly in the majority. In a town made up entirely of Jews—certainly in a small town the civil and religious authorities would be identical, i.e., the elders of the town would be also the elders of the synagogue. We can not be sure that in large towns, where there were several synagogal communities, there was a separate body of elders for each community, except, perhaps, where synagogues for different nationalities existed, as in Jerusalem. From early times it seems to have been a requirement that a synagogue should not be erected in a town where there were not ten men of leisure to look after its affairs. A synagogue thus constituted was under the government of the elders, who had the right to discipline and punish offending members. The methods of punishment were scourging and excommunication. In addition to the elders, who had general supervision over the affairs of the synagogal community the following officials were immediately connected with the synagogue: (1) The ruler of the synagogue (ἀρχισυνάγωγος), whose duty it was to look after the external order in public worship, to select teachers or readers, to examine the discourses of public speakers, and, in general, to see that the service was conducted in accord with ancestral usage. He had also the supervision of the synagogue building. The office was not identical with that of 'elder' (πρεσβύτερος), or 'ruler'

Synagogue at Kefr Bir'im in Galilee (Ground-Plan).

(ἀρχων), nor with that of 'president of the Gerousia' (γερονσιαρχης), tho one person could fill two offices, e.g., that of 'ruler' and 'ruler of the synagog,' at the same time. As ruler of the synagog, his duties were confined entirely to the synagog, i.e., he had no part in the general direction of the affairs of the community. Each synagog had one ἀρχισυνάγωγος. (2) The hazzān or 'attendant' (ὁπηρετής, minister AV, Lk 4 20). It was incumbent upon him to bring forth the sacred rolls of Scripture for reading, and to replace them in the ark, or sacred chest. He executed the punishment of scourging, and instructed the children in reading. (3) The receiver of alms. As it was in the synagog that the collection of alms took place, these men were appointed to receive and distribute the same. They correspond to the deacons of the Christian community.

3. The Synagog Building. It will help to clearness costliness of a synagog would depend, of course, upon the wealth of the Jewish population. Some of the synagogs of the ancient world, as e.g., those in Antioch and Alexandria, were among the finest structures in the city. The ruins of a costly building are found at Tell Hum (Capernaum?) in Palestine. The building was generally rectangular in form, and, if of the finer order, divided in the interior by three or even five rows of columns. In Palestine, the synagogs lie N. and S., with the front on the S. The synagog at Irbid had its door on the E. In general, the style was influenced by the Greco-Roman, altho it shows very characteristic differences from it. In particular, it was marked by a wealth of 'overladen ornamentation' (Schürer, HJP, II, ii, pp. 52-89). In the small places the building would be very plain and on some central site. Whatever might have been the size or character of the structure itself, the following furnishings would be found in all synagogues: (1) The chest, or ark, for the rolls of the Law and other sacred books, which were kept in linen cloths and in a case. The ark was placed in a shut-off part of the synagogue, in front of which hung a curtain. (2) The reading-platform (βήμα) stood near the center, and upon it was the lectern (ἀναλογεῖον). (3) Seats were arranged in the remaining space for the congregation, men and women sitting apart. The chief seats of the synagogue were in front of the ark, facing the people, and were reserved for those who were held in the highest honor. (4) Lamps and trumpets completed the outfit of the synagogue. The latter were for use in the service on feast-days.

4. The Order of Service. For the order of service the Mishna is our authority, but there is little doubt that the order which it gives was in all its principal parts that of the time of Christ. Of these there were five: (1) The recitation of the Shema, (2) prayer, (3) the reading of the Law, (4) the reading of the Prophets, (5) the benediction. The Shema, so called from the opening word ('Hear [O Israel]'), consisted of Dt 6 4-9, 11 13-21; Nu 15 37-41, two introductory benedictions, and three closing benedictions. Reference to these O T passages will show that the purpose of this part of the service, which was recited by the people, was to bring before the minds of the worshippers the sacredness of the Law. In the prayer, which was offered by one chosen for this act by the ruler of the synagogue, the people silently joined, saying 'Amen' at its close. The petitioner himself stood in front of the ark. Certain fixed forms of prayer were probably in use in Christ's time. The Shemoneh 'Esrēh is one of the finest examples of these. It did not attain its full form until after the destruction of Jerusalem, but in its earlier form was used in Christ's day. This prayer may be found in Edersheim's Life and Time of Jesus, I, p. 440. Next in order after the prayers came the Scripture lessons. As the synagogue was primarily for instruction, this part of the service was of the most importance. The hazzān took the roll of the Law from its place and handed it to him who was to begin the reading. On Sabbath-days at least seven persons were called upon by the rules of the synagogue to read, successively, parts of the Law. Each had to read at least three verses, and they must be read, not repeated from memory. Any member of the congregation might be invited to read, even minors, but if priests and Levites were present, they were invited first. The reader was accustomed to stand (Lk 4 16). A benediction was pronounced before and after each person's reading. Following the lesson from the Law came a lesson from the Prophets (the Haphtārāh). The older historical books were included under the Prophets. Only one person was called upon for this duty. No regular order of lessons, as in the case of reading from the Law, seems here to have been followed at first. Sections were chosen rather to illustrate or enforce the lesson from the Law. Jesus in this way made choice of His own selection (Lk 4 16).

Since many were not familiar with the original language of the Scriptures, it was necessary to translate them, as the reading went on, into the vernacular Aramaic. In the case of the Law, one verse was read at a time and then translated; of the Prophets, three verses were taken at a time (see TARGUM). A sermon or lecture followed the reading of the Scriptures, and this could be given by any one competent so to do. The preacher sat during his discourse (Lk 4 16). The whole service concluded by a blessing pronounced by a priest, if one were present, otherwise it was changed into the form of a prayer. The order above described is that of the principal morning service. In the afternoon and on week-day services the reading from the Prophets was omitted, and only three members took part in the reading of the Law.

5. Value and Importance of the Synagog. From the time of its establishment the synagogue has been of great importance to Judaism. It has, perhaps more than any other institution, given life and character to the Jewish faith. Within its sacred precincts the people came face to face not only with the Law, but with all that teaching which in interpreting the Law made Judaism what it was in Christ's day. It was the point of contact between the people and their religious teachers. There was but one Temple, while synagogues were all over the land. The people went to them with earnest purpose, listened with reverent attention, and there learned not only the requirements of the Law, but the hopes of the nation as both were interpreted to them. So the Jews have done ever since. The synagogue is the vital center of Judaism (cf. Schürer, HJP; Oesterly and Box, The Religion and Worship of the Synagogue, 1907; Pedagogics of the Talmud and that of Modern Times, 1924; F. H. Swift, Education in Ancient Israel to 70 A.D., 1919). J. S. R.—W. G. J.

SYNAGOG OF THE LIBERTINES (Λιβερτινῶν, from Lat. libertini, 'freedmen'): The name of worshippers in one of the two synagogues in Jerusalem whose members disputed with Stephen (Ac 6 9). They were evidently Jews who had been taken captive in Pompey's war and had been liberated afterward by their masters, enjoying thus the privileges of Roman citizenship (cf. Philo, Legat. ad Caium, 23). They worshiped in this synagogue, along with Jews from Cyrene and Alexandria (τινὲς τῶν ἐκ τῆς συναγωγῆς τῆς λεγομένης Λιβερτινῶν, καὶ Κυρηναίων καὶ Ἀλεξανδρέων), either as visitors to the city or as a community stately resident in the place. In either case, they are likely to have united with their fellow worshippers in the erection of the building for their common use. The reading Λιβερτινῶν, advocated by Blass (Philology of the Gospels, pp. 49 ff.), which would make them Jews of Libya and the synagogue a house of worship in general of African Jews, has considerable support. In 1914 there was discovered at Jerusalem a large limestone block inscribed with an inscription in Greek reading, in part, as follows: 'Theodotus . . . built this Synagog for the reading of the Law . . . and also this hostel for the need of those who coming from the outside . . .'. The inscription being in Greek indicates the Hellenistic-Jewish character of the group who used this synagogue. The date of the inscription must be near the 1st cent. A.D. Altogether, it throws an interesting side-light on Ac 6 a. M. W. J.

SYNOPTIC PROBLEM, THE: 1. The Problem Stated. The Synoptic Problem is the question as to the sources and particularly the literary interrelation of the first three (Synoptic) Gospels (see GOSPEL, GOSPELS, § 3)—in other words, the question as to what were the sources from which these Gospels drew their material and to what extent the material of any one of them was influenced by that of the others.

2. The History of the Criticism. The first suggestion of any interrelation among these Gospels was made as long ago as the time of Augustine (354-430 A.D.), who held naively that the second and third Evangelists wrote their Gospels with a knowledge of their Canonical predecessors, but, not remembering the Gospel events with equal accuracy, each wrote differently, Mt being the primary Gospel, Mk the abbeviator of Mt, and Lk the compiler of Mt and Mk. He gave no proof of his theory, offering it not as the result of any investigation, but rather as a natural explanation of their order in the Canon and the apparent difference in the length and external makeup of their respective contents.

In fact, the Fathers of that time were more concerned with the differences between the Gospels, which they sought to harmonize, than with their agreements, which they took as a matter of course.

This general attitude continued down through the Revival of Learning into the Reformation Church. The first to propound any real theory of their literary interrelation was Le Clerc (1719), who suggested the possibility of a common source for the three Gospels—not a single source for all, but several sources in common. This indefinite theory was given a definite shape toward the close of that century by two scholars, Lessing (1785), who held that the source was a definite Aramaic Gospel, and Eichhorn (1794), who also claimed that it was a definite Gospel, but Greek.

Between these two dates—in 1789-90—appeared a new statement of Augustine's view by Griesbach, to the effect that Mk was the epitome of both Mt and Lk.

The single source theory of Lessing and Eichhorn proved stimulating to scholarship. It was combined in various ways with Griesbach's idea, the most noteworthy of these combinations being that suggested with individual differences by Paulus, Schleiermacher and Lachmann, that this original source was an aggregate of documents representing in diversified forms the common floating narrative (like Lk's διηγήσεις). These gradually were consolidated into larger documents (like Mt's λόγια), and finally found their ultimate form in our Canonical Gospels, one of which, however, represented them more nearly, the others in a secondary way.

In the meanwhile another idea had been hinted at by Von Herder (1797) and Eckermann (1806), which was definitely formulated in 1818 by Gieseler, to the effect that our Synoptic Gospels were derived not from any preexisting document, or documents, but from the common base of oral tradition. This tradition represented the common apostolic preaching, which, by being constantly repeated, came to be stereotyped and fixed, and, so, easily transferred to writing, each evangelist reproducing it in a form modified by the purpose with which he was writing and by his own individuality of style and thought.

This gave a new idea to scholarship, which was quick to utilize it in combination with various phases of the written document idea. It was not, however, until twenty years had passed that there was propounded the theory which has guided all subsequent constructive work in this field. This was the idea advanced in 1838 by Weisse, that Papias' testimony regarding Mk<sup>1</sup> referred to our second Canonical Gospel, which was thus the earliest of our Synoptics and, together with this precanonical document, or documents, suggested by others, formed the sources for the other two Gospels.

3. Resultant Theories. From this historical review we see that the critical study of these Gospels has grouped itself into three main theories: (1) The Successive Dependence Theory (Augustine and Griesbach), viz., that the Evangelists made use of one or more of the Gospels already written, so that one of our Gospels is the first and original Gospel, the second using the first, and the third one or both of its predecessors. This is the oldest view, and has been worked out into every possible order of sequence and character of use. (2) The Documentary Theory (Le Clerc, Lessing, Eichhorn and Weisse), viz., that all three Evangelists to some extent made use of a preexisting written source, or sources. This represents the first critical approach of scholarship to the problem, and has expressed itself in many forms, according to the view held as to the character of the original document, or documents, and also according to the way the documentary idea has been combined with the successive dependence and the oral ideas. (3) The Oral Theory (Gieseler), viz., that all three Evangelists made use of the common oral tradition, which had become fixed by use. This theory, while more or less of a reaction from the documentary view, has in its many forms not hesitated at times to allow documents to enter in along with its oral material, or the Gospels to use each other in combination with oral tradition. Its main modification, however, has been in the direction of assuming various recensions of the common tradition in connection with the differently located and organized catechetical Schools, which recensions are held to have been used to various degrees and in varied combinations by the canonical Gospels.

To come to any decision among these general theories scholarship has realized that there must be a clear apprehension of just what is the problem which these Gospels present. This problem, simply stated, is: There are in these Gospels striking resemblances and striking differences. What theory as to their origin will account for both? The significant character of these resemblances and differences is seen in the fact that the resemblances do not lie in the fact that all three Gospels have the same general outline, filled in with the same general incidents, but that these same general incidents are placed before us in what is generally the same order even where that order is unchronological (e.g., the record of John's imprisonment, which is given by Mt, 14 3-5 and Mk, 6 17-20 in connection with Jesus' third preaching tour; whereas it really occurred in connection with Jesus' first coming into Galilee, Mt 4 12; Mk 1 14), and in what are to a large extent identical words, even where the words are parenthetical to the narrative (e.g., Jesus' remarks to the palsied man, Mt 9 8; Mk 2 10; Lk 5 24). In the same way the differences do not lie in the fact that not always are the same words, phrases, and forms of narrative used, which is what naturally would be expected, but that they extend to entire events (e.g., the inclusion of the Nativity Story by Mt, 1 18-23, and Lk, 1 5-23, and its omission by Mk; the inclusion of the Period of Retirement by Mt, 15 21-16 12, and Mk, 7 24-8 26, and its omission by Lk), and to whole portions of the narrative (e.g., the inclusion by Lk of the ten chapters, 9 51-19 28, recording what is known as the Perean Ministry, which, with the exception of a few verses, is not paralleled by either Mt or Mk); and to the order of definite incidents (e.g., the rejection at Nazareth, which is placed by Lk 4 16-30 at the beginning of the Galilean Ministry, while by Mt 13 54-58, and Mk 6 1-6a, it is placed at its close; the Sermon on the Mount, which is given by Mt 5 1-7 29, early in Jesus' Galilean work, but by Lk 6 20-49 much later).

If, however, this is the problem, then two of the above theories have specific difficulties to face. The Successive Dependence Theory might possibly be able to account for the resemblances, on the ground that the Gospels copied their predecessors; but it would be impossible, on such a basis, to account for the differences. Suppose it be assumed that Mk is the last of the three Gospels, and is the shortest because he has condensed the narratives of the other two, how account for the fact that where the three relate incidents in common, his record is generally fuller than theirs? Does this not presuppose that he had outside information not possessed by them? Or, suppose it be assumed that Mk is the first of the three, and is shortest because the others have enlarged upon his record, does this not admit that they have introduced material not possessed by him? In either case the theory, as a theory, falls to the ground. On the other hand, the Oral Theory might perhaps account for the differences, on the basis of the varying character of the oral tradition and its varying handling by the Evangelists; but it could not account for the strange and striking resemblances which these narratives disclose. Moreover, however true it is that oral tradition preceded the written Gospels and must have given way to them only relatively late and after it had become fixed at many points, yet, if oral tradition was the only source of the written Gospels, it is not only impossible to account for the minute agreements among the Gospels, but it is quite hopeless to understand how it comes that these agreements are so largely, continuously, and persistently present in the discourse material common to Mt and Lk (e.g., cf. Mt 3 7-10 and Lk 3 7-9; Mt 4 3-11 and Lk 4 3-12; Mt 6 25-33 and Lk 12 22-31; Mt 7 1-11 and Lk 6 37-39, 41 f., 11 9-13; Mt 8 8-10 and Lk 7 6-9; Mt 8 19-21 and Lk 9 57-59; Mt 11 4-27 and Lk 7 22-35, 10 13-15, 21 f.; Mt 12 39-45 and Lk 11 24-26; Mt 23 37-39 and Lk 13 34 f.; Mt 24 45-50 and Lk 12 42-46), and that a large portion of these discourse identities are concentrated by Lk in a certain part of his narrative, but by Mt are broken up and portions distributed among other discourses throughout his narrative. Oral tradition could not have existed in two forms, a narrative and a discourse form, nor could it have presented the discourse form in two such different characters. Further, it is very puzzling to understand why, on this oral theory, Mt and Lk should be quite independent of each other in their narratives before Mk's narrative begins, and as soon as Mk's narrative closes again become independent. The oral tradition should have covered all the narrative and not only a part of it. Equally confusing is it that so much of the narrative of the Jerusalem Ministry given in the Fourth Gospel should have been absent from the record of these three Gospels. It must have formed part of the oral tradition, especially as this Ministry gathered so closely around the Passion, where the emphasis of the apostolic preaching was placed. Finally, it is hard to understand how these minute resemblances, whether among all the Gospels, or between Mt and Lk, exist in the Greek, while the oral tradition must have formed itself in Aramaic. If recourse is made to the theory of different recensions of the tradition to account for these differences, it is clear that in proportion as such recensions might explain the differences, they fail to account for the minute resemblances that remain.

In view of the failure of these two theories to meet the problem, the propounding of a Documentary Theory has been almost a critical necessity, since such a theory alone promises to account for both the resemblances and the differences.

This theory has assumed three specific forms: (1) The Single Document Theory—that at the basis of these Gospels there was an original Gospel in written form from which each Evangelist drew his material in his own individual way. The prevailing idea has been that this Gospel was in the Aramaic language (Lessing and others), tho it has been held that it was Hebrew (Resch), and also that it was Greek (Eichhorn and others). As to this theory there is the difficulty, as far as its Aramaic or Hebrew character is concerned, of working out any convincing proof that either of these languages lay in written form behind our Synoptics as we have them.<sup>2</sup>

<sup>2</sup> But see Torrey's claim of an Aramaic Gospel of Mk, preceding our Greek Mk and an Aramaic Gospel of Mt preceding our Greek Mt, both of which Aramaic Gospels were used by Lk in combination with our Greek Gospels of Mk and Mt (Studies in the History of Religion, 1912).

In addition to this is the fact that even in its Greek form the differences between the Gospels are so far untouched that it has had to be assumed that this original Gospel went through several recensions, a separate one lying at the base of each of our Gospels. This, however, meets the same disaster as does the similar assumption in the case of the Oral Theory.

(2) The Multiple Document Theory—that at the basis of our Gospels was a general collection of fragmentary documents giving portions of the life of Jesus, or of his words, from individual combinations of which documents the Evangelists wrote their Gospels as we have them. While we can understand how such fragmentary documents might arise and how, being fragmentary, they might have disappeared, the agreements between our Gospels are too minute and sustained to have come from such accidental combinations of fragmentary sources. Nor does this seem to be the process followed by Lk as given in his prolog (1-4). He did not combine these fragmentary and apparently imperfect narratives to form his Gospel; he rather corrected and supplemented them by recourse to other and presumably oral testimony.<sup>3</sup>

(3) The Two Document Theory—that there were at the basis of our Gospels two documents, one containing a narrative of the events of Jesus' life, the other containing a collection of Jesus' teachings. This is a theory which has arisen largely from the necessities of the case, neither of the other document theories accounting in any satisfactory way for the factors in the problem, the Single Document Theory not being broad enough for the differences between the Gospels, and the Multiple Document Theory being too broad for the agreements. The starting ground for this theory was given by Weisse, as noted above, § 3, in his claim that Papias' statement regarding Mk referred to our present second Gospel. Inasmuch, however, as Mk covered the distinctively narrative material of the Synoptic record, it remained to discover a possible document which would cover the discourse material, and the hint at that was given in Papias' further statement regarding the writing of Mt, which was: 'So then Matthew compiled the oracles (λογια, 'words,' 'sayings') in the Hebrew language, and every one interpreted them as he was able.' It became clear to scholarship that the statements of this early witness marked the way to a rational solution of the problem, since if it could be shown that Mk's narrative was used by the other two Gospels and that, outside of Mk's narrative, there was used a distinct element of discourse material, it would seem that these two documents referred to by Papias might prove to be the sources from which the Synoptic record, with its peculiar characteristics of agreement and differences, was derived.

4. Facts Disclosed. When we come to study the Synoptic record there are certain facts which at once emerge. (1) It is seen that practically all of Mk's record is reproduced in the narrative of Mt and Lk (about two-thirds of it in both of them and the remaining one-third in one or the other of them). In other words, practically all the incidents he narrates and practically all the sayings and teachings he records are found in one or the other of his two companion Gospels. This is not the fact with either Mt or Lk. (2) It is seen that Mk's order of narrative controls the order of Mt and Lk. That is to say, they follow Mk's order in their narratives, and where either departs from it Mk's order is supported by the other. In no case do they support each other in disagreeing with Mark. Neither Mt's order nor Lk's is followed that way by the other two. (3) It is seen that Mk's language forms the background of the language of the other two. That is to say, where Mk's language is not reproduced by Mt or Lk, the reasons for the deviations are clear. No such reasons can be discovered if either Mt's language or Lk's is assumed as the standard. (4) It is seen that the discourse material is almost wholly confined to Mt and Lk. There is only one real discourse contained in Mk, and that is the discourse about the 'last things' given in his 13th chapter, at the close of Jesus' Jerusalem Ministry, the peculiarities of which and the reason for whose reproduction by Mk are stated in the article on that Gospel, § 1 (1), note 4. (5) When this discourse material of Mt and Lk is studied, however, we notice that the discourses and sayings have more or less narrative setting from which they proceed, and where they are parallel they are significantly identical in construction and wording of sentence and phrase. It is peculiar, however, that the larger part of this common discourse material has been segregated by Lk in the ten chapters which give the record of the Perean Ministry (9 51-19 28), while Mt has taken from it portions which he has distributed through the discourses he has embodied in his narrative of the Galilean and Jerusalem Ministries. It is further peculiar that the smaller portion of this common discourse material has been placed by both Mt and Lk in their respective records of the Ministry of the Baptist and the Galilean Ministry of Jesus, and, tho differently located in these portions (with the exception of the Preaching of the Baptist (Mt 3 7-10, 12 and Lk 3 7-9, 17) and the Temptation of Jesus (Mt 4 3-11 and Lk 4 3-13), is arranged by both Evangelists in the same general sequence of events. Still further, it is peculiar that this smaller portion of the common discourse material seems to be of different character from the larger portion. Its narrative element is much more graphic and its literary style is of a finer quality. (6) It is seen that Mt has a very considerable amount of discourse material apart from Mk and Lk, and peculiar to himself, consisting largely of long discourses (e.g., the Sermon on the Mount and the Parables), and also of shorter sayings, which latter he has distributed through his narrative. (7) It is seen finally that Lk has a large amount of discourse material apart from Mt and Mk and peculiar to himself, consisting mainly of the ten chapters referred to above which give his record of the Perean Ministry and which (with the exception of 18 15-43) does not appear in Mk at all, but certain portions of which appear distributed through Mt's discourses.

5. Conclusions. What are the conclusions to be drawn from this study of the Synoptic Record? (1) It would seem that in a distinct and definite way Mk's Gospel lay at the base of Mt's and Lk's. They may have had copies of his Gospel before them when they wrote, and more or less mechanically incorporated it in their writing, or they may have been fully familiar with it and reproduced it from memory. In either case they recognized it as the narrative of Jesus' ministry current in and accepted by the Church, and as such made it the base on which they built their own individual Gospels. (2) The discourse material peculiar to Mt may have come from the Logia writing ascribed by Papias to this Apostle, and, being thus the distinctively apostolic element in that Gospel, may have given to it the Apostle's name. If this is so, then it would be apparent that the First Gospel was not in its entire material the product of Mt but that the discourses for which Mt was responsible were combined by some other hand with Mk's narrative, to form the Gospel as we have it. If Mt himself had written the Gospel which we have under his name, he would not have been dependent on Mk's narrative of the events, but would have known them as one who himself had participated in them and would have narrated them from his own first hand knowledge of them. That the First Gospel is a compilation by another hand than Mt's is confirmed by the peculiar topical arrangement of its material, showing the work of one who knew neither discourses nor events at first hand, but having these two sources—one of them of direct Apostolic origin—combined them in his own way to give to his readers a fuller record of the Gospel Ministry than Mk afforded, and one more suited to his purpose of presenting to them Jesus as the Messiah of the Covenant People. (3) That the discourse material peculiar to Lk may have come from this same Logia writing of Mt is of course possible, and is still a matter of debate, but the fact that Lk states in his prolog that he was acquainted with many fragmentary narratives of Gospel history which, while not in themselves suitable for the purpose of a full and complete narrative of that history and needing confirmation from other sources as to their value, prepares us for the possibility that some of them were used by him in his writing. This possibility is raised to more than a probability by the fact, above noted, that the smaller portion of the discourse material which he has in common with Mt has a place and a character of its own in his record of the Baptist's Preaching and the Galilean Ministry of Jesus. If, however, it is more than probable that he has used one of these fragmentary documents in his record of this portion of the Gospel history, it is clear not only that the compiler of Mt also had access to it, for its material is common to them both, but also that Lk has used it in a different way from the way in which the Compiler of Mt used it. The Mt. Compiler has taken portions from it and distributed them among the other discourses of his Gospel, after the manner of his arrangement of his material; Lk on the other hand has inserted it as a whole. This would give the reason why Lk has placed the Rejection at Nazareth (4 16-30) so out of place. It evidently had that place in the document he used and he has left it undisturbed. (4) It would seem that this same reasoning would apply to the larger portion of the discourse material common to Mt and Lk, so that this also would represent one of Lk's fragmentary narrative documents which he has inserted entire in these ten chapters of his Gospel, but from which the Mt Compiler has taken portions and distributed them topically among his other discourses. Again this would show why Lk has placed in these ten chapters certain things that occurred earlier in Jesus' ministry (e.g., 10 13-22, 11 17-32), and some later (e.g., 11 39-41, 47-51, 17 23 f., 26 f., 34 f.). This is where they stood in the document, and Lk has inserted the document as it stood. It is seen, therefore, that in this smaller Galilean document and in the larger Perean document, while both the Mt compiler and Lk had alike access to the documents as such, the different ways in which they used them resulted in Mt and Lk having only a portion of these documents in common in their Gospels, the larger part of them being reproduced only by Lk.<sup>4</sup>

6. Summary. If we gather up these conclusions, we would seem to be justified in the following statement of the sources and interrelations of the Synoptic Gospels.

I. The Source behind Mk was the Gospel discourses of Peter. These he reproduced, as Papias states, not giving them an ordered arrangement (τάξις)—as the compiler of Mt has arranged his Gospel in its alternate groupings of discourses and miracles (see MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF, § 1 (a)), or as Lk has arranged his Gospel in its fullness and its rhetorical dressing of material (see LUKE, GOSPEL OF, § 1 (c))—but reproducing them in their simple and unadorned narration of the incidents and events of Jesus' Ministry. This would be the natural characteristic of the Apostolic preaching and is what Mk has faithfully reproduced.

II. The Sources behind Mt (as compiled) were (1) The Gospel of Mk substantially as we possess, it to-day. (2) The special discourse source spoken of by Papias (formerly designated as A but now generally known as Q, and showing itself probably in the following passages of his Gospel: 3 14 f.; 5 4 7-10, 13a, 14, 16 f., 19-24, 27 f., 31, 33-39a, 41, 43; 6 1-7, 10b, 12b, 16-18, 34; 7 6, 12b, 15, 23; 9 13a; 10 5 f., 8b, 23, 25b, 38, 41; 11 28-30; 12 5-7, 11, 12a, 34; 13 14 f., 24-30, 35-53; 15 12-14, 23 f.; 16 17-19; 17 24-27; 18 4, 10, 14, 16-20, 23-34; 19 10-12, 28; 20 1-15; 21 14-16, 28-32, 43; 22 1-14; 23 2, 3, 5, 7b-10, 15-22, 24, 28, 32; 24 10-12, 30a; 25 1-11a, 13, 14-46 26 52 f. (3) The Perean Document (P), showing itself in excerpts distributed through the record of the Galilean and Jerusalem Ministries (e.g., 6 9-13, 19-33; 7 7-11; 8 19-22; 10 28-30; 13 33). (4) The Galilean Document (G), showing itself in excerpts distributed through the narrative of the Baptist's Preaching.

<sup>4</sup> For discussion of the Perean section see Wickes, the Sources of Luke's Perean Section, in Historical and Linguistic Studies in Literature Related to N.T., Second Series, vol. ii, part 2, 1912. and the Galilean Ministry of Jesus (e.g., 3 7-10, 12; 4 3-10; 5 3-12; 7 1-5, 24-27; 8 5-10; 11 2-11, 16-19; 12 33-35).

III. The Sources Behind Lk were (1) The Gospel of Mk, substantially as we possess it to-day. (2) The Perean Document, showing itself in 9 57-18 14 (18 15-43 being paralleled by Mk); 19 1-28. (3) The Galilean Document (G), disclosing itself most likely in two sections: (a) 3 7-15, 17 f.; 4 2b-13; (b) 4 16-30, 42-44 (if not 31-41); 5 1-11; 6 20-49; 7 1-50.

These constitute the Major Sources. The Minor Sources might be indicated as

I. Behind Mk, ch. 13, as an individual apocalypse current in the church, apart from the Apostolic preaching.

II. Behind Mt, his nativity and infancy narrative; certain portions of the Passion narrative; and other minor narratives peculiar to Mt, not included in the discourse material which he has taken from Q.

III. Behind Lk, his nativity and infancy narrative; certain portions of the Passion narrative; and other minor narratives peculiar to Lk, not included in the narrative material of P and G.<sup>5</sup>

It will be seen from the foregoing that a full consideration of the facts disclosed in the Synoptic record point to a documentary theory which posits more than two documents behind the Synoptics.

7. Versions of Mark. There is one further fact that should be considered because of its relation to theories advanced as to the primary character of the Gospel of Mk. When we compare Mk with Mt and Lk we find there is a large section of Mk (7 24-8 26) which is substantially reproduced by Mt, but wholly omitted by Lk. It is the section which narrates Jesus' retirement to the regions of Tyre and Sidon, which apparently continued for some time and ended in the confession of the Disciples at Caesarea-Philippi as to the Messiahship of Jesus. How is Lk's omission of this Markan section to be accounted for?

Two theories have been advanced not only for this particular omission, but for all the above noted differences in material between Mk on the one side and Mt and Lk on the other. The first is that Mt and Lk had access to a Markan writing which preceded our present canonical Mk, viz., the writing by Mark to which Papias refers and which is assumed to have been an unordered and disconnected reproduction of Peter's discourses. This writing, it is claimed, possessed much more material than our present Gospel—material which Mt and Lk have incorporated into their records, but which has been omitted from our Canonical Mk (e. g., Weisse, Schenkel, Reville). Apart, however, from the difficulty of understanding how, as a mere literary process, Mk failed steadily to reproduce from his earlier writing so much significant material that Mt and Lk have steadily retained, it is almost impossible to account not only for the strange way in which this extra material differs from the material of Mk's Canonical Gospel, but for the strange way in which it differs within itself. Could two such different writings have come from the same pen? And then to come back to this large section of Mk which Lk has omitted. Did Lk omit it because it did not exist in this earlier writing? Then how came Mt to include it? If it be said that Mt and Lk had access to both Markan writings, Mt including it from the second writing and Lk omitting it because it was not in the first, then, not only where did Mk get this section if it was not in his original writing, but what was it that determined Lk after all to omit it when he had the chance to insert it as Mt did?

The second theory is that Mt and Lk had recourse to separate and distinct copies of our Canonical Mk, one of which contained the material Mt has reproduced, the other that which Lk has reproduced (e.g., Stanton, Holdsworth). While this might account for the different treatment of this and other Markan sections given by Mt and Lk, how can it account, as above noted, for the striking difference which the general material of Mt and Lk presents when compared with the general material of Mk? While one writer might conceivably write two different accounts of the same events, how could separate copies of the same account differ among themselves so strangely as Mt and Lk differ in their Gospels from Mk?

Without going into the controversy which gathers around these theories, it will be enough to say that the general consensus of modern scholarship is against an original Markan writing behind our Canonical Mk, as also against the existence of different copies of our Canonical Mk. As to the omission by Lk of this large section of Mk, it is best explained by the fact that it was not a ministry of Jesus in this Gentile region, but a period of retirement from all ministry, in order that he might prepare his disciples for the fatal ending of his work, which was now so clearly evident to him, and for the carrying of it on after his death by bringing them to realize and accept the spiritual character of his Messiahship. Had it been a Gentile Mission, it would be confessedly difficult to explain Lk's omission of it from his narrative. As it was not such a mission, it is easy to see how Lk was not attracted to it. As to the other and more general divergences from Mk on the part of Mt and Lk, they are not only better explained, they are in fact explained at all only on the assumption that there were documents in common and also peculiar to themselves, wholly separate and distinct from any writing of Mark's.

SYRACUSE, sir'ə-kiūs (Συράκουσαι): The most important city of Sicily, situated on the E. coast of the island. It had been one of the most famous and magnificent colonies of Greece, but, along with the rest of Sicily, it suffered greatly in the civil wars of the Republic. Even in Paul's time it retained much of its splendor, Caligula having restored many of its temples; but it never recovered its importance, tho the emperors gave it local self-government. Paul, as a prisoner under Roman guard, arrived here from Melita, probably toward the end of February, and waited for three days to get across to Rhegium in Italy (Ac 28 12). There is no record of any work done by the Apostle in the city.

SYRIA, sir'ī-ə, SYRIAN, sir'ī-ən: The name 'Syria' (which does not occur in the Heb. O T, where 'Ārām, or 'Āramnā [adj.], rendered 'Syrian' in Dt 26 5; II K 18 26, etc., is always used) seems to have been derived from the old name Suri of the Assyrian inscriptions, which denoted a district on the upper Euphrates. It came to be used by the Greek writers (from Herodotus down), and at last entirely supplanted the more correct 'Ārām, Aramean. Syria included the territory bounded by the Taurus Mountains, the Euphrates and the Syrian Desert, the Arabian Desert and the Mediterranean. All this territory was settled more or less thoroughly by people of Aramean stock. Historically, Syria does not show a steady progressive development toward unification. It was always a group of related, but not united, petty kingdoms or tribes. Consequently, its history is a part of the history of the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Greek, Roman, and Mohammedan empires successively. Not once was there in this vast region a united effort toward independent self-government. SYROPHENICIAN, sui'ro-fi-nish'en (Συροφινίκια): It is not clear that this designation is used with any attempt at precision (cf. Mk 7 28). If precision is not aimed at, the term is simply synonymous with Phœnician (cf. Mt 15 22, 'a woman of Canaan' AV, 'Canaanitish' RV); otherwise, the distinction which later appears between Syria Magna and Syria Phœnice must have already existed and found its way into popular usage. TAANACH, tā-ə-nak (תַּנַּח, ta'ānakh, also ta'nakh): A Canaanite town which formed part of the line of fortresses guarding the S. border of the Plain of Esdrael (Jos 12 21, 17 11 f., 21 25, Tanach AV; Jg 5 19; I K 4 12; I Ch 7 29). Map III, F 1. Excavations, conducted for the Austrian Government by Dr. Sellin in 1902-04, at T. have resulted in most interesting discoveries, including cuneiform tablets, images of Astarte, an Amorite rock-hewn altar, a whole street of sacred columns, jar-burials of newborn infants, evidences of human sacrifices in connection with the building of houses, and other proofs of an exceedingly ancient history and of the practises common to the Canaanite religion. TAANATH-SHILOH, tā'ə-nath-shai'lō (תַּנַּח שִׁלֹה, ta'ānath-shilōh): A place on the NE. border of Ephraim (Jos 16 6). It was identified by Eusebius and Jerome with Thana, 10 m. E. of Nāblus (Shechem). It is probably the modern Ta'na, 7 m. SE. of Nāblus, with old cisterns and rock-tombs. Map III, G 3. G. A. Smith suggests that it was a fortress guarding the upper end of the Wādy el-Ifjīm.

TABBAOTH, tab'ə-əth (תַּבְּאוֹת, tabbā'ōth), 'signet-rings': The ancestral head of one of the families of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43; Neh 7 46).

TABBATH, tab'əth (תַּבְּת, tabbāth): A place somewhere in the Jordan Valley, about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea (Jg 7 22). The exact site is unknown.

TABEEL, tā'bi-el (תַּבְּעֵל, tabh'el, Tabeal AV), 'God is good': 1. A person of doubtful identification in the days of Ahaz. It was the plan of Pekah and Rezin to overthrow Ahaz and place 'the son of Tabeel' on the throne of Judah (Is 7 5 f.). Winckler (KAT<sup>3</sup>, p. 135) is confident that 'the son of Tabeel' was none other than Rezin himself. The name is identical with Tabrimmon ('Rimmon is good,' I K 15 18), Rimmon being the name of a deity. In the Heb. text it is so pointed as to be pronounced Tabeal—i.e., 'good for nothing,' but this may be due simply to the pause. 2. A Persian official west of the Euphrates (Ezr 4 7). E. E. N.

TABER: This verb (only Nah 2 7 [8] AV) means 'to play on a taber [tabor], a tambourine-like instrument without the jingles. It renders the Pō'el participle of tāphaph, to 'drum,' 'beat' (cf. Ps 68 25, 'playing with timbrels'). In Nah 2 7, RV reads 'beating upon their breasts [hearts], an act of mourning. Stade, following the LXX., reads m'tsaphts-phōth, Pilpēl ptopt. of tsāphaph, 'twittering.' C. S. T.

TABERAH, tab'í-ra (תַּבְּרָה, tabh'eráh), 'burning': A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 11 3; Dt 9 22). Site unknown.

TABERNACLE: In the priestly portions of the Hexateuch (q.v.) there are frequent references to a tent or 'tabernacle' which was constructed by Moses at the command of God and, with its attendant priesthood, was the fundamental feature of Israel as the holy people of J'. Outside of P, the references to the Tabernacle in the O T are, with one or two exceptions, found only in late passages influenced by the views of P.

I. THE STRUCTURE DESCRIBED IN P.

1. Origin and Purpose of the Tabernacle. In P, in accordance with its 'priestly' point of view, the making of the Tabernacle with the organization of the cultus was the chief work done at Sinai. Immediately after the Israelites arrived here, Moses ascended the mount to meet God, and after a six days' theophany, entered into the cloud and there received the directions concerning the Tabernacle (Ex 17 1a, 19 1-2a, 24 15-18a, 25 1 ff.; see EXODUS, § 4). The account in Ex 25 1-31 17 and chs. 35-40, which is continued in Lv chs. 8 and 9, is not all of one composition, but consists of several strands distinguished from one another by their terminology and by other differences (cf. Carpenter-Harford, The Comp. of the Hexateuch, p. 266, note). As the account stands it may be analyzed as follows:

- I. The Directions for Making the Tabernacle, 25 1-32 17.
  - Preliminary: Regarding the materials to be collected from the people, 25 1-9.
  - A. The Main Section, 25 10-29 46.
    1. The three most sacred, significant, and symbolic pieces of furniture, 25 10-40.
      - (1) The Ark, vs. 10-22.
      - (2) The Table of Showbread, vs. 23-30.
      - (3) The Candlestick, vs. 31-40.
    2. The Tabernacle, or 'dwelling' (mishkán), 26 1-37.
      - (1) The 'dwelling' proper, of curtains of fine linen, vs. 1-6.
      - (2) The goats'-hair 'tent' over the curtain, vs. 7-13.
      - (3) The 'covering' of skins, ver. 14.
      - (4) The 'boards' (qerāshim, =?) of the 'dwelling,' vs. 15-25.
      - (5) The 'veil' (pārōketh) between the 'holy' place and the 'most holy' place, vs. 31-35.
      - (6) The 'screen' (māšûkh) at the door of the 'tent,' vs. 36-37.
    3. The Altar of Burnt Offerings, 27 1-8.
    4. The Court, with its curtains, pillars, etc., 27 9-18 (ver. 20 f., regarding the oil for the light, belongs logically with 25 31-40).
    5. The Garments for the priesthood, ch. 28.
    6. Directions concerning the consecration of the priests, 29 1-35.
    7. Directions regarding the consecration of the Altar and regarding daily offerings, 29 36-42.
  - Conclusion, as to the purpose of the Tent and the ideal embodied in it, 29 43-46.
  - B. Supplementary Section, chs. 30-31.
    1. The Altar of Incense, 30 1-10.
    2. The Redemption Money, 30 11-16.
    3. The Laver of Brass, 30 17-21.
    4. The Anointing Oil, 30 22-33.
    5. The Incense, 30 34-38.
    6. The Artizans who were to do the work, 31 1-11.
    7. The Sabbath, 31 12-17.

II. The Construction of the Tabernacle in accordance with the foregoing instructions, 34 22-39 43.

Moses comes down from the mount, face all aglow, and gives the people the commandments he had received (34 29 ff.), beginning with the Sabbath-law (35 1-3), then he calls for offerings and workers (35 4-10), to which call the people liberally respond (35 10-19). Bezalel and others are appointed to superintend the work (35 30-36 7). In the account that follows of the making of the Tabernacle and its furniture (36 8-39 43), the order of the instructions is not followed exactly, and the whole account evidences itself as secondary to the original in chs. 25-29.

III. The Erection of the Tabernacle and the formal institution of the worship, Ex ch. 40 and Lv ch. 8 f.

This account of the making of the Tabernacle and of the organization of the worship about it as a center is followed, in the main thread of P's narrative, by the description of the arrangement of the camp, details of the order of march, and other related matters in Nu chs. 1-4.

The prominence given to the T. in P is evidenced not only by the elaborate care with which it is described and by the fact that it forms the central point of the whole cultus-organization, but also by the names given to it. In P the T. as regards its structure, is viewed simply as a tent ('ōhel, sometimes rendered 'tent,' but more frequently 'tabernacle,' in AV). But this tent was the tent of meeting ('ōhel mō'ēdh, 'tabernacle of the congregation' AV, incorrectly) or the dwelling (mishkán, 'tabernacle' in both RV and AV; e.g., Ex 25 1, etc.). The significance of these terms is fully expressed in Ex 29 43 ff. The T. was to be the 'meeting-place' between God and His people Israel, the place where He 'dwelt' in their midst. It was thus the holiest place on earth, the center of Israel's life as the people of J'. Other terms such as miqdāsh, sanctuary (Ex 25 8, etc., also qōdhes, Ex 30 13, etc.), or 'tabernacle of the testimony,' mishkkan hā'ēdhūth (Ex 38 21 or 'tent of the testimony,' 'ōhel hā'ēdhūth'), because here the two tables of the 'testimony,' 'ēdhūth', were kept in the Ark (Ex 25 18, 21, etc.), each emphasizes one phase of the same general idea.

2. Place of the Tabernacle in the Camp. In P Israel is always spoken of as in 'camp' or on the march. The legislation is all formulated, as if intended to apply to such conditions, altho in reality it was intended to apply to a settled community living in its own land. The 'camp' is really a legal fiction. Consequently, the T., however elaborate and expensive it may have been, is viewed as a portable sanctuary, something not unknown to Semitic antiquity, a tent rather than a house, and the place assigned it in reference to the camp is not without great significance. In the arrangement of the camp in P the determining principle is that of the varying degrees of holiness possessed by the different elements which, all told, made up the holy nation. The camp is described as a hollow square or rectangle, located true to the points of the compass, each side guarded by three of the twelve tribes. Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun were encamped on the E., viewed as the front and considered, doubtless, as the most honorable position; Reuben, Simeon, and Gad made up the S. side; Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin (i.e., the house of Joseph) formed the W. or rear; and on the N. were Dan, Asher, and Naphtali (Nu 2 1-32).

Within this square was a second one formed by the priests and Levites (Nu 3 21-39). The priests (i.e., 'Aaron and his sons'; see PRIESTHOOD, § 9) and Moses occupied the place of honor, the E. or front side. The S., W., and N. sides were occupied respectively by the Kohathite, Gershonite, and Mera-rite divisions of the Levites, to each of which was assigned certain specific parts of the sanctuary and its furniture as their special charge.

Within this second square of Levites was the rectangular court of the Tabernacle, marked off by curtains and pillars, within which were, at last, the altar of burnt offerings and the holy 'dwelling' (see § 3, below). Thus the whole arrangement symbolized the idea of holiness. Next to the profane world was the holy nation, with Judah in the place of honor, then the more holy Levites, with the priests in the place of honor, then the still more holy enclosure or court with the altar in the center of its E. half, then finally the 'sanctuary,' with its Holy Place, and last of all the Most Holy Place, in the center of which was the 'Shekinah,' i.e., the manifestation of God Himself over the golden mercy-seat between the cherubim (cf. the reference to Ezekiel's Temple, § 6, below).

When camp was broken, the division of Judah set forward first, followed by that of Reuben. Then the Levites, with the Tabernacle in their midst, made up the center, followed by the divisions of Ephraim and Dan (Nu 2 1-31). In taking down the Court and the Tabernacle the greatest care was exercised lest any profane eyes should gaze on the holy things (Nu 4 1-34).

3. Details of Structure. (1) The Court and its Furniture (Ex 27 9-19, 38 9-20). The Court was a double square or a rectangle 50×100 cubits in size. Its limits were marked by curtains or hangings hung on sixty acacia pillars set in sockets of brass, 5 cu. apart. Each pillar was 5 cu. high, with a band or fillet of silver at the top, and also provided with silver hooks by which the curtains were secured. The pillars were held firm by cords and brazen tent-pins. The curtains for the N. and S. sides were each 5 cu. high by 100 cu. long, of fine white linen; that for the W. side was 5×50 cu. On the E. side two short curtains, each 5×15 cu. and hung on three pillars, extended from the corners toward the center, leaving an opening of 20 cu. wide in the center, which was closed by a screen of fine linen embroidered in colors and suspended from four (really five) pillars.

The furniture of the Court consisted of the portable brazen altar of burnt-offerings with its accessories such as pots, shovels, basins, flesh-hooks, and fire-pans (27 1-3, 38 1-7; on which see ALTAR, § 2) and (according to the secondary strata of the account) the brazen laver, kiggōr, which was to stand between the altar and the sanctuary (30 17-21; the notice in 38 8 contains a curious anachronism).

(2) The Tabernacle Proper (Ex 26 1-37). Theoretically, this is viewed as a tent, but of very peculiar structure. The 'tent' proper consisted of two sets of curtains, one of which was to serve as the covering for the other. The first set of curtains constituted the 'dwelling' (Ex 26 1). It consisted of ten curtains of fine twined linen in which figures of cherubim were woven or 'embroidered' in 'blue and purple and scarlet.' Each curtain was 4×28 cu. in size. The curtains were sewed together in two sets of five each, and the two sets were coupled to each other by fifty golden clasps (taches AV) linked into fifty loops of blue thread sewed on the edge of each set. These ten curtains when so joined together made a covering 40×28 cu. in size, which was to be spread over a framework consisting of upright 'boards' so arranged as to make a structure 10 cu. wide by 30 cu. long and 10 cu. high. The covering, when spread upon the framework, hung over each side to the length of 9 cu. (9+10+9=28) and at the rear to the extent of 10 cu., since the edge of the covering was flush with the front of the framework. Over this was spread the 'tent' made of eleven curtains of goats' hair, each 4×11 cu., made in two sets of five and six curtains each, fastened together with loops and brazen clasps. The first curtain of the front set was doubled and hung over the front of the structure. Along the N. and S. sides this covering overlapped the under one by a cubit, but at the rear the edges of the two coincided. The point most open to discussion in the description of the Tabernacle is the term qeresh (pl. qērāshīm, rendered 'boards').

The usual theory, based on the probably erroneous ideas of the LXX. and Josephus, regards them as pillars, and is advocated, e.g., by Benzinger (in EB, art. Tabernacle). But this makes the whole structure a most unwieldy and impossible affair (each 'board' being a huge timber 1×1½ cu. square × 10 cu. long and weighing between 1,000 and 2,000 lbs.). There is no evidence that qeresh means any such thing (cf. Nowack, Heb. Archäologie, II, p. 56, note). It is the plausible suggestion of A. R. S. Kennedy (HDB, IV, p. 659 f., and cf. Driver in Camb. Bible on Ex 26 15) that the 'boards' were light, strong frames shaped somewhat like the accompanying figure, sufficiently rigid to sustain the weight of the curtains and give the necessary firmness to the walls and yet so open as to allow the rich embroidery of the inner curtains to be visible from the inside, which would be impossible on the ordinary theory that qeresh means a solid 'board' or pillar. The projecting legs (tenons) of these frames were set in sockets of silver, each socket weighing a talent (38 27), or about 96 lbs. On each of the N. and S. sides of the Tabernacle there were twenty 'boards,' making up the total length of 30 cu. to a side. The W. end had but six 'boards' (=9 cu.), but as the two corner ones were each doubled in some way, the total width of 10 cu. was easily obtained. The 'boards' were overlaid with gold plate. The E. end was closed by a screen suspended on five acacia pillars overlaid with gold and with golden hooks, and set in sockets of brass. To add to the rigidity of the structure the 'boards' on the N. and S. sides were joined by bars of acacia overlaid with gold, which passed through rings of gold. Five bars were used on a side, the middle one in each case extending the whole length of the side, the upper and lower ones being only half as long.

Over this whole structure, to protect it from the weather, were spread (just how we do not know) two coverings, one of rams' skins dyed red and the other of sealskins (q.v.).

(3) The Holy Place and its Furniture (Ex 25 23-40, 26 31-35). The space enclosed by the 'boards,' curtains, and the screen at the E. end was divided into two parts, one double the area of the other, by a veil of the same beautiful fabric as the curtains, which was suspended by golden hooks on four acacia pillars overlaid with gold and set in silver sockets. This veil was placed 20 cu. from the E. end of the dwelling, exactly under the place where the curtains of the inner covering and the 'tent' above them were joined together by their clasps. The purpose of this veil was to separate the dwelling into two rooms, the larger one (10×20 cu.) being called the 'holy place.'

According to the older stratum (Ex chs. 25-29) of the account, the furniture of the Holy Place consisted of a table and a lamp-stand with their necessary accessories.

The table (shulhān, Ex 25 23 ff.; also called shulhān happānīm, 'table of the presence,' Nu 4 7; cf. also Lv 24 6 and II Ch 29 18) was of acacia wood plated heavily with pure gold. It was 1½ cu. high, 2 cu. long, and 1 cu. broad. The top was probably quite thick and heavy and around it ran a golden 'crown,' zēr, or decorated mounting. To stiffen the legs they were encased near the feet by a 'border,' misghereth, a handbreadth broad, likewise surmounted by a golden 'crown.' To this 'border' were attached the rings of gold through which the gold-plated staves were passed. On the table was to be placed the showbread (leḥem pānīm, 'bread of faces,' i.e., bread set before the 'face,' or in the presence of God). The table was thus in reality an altar, and it is so called in Ezk 41 22. The service of the table was of pure gold and consisted of dishes (q'ārōth, probably platters to hold the loaves), spoons (kappōth, cups for the frankincense; cf. Lv 24 7), flagons (q'sāwōth, for the wine), and bowls (m'nagqiyōth, also for the wine). The ritual of the table is given in part in Lv 24 5-9. The table was to be placed on the S. side of the Holy Place (Ex 26 35).

The lamp-stand or candlestick (m'nōrāh) was of 'beaten work' of pure gold (cf. Ex 25 31-40, 31 3; Lv 24 4). From a main stem or shaft three pairs of branches extended, curved upward so that the ends of the branches and stem were on the same level. At intervals on both branches and stem and also on their ends were almond blossoms (both knop and flower). In the seven blossoms which formed the ends of the stem and branches were to be placed the seven golden lamps. Tongs or snuffers and snuff-dishes of gold were also provided, together with 'oil-vessels' (Nu 4 9). The lamps were to be cared for daily, and the oil was to be of the finest variety (Ex 27 20 f.; Lv 24 1-4).

In the secondary strata of the account mention is made of an altar of incense (Ex 30 1-10; cf. ALTAR, § 2, at the end). This was a chest-like structure 2 cu. high, 1 cu. long, and 1 cu. wide, of acacia wood overlaid with gold. It had 'horns' at the corners and was provided with a 'crown,' rings, and staves like the table of showbread. It was to be placed 'before' (i.e., east of) the veil. The ritual of this altar is given minutely in Ex 30 7-10, but over against these directions must be placed the fact of a strange silence regarding this altar in other passages where it would naturally be referred to. Nothing is said of it in Lv ch. 16 in the ritual for the Day of Atonement (in spite of Ex 30 10), and in other passages the incense is brought before the Lord on censers (Lv 10 1; Nu 16 17). Furthermore, neither in Solomon's Temple (in the old account in I K, chs. 6 ff.) nor in that of Ezekiel is anything said of an altar of incense. It is probable, therefore, that the description in Ex 30 1-10 belongs to a stratum of P originating between the date of Lv ch. 16 and the Chronicler (cf. I Ch 28 18; II Ch 4 19), and that it was due to the introduction, during the Persian period, of an altar of incense into the Second Temple.

(4) The Most Holy Place (qūdhesh haqqōdhāshām, Ex 26 31-35, holy of holies AV) was, in size, a perfect cube of 10 cu. in each dimension. It was this that was viewed as the real 'dwelling' of J', for it was here, in a mysterious manifestation of Himself above the mercy-seat of the Ark, the one article of furniture in this room, and not at the door of the Tent, as in Ex 33 9 (E), that J' promised to 'meet with' and 'commune with' His people (Ex 25 22). See also ARK.

II. THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE ACCOUNT IN P.

4. General Considerations. Was the elaborate structure described by P ever actually used by the Israelites? This question can not be satisfactorily answered in the negative by the merely general objection that at the time of the Exodus the Israelites were too simple, rude, and poor to have been able to make such an expensive sanctuary. The true answer must be gained from the internal character of the account itself and its agreement or disagreement with other statements in the O T record. On the traditional assumption that Moses wrote the whole account, as well as the rest of the Pentateuch, we have a right to demand that there shall be no inconsistencies or contradictions either in the account itself or between it and the rest of the Pentateuch. If such are found, it is evident that more than one hand has had a share in the composition, and it then becomes our duty to analyze the account as minutely as possible, in order to get possession of all the facts involved and discover, if possible, a solution of the problem. Furthermore, if Moses wrote the account of the Tabernacle in Ex, the presence of such a sanctuary with its elaborate cultus must have left some trace of its existence in the early history as we have it recorded in Jos to II K. A brief consideration of the evidence bearing on this question will now be attempted.

5. Tent and Altar in JE and D. In the account of the reconciliation between J' and the Israelites after the making of the golden calf, we are told, Ex 33 7 ff., that 'Moses used to take the tent and to pitch it without the camp . . . and he called it, The tent of meeting' (ver. 7). On this Tent J' descended in a cloud, when Moses entered it, and there He spoke with him at the door of the Tent (ver. 9). Moses' 'minister Joshua departed not out of the Tent' (ver. 11). That this passage is but a fragment of an originally longer account is evident; but what else that account contained is unknown. Brief, however, as this fragment is, it seems to have a very different idea of the place of the Tent in reference to the camp (outside, instead of in the very center, as in P), of the part of the Tent where J' manifested Himself (at the door, instead of in the Most Holy Place) and of the persons in charge (Joshua, instead of Aaron, his sons, and Levites).

The altar of burnt offering is a most essential element in P's account of the T. and also of the cultus. It is the one only altar of sacrifice known to the priestly law. But in Ex 20 24-26 (JE) we find something quite different. Not a brazen, artificial altar, but altars of earth, or at best of unhewn stone, are prescribed, to be erected at the different places where J' may record His name.

In the order of march prescribed in P (Nu chs. 2-4 and 10 1-28) the Ark is to be carried by the Kohathite Levites in the center of the line (six tribes in front of it and six in the rear). But in Nu 10 33 f. (JE) the Ark leads the march, apparently at some distance from the main body.

These differences seem to forbid absolutely the ascription of all the passages containing them to one and the same author or date. Their importance is only enhanced when we discover that in the entire Code of Dt there is not the slightest reference to the Tabernacle, which seems to prove beyond all doubt that this code could not have proceeded from the same hand (or hands) that wrote P. For in P the entire system of worship centers about the Tabernacle and the Aaronic priesthood (q.v.). The same general subject of worship is covered in D in the form of a general national code. How could the author(s) of D have omitted the Tabernacle and its services if he were the same person who assigned them the importance given to them in P?

Another feature of the early literature is that while a Tent made by Moses is referred to (as in Ex 33 7 ff.) and also an Ark (Nu 10 33 f.; cf. Dt 10 1 ff., based on JE), there seems to be no close connection between the two. They are not spoken of together, and while the Levites have charge of the Ark, nothing is said of their care of the Tent (cf. Dt 10 8).

The truth seems to be that quite early historical tradition became vague as to the Tent Moses made, probably because, in the shifting and uncertain fortunes of the Conquest and 'judges' periods, it was lost or destroyed, and no one knew its fate. In none of the early notices of the Ark, at Shiloh (I S chs. 1-6), or at Kiriath-jearim (I S 7 1 f.), or of its removal to Jerusalem (II S 6 1-19; cf. especially ver. 17) is anything said about the Mosaic Tent. Only in late editorial additions or glosses is there any reference to the 'tent of meeting' (i.e., P's Tabernacle) in the earlier historical books (Jos-II K; as, e.g., I S 2 22, or I K 8 4). Even the Deuteronomic editor of I K must have been ignorant of its existence, or he could not have written what we find in I K 3 2. The same complete silence regarding the Tabernacle is found in the preexilic Prophets.

6. The Sources of P's Description of the T. If, then, the description of the T. in P is at variance with the older references to the Mosaic Tent, Ark, and altars, and if the Mosaic Tent disappeared altogether at a comparatively early date, what is to be said of the T. so elaborately described by P? Is it to be considered altogether a fiction? The answer to such questions is to be determined by considering what sources the authors of P may have had at their disposal and under what influences they made use of such sources.

Among the sources must be set down:

(1) The tradition of the Mosaic Tent. That there was such a tradition is certain from the traces of it in JE, but that the only form of it was that found in Ex 33 7-11 is not certain or even probable. It is not at all unlikely that there was an old tradition in priestly circles of a somewhat elaborate tent made by Moses to serve the purpose of at least a temporary sanctuary in the wilderness.

(2) A second source drawn on by P must have been the several Temples (of Solomon, of Ezekiel's vision, and the Second Temple) with which the authors of P were acquainted. Solomon's Temple was 20 cu. wide by 60 cu. long, and the T. of P is just one-half of these dimensions. Solomon's Temple had a 'holy place' (20×40 cu.), in which there was a table of showbread and ten golden 'candlesticks,' and also in the rear of this a most holy enclosure, containing the Ark only (20 cu. square), separated from the former by a wall with olive-wood doors. In Solomon's Temple the walls of both rooms were profusely decorated, especially with figures of cherubim, and nearly all the woodwork was plated with pure gold. This Temple also had a court in which there were a brazen altar and an immense brazen laver (the molten 'sea'). All these things with slight modifications the T. also had, tho on a smaller scale.

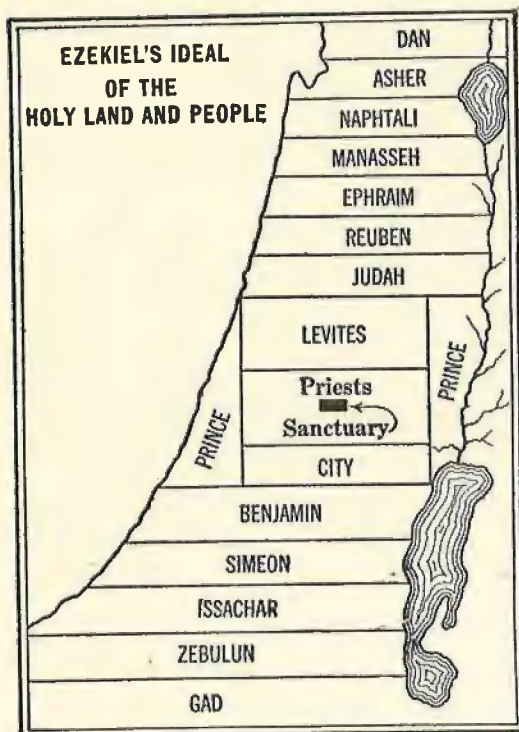

(3) A third source from which the authors of P drew must have been the ideas concerning the centralization of the cultus (one and one only sanctuary and sacrificial altar allowed), as set forth in the Code of Dt (q.v.), and the new emphasis on holiness and the distinctions to be made between the holy and the profane set forth and urged upon the exiles by Ezekiel, especially in his ideal sketch of the restored community (Ezk chs. 40-48). After reading this sketch, it is not difficult to see where P got his idea of the camp as a series of concentric enclosures of varying degrees of holiness, the innermost and holiest of all being the Tabernacle; for Ezekiel sets forth almost exactly the same idea. According to him, the holy land is to be divided into a number of parallel strips running from E. to W. A first series, the domain of seven tribes, lies N. of the central portion, and a second series, for five tribes, lies S. of the central strip.

The central portion of the center strip was a square (25,000 cu. each way) divided into three parts: one for the Levites (10,000×25,000 cu.) on the N., one for the 'city' and its land (5,000×25,000 cu.) on the S., and the center one for the priests (10,000×25,000 cu.), in the exact center of which lay the sanctuary where J<sup>h</sup> had His throne, where He dwelt (Ezk 43 7), and its court (500 cu. sq.); see TEMPLE, §§ 19 ff. It requires but little modification of this general plan to give us P's arrangement of the camp with the T. (the 'dwelling') at the center.

(4) Finally, the authors of P, or at least those who supplemented the earlier form of P, were acquainted with the Second Temple and its more formal cultus-arrangements. Little is directly known of this Temple before its rebuilding by Herod. But we do know that it contained an altar of incense, a golden candlestick, and a table of showbread (I Mac 1 22, 4 49) and before it was an altar of burnt-offerings made of stone (I Mac 4 45 f.). Whether the altar of incense was placed in it at the first is uncertain; more probably it was a later addition to the furniture of the Holy Place. No attempt was ever made to make another Ark of the Covenant after the loss of the original one when Jerusalem fell in 586 B.C.

7. Constructive Conclusion. The description of the T. is an essential part of the P document. In fact, in this description the ideal teaching of this great document reaches its climax. Starting with the creation of the universe (Gn 1 1), the writer draws ever nearer to his main theme—how the infinite, holy God has His abode among men in the midst of His holy people Israel. When he wrote, it had probably long been the custom to assign a Mosaic origin to all the important legitimate religious customs then current (as Dt had already done). That there could be but one altar, one sanctuary, one priestly family; that the line between the holy and the profane must be drawn most strictly; that the sanctuary and its services must be as expensive and beautiful and elaborate as possible—all such ideas as these had long been current and accepted, and, of course—so he must have reasoned—they were entertained and taught by Moses. Making use of the tradition of the Mosaic Tent as he understood it, the author of P (in its original form) built his description mainly on the data of Solomon's Temple and on Ezekiel's idealistic picture (this is what we find now embedded in Ex chs. 25-29, Nu chs. 2-4, etc.). Later additions in the same spirit extended this by transferring to it elements from the subsequent developments of the cultus (as the Altar of Incense, Ex ch. 30, etc.), or from the more fully developed theories of later times. The Tabernacle of P is not, therefore, a bald fiction, but an honest, sincere attempt to set forth a great ideal on the basis of ancient tradition and established usage.

TABLE: This word is the rendering of: (1) lūah, 'tablet.' See TABLE, TABLET. (2) mēšabāh, 'that which surrounds,' 'is round.' The meaning is doubtful (Song 1 12), perhaps 'table' or 'cushion,' 'divan.' (3) shulhān, properly a 'skin' or 'round leather mat' spread on the ground. It often had a string run around the edge so that it could be drawn up and used as a bag for carrying food. The name was also applied to the wooden or metal tray set on a stand. Those who ate from the table gathered about it, sitting on the ground, chairs, or couches, according to its height above the ground (I K 10 5, 13 20); later, it became the custom to recline at table (Jn 12 2 RVmg.). The king ate at a 'table' (Jg 1 7; I S 20 29, etc.); private individuals had them (I K 13 20; Job 36 18, etc.); and it was one of the pieces of furniture in a bedroom (II K 4 10). It is used figuratively of wisdom (Pr 9 2). In the following passages tables for sacred uses are mentioned: That for the showbread in the Tabernacle was made of wood overlaid with gold (Ex 25 23 and seventeen times in chs. 25-40; Nu 3 31, 4 7; Lv 24 6); in Solomon's Temple it was a table of gold (I K 7 48; II Ch 29 18 [ten in number]; II Ch 4 8, 19, 13 11; cf. I Ch 28 16); in Ezekiel's Temple there were tables on which the offerings were to be slain (Ezk 40 39, etc.; Ezk 40 40 [eight in number]; of stone, 40 42; an altar of wood, called a 'table,' 41 22; cf. 44 16); Mal speaks of the altar as a table (Mal 1 7, 12). In Is 65 11 'table' means an idolatrous meal; and in Ezk 39 20 it is a figure of J''s sacrificial feast. (4) xllyh, 'reclining-couch' or 'bed' (Mt 7 4), correctly RVmg. 'couches.' (5) plāzē, 'slab,' 'tablet' (II Co 3 3; He 9 4); see above under (1). (6) trāpēzā, a 'table with four feet,' LXX. for shulhān; used in the N T in various senses, as a 'dining-table' (Mt 15 27; Mk 7 28; Lk 16 21, 22 21, 30; cf. Ac 16 34, 'food' RV, 'table' mg.); 'a feast' (Ro 11 9; I Co 10 21); the stand of a money-changer (Mt 21 12; Mk 11 15; Jn 2 15; Lk 19 23, 'bank' EV; Ac 6 2, where moneys or goods placed on a table for distribution are perhaps meant); the table for showbread (He 9 2).

C. S. T.

TABLE, TABLET: (1) The word 'table' is the rendering of lūah, in Ex 24 12, etc. (of the 'tables' of stone). The same Heb. word is rendered 'boards' or 'planks' (Ex 27 8; Ezk 27 5, etc.) and metal 'plates' (I K 7 38). It is also used of the heart (Pr 3 3, 7 3; Jer 17 1) and in Is 30 8 of a writing-'tablet' of some sort. The root meaning of the term is unknown. On Is 8 1, 30 8 and on the N T passages (Lk 1 63; II Co 3 3; He 9 4), see BOOKS AND WRITING, § 1. (2) In Is 3 20, RV substitutes 'perfume-boxes' for the AV 'tablets.' The Heb. means literally 'houses of the soul.' (3) On Ex 35 22 and Nu 31 50, cf. the RV; see also DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, II, § 2.

TABOR, tē'bar or -bār (תֹּבֶר, tābhōr): 1. A village in Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites (I Ch 6 77), probably the same as the Tabor on the border of Issachar (Jos 19 22), and that at which Zebah and Zalmunna slew Gideon's brothers (Jg 8 18); not impossible also the same as Chisloth-tabor of Jos 19 12, a town on the border of Zebulun. Its exact location is uncertain, but it was probably not far from Mount Tabor. 2. Mount Tabor, called by the Arabs Jebel eṭ-Ṭār (like Sinai, Gerizim, and Olivet). A mountain on the boundaries of Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali (Jos 19 22, 12), 5 m. E. of Nazareth and about 12 m. W. of the S. end of the Sea of Galilee. Map IV, D 7. Its altitude is 1,843 ft. above sea-level. Olive, fig-, carob-, but especially oak- and terebinth-trees grow upon its slopes. The view obtained from its summit looking SW. toward Mt. Carmel across the fertile Plain of Esdraelon ('the great battle-field of history') is one long to be remembered. From Dt 33 19 it seems probable that it was the seat of an ancient sanctuary. Here Barak assembled the forces of Issachar and Zebulun to fight against Sisera and the Canaanites (Jg 4 8, 12, 14). Jeremiah uses it as a figure of the supreme power of the king of Babylon (46 18). Both Antiochus the Great (218 B.C.) and Josephus (66 A.D.) fortified it (Polybius, V, 70, 6; Jos BJ, IV, 1 8). Saladin captured it in 1187, but the crusaders failed in the attempt to do so in 1217. An ancient tradition, traceable back as far as Jerome and Origen, associates T. with the scene of the Transfiguration, but in Christ's time the top of the mountain was probably covered with houses, ruins of which and of an old fortress, as well as of churches and monasteries with pools and cisterns, are still to be found on it. Two monasteries, one Greek, the other Latin, now crown its flat, oblong (3,000×1,300 ft.) summit. 3. The oak ('plain' AV) of Tabor, which Saul passed on his way home after having been anointed by Samuel

(I S 10 3). The context of this passage locates it between 'Rachel's sepulcher in the border of Benjamin at Zelzah' (ver. 2) and 'the hill of God,' perhaps Gibeah (ver. 5), but its exact site is unknown. Ewald (History, III, 21) identified it with 'the palm-tree of Deborah between Ramah and Bethel in the hill-country of Ephraim' (Jg 4 5; cf. Gn 35 8).

TADMOR, tad'mōr (תַּדְמוֹר, ṭadmōr), derived from tāmār, 'palm': A city 'in the wilderness,' whose building is ascribed to Solomon (II Ch 8 4; also I K 9 18, AV, ARVmg., Heb. mg.); known to later history as the famous Palmyra, but since the Arabian period called again by its ancient name of Tadmor. The Tamar of I K 9 18, however, was probably not Tadmor. Palmyra was situated in a fertile oasis of the Syrian Desert, 120 m. NE. of Damascus, and thus was a natural halting-place for caravans passing between the Euphrates Valley and the Mediterranean. At the same time, its desert barriers enabled the city to enjoy practical freedom from imperial control. Palmyra reached the height of its wealth, culture, and influence during the reigns of Odenatus (255-267 A.D.) and his widow, the great Zenobia, when the city was the capital of an independent kingdom whose power was felt from Armenia to Egypt. In 273, however, a Roman army, led by the Emperor Aurelian in person, defeated the Palmyrene troops and destroyed the splendid capital. Modern Tadmor is a squalid Arab village surrounded by magnificent ruins, among the more important of which are an ancient aqueduct, Roman walls built by Justinian, the great Temple of the Sun, peculiar sepulchral towers, and superb colonnaded avenues.

TAHAN, tē'han (תַּחַן, ṭaḥan): 1. The ancestral head of the Tahanites, a clan of Ephraim (Nu 26 35), called Tahath in I Ch 7 20. 2. A descendant of 1 in the fourth generation (I Ch 7 25).

TAHAPANES, tā-hap'a-niz. See TAHAPANES.

TAHASH, tē'hash (תַּחַשׁ, ṭaḥash, Thahash AV): The ancestral head of an Aramean clan supposed to be descended from Nahor (Gn 22 24). On the name see SEAL.

TAHATH, tē'haṭh (תַּחַת, ṭaḥath): I. 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Ephraim (I Ch 7 20, called Tahan, Nu 26 35). 2. Another name in the same genealogy (I Ch 7 20). 3. A Korahite Levite (I Ch 6 24, 37). II. A station on the wilderness journey (Nu 33 26 f.). Site unknown.

TAHCHEMONITE, tā'ki-mən-ait (תַּחְמֹנִי, taḥmōnī): A patronymic of Joshebbasshebeth (=Adino, q.v.), the chief of David's three mighty men (II S 23 8). The form תַּחְמֹנִי, taḥmōnī, in the parallel passage (I Ch 11 11) is probably correct; the מ of the longer form being a mistake for the article ה.

It was situated on the Pelusiac branch of the Nile (the E. frontier of Egypt), 5 m. SE. of Tanis (Zoan). The classical writers called it Daphnæ, and its modern name is Tell Defneh. As a frontier town it was garrisoned (Herod. II, 30), a fact which no doubt contributed to its selection as a refuge for the fugitive Jews. Much of its history has been verified through excavations conducted by Flinders Petrie. Ezekiel (30 18) prophesied its destruction. Mention of the place is also made in the Book of Judith (1 9).

TAHPENES, tā'pī-nīz (תַּחְפַּנֶּז, taḥpānēs): The name of the wife of an unnamed Pharaoh, a contemporary of Solomon, who gave the queen's sister in marriage to Hadad the Edomite (I K 11 19 f.). The name is not mentioned elsewhere, nor is it found in the Egyptian inscriptions, but the fact that Hadad returned and, according to the LXX. of I K 11 22, became a formidable opponent of Solomon bears out the historicity of his marriage with the king's sister-in-law.

This puzzling name has given rise to many conjectures, of which the most plausible is that it is a textual error for 'the land of the Hittites to Kadesh' (so LXX. [L]). If so, the northern limit of David's rule is represented, perhaps with some exaggeration, as Kadesh on the Orontes. Cf. Driver, Notes on Heb. Text of Books of S., ad loc.

TAMAH, tā'mā. See TEMAH.

TAMAR, tā'mar (תָּמָר, tāmār), 'date-palm': 1. An unidentified town at the S. end of the Dead Sea. According to Ezk 47 19, 48 28, it formed the SE. corner of the Holy Land (cf. Nu 34 4; Jos 15 2-4). The same place is probably meant in I K 9 18 (where the K'thībā is more correct than 'Tadmor' of the Q'rē and II Ch 8 4). Winckler (Gesch. Isr. ii, 98) reads in this passage, instead of 'Ba'alath and Tamar,' 'Ba'alath-tamar,' which he identifies with Ba'al-tamar in Benjamin.

II. 1. The daughter-in-law of Judah, through whom he lost his two older sons, and by whom he became the father of Perez and Zerah (Gn 38 6, 11, 13, 24; Ru 4 12; I Ch 2 4). Under these personal names we have probably the story of two unsuccessful attempts of clans of the tribe of Judah to occupy the Canaanite town of Tamar, and the subsequent peaceful mingling of Judah with its inhabitants, out of which arose the new clans of Perez and Zerah. 2. A daughter of David who was violated by her half-brother Amnon and was avenged by her own brother Absalom (II S ch. 13; I Ch 3 9). 3. A daughter of Absalom (II S 14 27). The LXX. adds 'and she became the wife of Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and bare him Abiathar.' In this case she was identical with Maacah (I K 15 2; II Ch 11 20 ff.). The Lucianic text of II S 14 27 reads 'Maacah' instead of 'Tamar.'

TAMMUZ, tam'uz. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 34.

TANACH, tā'nak. See TAANACH.

TANHUMETH, tən-hiū'meth or tan'hiu- (תַּנְחֻמֶּת, tanhumeth), 'comfort': One of those who took refuge with Gedaliah, after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (II K 25 23; Jer 40 8).

TANNER. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 16.

TAPESTRY: This word occurs in the Bible only in Pr 7 16, 31 32 ('coverings of tapestry' AV, 'carpets of tapestry' RV, 'cushions' RVmg.). It renders the Heb. marbhaddim, literally 'things that are spread.'

TAPHATH, tā'fath (תַּפַּחַת, tāphath): A daughter of Solomon and wife of Ben-abinadab, one of Solomon's prefects (I K 4 11).

TAPPUAH, ta-piū'ā or tap'yu-ā (תַּפְּוּאָה, tappūah), 'apple [tree]': 1. An old Canaanite royal city (Jos 12 17, 15 34). The district and its city later belonged to Manasseh (Jos 17 8). It is also called En-Tappuah and lay on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh, so that it could also be counted as Ephraim's (Jos 16 8, 17 7 f.). The identification (Map III, F 4) is not certain. 2. A town of Judah, connected genealogically with the Calebites of Hebron (I Ch 2 42), also called Beth-tappuah (q.v.). E. E. N.

TARAH, tā'ra. See TERAH, II.

TARALAH, tar'ā-la (תַּרְאֵלָה, tar'ālāh): A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 27). Site unknown.

TAREA, tā-rī'ā or tā'rī-ā. See TAHREA.

TARES. See PALESTINE, § 22.

TARGET: The mistaken rendering in I S 17 6 AV of the Heb. kīdhōn, properly 'javelin.' See ARMS AND ARMOR, § 1.

TARGUM, tār'gum: The name given to the Aramaic versions of the O T. After the Exile, the Aramaic (q.v.), displacing the Hebrew, gradually became the popular language of Palestine, not only of Galilee and Samaria, but also of Judea. During the whole period in which the synagogue (q.v.) developed as an institution, the original language of the O T was unknown to the mass of the people. Hebrew was understood only by those who made it a special study. As the Scriptures were read in the original in the synagogue of Palestine, it was necessary to translate them for the understanding of the listeners. In this way arose the targums of the O T books. The word targum means 'translation,' or 'interpretation.' The targums, therefore, are translations, or paraphrases of the Hebrew Scriptures. It was the custom in the synagogue, in reading the Law, to read one verse, and then wait until that had been translated or paraphrased before proceeding to the next (cf. Neh 8 8). In the same way the reading from the Prophets was rendered into the vernacular, except that three verses were taken at a time. In earliest times it was forbidden to the interpreter to read his translation. It was feared lest the written targum might be placed upon the same level of authority as that held by the original. But the use of written targums was permitted for private instruction. Three stages may be marked in the growth of the targums: (1) the purely oral stage; (2) the stage in which they were partially written; (3) the stage in which they were written fully and with authoritative sanction. Our knowledge of the first and second stages is derived largely from later statements made regarding the customs in reference to the synagogue. The story of the confiscation of a Targum on Job in the 1st cent. A.D. (Bab. Shab. 115 1) shows the existence of written targums before the time when they received official sanction. All the targums extant are of a late date. They may be classified as follows:

I. Of the Pentateuch. (1) The Targum of Onkelos, also called the Babylonian Targum. (2) The Targum of Jonathan (pseudo-Jonathan), also called the Jerusalem Targum. Both of these targums cover the entire Pentateuch. (3) A third, containing only parts of the Pentateuch, is known by the name of the Fragmentary Targum, or the Jerusalem Targum II.

II. Of the Prophets. The Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel, also called the Babylonian Targum on the Prophets.

III. Of the Hagiographa: (1) The Targum of the Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. (2) The Targum of the Megilloth (Cant., Ru, La, Ec, Est). (3) The Targum of Chronicles.

Of most importance are the targums on the Law and the Prophets. Only a brief description of the different targums can be given here. 1. The Targum of Onkelos: The author of this targum is really unknown, for its ascription to Onkelos is due to a mistaken application of the tradition regarding the Greek version of the O T by Aquila to the Aramaic translation of the Pentateuch. The confusion of the names Onkelos and Akylas (Aquila) accounts for this mistake. The better name for this targum is the 'Babylonian,' because of its general acceptance in the Babylonian schools. It was received from Palestine, where it may have been compiled, in whole or in part, in the 2d or 3d cent. A.D., but it received its final redaction in Babylonia, in the 4th or 5th cent. This latter fact accounts for the traces of Babylonian influence upon its vocabulary. The translation contained in this targum is faithful. 'Wherever it deviates from the literalness of the text, such a course in its case is fully justified either by the obscurity of the passage or the wrong construction that naturally would be put upon its wording by the multitude.' Noticeable are its departures from the text when it wishes to avoid anthropomorphisms and any expressions reflecting on the worthiness of God. 2. The Jerusalem Targum (of pseudo-Jonathan): Until the 14th cent. this targum was known under no other name than the Jerusalem Targum. It is due to the carelessness of some scribe that an abbreviation 'י' was interpreted 'Targum Jonathan,' rather than 'T. Jerusalem.' Certainly Jonathan ben Uzziel, the reputed author of the Targum on the Prophets, can not have been its author. He is said to have lived near the time of Christ, and this targum introduces in its interpretations facts and references, e.g., the breaking up of the West Roman empire and the names of Mohammed's wives, which bring its date down to the 7th or 8th cent. A.D. It had its origin in Palestine, and differs essentially in its general character from the Targum of Onkelos. Instead of giving merely a faithful translation or paraphrastic understanding of the original, it seeks by allegory, parable, or story to illustrate and illumine the meaning. It is virtually a haggadic treatment of the Pentateuch. Like the Targum of Onkelos, it avoids anthropomorphisms and anthropopathisms. It is 'a mine of information on most of the religious and dogmatic conceptions of the Judaism of the Talmudic age.' Much discussion has been given to the relation of the pseudo-Jonathan Targum to the Fragmentary Targum. This latter contains only about 850 verses, and these belong mainly to the historical sections of the Pentateuch. It is not necessary here to go into the various theories which have been offered in order to set forth the inner relation of the Palestinian targums. It is sufficient to say that they are closely related. 3. The Targum of Jonathan (ben Uzziel) on the Prophets: The reputed author of this targum is said to have been a pupil of Hillel, 75 B.C.-10 A.D. The sole authority for his authorship is a statement of the Talmud (Meg. 3a), but by that same Talmud another name is given, R. Joseph bar Chiya of Babylon (270-333 A.D.). Whether we can discover his name or not, there is evidence in this work of the hand of one man who has given to the whole of it the stamp of his redaction. The targum originated in Palestine, and, like that of Onkelos, received its final form in Babylonia. In its treatment of the historical books it is much more literal than in its rendering of the Prophets. In this latter part it follows the haggadic method of added allegory, parable, and story, in order to illumine the passage. The traits common to other targums, such as the avoidance of anthropo-morphisms, the interpretation of figurative language, and the emphasis upon that which is to the glory of any Israelite, are all here. 4. The targums of the Hagiographa are all late in origin. As they are mostly private literary works, their value is varied. They show in general the characteristics of their models—the older targums—and are for the most part of Palestinian origin. The most noteworthy feature regarding them must be given in a single word. The Targum on the Psalms and Job is a faithful translation, with haggadic additions; that on Proverbs is marked by Syriac features arguing the use of the Peshitto version. The targums on the Megilloth are notably paraphrastic; Esther is extant in two forms, one of which is quite literal, the other called Targum Sheni, i. e., 'second' Targum, quite paraphrastic. The Targum on Chronicles, which was not known to exist until very late, combines literal translation with haggadic paraphrase.

LITERATURE: An extensive literature on the targums, mostly from the pens of German scholars, is in existence. (See lists in HDB and in JE, vol. xii.) J. W. Etheridge (1862, 1865) has translated into English the targums on the Pentateuch. See also Schürer, HJP (3d ed.), vol. i, pp. 147-152, and the literature there indicated. J. S. R.—W. G. J.

TARPELITE, tār'pel-ait (תַּרְפֵּלַיִת, tarpe'lāyē): Apparently a class of officials (Ezr 4 9). No satisfactory explanation of the term is known.

TARSHISH, tār'shish (תַּרְשִׁישׁ, tarshīsh): I. 1. A descendant of Benjamin (I Ch 7 10). 2. One of the seven princes of Persia (Est 1 14). See PRINCES, THE SEVEN. II. A geographical and ethnological term. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13; and SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 1.

TARSHISH, SHIPS OF. See SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2.

TARSUS, tār'sus (Ταρσός, now Tarsūs): The chief city of Cilicia, the situation of which at the junction of the trade-routes between western Asia Minor, Syria, and the Far East early made it an emporium for commerce and important for strategy. It lay on the Cydnus, which ran through the city, whereas the modern town is wholly on the western bank. Assyrian influences were felt at T. even in the 9th cent. B.C., for the name Tarzi occurs on the 'black Obelisk' of Shalmaneser III (860-824 B.C.), who conquered Cilicia (834). Some ancient writers claimed that T. was founded or fortified by Sennacherib (705-681); others that Assurbanipal (668-626), the Greek Sardapalus, was its founder. After Cilicia had become Hellenized, it was claimed that T. was founded by the Argives; others by Perseus. T. became the capital of an independent kingdom (about 607) under princes who bore the title of 'Syennesis,' and who later accepted the Persian suzerainty. This was true of the time of Xenophon, when T. was populous and wealthy. T. retained its Oriental character until the time of the Seleucids, when many Greeks settled there, enriched themselves, established a school of philosophy (or university, ranking, according to Strabo, above those of Athens and Alexandria), which became famous, especially under the first Roman emperors, who patronized it. About 171 B.C. Antiochus Epiphanes IV refounded Tarsus (hence the name 'Antioch on the Cydnus' which it bore for a time) granting to Jewish colonists full burgess rights. To T. belonged Athenodorus the Stoic, the teacher of Augustus, and Nestor the Platonist, the teacher of Marcellus. T. was the birthplace of St. Paul, of the physician Dioscorides, and of the Stoics Antipater and Archedemus. In the civil wars T. favored Caesar and actually changed its name to Juliopolis when Caesar visited the city. Antonius made it a free city. He summoned Cleopatra to appear before his court at T. Cleopatra, impersonating Aphrodite, sailed up the Cydnus (38 B.C.) in a gilded galley with silver-plated oars and vanquished her judge, so that scoffers told how Venus had enmeshed Bacchus. In 22 B.C. T. was made the capital of the imperial province of Cilicia, when Augustus confirmed the privileges bestowed by Antonius, and also raised T. to the dignity of a metropolis. It claimed the titles of 'First' and, subsequently, 'Neokoros' (for devotion to Caesar-worship). It was an important city during the Parthian and Persian wars. As metropolis of Cilicia, T. represented the religious interests of the Isaurians, Cappadocians, and Syrians. The native deity was Baal-Tarz (Lord of Tarsus, identified with the Greek Zeus) accompanied by a youthful god, Sardon (identified with Heracles).

The ruins of ancient Tarsus are now 15-20 ft. below the surface of the modern town, which, built of mud and stone, nestles amid magnificent gardens of semitropical trees, as the myrtle, oleander, pomegranate, fig, orange, lemon, and citron. The soil is intensely fertile, and the exports of T. comprise wheat, barley, cotton, madder, yellow berries, valonia, wax, linseed, sesame seed, colored leather, hides, and wool. The finest apples, apricots, cherries, and grapes come from the foothills of the Taurus Mountains. The alleged tomb of Paul on the outskirts of the city is more likely that of the Moslem el-Mamūn. TARTAK, tār'tak. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 35.

TARTAN, tār'tan (תַּרְתָּן, tartān, Assy. turtānu, tartānu): An Assyrian official title. In Hittite-texts, tartannutu is a field-marshal. An officer of this rank was in command of Sargon's campaign against Ashdod in 720 B.C. (Is 20 1); and with the Rab-saris and Rabshakeh, he demanded of Hezekiah the surrender of Jerusalem in 701 B.C. (II K 18 17). In authority and dignity the tartan stood next to the king himself. Several names of generals who held this rank appear in the lists of the eponyms of the empire. I. M. P.

TASKMASTER: This term is the translation of sar-mas, 'officer of the labor-gang' (Ex 1 11), i. e., a superintendent of one of the companies of men who rendered forced labor in the Egyptian corvée or levy. Such officials were set over the Israelites when they were compelled to build store-cities for the Pharaoh. They are often depicted on the Egyptian monuments armed with long rods with which they chastised those who failed to accomplish the task assigned for the day (cf. Ex 5 14). In Ex 3 7, 5 6, 10, 13, 14; Job 3 13, 'taskmaster' represents the Heb. word nāghēs, 'driver,' which is simply another name for the same class of officials. David and Solomon had similar officers who coerced the Canaanites assigned to labor upon their public works (II S 20 24; I K 4 6, 5 16 [30], 12 18 = II Ch 10 18). The Prophets use the word as a figure for a tyrannical native ruler (Is 3 7), or for a foreign oppressor (Is 9 3, 14 2, 4; Zec 9 8). L. B. P.

TATTENAI, tat'i-nai (תַּתְנַי, tatt'nay, Tatnai AV): The Persian governor of the satrapy W. of the Euphrates, circa 520 B.C., who sent to Darius I asking that the records be searched to see whether Cyrus had given permission to the Jews to rebuild their Temple (Ezr 5 3 ff.). The name is believed to have been recovered in texts on contract tablets belonging to 1st and 3d years of Darius' reign ('Ushtani, satrap of Bab. and beyond the River,' cf. Batten's note in ICC., Ezr-Neh, p. 133). E. E. N.

TAUNT, TAUNTING PROVERB. See TERMS OF BLESSING AND REPROACH.

TAVERNS (THREE), Τρεῖς ταβέρναι: Transliteration of the Latin Tres Tabernae, 'three roadside taverns,' 30 m. S. of Rome (Ac 28 15) on the Appian way. The site remains unidentified. The term tabernae rarely meant inns for shelter and entertainment of travelers, and keepers of such places were disreputable persons. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

TAX, TAXATION, TRIBUTE: In the nomadic period taxes were unknown to the Hebrews. The chieftains received voluntary presents from those who sought their protection (Gn 32 13-21, 33 10, 43 11), but they exacted no regular dues of their kinsmen. Only from aliens could tribute be taken. After the conquest of Canaan, this custom remained unchanged. The so called 'Judges' never collected taxes, but received only a special portion of the spoil of war (Jg 8 24; I S 30 26). When the Canaanites were subdued, they were compelled to render forced labor (maṣ), translated in AV and RV 'tribute' (Jos 16 10, 17 13; Jg 1 28-35). When Israel was worsted, it had to submit to forced labor or to pay tribute (euphemistically called 'a present' AV) to the victor (Gn 49 15-20; Jg 3 15-18).

In the city communities of Canaan very different conditions prevailed. Here there had long been kings who collected regular taxes (cf. the Tell-el-Amarna letters and the letters discovered by Sellin at Ta'anach). With the adoption of Canaanite civilization and the establishment of the monarchy, taxation became a necessary part of the Israelitic system of government. I S 10 27 shows that Saul received regular dues called 'presents' (cf. II Ch 17 5), and in I S 17 25 he promises the man who will kill Goliath that his family shall be 'free,' i.e., exempt from taxes. The 'covenant' that David made with the elders of Israel (II S 5 3) doubtless included provision for his support, and the census (II S ch. 24) may have been for purposes of taxation. According to I S 8 15-17, the taxes consisted of a tenth of the crops and of the increase of the herds. Under Solomon an elaborate system was devised for collecting these revenues (I K 4 7-19). There were also royal monopolies and tariffs on imported goods (I K 10 15, 28). Powerful kings, such as David and Solomon, received in addition the 'presents' of conquered nations (II S 8 10-12; I K 4 21, 10 25; II Ch 17 11).

Under Solomon Israel experienced the hardship of the levy, maṣ (I K 5 13 ff.), i.e., forced labor. See SOLOMON, § 3.

Under the later kings, who acquired no income from trade or from foreign sources, taxes and other exactions became exceedingly burdensome (I S 8 11-13). Their collection was farmed out to officials who cruelly oppressed the people (Am 2 3, 5 11; Is 3 14 f.; Mic 3 1-3). At the time of the Syrian supremacy large sums of money had to be sent as 'presents' to Damascus (I K 15 18 f., 20 1-6). Then came the Assyrian, the Egyptian, and the Babylonian exactions, which lasted until the fall of Jerusalem (II K 15 19 f., 16 8, 17 4, 18 31, 23 33-35, 24 1).

In the Persian period we read of mindāh, 'tribute' (=Assyr. mandatu, 'present'), a special forced contribution, blō, 'custom' (=Assyr. bēltu), 'tribute,' and hālāk, 'toll' or 'tariff' (Ezr 4 13, 20, 7 24). There was also a tax of 40 shekels a day imposed on the community by the governor (Neh 5 15), besides the presents that had to be brought him (Mal 1 8). The result was extreme poverty in the community (Neh 5 4 f.).

In the Greek period there was a poll-tax, an exaction of one-third of the grain and one-half of the fruit, a tax on salt, and a special tax to furnish new crowns to the monarch (I Mac 1 29, 10 28 f., 11 34 f.). The Ptolemies farmed out the revenues to the highest bidders (Josephus, Ant. XII, 4 4). The Seleucids collected them by royal officials (I Mac 1 29).

Under Roman rule Judea had to pay a regular tribute, but the collecting was left in the hands of the native rulers, who followed the ancient methods (Josephus, Ant. XIV, 10 5 f.; XV, 9 1). When subsequently, after the death of Herod, the government was administered by procurators, the Roman system of taxation was introduced. The census or poll-tax (Gr. ἀπογραφή, Lk 2 2, 'taxing' AV, 'enrolment' RV; or κῆνος [=Lat. census], Mt 17 25, 22 17-19; Mk 12 14, 'tribute' EV) was gathered by Roman officials. The more troublesome tolls and duties (Gr. τέλος, whence τελώνιον, Mt 9 9; Mk 2 14; Lk 5 27, receipt of custom AV, place of toll RV) were farmed out to the highest bidders (see PUBLICAN). On the religious dues, see PRIESTHOOD, §§ 3, 4, 9 (c); SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS; and TITHE.

TEACH, TEACHER, TEACHING: In the O T, 'teaching' as an educational term means the process of training the young in the knowledge of God and the principles of a wise and virtuous life. Teaching simply for the sake of imparting information on all sorts of subjects is unknown. Making children acquainted with the will of God is, however, recognized as an important parental duty (Pr 4 4), the performance of which gives rise, first to religious and later, to comprehensive education (see EDUCATION; and WISDOM, WISE MEN). But the parent is not the only teacher. He must himself be taught by the representative of J' who is commissioned to give his people the Torah. The prophets, tho not called by the name (the word mōreh, 'teacher,' occurs only in Hab 2 18), claim a right to be listened to as the conveyors and exponents of J's wishes concerning conduct (cf. Hos 4 6, 8 1; Am 2 4; Mic 4 2; Is 1 10, 2 3, etc.). But that priests also claimed and exercised the privilege of teaching is evident from the rebuke administered to them by Micah (3 11) because they 'teach for hire.' After the Exile, teaching as a function passed into the hands of the scribes; since, from the nature of their professional work as students of the Law, they were first looked up to as competent expounders of its meaning and then took upon themselves the work of teaching it. Accordingly, they were given the title 'rabbi,' i.e., 'great one.'

In the N T the teacher was he who could give clear solutions of puzzling problems in the sphere of religious thought. Jesus was recognized as able to do this and was called 'teacher' (διδάσκαλος, Jn 3 2; Mk 12 14); but as Christianity raised a class of questions peculiar to itself, it also called forth leaders who could answer them and grouped these leaders under the name of teachers (Ac 13 1; I Co 12 28; Ro 12 6-8; Eph 4 11; here teachers are placed side by side with apostles and prophets). See also CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 6; and, in general, EDUCATION.

At first, teaching was probably only a function, but in the Church of the 2d cent. it came to be vested in an office clearly defined and recognized as such (Did. 13 2, 15 1-2; Barn. 1 8; Ign. Eph. 3 1; Herm. Mand. IV, 3 1). The Teaching of the Twelve was a manual designed to be used by such official teachers in the Church. A. C. Z.

TEBAH, tī'ba (תְּבַח, tebhah): A clan descended from Nahor (Gn 22 24). The name seems to appear as that of an Aramean town (II S 8 8, Betah; cf. I Ch 18 8, Tibhath), taken by David from Hadarezer, King of Aram-zobah (q.v.). Site unknown.

TEBALIAH, teb'ā-loi'ā (תֵּבַלְיָהּ, tebalyāhū), 'J' hath purified' (?): The son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite (I Ch 26 11).

TEBETH, tī'bēth (תְּבֵת, tebhēth): The tenth month of the Jewish year. See TIME, § 3.

TEHAPHNEHES, ti-haf'm-hīz. See TAHPAN-HES.

TEHINNAH, ti-hin'ā (תִּינָח, tehināh), 'supplication': An individual (or clan?) of Judah, the 'father' of the city of Nahash (cf. RVmg), named as one of 'the men of Recah' (I Ch 4 12). See RECAH.

TEIL TREE, til. See PALESTINE, § 21; and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 37.

TEKEL, tī'kel. See MENE, MENE, etc.

TEKOA, te-kō'a (תְּקוֹעַ, teqōa' [h]); spelled Tekoah in II S 14 2, 4, 9 AV, and I Mac 9 33 RV: The name of a town of Judah (I Ch 4 5; cf. the LXX. of Jos 15 60), in the wilderness of Tekoa (II Ch 20 20). The town is identified with the ruins of modern Tekā'a, which is about 5 m. S. of Bethlehem. Map II, F 2. It is located on a hill whose altitude is about 2,700 ft. above sea-level, from which is obtained a fine view of Bethlehem, the Mount of Olives, the valley of the Jordan, the mountains of Moab, and the N. end of the Dead Sea. David as a shepherd-boy, and in his exile wanderings, must have become thoroughly familiar with all the region round about. Ira, the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite, dwelt here (II S 23 26); also the prophet Amos (Am 1 1). It was here that the 'wise woman' lived whom Joab employed to persuade David to bring home his banished son Absalom (II S 14 2 ff.). Rehoboam fortified T. (II Ch 11 6). It was reinhabited after the Exile, and its citizens assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding Jerusalem's walls (Neh 3 5, 27). Simon and Jonathan fled to the Wilderness of T. from before Bacchides (I Mac 9 33). Jerome speaks of it as abounding in shepherds with their flocks. The Talmud praises its oil, and an Arab geographer its honey. To-day the ruins of the former city cover a space of four or five acres.

TEL-ABIB, tel'ē'bīb (תֵּל אֲבִיב, tel 'ābhāb), 'hill of ears of grain': A place in Babylonia, on the Chebar (q.v.), where dwelt a colony of exiled Jews (Ezk 3 15). It was common in Babylonia to call a mound where a town had once existed a tel-abūbi, 'mound of the Flood,' i.e., ruined by the Flood. The Hebrews probably simply changed the pronunciation of the name of one of such mounds when they came to occupy it. E. E. N.

TELAH, tī'la (תֵּלָה, telah): A clan of Ephraim (I Ch 7 25).

TELAIM, ti-lē'im (תֵּלַיִם, telā'im): A town where Saul mustered his army when he made war on Amalek (I S 15 4). It was in the S. of Judah, probably the Telem (q.v.) of Jos 15 24. Wellhausen and Driver, ad loc., read תֵּלַיִם (telā'im); and correct in I S 27 8 תֵּלַיִם to תֵּלַיִם ('from of old' to 'from Telam'; cf. LXX. Γελάμ). Wellhausen would also read in I S 15 7 'Telam' for 'Havilah.' C. S. T.

TELASSAR, ti-las'ar (תֵּלַסָר, telā'sār, II K 19 12, Thelasar AV; תֵּלַסָר, telassār, Is 37 12): The name of an Assyrian province, in which the children of Eden (q.v.) dwelt. Bīt-Adini (Eden) was on both banks of the Middle Euphrates, and accordingly, T. is possibly the Til-ašuri ('hill of Assur'), near Mittani, mentioned in an inscription of Esarhaddon.

C. S. T.

TELEM, tī'lem (תֵּלֵם, telem): I. A gatekeeper who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 24). II. A town in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 24) which is not yet identified. See TELAIM. C. S. T.

TEL-HARSHA, tel'-har'shā (תֵּל חַרְשָׁה, telharshā), 'hill of the forest' (or 'hill in the mountain,' if the name be Babylonian): The home of a colony of exiles (Ezr 2 59, T.-Harsa AV; Neh 7 61, T.-Harsesha AV), in Babylonia. E. E. N.

TEL-MELAH, tel'mī'la (תֵּל מֵלַח, tel melah), 'hill of salt,' or, if the name be Babylonian, perhaps 'hill of sailors': The home of a colony of Jewish exiles (Ezr 2 59; Neh 7 61) in Babylonia. E. E. N.

TEMA, tī'mā (תֵּמָה, tēmā), 'on the right,' i.e., 'south': An Arabian trading-tribe and a locality (Job 6 19; Is 21 14; Jer 25 23), counted as a 'son' of Ishmael (Gn 25 15; I Ch 1 30). It is frequently mentioned in the Assyrian and the Babylonian inscriptions, and a tablet of the fifth year of Nabonidus speaks of fifty talents of silver given to a man for a donkey and flour to make the journey to Temā (see R. P. Dougherty, AJS, xlii, 1922, pp. 305 sq.). An important Aramaic inscription of the 5th cent. B.C. also comes from this place (see G. A. Cooke, North Semitic Inscriptions, pp. 195 sq.). The locality is now known as Teimā, a fertile oasis and prosperous village about 200 m. SE. of Akabā. It was an important place on the ancient caravan-route between N. and S. Arabia. On the edge of the oasis are famous salt-beds. Ruins of a city wall have been found, and old Aramaic inscriptions which prove Teimā to have been the seat of an ancient civilization. See Dougherty, Arabia Deserta, I, 284-300, with plan.

TEMAH, ti'mā (תִּמְאָה, tēmāh): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 53, Thamah AV; Neh 7 55, Tamah AV). L. G. L.—L. B. P.

TEMAN, ti'mān (תִּמְנָה, tēmān), 'which is on the right hand': An important district, apparently in the N. part of Edom (Ezk 25 13). Esau's grandson was called Teman (Gn 36 11). In Am 1 12 and Hab 3 3 T. seems to be used for all Edom, and one of the early kings of Edom was from T. (Gn 36 34). Job's friend Eliphaz was a Temanite, i.e., one of the district or tribe of Teman (Job 2 11). The Temanites were renowned for their wisdom (Jer 49 7). Eusebius (Onom. 158.7) speaks of a town, also, Teman, 15 Roman miles (Jerome says 5) from Petra, having a garrison.

G. L. R.

TEMANITE, ti'mān-ait. See TEMAN.

TEMENI, tem'i-nai or ti'm-nai (תִּמְנִי, tēmēnī): One of the sons of Asshur (I Ch 4 6).

TEMPER: This term renders (1) bālāl, to 'mix,' 'mingle.' It is the technical term for mixing oil with cakes or flour (Ex 29 2; and often in P). (2) rāṣas, to 'moisten' flour with oil, like (1) (Ezk 46 14). (3) mālāḥ, denom. vb., Pu'al ptcl., to 'season' (Ex 30 35). (4) συγχεράνωμι, to 'commingle,' well rendered in I Co 12 24 'temper,' i.e., to combine into an organic structure.

C. S. T.

TEMPEST: This term is used often in figures drawn from the rain- and hard wind-storms of Palestine to express destructive force. It renders (1) zerem, 'rain-' or 'hail-storm,' to typify the Assyr. invasion (Is 28 2); or the destruction of the Assyrians (Is 30 30); or disaster in general (Is 32 2). (2) šūpāhā, 'storm-wind' (Job 27 20; cf. the same fig. in 21 18). (3) šā'ar, vb. 'storm-tossed,' fig. of Jerusalem (Is 54 11); šā'ar, 'tempest,' noun (= sa'ar Is 28 2, 'flood' AV); fig. of the passion of men (Ps 55 8 [9]); of the wrath of J' (Jer 23 19, 25 32, 30 23, 'whirlwind' AV); as the instrument of J' in punishment (Ps 83 15 [16]; cf. Am 1 14; Jon 1 4, 12). (4) š'ārāh (= se'ārāh Job 9 17), 'tempest,' 'storm-wind,' fig. of the wrath of J' (Is 29 6; cf. Nah 1 3). (5) rūāḥ, 'wind' (Ps 11 6 RV). (6) θύελλα, 'tempest' (He 12 18). (7) λαίλαψ, 'wind- and rain-storm' (II P 2 17). (8) σεισμός, 'earthquake,' 'shaking' (Mt 8 24). (9) χειμώνας, 'rainy weather' (winter) (Ac 27 20). (10) χειμῶνισμός (Ac 27 18, 'storm' RV). (11) τυφωνικός, 'like a whirlwind' (Ac 27 14). Cf. PALESTINE, §§ 17-19.

C. S. T.

TEMPLE: 1. Terms Used. In the O T 'temple' is the rendering of hēkhāl (cf. the Accadian egal, 'great house,' 'palace'), and once (II Ch 35 20) of bayith, 'house' (cf. also II K 11 10 f.; I Ch 6 10, 10 10, and II Ch 23 10). In the N T the word renders τερόν, 'sacred enclosure,' and ναός, 'the sanctuary building' (in AV also οἶκος, 'house,' Lk 11 51, 'sanctuary' RV, 'house' RVmg.). The fundamental conception of the temple suggested by the foregoing terminology is not that of a place convenient for worship, but that of a dwelling-place for God, where, accordingly, He could be found and approached. Worship itself might be offered wherever God had an altar. Temples as abiding-places of the gods were very common among the Semitic and other ancient peoples and lands (e.g., Assyria, Babylonia, Phoenicia, Egypt). They often called for large outlay of means and energy in their construction.

2. Temples Before David's Time. Among the Hebrews, it was in comparatively later days that the thought of erecting a temple to J' occurred. The Ark of J' (the emblem of His presence among His people) was kept under a tent ('Tabernacle' [q.v.]) down to the reign of David (II S 6 17; I K 1 30, 2 28-30), and according to II S 7 8, this had been the condition of things ever since the days of Moses. And yet from I S 1 9, 3 3 (cf. Jer 7 14), it is to be inferred that there must have been some sort of permanent structure at Shiloh (a stone temple, according to Smend) dedicated to J'. There may also have been a temple at Nob (I S ch. 21), tho not named explicitly. 'Micah had a house of gods' for his ephod (Jg 17 5, 'God' mg.). But of this and other sacred buildings, such as the 'house of Elberith' at Shechem (Jg 9 46), little, if anything, is known. They were remnants of Canaanite cults, and on a par with the house of Dagon at Gaza (Jg 16 23). The word 'temple' is in the main applied to three actual successive structures erected on the same spot in Jerusalem and dedicated to J'. In addition to these, an ideal temple is described by Ezekiel. The actual temples are those of Solomon, Zerubbabel (the Second Temple), and Herod.

I. THE TEMPLE OF SOLOMON.

3. Site of the Temple. The site of this structure was the eastern hill in Jerusalem called Zion or Moriah (the identification of Zion with the hill W. of the Tyropæon Valley is purely traditional and lacks historical support). The choice of this site was undoubtedly determined by sacred associations traceable back to a very ancient date. At all events, the place was the scene of a theophany (II S 24 16), while it was used as a threshing-floor by Araunah the Jebusite. See JERUSALEM, (Map).

4. Group of Associated Buildings. But Zion in the days of David and Solomon was not so much the sacred as it was the royal hill. On its leveled summit was the enclosure in which Solomon erected a group of buildings intended for use by himself and his household. Some of these were designed for administrative purposes, but others were to be used simply as the residence of the king and his harem. The group included the royal palace and harem, the Porch of Pillars and the Throne Porch (Solomon's Porch), and the House of the Forest of Lebanon (see page 512). These were unified and regarded as a complex, but this fact does not warrant the statement occasionally made, that the Temple of Solomon was a chapel royal, designed for the private use of the king and his household. See also JERUSALEM, §§ 25-30.

Plan of Royal Buildings, after Stade.

5. David's Plan and Preparations. The idea of erecting a temple in Jerusalem is traced to David; and it is in harmony with what is otherwise known of the mind of this king. For he certainly saw deeply enough into the true character and mission of the people over whom he was called to rule to realize that only through the cultivation and full development of the worship of J" could Israel accomplish the work assigned it by Providence. But for reasons variously given (II S 7 5 f.; cf. I Ch 17 6), David did not put his idea into execution. What he did toward this end was to accumulate a large mass of material.

6. The Enclosure and its Gates. The Plan of the Temple of Solomon. The Temple area, strictly so called, was enclosed by a wall made of three layers of stone, on which a layer of cedar planks was laid in the form of a gable. The floor of the court was paved. The approach to it was through several gates, i.e.: (1) the upper gate (II K 15 35), said to have been built by Jotham (II Ch 27 3); (2) the Benjamin gate (Jer 20 2, 37 13, 38 7); (3) the King's gate (I Ch 9 18), to the E., and the New gate, to the S. (Jer 26 10, 36 10). In addition, mention is made of the Shallecheth gate (RVmg. 'Casting forth') on the W. side of the court (I Ch 26 16). But whether it opened into the Temple court or into that of the palace is uncertain. It is supposed to have been connected with a causeway leading from the Tyropæon Valley to the Temple court (identified with Wilson's Arch), but this can not be positively asserted. Neither can the meaning of the name (shallecheth, 'casting out') be literally pressed, making it the avenue for getting rid of the refuse from the Temple. For this purpose other provisions were made on the opposite side of the grounds.

7. Form and Dimensions. Ground-Plan. The Temple structure was in the form of a rectangle, with the following dimensions: length, 60 cu., about 104 ft. if the 'sacred cubit' of 21 in. is meant; (but cf. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 2) breadth, 22 cu.; height, 30 cu. The building faced the E., its length extending from E. to W. Whether these measurements represent the inner or outer dimensions is a question of minor importance, but the probable answer is in favor of the former alternative. See cut of ground-plan and plan of the Temple of Amon at Thebes (next page), for purposes of comparison.

8. Sub-divisions. The inner space of the building was divided into two parts, to which a third is sometimes added by reckoning the porch of the Temple as an integral portion of it. The two parts were respectively called the Holy Place (hēkhāl) or Sanctuary, and the Holy of Holies or Most Holy Place (dēbhār, Oracle, lit. the 'innermost' or 'rear'). Of these, the Holy Place was 40 cu. in length (from E. to W.) and 20 cu. in breadth (from N. to S.). The Most Holy Place was 20 cu. in each direction (a perfect cube). This leaves a space in the roof of 20×20×10 cu. unaccounted for. It may have been left entirely unused or reserved for storage purposes. The porch or vestibule was 10 cu. in breadth, and its length was the same as that of the breadth of the main building (20 cu.). The statement in II Ch 3 4 that the height of the porch was 120 cu. is evidently based upon a textual corruption. The description in I K ch. 6, without being explicit, leaves the impression that the height of the porch was the same as that of the rest of the building, viz., 30 cu.

9. Construction. Of the construction of the house very few details are given. The walls were massive but scarcely as thick as the 6 cu. allowed in Ezekiel's ideal temple. The roof was flat with possibly the customary parapet (coping?) of Oriental house roofs. It is conjectured from the nature of the case that the roof must have been supported by pillars within, which, of course, could be so arranged as not to mar but rather to add to the beauty of the structure. I K 10 12 may possibly refer to this feature. The floor of marble slabs was covered with boards of fir (I K 6 15, perhaps more correctly cypress so AVmg.).

10. Materials. The material of the walls was stone, which was hewn and prepared in the quarry, so that while the structure was being erected no sound of ax, or hammer, or tool of iron, was heard (II K 7 6). The walls, however, were wainscoted with cedar wood. The doors were made of solid olive wood, each consisting of two folding leaves. They were decorated with carvings of cherubim, palm-trees, and open flowers, and overlaid with gold.

11. The 'Chambers Round About.' The main building was surrounded on all sides except the E. by a series of so called 'chambers.' These were arranged in three stories. One peculiarity in their construction was that in the lowest story their width was 5 cu., in the next 6, and in the third 7, this result being secured by narrowing the thickness of the Temple wall with each story. As far as the wall was concerned, this narrowing would be of the nature of a rebatement (I K 6:6 RV); accordingly the beams of cedar wood on which the floors and roofs of these chambers rested were not built in the Temple wall, but placed on the rebatement, thus preserving the sanctity of the sacred building (see illus., front elevation). The number of the chambers is not given in the account of I Kings; but on the ground of Ezk 41:6, they have been supposed to be thirty. These chambers rose to a height of not more than 20 cu. It was possible to cut windows in the wall over them for the purpose of admitting some light into the interior of the sacred court. The Oracle, however, was totally devoid of windows and must have been lighted, if at all, altogether artificially.

made of brass 20 cu. square and 10 cu. high, the work of the artist Hiram Abi (so Heb. cf. II Ch 2:13 RVmg.). Its being made of brass has been regarded a violation of Ex 20:24 f., tho Keil held that the brass was simply a shell or cover under which an altar of earth and unhewn stones existed. A more probable explanation is that such an elaborate metallic altar was due to the influence of the more luxurious religious practices of surrounding peoples (see ALTAR, § 2).

13. The Brazen Sea. Another object of prominence in the court was the 'brazen sea' (II K 25:13; I Ch 18:8), called also the molten sea (I K 7:23; II Ch 4:

2). This was a large basin of brass or bronze, and stood between the porch and the altar, 'on the right side of the house, eastward, toward the south' (I K 7:39), i.e., south of the line between the house and the altar of burnt offering. Its dimensions are given as 5 cu. in height and 10 in diameter. The thickness of the basin was a 'handbreadth' and its shape in general that of a lily. Its capacity was 2,000 baths (q.v.). If the shape of the basin were that of a hemisphere, a difficulty would arise, since

12. Furniture: The Brazen Altar. In the outer or general court of the Temple the most striking object was the altar of burnt offering (brazen altar, I K 8:64; cf. II K 16:10). This is described in II Ch 4:1 as a hemisphere of the dimensions given could not contain much more than one-half of the quantity mentioned, whereas if the shape of the basin were more nearly that of a cylinder, it might contain three-fourths of the quantity. Accordingly, it is best to assume that the measurements given are those of the rim and possibly the base, but that the middle portion of the vessel bulged out considerably. The middle of the exterior of the basin was decorated with two rows of knobs (cocolocynths), cast when the vessel was cast, and carved into perfect form afterward (I K 7 24). The brazen sea was made to rest on twelve oxen, divided into four groups of three each, and each group so placed as to face one of the cardinal points of the compass. How the water was brought into it, or caused to flow out of it, is not specified. As to the latter, the interesting conjecture has been made that it issued out of the mouths of the oxen. The purpose of the vessel was, according to II Ch 4 6, to furnish water for the priests in their ablutions preparatory to the performance of their service. According to II K 16 17, Ahaz, when in need of funds, used the oxen in payment of tribute, and laid the brazen sea on a plain stone pavement. Later (II K 25 13; Jer 52 17, 20), the Babylonians broke up the basin itself and carried the brass to Babylon.

14. The Pillars Jachin and Boaz.

Immediately before the porch stood the two hollow bronze pillars, called respectively Jachin and Boaz (I K 7 21; II Ch 3 17; Jer 52 21, 22). According to some authorities, these were not connected with the porch, but according to others, they served to support its roof. The first of them stood to the right or N. side of the entrance, and the second, to the left (see illus., front elevation). The height of each was 18 cu., and the circumference 12 cu. Their tops or capitals (chapters AV) were decorated with carved work (checker-work, lily work) and also with wreaths of chainwork (I K 7 17, 19). These were the work of Hiram, the Phenician artist. Those who hold that the pillars supported the roof of the porch allege that their existence is sufficiently accounted for by that fact, but according to those who believe that they were detached, their function was simply ornamental. Their names (Boaz, 'strength,' and Jachin, 'firmness,' lit. 'setting right') certainly evince their symbolical character, tho probably they were set up primarily as ornaments. The 'pillar' had for long been a common adjunct of Phenician sanctuaries (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 29), and Solomon's Phenician architects planned for their presence in connection with the Temple as a matter of course. Their symbolical significance easily developed afterward. The accompanying cut of a clay model of a Phenician temple is instructive in this respect. The ornamental capitals of the pillars Boaz and Jachin were in the form of bows, covered with 400 pomegranates, which were attached to network and arranged in two rows.

15. The Ten Bases and Lavers. Other works of Hiram are mentioned, as the ten lavers, shovels and basins, and ten bases on which the lavers rested. Just what these bases and lavers were has been carefully worked out by Nowack (Heb. Arch. 1894) on the ground of a comparison with similar articles used in extra-Biblical Semitic worship. The bases, m'khōnōth, were of very complex construction, the lower portion of each being a framework 4 cu. square and 3 cu. high, fastened at the corners by under-setters, i.e., square pillars whose lower ends projected below the frame. To these projections were attached axles and wheels, thus making the whole a vehicle. The upper part was of the nature of a pedestal in the form of a ring or narrow cylinder raised one-half cu. above the base, and supported by stays, sloping inward. Into this was fitted the laver or basin with a diameter of 4 cu. and capacity of forty baths. The borders, or framework (ledges), and stays were ornamented with embossed figures of lions, oxen, cherubim, and wreath-work. See illustration on page 895.

Miniature Clay Model of a Phenician Temple at Idalion in Cyprus.

Before the entrance are two isolated pillars with capitals in the form of a lotus flower. In the doorway is a bird with a woman's head. The pillars are significant in connection with the mention of the two pillars of Solomon's Temple, which was built by Phenician workmen.

In the Holy Place the principal item of furniture was a table (or a series of ten tables) of showbread. This was made in the form of an altar. Just where it was placed is not stated. A golden altar is also mentioned (I K 7 48), sometimes supposed to be the altar of incense. But as no such feature appears in the description of Ezekiel's Temple, and as in general the use of incense in the worship of J' can not be traced earlier than the exilic period, Stade (GVI, I, 330) and others have identified the golden altar with the table of the showbread. Toward the wall of the Holy Place there were ten lamp-stands (candlesticks), five on each side, together with their lamps.

16. Minor Pieces of Furniture. The following smaller articles must have had a place in some part of the hēkhāl or in some other portion of the building, possibly in the 'chambers round about': (1) Tongs, or snuffers, malqāḥayim, and m'zamm'm'vōth, to be used in trimming the candle-sticks (I K 7 50; II K 12 14, etc.). (2) Censers and firepans or snuff dishes (mahtōth) for coals or for the purpose of carrying off burned portions of wicks (Ex 27 3, 37 23; Nu 4 9; I K

7 50). (3) Shovels (yā'im), to be used in removing the ashes from the altar (I K 7 40, 45; II K 25 14). (4) Spoons (kappōth), probably shallow bowls, mentioned along with the other articles of the furniture of the table of show-bread (Ex 25 29; I K 7 50). (5) Flagons (q'sāwōth), in which the wine of libations was kept (Ex 37 16) and bowls (m'nagqiyōth) for the pouring out of the same wine. (6) Flesh-hooks (mizlāghōth, I Ch 28 17), two- or three-pronged forks used for stirring and removing the contents of boiling pots (I S 2 13).

17. Partition or Veil. Between the hēkhāl and the d'bhār stood a wall of cedar wood (I K 6 16) with a door of olive wood inserted. According to II Ch 3 14 (cf. also Mt 27 51), there was a curtain or veil also before this partition. In the d'bhār the only object was the Ark of the Covenant (I K 8 8), overshadowed by two gigantic figures of cherubim, 10 cu. high, each with outstretched wings, so that their tips touched in the center over the Mercy-seat, the free wings extending to the side-walls on each side. The Ark was placed in the middle, yet so that the handles by which it was borne were visible. Within the ark were the two Stone Tables of the Law. It is not likely that the brazen serpent was kept in the d'bhār, or in the Temple. It must be admitted, however, as possible that this was the case, as it was destroyed during Hezekiah's reformation (II K 18 4).

II. THE TEMPLE OF EZEKIEL.

18. Ezekiel's Temple an Ideal Model. In Ezk 40 1-43 27 there is a description of a temple which, on the surface of it, was designed to furnish an ideal. It is not likely that the prophet believed in its exact reproduction in the restored Jerusalem. In its essential features this ideal is patterned after the Temple of Solomon, and has often been used as legitimate material for the reconstruction of the plan of the older building.

19. Distinctive Features of Ezekiel's Temple. The chief characteristic in Ezekiel's ideal is symmetry. This structure with its appurtenances was to be located on a site 500 cu. square, and walled about (Ezk 40 5-27). It was to be provided with three gates (A, in the ground-plan), each lengthened out so as to include lodges (little chambers AV) on the side, ending in a porch (a) into a gateway 50 cu. in length. Each gateway was to have arches ('colonnade' RVmg., 40 16). These gates were to be located in the middle of each one of the N., E., and S. walls of the enclosure. There was to be no gate on the W. side. As the whole area of the court was to be raised above the surrounding territory, each gate was to be approached by a flight of steps. Around the outer wall, which was 6 cu. high and 6 cu. in thickness, and opened into the court, there were to be chambers or cells (1, 2, 3, etc.) for the keeping of the utensils and provisions (40 17 ff.). These were to serve also as priestly residences. The four corners were to be occupied by four small courts separated by partitions in which would be located kitchens (D) for cooking the sacrificial meals (40 21-24, 38-40).

20. Temple Court and Furniture. In this great outer court, or rather upon it, Ezekiel's plan placed an inner raised court (v, w, x, y) (40 28-37), approached, like the outer one, by means of three gates (E) with gateways and steps. The steps, however, were in this case eight instead of seven. The chief structure to stand in this inner court was the great altar (L), in the exact center of the area (a, b, c, d) bounded by the three inner gates and the main Temple building toward the W. The dimensions of this area were exactly 100 cu. square (40 47). Near the N. and S. gates of the inner court there were cells (ishkhōth) or chambers (J) designed for use by the priests in the performance of sacrifices (40 44-46). In the vestibule of the E. inner gate there were four tables (S), on which the sin- and trespass-offerings were slain, and in the space to the N. and S. of this same gateway four (or eight) others of hewn stone (H), some of which were designed for the killing of the sacrificial victims and some for the preparation of the carcasses for sacrifice (40 38-42). In the portions of the inner court, N. and S. of the Temple building (K), were rows or galleries of chambers (three-storied) for the exclusive use of the priests as the place where they were to eat 'the most holy things' (42 1-14). In the space behind the house (K) there was also a building (41 15). The area just next to the house (b, b', c', c) was left unoccupied as a holy 'separate' place (41 12, etc.). The altar was in the form of four platforms, the lowest (the 'base,' or bottom) a square of 18 cu. but only 1½ cu. high, and bordered by an edge of a span in width. The next, the lower ledge (43 14, settle AV), was a square of 16 cu., but 2 cu. high. The third was 14 cu. square and 4 cu. high, and the fourth, called Ariel (43 15, 'altar-hearth' RVmg.), 12 cu. square and 4 cu. high. The corners of this altar-hearth were adorned with four horns each 1 cu. in length (see also ALTAR, § 2).

21. The Temple Building. The central structure (40 48-41 26) consisted of a porch 20 cu. by 12 ('eleven' 40 49 should be 'twelve'), and the two main inner chambers (a) the Holy Place, 40 cu. by 20, and (b) the Most Holy Place, 20 cu. by 20, the whole building being built on a raised platform (41 s) and reached by a series of ten steps in front (e) of the porch. Its walls were 6 cu. in thickness, and it was surrounded by 30 (LXX. 33) chambers. Access to these chambers was from without through the N. and S. sides. The arrangement admitted of passageways (41 7) from the lower to the upper stories. The

22. The Temple Built by Zerubbabel. The Temple erected under the supervision of Zerubbabel, with the encouragement of Haggai and Zechariah, commonly known as the Second Temple, was intended to restore that which had been destroyed by the Babylonians at the beginning of the Exile. The interest of Cyrus, King of Persia, was enlisted in the case, and his approval secured for the plan;

GROUND-PLAN OF THE TEMPLE OF EZEKIEL'S VISION.

(The side of each square=50 cubits).

governing idea of Ezekiel's Temple was the absolute separation of the sacred from the profane. No secular building should go upon the holy area, which was to be protected on all sides by the wall and to have no contact with any wall of the city. Its two courts (Solomon's Temple had but one) provided against the mingling of the laity and the priesthood.

also a decree ordering that the vessels taken by Nebuchadrezzar from Solomon's Temple should be returned; and that a tax should be levied on the provinces W. of the Euphrates to meet the expenses of the Jews who might return to their own country (Ezr 1 7 ff., 5 1 ff., 6 5). Tho the altar of burnt offering was set up soon after the returned exiles had arrived at Jerusalem the work of rebuilding did not take place before 521 B.C. (the second year of Darius), under the stimulus of the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, Zerubbabel and the priest Jeshua taking the leadership. See HAGGAI.

23. Plan of the Building. In its general lines the Second Temple was undoubtedly patterned after the First. The fact that Cyrus prescribed that its dimensions might be 60 cu. in height and breadth must be taken as permission which was not used to the full. The court was divided into two parts, an inner for priests only, and, separated from this by a returned exiles (Hag 2 3); but it served the purpose of consolidating the Levitical ceremonial. In the days of the Maccabean persecution, the Syrian king, Antiochus Epiphanes (168-165 B.C.), placed an altar to Jupiter Olympius in it and perpetrated various other acts of sacrilege; but at his downfall it was repaired and rededicated, of which event the Feast of Dedication (1 Mace 4 36-60 cf. Jn 10 22) was the commemoration. With other minor embellishments and additions, the Temple continued to the days of the Romans (from 63 B.C. on), who plundered but did no damage to the building.

INSCRIPTION ON A WARNING TABLET NOTIFYING GENTILES NOT TO ENTER THE COURT OF ISRAEL.

The inscription reads: Μηθένα ἀλλογενῇ εἰσπορεύεσθαι ἐντὸς τοῦ περὶ τὸ ἱερὸν τρυφάκτου καὶ περιβόλου. ὅς δ' ἂν ληφθῇ ἑαυτῷ αἴτιος ἔσται διὰ τὸ ἐξακολουθεῖν θάνατον.

Translation: Let no alien enter within the balustrade and embankment about the sanctuary. Whoever is caught makes himself responsible for his death which will follow.

railing of wood (Jos. Ant. XIII, 13 5), an outer court. In the main, the differences between Zerubbabel's Temple and that of Solomon center about the furniture. In the former, an altar of burnt offering made of unhewn stone took the place of the brazen altar in Solomon's Temple. In the hēkhāl, there was but one candlestick (with seven lamps, cf. § 15 above), one table of showbread, also a golden altar of incense and minor vessels. It has been alleged that the walls of the building were overlaid with gold, but this does not seem probable. The dōhār was altogether empty, as the Ark of the Covenant was not rescued from the catastrophe of the Exile.

24. Later History of the Second Temple. The contrast between the magnificence of Solomon's Temple and the comparative poverty of the Second occasioned some sadness on the part of the older

IV. THE TEMPLE OF HEROD.

25. Relation to the Second Temple. The connection between the Temple of Zerubbabel and that of Herod was meant to be one of identity. In deference to the Jews, who, when Herod announced his intention to rebuild the Temple (Jos. Ant. XV, 11; BJ, V, 5), feared that if the old building were demolished a new one might not be erected very soon, Herod devised the reconstruction in such a way that it appeared to be at its different stages a simple process of repairing portions of the old, the services of worship being meanwhile uninterrupted. When the work was completed, however, it was an entirely different structure throughout. It was begun in 19 B.C. and tho sufficiently completed to have been dedicated with a great celebration in eight (or possibly nine and one-half years, i.e., in 10 or 12

B.C. (cf. Jos., Ant. XV. 11 5-6) it was not entirely finished until between 62 and 64 A.D., under the procuratorship of Albinus. At the time of Jesus, it was said to have been forty-six years in building (Jn 2 20), and was still unfinished (Edersheim, The Temple and Its Services in the Time of Christ).

26. General Features. The Temple of Herod was characterized by unparalleled external splendor. Being anxious to impart an air of glory to his reign, and to vindicate his place as the champion of all that was distinctively national, and still further to please the Jews by giving them a sanctuary of which they might be proud, Herod spared no expense in adorning the Temple with all manner of architectural lavishment. The plan was in its essentials the same as that of its predecessors, and yet in particulars differences were introduced. The Temple area was enlarged so as to cover the whole surface of the hill Zion (Moriah, now Haram esh-Sherif). This space, a terraced platform, was made by first enclosing the whole by a wall to the NW. corner, where a part of the area was broken into by the castle of Antonia, the old tower of Baris, which stood on a rock platform higher than the level of the Temple Hill and lower than that of the adjoining suburbs of the city. The tower was built as a fortress by John Hyrcanus II, but enlarged, strengthened, beautified, and transformed into a palace by Herod Himself, who also renamed it Antonia after his patron Mark Antony.

27. The Court of the Gentiles. A covered colonnade, usually called Porch (portico, cloister), ran around the inner portion of the wall of the enclosure. The south division of this series of porticoes was especially known as the Royal Porch, and was the most elaborate and imposing. It consisted of 162 gigantic columns arranged in four rows. This naturally gave three corridors, the middle one of which was wider and higher than those on each side. Somewhere along the eastern portico, and on that portion of the area which was artificially built overlooking the Kedron Valley, was a section of the colonnade known as Solomon's Porch (Jn 10 23; Ac 3 11, 5 12), upon the basis of a belief that it had been erected by Solomon and had escaped the various vicissitudes of the city and the sanctuary from Solomon's day. But the name may have been given to it upon other grounds. The outer court (the Court of the Gentiles) was nearly square and approached from the W. by four gates and a bridge (Wilson's Arch) spanning the Tyropæan Valley, and connecting the Temple with the western hill. There were also two gates on the S. and one each on the N. and E. (See plan).

28. The Inner Court (of Israel). Within this general enclosure and reached by an ascent of fourteen (fifteen) steps was the Inner Court, a complex of buildings surrounded by a narrow corridor of 10 cu. in width. Upon this, but reached by an ascent of five steps, was the wall of the inner Court, rising to the height of 25 cu., and separating the sanctuary proper from the world. Inscribed tablets warned non-Israelites not to enter this part of the sanctuary on pain of death (see accompanying facsimile of one such inscription discovered by Clermont Ganneau in 1871 and at present in Constantinople.) The entrance to this Court was effected through one of nine gates, four respectively on the N. and S., and one on the E. side, the W. being as in previous temples unprovided with a gate. (See Plan). One-third of the area (the eastern portion) was divided from the rest, and access to it was allowed to women, whence it was called the Court of Women. Between this section and the Court of Men (the Court of Israel), to the W., accessible only to men, a flight of fifteen steps semi-circular in form led to the great gate 40 cu. wide and 50 high. Whether this was the Beautiful Gate (Ac 3 2), or the one that led directly into the Court of Women from the outer court is not absolutely certain. Within the Court of Women was located the Treasury. But the name is applicable either to the colonnade around this court in which the so called trumpets or trumpet-shaped contribution-boxes were placed, or to that one of the two chambers in which gifts and votive offerings were deposited (Sheqal 5, 6). In the allusion in Jn 8 20, it is undoubtedly the first.

29. The Priests' Court and the Sanctuary Proper. Within the Court of Israel, a series of chambers was built for purposes of storage. One of them was used by the Supreme Council in its sittings. Another court (the Court of the Priests) rose out of and above the Court of Israel. Within this was located the Altar of Sacrifice. Only priests were allowed access here, except when a layman might appear bringing his offering. In this last court was located the Temple proper, including the original nave of Zerubabel's Temple; but its width was increased to 100 cu. by the erection of shoulders, and its height likewise raised to 100 cu. The old division of Holy Place and Holy of Holies was naturally maintained, but instead of a solid wall or partition between these two sections the Veil was hung, consisting of two parallel curtains made of rich materials. These two curtains were 3 cu. apart, the one toward the Holy Place being open at its N. end, and the one toward the Holy of Holies at its S. end, so that the high priest, passing into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement, could do so without any risk of exposing its sacred interior. Another curtain was hung at the entrance of the Holy Place, instead of a door.

30. The Pinnacle. What was meant by the 'pinnacle,' περύγιον (Mt 4 5; Lk 4 9) (nowhere else connected with the Temple), was certainly a height from which a large and impressive outlook on the country about was possible, and at the same time a fall would prove fatal in ordinary circumstances. All the interpretations offered of the expression resolve themselves into two classes, i.e.: (1) those which identify the spot with the summit of some building at the extremity of the Temple area such as Solomon's Porch (Wetstein), or the Royal Porch, or the SE. corner, which looked down into a dizzying precipitous chasm (Meyer); and (2) those which fix it on some point of the roof of the main building, such as that portion of it which was directly over the eastern projection or Porch (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.; Mt 4 5), or the parapet (Luther), or the gable or ridge (Paulus, Wiener). The latter of these classes of interpretations meets the requirements of the text best. It is not necessary, however, to assume that any special corner, edge, or point on the roof bore the name 'pinnacle.' The point of the pinnacle from which Jesus was bidden to cast Himself down is to be distinguished from the pinnacle in general.

TEMPLE<sup>2</sup>: An anatomical term (Heb. raqqāh, 'thinness'). The temples are the regions on both sides of the head behind the forehead and eyes, and a severe blow on the temples is often deadly (Jg 4 21, 22, 5 28). They are likened to pomegranates (Song 4 3=6 7), because of the shape or the varied light and dark red coloring of a slice of the fruit.

C. S. T.

TEMPLE<sup>3</sup>: Besides the Temple at Jerusalem, mention is made in the Bible of the temples of heathen gods. As a transl. of bayith (I Ch 10 19, 'temple' AV), the RV has 'house,' i.e., the dwelling-place of the god, in which his idol was placed (cf. Jg 9 4; I S 5 5, 31 9 f.; II K 5 18, 10 21, etc.). In II Ch 36 7, Ezr 5 14 ('palaces' RVmg.), and Jl 3 5 [4 5], 'temple' is the transl. of hēkhāl. This word means also 'royal house,' 'palace,' which may be more exact in all three passages (cf. II K 20 18). Some find a reference to the temple of Marduk in II Ch 36 7; Ezr 5 14. In the N T ναός, 'temple,' is used in reference to the temple of Diana (Ac 19 27), and in metaphor, 'as the dwelling-place of God,' for the Christian Church (I Co 3 16; II Co 6 16; Eph 2 21), and the bodies of Christians (I Co 6 19). C. S. T.

TEMPLE-KEEPER (Gr. ναυκέρως, 'temple-sweeper,' i.e., one who cares for a temple): A term often used as a self-designation, like an honorary title, by cities as 'temple keepers' of the deity (or deified hero or ruler) to whom the city gave special honor. Very frequently coins of cities carry the legend 'ναυκέρως' (followed by the name of the deity). Coins of Ephesus of the 2d cent. A.D., e.g., name the city 'doubly temple-keeper,' of the Emperor and of Artemis, which well illustrates Ac 19 35.

E. E. N.

TEMPLES, ROBBERS OF (ἱερόσυλοι, robbers of churches AV): According to ancient conceptions a sacred place belonged to deity; consequently, violence done to either property or persons within its precincts was regarded as particularly heinous (cf. II Mac 4 42). The fact that the town clerk of Ephesus expressly denied that Paul and his companions were guilty of this offense (Ac 19 37) may imply that this charge had been brought against them by Demetrius or others.

J. M. T.

TEMPT, TEMPTATION: 1. In the O T. The word 'tempt' is used in EV as the rendering of nāṣāh, 'test,' 'prove,' and of bāhan, 'try,' 'examine.' The same two words are also frequently translated 'prove' and 'try.' The latter translations are more accurate. In modern English 'tempt' suggests the idea of constraining a person to do evil, but these words mean merely 'to put character to the test.' Thus God

'tests' men to see whether they will be faithful to Him (Gn 22 1; Ex 16 4, 20 20; Dt 8 2, 13 4 [3]; Jg 2 22, 3 4; Ps 26 2), and men 'test' God to see whether His patience or His promises will hold out (Ex 17 2, 7; Nu 14 22; Dt 6 16; Is 7 12; Ps 78 18, 41, 56, 95 9, 106 14). Similarly the noun maṣṣōth (Dt 4 34, 7 19, 29 3) should be translated with ERVmg. 'testings' rather than 'temptations' (AV and ERV, 'trials' ARV).

L. B. P.

2. In the N T. In the N T the Gr. terms πειράζειν, ἐκπειράζειν, πειρασμός, and ἀπειραστός are used with a meaning ranging from the simple 'trial' by suffering, etc. (Ac 20 19; I Co 10 13; Gal 4 14), through 'testing' (Mt 4 1, 7, 6 13; Ac 5 9; He 3 8 f.; Ja 1 2, etc.) to 'constraining to evil' (Mt 16 1 f.; I Co 7 5; Ja 1 13, etc.). In RV 'try,' and 'trial' are frequently substituted for 'tempt,' etc. of AV. For the temptation of Jesus see JESUS CHRIST, § 6.

TERAH, tī'ra (תֵּרַח, terah): I. The father of Abram, Nahor, and Haran (Gn 11 24-28; I Ch 1 26; Lk 3 34). He migrated with his family from Ur of the Chaldees to Haran, where he died 205 years old (Gn 11 31-32), but according to the Samaritan text, 145. In Jos 24 2 it is stated that Terah worshiped gods other than J' (cf. Gn 31 53 RVmg.). II. A station of the Israelites on their way from Sinai to Canaan (Nu 33 27 f., Tarah AV). Not identified.

TEREBINTH, ter'i-binth. See PALESTINE, § 21; and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 37.

TERESH, tī'resh (תֵּרֶשׁ, teresh): One of the two Persian eunuchs whose plot against Ahasuerus was frustrated by Mordecai (Est 2 21 f., 6 2).

TERMS OF BLESSING AND REPROACH: Among the Israelites with other peoples of Semitic antiquity much more significance was attached to words or expressions uttered with some show of formality, especially if an invocation to deity (either God or some inferior spirit) was implied. A blessing was thought to have efficacy, particularly if uttered by a dying father or leader (cf. the blessings of Isaac Gn ch. 27; of Jacob, Gn 47 7, 48 9 f., 49 1-28; of Moses, Dt ch. 33). The formula of a blessing was considered important, and on the choice of the right terms it was thought that much of the efficacy depended. God's blessing on creation (Gn 1 28), on the Sabbath (2 2), on Noah (9 1 f.), on Abraham (12 2 f.), etc., are all carefully noted. The nations of the earth were to be so impressed by the Divine blessing on Israel that they were to 'bless themselves' in Abraham, i.e., they were to use his name in invoking blessing on themselves (see Gn 12 3; cf. 48 20; Is 65 16; Jer 4 2 for an illustration of what is meant). In this connection the great recital of blessings and curses on Mts. Gerizim and Ebal should be noted (Dt ch. 27 f.). The blessing pronounced on Rebekah (Gn 24 60) is an example of a blessing on an individual, and the story of Balaam (Nu chs. 22-24) illustrates the significance attached to a blessing (or curse) pronounced by a seer. In the Psalms there are many examples of formulated blessings, and in the N T the beatitudes are but a collection of a few of the many blessings pronounced by Jesus.

On the other hand, words of insult, jeer, reproach, or curse were felt to be of more than passing significance. Once uttered, they were thought to have a baneful effect which was likely to follow one as a sinister fate and surely overtake one some day. See also BYWORD; CURSE; REBUKE; REPROACH.

TERTIUS, tur'shi-us (Τέρτιος): The amanuensis who penned Paul's Epistle to the Romans and who sent his salutation, along with others' to the Church of Rome (Ro 16 22). Elsewhere in the Pauline Epistles the amanuensis is not expressly mentioned, altho Paul's salutation in his own hand generally implies that the letter was written by some one else (cf. I Co 16 21; Col 4 18; II Th 3 17). J. M. T.

TERTULLUS, tar-tul'us (Τέρτυλλος): A professional Roman advocate employed, as was often done by provincials unacquainted with Roman law, by the deputation of the Sanhedrin to plead their case against Paul at the court of Felix (Ac 24 1 ff.). Skillfully but falsely flattering Felix as pacifier of the province, he accused Paul of inciting Jews to disorder and of profaning the Temple.

R. A. F.—E. C. L.

TESTAMENT: The rendering of διαθήκη, primarily a 'disposition of property by will'; but the word even in classic Greek (Aristoph. Av. 439) has the secondary sense of a 'convention' or 'arrangement between two parties' (i.e., a covenant). It is upon this rarer and secondary sense that the Alexandrian translators of the O T fixed when they sought for an equivalent to the Heb. berith ('covenant'). Accordingly, in the LXX, 'testament' and 'covenant' are identified (Is 28 15; I S 18 3). This imports into the N T usage of the term a variable element; for side by side with the secondary sense of the word adopted by the LXX, the original meaning of disposition of property by will is held in mind. 'Testament' is made equivalent to 'covenant' in Gal 4 24 AVmg. ('covenants' in both AV and RV texts). This is manifestly also the case in the accounts of the institution of the Lord's Supper (cf., however, Mt 26 28; Mk 14 24; Lk 22 20; I Co 11 25; II Co 3 6, 14, 'covenant' RV). On the other hand, in He 7 22, 9 16 ff. (cf. also RVmg), the primitive significance of the Greek word is preserved, since the author has in mind an aspect of the Gospel which is best illustrated by a last will and testament in the modern sense.

A. C. Z.

TESTIMONY: The Heb. words so rendered are all derived from the vb. 'ādh (in Hiph'il), 'to bear witness,' 'to testify.' (1) 'ēdhāh (in pl.) when rendered 'testimonies' always refers to Divine commands, either those of the Deuteronomic Code and its basis, the Decalog (Dt 4 45, 6 17 f.), or the larger body of Law (and possibly Prophecy also, in some cases) known to the psalmists (Ps 25 10, 78 56, etc., especially Ps 119, passim). (2) 'ēdhāh. In the 'priestly' portion of the Hexateuch this term always refers to the Ark as containing the two tables of the 'testimony,' i.e., the Decalog, or to the Tabernacle as the shelter of the Ark (Ex 25 16 ff., 27 21; Nu 1 50, etc.). In the historical books and Psalms the term is synonymous with 'ēdhāh. (3) t'ādāh in Ru 4 7 ('attestation' RV) means legal evidence, i.e., a token or sign required by law; in Is 8 16, 20 it refers to the prophetic word as a Divinely sanctioned witness to the truth. In the N T the three Gr. terms μαρτυρεῖν, μαρτυρία, μαρτύριον are adequately rendered by 'testimony' or 'give testimony,' and should present no difficulties to the reader.

E. E. N.

TETRARCH, tet'rārk or tī'trārk: τετράρχης, literally a ruler over one of four provinces of a country (as in Thessaly). It was applied by the Romans to a ruler over part of a divided kingdom, or to a dynast below the rank of king; hence when, after the death of Herod, Palestine was subdivided, not into four, but into three parts, the ruler of each was called a 'tetrarch.'

TETTER. See DISEASE AND MEDICINE, § 4 (3).

TEXT OF THE BIBLE. See OLD TESTAMENT TEXT and NEW TESTAMENT TEXT.

THADDÆUS, thā-dī'us (Θαδδαῖος): One of the Twelve Apostles (Mk 3 18; Mt 10 3). It is to be noted, however, that this name does not occur in Lk 6 16 and Ac 1 13, and that D and the Western Text generally substitute 'Lebbæus' (probably the same as Levi [Λευαῖ; cf. Orig. Contra Cel. 1, 62, Δέβης], for whom a place is thus made among the Apostles). On the other hand, the name Judas, son of Alphæus, found in Lk 6 16; Ac 1 13, does not occur in the lists in Mk and Mt. There is no sufficient reason for identifying Judas, the son of Alphæus, with T., since (1) the last name can hardly be a corruption of the first as held by Allen (EB, art. Thaddæus); and (2) other names are substituted for 'Judas' in the versions (thus: Syr. Cur. has 'Judas Thomas'; Syr. Sin., simply 'Thomas'). The occurrence of different names in different traditions is to be explained rather as due to the fact that there were more who 'heard and saw the Lord' than could be included in a single list of Apostles. Hence the substitution of names. Of T. nothing further is said in the N T, which may account for the early substitution of other names. According to the Syriac legend of Abgar, translated by Eusebius (HE, I, 13), T. was sent to Edessa. In the Greek Acts of Thaddæus (ed. Lipsius-Bonnet, I, 271), he is identified with Lebbæus, and represented as evangelizing Syrians and Armenians. (Cf. Nestle in Hastings DCG, sub. voc.).

THEATER (θέατρον, 'a place for seeing,' from θεᾶσθαι, 'to look upon'): In classical times usually a natural concavity in a hillside, supplemented by masonry, furnished with marble seats usually hewn from the rock and placed concentrically and a stage artificially constructed and open to the air. The ground between the seats and the stage was for the choir. Among the Greeks, it was employed sometimes for municipal and religious assemblies, as well as dramatic performances. The theater at Ephesus (Ac 19 29, 31), on the slope of Mt. Coressus, facing the harbor, was exceptionally large (seating perhaps 24,000 people). Excavations have revealed many inscriptions illustrating Ac ch. 19. The present condition of the excavations is shown in the cut attached to the article EPHESUS. S. D.—M. W. J.

THEBES, thī'bez. See NO, NO-AMMON.

THEBEZ, thī'bez (תֵּבֵּז, tēbhēts): A city near Shechem. It was taken by Abimelech, who later, while storming its tower, was killed by a stone thrown by a woman from the parapet (Jg 9 53; II S 11 21). Eusebius and Jerome mention a Thebes 13 m. from Neapolis on the road to Scythopolis, probably the modern Tābās 10 m. N. of Nāblus. Map III, G 3. It is a large village in a fertile valley, with old cisterns, caves, and graves. C. S. T.

THELASAR, thī-lē'sar. See TELASSAR.

THEOPHILUS, thī-ef'i-lus (Θεοφιλος): The name of the person to whom the Third Gospel (Lk 1 3) and the Book of Acts (Ac 1 1) are dedicated. The meaning of the name ('friend of God,' not 'lover of God,' which would be Philotheus, Φιλόθεος) has led some to suppose that it was not that of a real individual, but of an ideal or typical convert to Christianity from among the educated classes of Gentiles, possibly an officer under the Roman government. But the reasons for this theory, as well as for others built upon the mere name (cf. Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, p. 388), are not convincing. The only certainty in the case is that Theophilus, whether an ideal or an actual personage, represents the intelligent, possibly literary, Gentile convert or student of Christianity.

THESSALONIANS, thes''ə-lō'm-ənz, EPISTLES TO: 1. Situation Disclosed by I Thessalonians. On the occasion of his second missionary journey Paul, accompanied by Silas and (probably) Timothy, visited Thessalonica, a busy seaport at the head of the Thermaic Gulf, and there carried on active missionary work, at first among the Jewish, and afterward among the Gentile, inhabitants of the town (Ac 17 1 ff.; I Th 1 9, 2 14). The work, especially among the latter, was very successful, and the foundations were laid of a church which, writing a few months later, Paul makes bold to say is already widely known for its faith and active work (17 f.). According to Ac Paul preached for three Sabbaths in the Synagog, but the success of his work (cf. Ph 4 16) probably points to a longer total stay. Finally, however, owing to the determined hostility of a section of the population, the Apostle was obliged to leave Thessalonica just at the time when his young converts most needed his guidance, and, finding it impossible to revisit them in person (2 18), he despatched Timothy, probably from Athens (3 1 f.), to assure them of his continued affection and to bring him a report of their state. The report which Timothy brought back to Paul, who had meanwhile gone on to Corinth (Ac 18 5), was evidently in the main highly satisfactory. At the same time, he had to tell the anxious Apostle of certain difficulties, both doctrinal and practical, which were besetting the Thessalonians' faith. And it was with the view of meeting these, and of giving expression to his heartfelt joy at the 'glad tidings' he had just heard, that Paul, soon after his arrival in Corinth in 50 A.D., despatched from there this First Epistle to the Thessalonians.

2. Contents of I Thessalonians. Beginning with a greeting which happily combines the new watchword of 'grace' with the old Hebraic salutation of 'peace' (1 1), the writers (for the manner in which Paul associates Silas and Timothy with himself not only in the opening greeting, but throughout both Epistles, is one of their characteristic features) give thanks for the spiritual state of the Thessalonians (1 2-10), and then proceed at once to refute certain calumnies which, as they have been informed, are in course of being circulated against themselves. Their apologia takes, naturally, the form of a historical narrative of their ministry at Thessalonica, and is marked by frequent appeals to the Thessalonians' own knowledge of what its character had been (2 1-13); while it gives also the Apostles the opportunity of emphasizing the Thessalonians' own ready acceptance of the word of God, and their consequent brave endurance under persecution (2 13-15). It is little wonder, therefore, they continue, that they are longing so exceedingly to see again those who are proving such a 'crown of glorying,' and to complete the good work that has been so happily begun (2 17-3 13).

A second and more didactic part of the letter follows, based largely, no doubt, on the report brought back by Timothy, in which the Apostles furnish fresh guidance for their converts in their Christian life, warning them in particular against the unchastity which was so marked a feature of Greek city life and which, regarding salvation as essentially spiritual, Gentiles, even after conversion, were apt to regard as natural and permissible (4 1-8), and, while gladly recognizing their love of the brethren, summoning all to diligence in their own work, that so they may preserve an honorable spirit of independence and gain the respect of their heathen neighbors (4 9-12). Next, the writers deal with two problems, both connected with the coming of Christ, on which the Thessalonians are understood to require guidance: (a) Some of the converts who had expected to be alive at the Parousia had died (the phrase in 4 14 need not, as some think, imply martyrdom), and the Apostles assure the brethren that these, so far from being shut out from Christ's glory at His return, will rather be the first to share in it (4 14-18). (b) As regards the time of Christ's return the fact, of which they have already been fully warned, that it will come as a thief in the night is made the basis of an urgent appeal to watchfulness and sobriety (5 1-11). Certain exhortations follow, still addressed to the community as a whole, with reference to their attitude to their leaders and to their own more feeble brethren, along with some general rules of Christian living (5 12-22). And finally, the letter is brought to a close with a salutation and benediction (5 25-28).

What result the First Epistle had we are left to gather as best we can from the Second Epistle, which must have followed very soon after.

3. Contents of II Thessalonians. The Second Epistle opens with even stronger terms of praise than the First, probably implying that the Thessalonians had in the interval been spurred to still nobler efforts (I 3 11). But the idleness and even disorder, of which complaint had already been made (caused in all probability, tho this is not stated, by the belief in the speedy return of Christ), had by no means disappeared. On the contrary, this 'business which was no business' (3 11) would seem rather to have been fomented by certain spiritual utterances and sayings, and even a letter—all purporting to come from the Apostles, but for which they were in no way responsible (2 2). Let the Thessalonians see to it that they be not led astray, but rather remember that, sudden and unexpected tho the actual coming of the Day of the Lord will be, it will nevertheless be preceded by certain clearly defined signs, and, above all, by the appearance of the 'man of sin (or lawlessness),' the full and crowning manifestation of the power of evil already working in their midst. For the present, this manifestation is being held in check—apparently by the power of the Roman state—but how long this restraining power will last no one can tell (2 1-2). In any case, the Thessalonians' duty is clear—to stand firm and hold fast the traditions they have already been taught, in humble dependence upon the power of God (2 13-17). To the same God let them also pray on the Apostles' behalf (3 1-3); meanwhile, in conformity with the Apostles' own example, let them go about their daily work and duty in quietness, shunning all disorderly brethren, and at all times and in all ways seeking that peace which is the peculiar property of the Lord of peace (3 14). Finally, the letter is confirmed by an autographic salutation and benediction in Paul's own handwriting (3 17 1).

4. Characteristics of the Epistles. (1) Of all the Pauline Epistles which have come down to us, the Thessalonian Letters represent perhaps most fully the Apostle's 'normal' style in his more familiar intercourse with his friends, and which in its vivid, living character has been well described as a 'stenographed conversation' (Rénan). Greatly, however, as this contributes to the personal charm and interest of the letters, it adds materially to their difficulty. For they so abound in allusions to what the Thessalonians already knew, and perhaps have themselves been saying in letters on their own part to the Apostle (cf. Rendel Harris in The Expositor, vol. viii, 1898, pp. 161 ff.), or to circumstances the precise character of which was known to the Apostle, (e.g. through the report of Timothy), that it is hardly too much to say that the more familiar the subjects with which they deal were to the Thessalonians the more veiled they are from us.

(2) If the Thessalonian Epistles do not exhibit those elaborations of Christian doctrine which we find, e.g. in the Epistle to the Galatians, it is not that Paul's theology was not by this time thought out, (he had been a Christian now for well nigh 20 years), but rather that the need for such elaborations did not here arise. There are however in these letters enough doctrinal statements to enable us to see with remarkable clearness what was the substance of Paul's missionary teaching. I Th 1 9 f. shows that he proclaimed as the center of his message (a) a living and a real God, as opposed to the idols of heathenism, (b) the coming of the Son of God from heaven. The eschatological note resounds through these letters from start to finish. Jesus who has died for men (I 5 10), and Whom God has raised from the dead (I 1 10), is destined to come again in power from heaven (II 1 7), and that soon (I 4 15, 5 2 ff.), to punish the enemies of God (II 1 8), to save those who are His from the coming wrath (I 1 10), catching up His saints to meet Him in the air (I 4 17), and welcoming them into His kingdom (I 2 12), to live with Him for ever (I 5 10). Meanwhile Paul sets as an ideal before his converts the love of God and the patience of Christ (II 3 5), he urges them to be worthy of the call that has come to them (I 2 12; II 1 11), and in praying that they may be preserved in spirit, soul and body, entire and without blame, till the coming of Christ, he adds that He Who has called them is faithful and will complete what He has purposed (I 5 23 f.).

(3) Nowhere more than in these Letters does the real Paul stand out clearly before us, alike in the intensity of his affection for his converts, in the confident assertion of the purity of his own motives, and in the fierceness of his indignation against those who are hindering the progress of Christ's work. Very noteworthy, too, is the tact which the Apostle displays, praising with the utmost generosity where praise is due, but only as a means to continued progress. When, too, he sees cause for blame, he is not afraid to say so, and this with all the authority belonging to a fully accredited Apostle of Christ. At the same time, as regards the Thessalonians, it is of interest to notice that this is the fullest picture we possess of a young Christian community, still very simply organized (I 5 12), in all the freshness of its first love, not yet wholly separated, it is true, even from the more glaring pagan vices, but possessed of a faith and a love and a hope which have already borne practical fruits in the Thessalonians' own lives, and made them the honored means of commending the truth to others.

5. Genuineness of the Epistles. All that we have so far considered regarding the character and contents of these letters supports the traditional belief that they are the work of Paul. In the case of the First Epistle, its authenticity, which no one even thought of challenging before the 19th cent., is now generally recognized by critics of all schools, except those who reject the Pauline writings altogether, tho recently (Christian Beginnings, 1924) Burkitt has conjectured that both Epistles while approved by Paul, owe their structure, drafting and some of their ideas to Silas. More doubt attaches to the Second Epistle. Tho the external evidence in its favor is even stronger than in the case of I Th, it has, more particularly in recent years, been seriously objected to on internal grounds. So far as the apocalyptic passage in ch. 2 is concerned, the objection (a) that the picture there given of the Man of Sin is dependent on the Nero redivivus myth, and is therefore later than Paul, is groundless, for such a conception had its roots in Judaism long before Paul's day (see ANTICHRIST); neither (b) can it be argued that the suddenness of the Parousia as depicted in I Th is essentially contradicted by the more detailed teaching in II Th regarding the premonitory signs and the present restraining power; for the vital point emphasized by the Apostle in II Th (probably in order to correct a misinterpretation of his previous note of urgency) is that the Day of the Lord has not yet begun (not 'is just at hand,' 2 2 ARV). In more recent years the main difficulty as regards II Th has come from the contention, stressed by Wrede (Texte und Untersuchungen, N.F., ix, 2), that whereas in I Th Paul addresses an essentially Gentile Christian community, in II Th he seems to have in mind a community whose religious background is Jewish Christian. Wrede would argue that as the community addressed can not have changed its character in this way, the Second Epistle can not be Pauline. But (a) apart from a by no means large list of words peculiar to the Epistle among N T writings, and a few deviations from ordinary Pauline practise in the use of particular words and phrases, its general phraseology and style leave upon the mind of any unbiased reader the impression of a genuinely Pauline work. (b) The very remarkable similarity to I Th as regards both language and contents (cf. I 1 4, II 2 13; I 2 9, II 3 8; I 4 11, II 3 11; I 5 23, II 3 16) is far more naturally explained if both letters came from the same author about the same time, than if, with Wrede, we assume that we have in II Th the work of a late imitator, or even forger, who, in order to gain credence for certain views, encased them in a framework drawn from a genuine Pauline Epistle. Harnack (Sitzungsberichte der kön. preuss. Akademie, 1910, p. 562 f.), while acknowledging Wrede's contention as regards the difference in tone between the two letters, preserves the Pauline authorship of II Th by the hypothesis that it was addressed primarily to the Jewish section of the Thessalonian Church (cf. 'first fruits' in 2 13, ARVmg.); and, partly arising out of this, the further suggestion has been made, tho for this there are no sufficient grounds, that the Second letter may have been written before the First (Jour. Theol. Stud., Oct., 1913). Harnack's hypothesis is attractive. Jewish Christians, brought up originally in an atmosphere of religious exclusiveness and superiority, must have found at first the greatest difficulty, which persecution would have intensified in Thessalonica, in merging themselves into a corporate unity with converts from heathenism (cf. the situation at Antioch, Gal 2 11 ff.); and there are traces in I Th (cf. the emphasis on 'all' in 3 12, 5 15, 26, 27), as in other Pauline letters, that it was a matter of fundamental concern for the Apostle to get his converts to realise that in Christ Jesus there was neither Jew nor Greek. Timothy may have reported that this difficulty was acute in the nascent church of Thessalonica, and also the Jewish converts may have taken exception to much in Paul's first letter which seemed to be applicable to Gentile Christians rather than to themselves. It is to be noted, however, that, even if in II Th Paul had Jewish Christians primarily in his mind's eye, he nevertheless addressed the letter to the Thessalonian church as a whole (1 1); to have done otherwise would have encouraged that sectarianism which he was so eager to avoid. Finally, whatever substance there may be in Harnack's hypothesis (and it may be doubted whether it is wholly satisfactory or necessary), neither the difficulties which it is designed to meet, nor any of the other objections which have been raised against this remarkable Epistle, can be said to be sufficient to overthrow the belief in its genuineness, especially in view of the absence of any other adequate explanation of its origin, and of the place it has so long enjoyed in the esteem of the Church.

THESSALONICA, thes'sa-lo-noi'ka (Θεσσαλονίκη): A city of Macedonia, the modern Saloniki. Its original name was Therma, but when it was rebuilt by Cassander (315 B.C.), it was renamed after his wife, Thessalonica, the step-sister of Alexander the Great. It was strongly fortified, and, situated as it was on the Thermaic Gulf, it soon became the most important harbor of Macedonia, being in Roman times the capital of the second of the four divisions of the province and the residence of a Roman governor and questor. It played a great rôle as a frontier town. After 148 B.C. it became the midway commercial and military station on the Via Egnatia, connecting Dyrrhachium and Byzantium, which still traverses the city. Its most flourishing period was before the rise of Constantinople. The presence of a Jewish community in the city led to the founding of a Christian church by Paul on his second missionary journey (Ac 17 1-9), which, in spite of persecution, soon grew into one of the Apostle's important European churches (I Th 1 4-8), composed largely of Gentiles (I Th 1 9). The present population is about 170,000, including Jews, Turks, Greeks, Slavs, and Franks. J. R. S. S.—S. A.

THEUDAS, thi'ūdas (Θευδᾶς, a contract form of Θεοδᾶς [Θεόδωρος]): A Jewish revolutionist in the reign of Augustus who instigated a political uprising in Palestine that came to an inglorious end (Ac 5 36). In the Ac narrative, the time of his activity is fixed prior to the insurrection under Judas, the Galilean, which took place in the days of the taxing (i.e., in 6 B.C., or 6 A.D., under Quirinius, q.v.). No other reference is made to T. in the N T, but, according to Josephus (Ant. XX, 5 1), an insurrection under the leadership of one Theudas took place while Fadus was procurator (i.e., between 44 and 46 A.D.). That both Luke and Josephus refer to the same event is evident from the similar language used of the person in question (cf. λέγων εἶναι τινα αὐτόν, Ac 5 36, with ἔλεγεν εἶναι προφήτην, Ant. XX, 5 1). Josephus is not likely to have made a mistake of many years with reference to events happening within his own lifetime and in his own country. On the other hand, the value of Luke's history does not depend upon accuracy with reference to every detail, particularly a detail so incidental as the one in question (with Schmiedel's argument in favor of Luke's inaccurate use of Josephus in EB, art. Theudas, compare also Zahn, Eint. 2, II, 418 f.). J. M. T

THOMAS (Θωμᾶς; Aram. t'ōmā'; cf. the Phœnician ܬܡܬܐ, CIS, I, No. 46): The name of one of Jesus' disciples. This is the only name given to him in the Synoptics (Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 15; cf. Ac 1 13). But in Jn the interpretation Didymus, 'twin' (cf. Heb. tō'ām, 'twin,' pl., Gn 25 24, etc.), is given with the name (Jn 11 16, 20 24, 21 2). Throughout this Gospel T. plays a more important rôle than in the Synoptics. He commonly appears in the rôle of a doubter, which may account for the reading διψυχος, 'double-minded,' instead of διδυμος, in some of the versions. In Jn 14 22, Syr. Sin. reads 'Thoma' instead of 'Juda,' showing that at an early date Thomas was identified with 'Judas of James,' but not in Ac 1 13, Lk 6 16, where both names occur. The same identification was made in the Syriac source from which Eusebius translated the story of King Abgar and Thaddæus ('Ιούδας ὁ καὶ Θωμᾶς), also in the Acts of Thomas (ed. Lipsius-Bonnet, II, 2, p. 100, 'Ιούδας Θωμᾶς).

THORNS AND THISTLES: Symbolically, thorns or thistles, or both, are often used to denote the judgment of God on Israel—the fact that the uncultivated land bore only such worthless shrubs symbolizing the extremity of distress and desolation (cf. Is 7 23-25; Hos 9 6, 10 8, etc.). On the species and varieties designated by these terms, see PALESTINE, § 21 f. The dried thorn-bushes often served as fuel (Ps 58 9; Ec 7 6). Hedges of thorn seem to have been very common (Pr 15 19; Hos 2 6; Mic 7 4). The thorn also easily served as a cruel instrument of punishment (Jg 8 7, 16; Mk 15 17; Jn 19 2 ff.). On II Ch 33 11 (AV) cf. RV. See also HOOKS.

E. E. N.

THOUSAND: In the O T this term signifies a political unit of ancient Israel. It is the translation of 'eleph, which is often the equivalent of mishpāhāh, 'clan.' After the Israelites had settled in cities and villages, and clan- if not tribe-distinctions could not be easily maintained, more or less arbitrary subdivisions were made of the tribe (cf. Ex 18 21, 25; Nu 1 16 'families' RVmg.; Jos 22 14, 21, 30; I S 10 19, 23 23 'families' RVmg.; Jg 6 15, 'family,' 'thousand' RVmg.). Of these the 'eleph, 'thousand' or 'family,' was the largest, and was ideally a company of 1,000 united under one head (gar). The 'clan,' a subdivision of a tribe, and made up of bēth-'ābhōth, 'fathers' houses,' was of no definite numerical size, and accordingly, it is probable that the 'eleph only rarely, if ever, numbered 1,000, and was usually a much smaller number. The 'eleph is also used similarly as a military term (Nu 10 4, 31 5, 14, 48; I S 8 12, 17 18, 18 13; II S 18 1; I Ch 13 1, 15 25, etc.). C. S. T.

THRESHOLD. See PASSOVER, § 7; and also HOUSE, § 6 (k).

THRONE: The Heb. kīṣṣē, 'seat' (Aram. korṣē), is used of an ordinary seat (Jg 3 20; I S 1 9, etc.), but frequently of the royal chair of state, when it is rendered 'throne.' In many cases the expression is to be taken literally, the actual seat or chair being intended and no more (I K 2 12, 19, etc.; cf. especially Solomon's magnificent throne, I K 10 18); but generally, it is not merely the throne itself, but what it symbolized—the royal authority, dominion, power (Gn 41 40; I K 1 37, etc.). The supreme authority and sway of God are also often succinctly expressed by speaking of His 'throne.' In the vision of Micaiah (I K 22 19) and of Isaiah (Is 6 1) J" was seen sitting on His heavenly throne surrounded by His attendant ministers. In the religio-political sense the 'throne of David' came to signify the union of the two ideas—God's supremacy over all kingdoms of the earth, and the Davidic throne as the one kingdom in which God's supremacy was actually illustrated or embodied (Is 9 7). The 'throne of David' was thus an ideal expression which came to mean much to the prophets and psalmists.

In the N T these O T conceptions are found reproduced. Jesus the Messiah is the true Davidic king, and His 'throne,' i.e., His power, etc.—sometimes His seat at the right hand of the Father—is the realized ideal of the Davidic throne of the O T (Mt 19 28; Lk 1 32; Ac 2 30; He 1 8, 8 1, 12 2; Rev, often). Naturally, at times in the N T the throne of God alone is often spoken of with no reference to the Messiah (Mt 5 34, 23 22, etc.). In Ac 12 21 the Gr. is βῆμα, 'judgment-seat,' rather than 'throne.'

THUMMIM, thum'im. See URIM AND THUMMIM.

THUNDER: Thunder (ra'am; Gr. βροντή) is a frequent phenomenon in Palestine during the winter rainy season, but never occurs in summer (I S 12 17). By the primitive Hebrews, as by all other Semites, the thunder-storm and everything connected with it were worshiped as divine (see SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 7, 8, 30). Among the later Hebrews the thunder-cloud became the cherub or chariot on which J" rode (see CHERUB); the lightnings, the seraphim, or 'fiery serpents,' that attended Him (see SERAPHIM) or the arrows that He shot out of His bow; and the thunder was His 'voice' (Job 37 4; Ps 18 13 [14]; Ps 29, 104 7; Am 1 2; Is 30 30 f.; Ac 10 13). Hence qōl, 'voice,' is frequently used as a synonym of 'thunder' (Ex 9 23-24, 19 16, 20 13; I S 7 10, 12 17 f.; Job 28 26, 38 25), and in such cases is regularly translated 'thunder.' As the 'voice of Yahweh' the thunder served to discomfit His enemies (I S 7 10; Ps 77 18, 81 7; Sir 46 17), or as a sign to His people (Ex 19 16, 20 18; I S 12 17 f.; Jn 12 28 f.).

THYATIRA, thoi'a-tai'ra (Θυάτιρα): A city of Lydia, NW. of Sardis, on the river Lycus, a tributary of the Hyllus, the modern Akhissar. Teira probably means 'the town,' Thyateira, 'the town of Thya.' Its original name was Pelopia (and Semiramis). In the 3d cent. B.C. a Macedonian colony was settled at Pelopia by the Seleucid kings, and named Thyatira. This soon became an important place because of its numerous industries. It was most famous for its dyed garments (see LAODICEA), called 'purple' (Turkey red, cardinal red), of which goods the Lydia mentioned in Ac 16 14 was a seller. Many other industries flourished at Thyatira, each guild being governed by a president, called ἐπιστάτης (the guild of bronze-smiths is doubtless referred to in Rev 2 18, 'and his feet are like bright bronze'). A strong Jewish colony existed at Thyatira, and here, as elsewhere (Ac 13 6, 19 13), they were given over to superstitious and magical rites, a mixture of Judaism and paganism, stigmatized by the Apostle as 'fornication' (Rev 2 20 f.), 'adultery' (ver. 22), 'the deep things of Satan' (ver. 24). But the presence of this Jewish colony made possible the establishment of a Christian community at an early period.

TIBERIAS, tai-biʿri-as (Τιβεριάς): A city on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee, founded by Herod Antipas about 20 A.D., and named in honor of the reigning emperor (see TIBERIUS). It became the capital of Galilee and gave its name to the lake (cf. Jn 6 1, 21 1); but was avoided by the better class of Jews on account of its foreign and disreputable population, and also because the new city had been built over the ancient cemetery of Hammath (q.v.). It is mentioned in the N T only once (Jn 6 23). After the fall of Jerusalem, however, T. became the chief center of Jewish learning, and in the 2nd cent. the Sanhedrin was established there. Here were published the Mishna, the Palestinian Talmud, and the 'Western' pointing of the Hebrew Scriptures, which is now universally employed.

The modern Tabariya is a town of about 7,000 inhabitants, a large proportion being Jews. It was formerly noted as the most filthy and unhealthful place in all Palestine, but in recent years has been considerably improved.

TIBERIUS, tai-biʿri-us (Τιβέριος): The 'Caesar' of the Gospels (exc. Lk 2 1, which refers to Augustus), tho mentioned by name only in Lk 3 1. T. was entrusted by his step-father Augustus with the military government of the provinces in 12 A.D. and at his death in 14 A.D. succeeded him as emperor of Rome. He possessed much military skill and administrative ability, so that his reign of twenty-three years was beneficial to the empire as a whole; but within the circle of his personal acquaintance he was according to Tacitus, whose statements may need to be discounted to some extent, a suspicious, ruthless, and unprincipled tyrant, the last decade of whose life was spent in unspeakable debauchery upon the Island of Capri. The city of Tiberias (q.v.) was named in his honor. For a discussion of the date indicated in Lk 3 1, see Plummer, ICC, ad loc.; also NEW TESTAMENT CHRONOLOGY.

TIBHATH, tib'hæth. See TEBAH.

TIBNI, tib'nai (תִּבְנִי, tibhnā): Son of Ginath (I K 16 21 f.) and rival of Omri in the contest for the throne of N. Israel. The struggle was probably longer and more severe than the brief notice in I K indicates (cf. the LXX. text). Tibni's death, apparently a natural one, closed the conflict.

TIDAL, tai'dæl (תִּדְאֵל, tidh'al), king of Gōyīm, 'nations,' who invaded Canaan with Amraphel, Chedorlaomer and Arioch (Gn 14 1, 9). The name is unknown in the time of Hammurabi, with whom Amraphel has commonly been identified; but is identical with that of Tu-ud-ha-li-ia, king of the Hittites in the time of Ramses II, ca. 1250 B.C. This has suggested to recent critics that the events of Gn 14 are to be assigned to the 13th cent. B.C. rather than to the 22d cent., as has commonly been supposed.

TIGLATH-PILESER, tig'laṯh-pi-li'zur (תִּגְלַת־פִּלְעֶזֶר, tighlath pi'ēser = Assy. tukulti-apal Ešharra, erroneously written Tilgath-pilneser [I Ch 5 6, 26; II Ch 28 20]), 'my strength is the son of Ešharra,' i.e., the god Ninib, perhaps more correctly 'Ninurta': The name of several kings of Assyria. Tiglath-pileser III ruled Assyria 745-727 B.C., and is to be identified with the Pul of II K 15 19 (his name on the Babylonian Chronicle). He usurped the throne in 745 as Pulu, and doubtless assumed the name of the great Tiglath-pileser (I) 1115-1103 B.C. His first active operation in the 'Westland' began in 743 B.C. The cities of Arpad, Tyre, and Damascus at first paid him tribute, but later revolted. Arpad was besieged, but held out until 740 (Is 10 9, 36 19, 37 13). In 739 T. clashed with Azriyau of Jaudi, apparently Azariah of Judah. He plundered Kullania, probably the Calno of Isaiah (10 9; cf. Am 6 2). In 738 tribute was received, among others, from Menahem of Samaria (II K 15 19 ff.), Rezin of Damascus, Hiram of Tyre, and Panammu of Samal. Conditions on this coast-land brought him back in 734, when he came to the help of Ahaz of Judah against Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus. Rezin was defeated and took refuge in his capital, where he was besieged. T. raided the districts of Syria and N. Israel, E. and W. of the Jordan (I Ch 5 26), deporting large numbers of captives. T. replaced the deported population by importations of thousands of persons from other districts of his realm. Philistia, particularly Gaza, Ashdod, and Ekron, were conquered and plundered. Moab, Ammon, Edom, and the Arabians paid him tribute. Damascus fell before his besiegers in 732 B.C., and among his subjects assembled in court at that place we find Ahaz of Judah (II K 16 10 ff.). The collapse of the Syro-Israelitic combination was followed by the deposing of Pekah of Israel by the people (I) and the enthronement of Hoshea by T. In 727 T. died, having been the founder of a new dynasty of Assyria, and the establisher of a new policy of provincial rulership and forced importations that gave the background of the later mottled population of Syria.

TIGRIS, tai'gris (תִּגְרִיִּס, hiddeqel = Assy. i-di-ik-lat, Sumerian I-di-ig-na, Old Persian tigrā, Gr. T'igris): The twin stream of Babylonia with the Euphrates. It is designated the Hiddekel in a description of the streams of Paradise (Gn 2 14), and also once in Daniel (10 4). This stream rises a little S. of Harput, in proximity to one of the sources of the Euphrates, flows southward to Diarbekr, nearly 150 m. distant, whence, after forming a junction with the eastern Tigris, a shorter stream, it flows through precipitous ravines and gorges, until it breaks out into the plains of Mesopotamia, N. of the site of old Nineveh. Thence, enlarged by its affluents, the Greater and Lesser Zab, and the Diyalah on the E. and a few small streams from the W., it rushes on swiftly to the Persian Gulf. Anciently, it emptied into the Gulf through its own mouth, but to-day it combines with the Euphrates and forms one great onflowing stream. On the upper E. bank of the Tigris, opposite the city of Mosul, stood old Nineveh. S. of this was Calah-Nimrud and, a little below on the W. bank, the ancient capital of Assyria, Ashur, so completely excavated by the Germans before the World War. The entire length of the river is about 1,150 m. Only the lower portions of the river are safe and that only for small, strong crafts. I. M. P.

TIKVAH, tik'va (תִּקְוָה, tiqwāh), 'hope': 1. The father-in-law of Huldah, the prophetess (II K 22 14, called also Tokhath, Tikvath AV, in II Ch 34 22). 2. The father of Jahzeiah (Ezr 10 15).

TILE, TILING: In Ezk 4 1 the word rendered 'tile' is ḥhēnāh, 'brick,' i.e., a large soft clay brick (perhaps more like a tablet) on which Ezekiel could easily draw a plan of the city. Unbaked bricks were often used for such purposes and then, if permanency was desired, baked or burned in a kiln so as to render them almost imperishable. In Lk 5 19 the reference is to the clay roofing-tiles with which the roof was supposed by Luke to have been covered. The || in Mk (2 4) gives a slightly divergent but not contradictory account, since the term ἐξορύττεται ('broken it up' RV) may refer to the whole process of removing the roofing E. E. N.

TILGATH-PILNESER, til'gath-pil-ni'zur. See TIGLATH-PILESER.

TILON, tai'lan (תִּלְוָן, tilōn): The son of Shimon, a Judahite (I Ch 4 20).

TIMEŪS, tai-mi'os (Τῑμαῖος): The father of Bartimeus (Mk 10 46). This word (perhaps a gloss) was evidently added in order to explain the name 'Bartimeus' (q.v.) in the same verse. Both names are omitted in Mt 20 29; Lk 18 35. J. M. T.

TIMBREL. See MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (1).

TIME: Modes of measuring time in the Bible include: (1) a general and rather indefinite way of marking it, (2) the Hebrew (O T), and (3) the Roman (N T) time designations.

1. The Day. So far as Bible references are concerned, the Roman system of time division differs from the Hebrew only in its application to the day. The only writing, however, in which the Roman custom rules is the Fourth Gospel (Jn 11 9) where the day is reckoned from midnight to midnight. Everywhere else the usage is that of the Jews, i.e., the computation of the hours from morning to evening and from evening to morning (Mt 27 45; Mk 15 34; Lk 23 44; cf. Jn 19 14). In the O T no mention of hours is made (except in the Aramaic of Dn 3 6, 15, 4 19 AV, 33, 5 5). The night was more usually divided into watches. In early times the Hebrews reckoned three watches (cf. Jg 7 19; Ex 14 24; I S 11 11; La 2 19). In later times the Romans reckoned four (Mk 13 35), i.e.: (1) evening, (2) midnight, (3) cock-crowing, (4) morning. Cock-crowing as the third watch was between 12 and 3 A.M. The day as a twenty-four hour period began with sunset. The phrase 'between the two evenings' (Ex 16 12, 29 39 AV, RVmg.)

is probably the interval between sunset and the end of the twilight, or the complete setting in of the darkness. This is also called 'the cool [Heb. 'wind'] of the day' (Gn 3 8), and is evidently distinguished from the 'heat of the day' (Gn 18 1, etc.), which is midday (or noon).

2. The Week. Whether the original basis for the weekly division of time was the lunar month or not, in historical time the phases of the moon do not appear to have had any connection with the seven-day period (cf. SABBATH). There was no attempt to make the month commence and end with the beginning of the week. In the N T, the week itself is called a Sabbath (σαββατα, Mt 28 1; Jn 20 1). The day before the seventh is the 'preparation' (παρασκευή, Mt 27 62; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 31, 42; προάβατον, Mk 15 42). The other days of the week are simply distinguished by ordinary numerals ('first day,' etc.).

3. The Month. In the earliest times, the division of the year into months was based upon the revolution of the sun. This is evinced by the four names which have survived of months of this period, namely, Abib, month of earing-corn (Ex 13 4); Zif (Ziv), month of flowers (I K 6 37); Ethanim, month of perennial streams (I K 8 2), and Bul, the rainy month (I K 6 38). Of these, the last two occur also in Phœnician and Cypriot inscriptions. All are evidently survivals of early Canaanitic usage. In the postexilic period, the Assyro-Babylonian calendar seems to have been introduced with its ordinal numbers for the months of the year. In addition to these, proper names were given to the months, making up the following list:

- (1) Nisan, March-April (Neh 2 1; Est 3 7), the same as Abib.
- (2) Iyyar, April-May (not mentioned in the Bible, but cf. Jos. Ant. VIII, 3 1), the same as Zif.
- (3) Sivan, May-June (Est 8 9).
- (4) Tammuz, June-July (in Ezk 8 14, but not as the name of the month).
- (5) Ab, July-August (not named in the Bible, but cf. Jos. Ant. IV, 4 7).
- (6) Elul, August-September (Neh 6 15).
- (7) Tishri, September-October (not named in the Bible, but cf. Jos. Ant. 4 1), the same as Ethanim.
- (8) Marchesvan, October-November (not named in the Bible), the same as Bul.
- (9) Chislev, Chisleu AV, November-December (Zec 7 1; Neh 1 1).
- (10) Tebeth, December-January (Est 2 16).
- (11) Shebat, Sebat AV, Jan.-Feb. (Zec 1 7).
- (12) Adar, February-March (Est 3 7; Ezr 6 15).

To maintain the relation of the lunar months to the solar year, it was necessary periodically to intercalate a thirteenth month, which was called Second Adar ('after Adar').

4. The Year. The Hebrew year was solar; but according to P (Gn 7 11, 8 14), in the earliest ages it must have been lunar; for the duration of the Flood, given by tradition as 365 days, is made by this document to include one year and eleven days. The beginning of the year of the old Hebrew calendar before the Exile was reckoned with the autumn, a natural and convenient season, since the whole product of the fields and vineyards was gathered in; but after the Exile, the spring equinox was substituted, following the Babylonian custom, along with the adoption of the names of the months as above given. The practise of the earlier period, however, did not completely die out, but was continued in the observance of the religious festivals (Ezk 40 1; Lv 25 9; Nu 29 1). Thus arose the observance of two days marking the change of year—one in the spring, as the civil new-year's day (1st of Nisan), and one in the autumn, as the ecclesiastical new-year's day (10th of Tishri, later 1st of Tishri). The subdivision of the year into seasons did not go beyond the recognition of summer (qayits) and late autumn or winter (hōreph, lit. 'harvest-time,' Ps 74 17; Zec 14 8). Barley-harvest is mentioned as a definite time in the year (Ru 1 22; II S 21 9), but varies for the different parts of the land. The same vagueness attaches to the terms earing, seed-time, sowing-time, and harvest (Ex 34 21; Gn 8 22; Lv 26 5), tho they seem to be alluded to as clearly marked seasons.

5. Larger Divisions of Time. Of larger periods, the Hebrews observed the Sabbatical period of seven years (Dt 15 1 ff.) and the Jubilee, or fifty-year period, of seven Sabbatical periods (Lv 25 10 ff.); but it does not appear that they made extensive use of these or of generations (as in Mt 1 17). Of eras, as fixed points of time, generally and uniformly used, there is no mention. Great and well-known events, however, like the Exodus (I K 6 1), the Babylonian Exile (Ezk 33 21, 40 1), the building of the Temple (I K 9 10), the earthquake (Am 1 1), were often used as fixed points for indicating the relative time of other events. For later Judaism (the Maccabean age), the year 312 B.C., the beginning of the Seleucid era, became a starting-point and continued to be used until very late. An effort to begin a national Jewish era with the year of the accession of Simon the high priest (I Mac 14 27, 13 40) succeeded only for a short time. See also CHRONOLOGY.

TIMNAH, tim'na, TIMNITE, tim'nait (תִּמְנִיתִי, tim-nāh, Timnath AV), 'portion': 1. A place in the hill-country of Judah (Gn 38 12, 13, 14), where Judah pastured his sheep. It is mentioned (Jos 15 57) with cities lying S. of Hebron. 2. A town on the N. border of Judah, W. of Beth-shemesh (Jos 15 10), called a city of Dan (Jos 19 43, Thimnathah AV). It was the home of Samson's wife and inhabited by Philistines (Jg 14 1, 2, 5, 15 6, Timnite), and, under Ahaz, retaken by them (II Ch 28 18). It is the modern Tibneh, W. of Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh). Map II, D 1. C. S. T.

TIMNATH, tim'nāth. See TIMNAH, 1, 2.

TIMNATH-HERES, tim'nāth-hi'rīz. See TIMNATH-SERAH.

TIMNATH-SERAH, -sī'ra (תִּמְנַת שֶׂרָא, timnath serah; in Jg 2 9 written Timnath-heres): The inheritance of Joshua, in the border of which he was buried (Jos 19 50, 24 30). The original name, was probably timnath heres 'portion (i.e., 'territory') of the sun' (heres) which was later altered to T-serah to avoid the suggestion of sun-worship. Jewish and Samaritan traditions locate Timnath-serah 9 m. SW. of Shechem at Kefr Hāris, where there are three sacred places which seem to represent the tombs of Joshua, Caleb, and Nun. Ancient Christian tradition, however (followed by most modern scholars), identifies T. with Tibneh, a tell with many ruins, 10 m. NW. of Bethel. Map III, E 4. In the hill (? Gaash) to the S. of Tibneh are remarkable rock-tombs, the largest of which Guérin (Samarie, ii, 84-104) believes to be the burial-place of Joshua. See SWP, II, 284, 374-378, with plans. Cf. TIMON, tai'mən (Τίμων): One of the 'Seven' chosen to care for 'the daily ministration' in the early Church (Ac 6 5). Nothing further is known of him.

TIMOTHY, tim'o-thi (Τιμόθεος), 'honorer of God' (cf. φιλόθεος, 'lovers of God,' II Ti 3 4), Paul's beloved disciple or 'son' (I Ti 1 2, 18; II Ti 1 2; cf. I Co 4 17) and devoted fellow worker. The son of a Greek father and a Jewish mother (Eunice), Timothy—whose name well suits such a case—was born apparently in Lystra, where he was probably converted on the Apostle's first missionary journey (Ac 14 6 f., 19; cf. I Ti 6 12; Ac 16 1; cf. II Ti 3 11). On the second journey, Paul took him by Divine direction, through 'the prophecies which pointed him out' (I Ti 1 18; cf. Ac 13 2 f.), to be his companion in the work of the Gospel; and, in order to avoid unnecessary antagonism on the part of the Jews, had him circumcised (Ac 16 1-3), in virtue of his Jewish race and training on the mother's side (II Ti 1 5, 3 15). He was left in Berea with Silas when Paul went to Athens; but, joining the Apostle there, he was sent back to encourage the church of Thessalonica (I Th 3 1-6). Later, he rejoined Paul in Corinth (II Co 1 19; Ac 18 5; I Th 3 1-8; cf. I Th 1 1; II Th 1 1). We next find him at Ephesus (Ac 19 22), whence he is sent on a mission into northern Greece (Philippi, Thessalonica, etc.), along with Erastus of Corinth, which city he was expected finally to reach (I Co 4 17, 16 10 f.). Thence he was to return to Ephesus 'with the brethren' who had meanwhile started by the shorter sea-route to Corinth, carrying with them Paul's letter, I Co. Titus was probably one of these (II Co 8 6 compared with I Co 16 1 f.), and the two played parts in the troubles of the Corinthian Church, tho Timothy not with the same distinction as Titus (see TITUS). He was associated with the Apostle in writing II Co, and was with him again in Corinth (Ro 16 21) and in Troas (Ac 20 4 f.: see TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO, § 3 f.).

So much we can say with certainty. But if the Epistles to Timothy (q.v.) be authentic, they may give us further glimpses of his movements. For, besides what I Ti 1 f. may imply, I Ti 1 3 ff. suggests that Paul urged him (on his return from Greece) to tarry at Ephesus when he himself 'was going into Macedonia' (Ac 20 1), in order to 'charge certain persons not to teach' differently from Paul's Gospel. If so, Timothy later rejoined his chief in Macedonia, as he appears associated with Paul in II Co 1 1, in the summer of the same year (56) in the spring of which Paul's own journey via Troas began. Further, we may see in II Ti 4 20, 21a (attached by affinity to the personalia at the end of a more important letter) a fragment from a note, written whilst sailing southwards for Jerusalem from Miletus (it would not be on his route when sailing from Ephesus northward to Macedonia), to Timothy when left behind at Ephesus to help its elders to meet the situation forecast in the speech to them in Ac 20 17-35 (see Expositor, VIII, v, 332 ff., 338 f.; this seems to meet the requirements more simply than the elaborate theory of 'Pauline Readjustments' in IX, i, 446 ff. by T.W. L. Davies). T. last appears in connection with Paul's Roman captivity. He was with Paul when Col, Phm, and Ph were written. In Ph 2 19-24, Paul hopes 'to send him shortly' to visit their first church in Europe, and to report how it fared. Next he is back in Ephesus, whence he is urgently summoned to Paul's side when the end seemed imminent (II Ti 4 9).

Finally, the author of He, apparently a friend (Apollos?), gives us our last glimpse of him, as he informs his readers that Timothy has just been set at liberty (He 13 23),—surely after being involved in Paul's case, perhaps by Alexander the Copper-smith (II Ti 4 14 ff.). R. A. F.—J. V. B.

TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO: the N T writings which, together, with the Epistle to Titus, are usually called the Pastoral Epistles. Unlike Paul's other Epistles, except Philemon, they are addressed to private persons, and unlike Philemon they are concerned with the life of churches. These unique conditions must be borne in mind in all comparisons between them and the other Epistles bearing Paul's name.

1. Analysis. Contents of the first Epistle.

Greeting (1 1, 2).

Occasion of writing. The continued need of checking certain Judaizing teachers of the Law, as contrasted with Paul's Gospel (1 3-11).

The Gospel which saved Paul, the greatest of sinners, the sure and only source of power (1 12-17).

The charge now solemnly committed to Timothy on the basis of his own past (1 18-23).

Regulations for Church Life, chs. 2 and 3.

(a) Public prayer to be made for all men to God, the Saviour of all (2 1-7).

(b) The conduct of men and women in public worship (2 8-15).

(c) The character and personal qualifications required of those who hold office in the Church which supports among men the Truth of the Incarnate Saviour (3 1-16).

Special vigilance against moral error 'in latter times' (4 1-5). Hence particular advice to Timothy (chs. 4, 5, 6).

(a) His own life and ministry (4 6-16).

(b) His handling of others; special application to old, young, widows, elders, and slaves (5 1-6 2).

(c) The false type of teacher, his aims, especially his love of money (6 2-16).

(d) Appeal to T, as a true man of God, to fight the good fight, in the footsteps of Jesus Christ, in view of His Appearing (6 11-12).

(e) Truth for the rich in particular (6 17-19).

(f) Final appeal for fidelity to the fore-going in spite of certain specious claims to higher insight (gnosis, 6 20 f.).

Contents of the second Epistle.

Greeting (1 1-2).

A personal appeal for loyalty to the Gospel at a grave crisis (1 3-18).

Thanksgiving for T's past, and exhortation that he may be zealous and willing, like Paul, to suffer for the Gospel of Divine power (1 19-14).

Deserters and loyal friends (1 15-18).

Detailed appeal for courage in the task of transmitting to others the gospel of the risen Christ, even at the cost of suffering, and the temper needful for that task, ch. 2.

The need for courage, and its basis (2 1-13).

The spirit of the true workman for God in the Church (2 14-26).

The last days to be testing ones but Timothy has been prepared for all by his past, ch. 3.

The features of the days of trial (3 1-9).

Timothy's Divine resources for meeting them (3 10-17).

Final Summing up of the Charge to Timothy to fulfill his ministry, as coming through one who has already finished his course and sees the crown in view—for himself and others (4 1-8).

Timothy is called to Paul's side for the final act now in sight (4 9-22).

Paul isolated among foes, but in peace; personalia.

2. Purpose. As regards the occasion of the First letter, it is evidently directed against a practically injurious type of teaching which had invaded the churches in Ephesus and its neighborhood, over which Timothy held temporary charge. While concerned primarily with his responsibilities, it was doubtless also meant to uphold his authority among the churches. The burden of its thought is that the pure Apostolic Gospel, manifested in the healthy moral life of a well-organized Christian church, is the truth for the times. Timothy was, therefore, enjoined to see that men of the highest character were appointed as elders and deacons to serve the household of God, and so help it to perform its function of witness to His truth. Disputation not tending to this end was to be avoided, teachers of morally 'unprofitable' doctrines were to be silenced, and error was to be devitalized by the purification of the moral atmosphere of the Church. The emphasis throughout is on the practical or morally 'wholesome' aspects of the Gospel (1 10, 6 3).

The Second letter is more personal than the first. The Apostle feels now that his race has been run; Nero's sentence was almost certain. And so, in case his son in the faith should arrive too late, he wrote solemnly exhorting him to be faithful in the work of the Gospel.

A strong personality never can, without some anxiety, entrust to others the work into which he has poured his own life. In this case, however, there was a special need for such a 'final will and testimony.' For he was aware that Timothy was faced, not only by plausible false teachers, but by the likelihood of being called in various ways and degrees to suffer for the Gospel; and, knowing his disposition, as one rather easily impressed and overawed, Paul feared lest his courage and faith should waver.

3. The Historical Situation. It is generally thought impossible to fit these Epistles, in their present form, into the life of Paul as recorded in Ac. Not only is II Ti 4 20 inconsistent with Paul's position in Rome, far from Miletus, but the church conditions are thought by many to involve an interval between the Pastorals and the Captivity Epistles. It is also assumed that I Ti 3 14 f., which expresses Paul's hope of joining Timothy shortly, means that the writer is at liberty; yet its style links it closely in time with II Ti which is clearly written from prison.

If, then, they came from the Apostle's hand as they are, a place must be found, so it is argued, after the close of Ac; that is, a second imprisonment is indispensable to their authenticity. But it can not be allowed, save on the understanding that it, too, was already closed by Paul's death before summer 64 A.D. (so Lock, ICC, The Pastoral Epistles, 1924, p. xxii). This, as the latest possible date, is fixed alike by I P (which, if authentic, must itself be earlier than the Neronian persecution and probably implies that Paul is already dead) and by I Clem. 6. This speaks of the Neronian martyrs as 'gathered together to Paul and Peter, in the place of reward—whither, of course, they must have already gone. That would give a very brief interval between spring 62 and 63 (the probable period in which, too, I P fell) within which all the movements implied on this view (see Gwatkin) in I Ti and Tit would have to be compressed—let alone any assumed journey to Spain. Over against this must be set the probability that the sudden end of Paul's story with the 'two whole years' Ac 28 30 f., simply meant that there was nothing more to the point to tell (see Acts) and that Paul was martyred shortly after, about summer 62. It is indeed argued by some (e.g., K. Lake, and Ramsay, Expos., VIII, v, 264 ff.) that the case against Paul lapsed by default, the Jews failing to press it to an issue in Rome. But this, as also Ramsay's view that it fits in with Paul's varying degrees of hope in the different Captivity letters, is (see Expos., ibid., 464 ff.) very dubious. On this showing the historicity of the Pastoral Epistles depends on places being found for them prior to the middle of 62, a task usually held hopeless. Hence many scholars reject their authenticity, save for fragments of smaller letters utilized in the composition of three quasi Pauline treatises on Church order, over against certain post-Pauline errors of a Gnostic kind (see P. N., Harrison, The Problem of the Pastoral Epistles, 1921). But plausible as this position seems, it crumbles under anything like vigorous examination. (See further Bartlet, 'The Historic Setting of the Pastoral Epistles,' in Expos., VIII, v, 28 ff., 161 ff., 256 ff.).

There are really only two serious objections to the authenticity of the Pauline Epistles: viz., their style and language as compared with the admitted epistles of Paul, and the problem of finding suitable historical settings within Paul's life. Hort regarded the former as the chief, but thought it inconclusive, particularly 'when we notice similar differences between the Epistles of the Captivity and those of earlier date. Much of them may be reasonably taken to be due to changed circumstances, and especially to the fact that the recipients were trusted individual disciples and deputies, not miscellaneous churches (Judaistic Christianity, p. 131). Sir W. M. Ramsay fully concurs in this view, and has supported it in detail (Expos., VII, viii; see also VIII, v, 161 ff. for a paper by the present writer). Recently it has been strongly controverted by Dr. P. N. Harrison (ut sup.); but his statistics are too formal and abstract, too unanalysed as to their relation to the factor of changed subject-matters and personal conditions—the historical and psychological element—to carry conviction (cf. F. Torm in ZNTW, xviii, 215 ff.). Such statistics used to be urged against the 'Captivity group,' which is now generally accepted as Paul's. In other words, the negative linguistic argument has not thus far been made contextual and historical enough to be really scientific, i.e., concretely exact. On the other hand the age of Trajan (98-117), the period assigned for the origin of the Pastorals as imitations of Paul by an admiring disciple, in order to apply the spirit of his principles in to later conditions of the Church in the province of Asia, simply will not suit them. The false teaching in view, whatever its exact nature (see Hort, op. cit., pp. 132 ff., for its primitive and mainly Judaistic type; cf. COLOSSIANS), was not that of the age of Trajan; in particular, it shows no trace of Docetism (cf. JOHN, EPISTLES OF), which was then dominant in Asia (witness the letters of Ignatius and Polycarp; see Hort, op. cit., ch. X). There is again no reference to the Eucharistic function of the ministry, another living question in that age: nor is official persecution on the horizon as in Trajan's day.

The fact is that, when the analogy of Colossians and Ephesians—once rejected on the score of style and thought—and the special conditions alluded to by Hort have been duly pondered, there is nothing to preclude the Pastorals forming members of the 'Captivity group' and dating from 60-62. Such a 'historical setting' has been argued for at length in Expos., VIII, v, 325 ff., and need only be briefly indicated here. (See also TIMOTHY; TITUS). Titus, having been hurriedly 'left behind in Crete' by Paul on his voyage to Rome, was in need of further guidance and support as soon as it was possible for Paul to write, viz., from Rome not long after his arrival there, say spring or early summer of 60. Its bearers, 'Zenas the lawyer and Apollos,' probably on their way to Asia to get witnesses for Paul, carried also a letter to Timothy, urging him to 'stay on' (προσμεῖναι) at Ephesus (I Ti 1 3; see TIMOTHY for reference to a similar past situation), rather than leave his post for Paul's side, as the latter had learned (perhaps from Epaphras of Colossae, Col 1 7; Phm 23) that he was inclined to do. Seemingly the letter crossed Timothy on the way; for he is with Paul when he writes Col and Phm—soon enough after reaching Rome to be still hopeful of an early release as the result of his appeal case (Phm 22). Timothy is yet with him in Ph 1 1, 2 19 ff., when Paul is already more doubtful of a favorable issue (2 17). Whether or not Timothy carried out the projected visit to Philippi (2 19) and then returned to Paul, he was again at his post in Ephesus before the date of II Ti, say, summer 62. This is at least a working hypothesis covering all the known facts, especially the personalia—from which, as being the most objective of data, it is best to start. On the basis of a single captivity in Rome, other theories have also been put forward (see Expos., VIII, v, 338 f.), the most recent being that of T. W. Ll. Davies (Expos., June, 1924, pp. 446 ff.), which involves very radical 'readjustments' in order and dates for most of Paul's Epistles. (Titus comes after I Co; I Ti between Gal and II Co; and II Ti between Romans and Ph). In contrast to this, the above theory (cf. that of J. Macpherson in the AJT for 1900, pp. 23 ff., which has, however, no real solution of the 'aberrant block' II Ti 4 20; see TIMOTHY) is simple, and merely enlarges the number of the Captivity group.

On such a theory, the Pastorals are important for our conceptions of the Paulinism of Paul the Missionary, and of the development of early church order, on the one hand, and of aberrant doctrinal tendencies, on the other. In particular it fits in well with our recent knowledge of the early reaction of 'Hellenistic' thought and pre-Christian Gnosis on the Christian Gospel, (esp. Paul's, e.g., II Ti 2 18; cf. Col 2 12, Eph 6 14: see below) outside Palestine.

4. The False Teachers. Allowing for differences in locality, the errors described in each of the Pastoral Epistles seem much of the same kind. The false teachers are spreading errors that eat like a cancer into the healthy life of the Church (II Ti 2 17, 3 5 f.), and are only a foretaste of worse evils to follow (I Ti 4 1; II Ti 3 1). They are of two kinds, as suggested by Ac 20 29 f. Some claim to be teachers of the Law (I Ti 1 7), but prate of Jewish fables and genealogies (I Ti 1 4; Tit 1 14, 3 9), and so stir up strife with notions fit only for credulous old women (I Ti 4 7, 6 4). Morbid in conscience, the mercenary, 'puffed up' and spurning authority (I Ti 1 5 f., 19, II Ti 2 18), they also preach an unnatural asceticism based on false ideas of the relation between the spiritual and the material (I Ti 4 1-5; Tit 1 10-16). Others, starting from such views, go on to antinomian positions (II Ti 2 16 f.; cf. 3 1-8), after claiming that the Resurrection is already past (II Ti 2 18) thus perverting Paul's own teaching as to rising into new life at baptism (q.v., and HYMENÆUS). The root-error, in its ascetic scruples, reveals affinities with the Colossian heresy. It was evidently, for the most part, an outgrowth of Judaism as found in the Dispersion. Rabbinical speculation, combined first with ritual asceticism and then with practical immorality, was the main source of such error. It grafted the legendary and puerile tales ('fables') of certain Jewish haggadoth upon the narratives of Scripture (see JUBILEES, BOOK OF, and FABLES), and so diverted the hearers from the realities of the Gospel and a godly life. Thus the grasp of the conscience upon Evangelic principles having been undermined, the plausible mysticism of a super-ethical 'resurrection' life made an easier prey of some. In a word, non-moral scrupulosity, as Judaic ritual asceticism, passed over, in men of Hellenistic mentality, into a dualistic antinomianism (cf. 1 Jn)—a phenomenon familiar in Hinduism and other ceremonial religions (cf. the conjunction of these two in the Ep. to the Hebrews). Hence Paul's repeated emphasis on morally 'healthy' instruction, as the antidote to such 'brain-sick' (I Ti 6 3 f.) views. The elaborate systems of second century Gnosis are not yet in sight (see GNOSTICISM).

5. Organization. Timothy and Titus as Paul's representatives were commissioned with the temporary duty of directing the church at Ephesus and the young communities of Crete into self-government under men of character, and of building them up by wholesome instruction in the ethics of the Gospel. The Apostolic deputies did not create any new offices, but were to see that leaders of sound piety were chosen elders and deacons (see CHURCH LIFE, § 8). In the Pastoral Epistles, 'ruling' or official 'elders' and 'bishops' are to be identified (I Ti 3 1-7, 5 17-19; Tit 1 5-7), the term 'elder' denoting the office, while the term 'bishop' indicates an elder's function of local oversight. The second order, deacons, who performed services of relief, is mentioned only in I Ti. If there were not deaconesses (I Ti 3 11), there was at least in Ephesus a ministry of women, including 'widows' (5 9 f.).

6. Authenticity. The question of authenticity has already been dealt with, in the main in § 3. The chief objections urged against Paul's authorship are the following. (1) The false teachers are thought to be Gnostics (cf. I T, 6 20) of the 2d cent. But, as we have seen, there were Judaic and other types within the Apostolic Age closely akin to the false doctrine of these Epistles. (2) The ecclesiastical tone is said to be post-Pauline. It is held that the freedom of the Spirit is yielding to an episcopal succession for the protection of the faith as a deposit of doctrine (I Ti 6 20; II Ti 1 6, 13 f., 3 14 f.); that the sacraments are being invested with magical efficacy (Tit 3 5); that there are liturgical and confessional developments (I Ti 3 16, 6 12 f.; II Ti 2 8); and that a higher standard of morality is being demanded of the clergy (I Ti 3 1 f.; Tit 1 5 f.). But, such difficulties fade away under a truer exegesis. As we have already seen, there is no trace of the sole or monarchical bishop in these epistles. Stress is laid on the character of the official rather than on the office, and the organization is similar to that in Ph 1 1; Ac 20 28. It is true that the 'charismatic' ministry is passing away; but even in the earliest epistle of Paul there is evidence that he desired his churches to be organized under the pastoral leadership of members whose functions are not unlike those of the elder (I Th 5 11-15); The words 'husband of one wife' (I Ti 3 2) imply that the 'overseer,' as one in a fatherly relation to the Church, should have the experience of a paterfamilias (3 4 f.), and promise that his shall be a married life that is above reproach (even if they mean also that he should not marry a second time, they do not involve much advance upon I Co 7 8). The advice in I Ti 5 14 also accords with I Co 7 39 f., but hardly with the more ascetic views of the Church in the 2d cent. (cf. I Ti 5 23, which—as breaking the sequence—some take as a gloss on 'pure,' ἀγνός, added from a private note such as that whence II Ti 4 20 comes). There are not two standards of morality. Nor is the doctrine of the Church and the Sacraments more fully developed than in Eph 4 4-16, 5 23-27. (3) Far more serious is the objection that the doctrine of these Epistles is post-Pauline. It is said that the old intensity has disappeared: that Paul's distinctive doctrine of the mystical union with Christ, of righteousness by faith alone, of the removal of sin by the Cross, and of the Parousia, is being replaced by emphasis on works, 'piety' (I Ti 5 4), and the necessity of 'healthy doctrine' (I Ti 1 10); that 'faith is changed to orthodoxy,' and made one virtue among others. But this is an overstatement, and confuses the root of the new life with its fruit (cf. Tit 3 14), on which Paul always laid stress corresponding to the needs of his readers. Even by comparison with the Epistles of the Judaistic controversy, which are often unjustly assumed to contain the whole of original Pauline thought, the Pastorals show much that is undubitably Pauline (cf. I Ti 1 12-16, 2 7; II Ti 1 8-12; 2 8-13; Tit 2 11-14, 3 1-7); while Eph and Ph afford parallels with many 'un-Pauline' ideas of the Pastorals (Eph 2 9 f., 16-18; 5 25-27; Ph 2 12 f., 4 8 f.). (4) The language and style present the gravest difficulties. Some of Paul's most distinctive words and particles are absent, and a number of new words or old words in a new sense occur; while the energy, sustained periods, and broken construction of the earlier Epistles have given way to a more regular style and stereotyped expressions. The answer to this has largely been given in § 3. In particular, it is natural that Paul's style should vary in proportion to the change in the historical situation and the nature of the letters as 'pastoral,' and written to friends who were chief pastors. They may well echo much current technical Christian language and even some of the formulas used in its worship (e.g. I Ti 3 16, cf. Eph 5 14; also the 'faithful sayings,' I Ti 1 15, [save 'of whom I am chief'], 3 1, 4 10; II Ti 2 11-13; Tit 3 4-7). The undoubted Pauline coloring of certain sections has led some scholars to believe that they are fragments of the Apostle's letters, embedded in these Epistles (see McGiffert, Apost. Age, pp. 405-414, and P. N. Harrison's reconstruction at the end of his book). But such sections shade off too naturally into their context to support such partition theories. Possibly Luke, who was with the Apostle (II Ti 4 11), and whose language and thought in Ac afford parallels, had some hand in their phrasing.

The external evidence for I and II Timothy and Titus is by no means weak, echoes very probably being found in Ignatius and Polycarp, perhaps also in Clement of Rome. Indeed, they are as well (or better) attested in the Apostolic Fathers as are I and II Th, Gal, or Ph (see the N T in the Apost. Fathers p. 138).

TIN. See METALS, § 5.

TINKLING ORNAMENTS. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § II, 2.

TIPHSAH, tif'sa (תִּפְסָה, tiphṣāh), 'ford': 1. A city on the W. bank of the Euphrates and on the extreme NE. boundary of Solomon's kingdom (I K 4 24 [5 4]). It is commonly identified with Thapsacus on the Euphrates, above the mouth of the Belik. It was the most important crossing-place of the Middle Euphrates, and was the head of navigation on the river, being on one of the great commercial routes from E. to W. 2. A town near Tirzah in the Northern Kingdom, destroyed by Menahem, after he had killed Shallum (II K 15 16). No place corresponding to this name has been found. Thenius suggests that it was a copyist's mistake for Tappuah (q.v.) on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh. C. S. T.

TIRAS, tai'ras (תִּירָס, tīrās): A 'son' of Japhet (Gn 10 2). See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

TIRATHITES, tai'rēth-aits (תִּירָתִים, tīr'āthīm): A family of 'scribes' (i. e., learned men) living at Jabez (somewhere in Judah). The notice (I Ch 2 55) is obscure, but probably reflects postexilic conditions. E. E. N.

TIRE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, I, 8 and II, 2.

TIRHAKAH, tur-hē'ka or tur'hē-ku (תִּרְחָקָה, tīrhāqāh): An Ethiopian prince, son of Piankhi, who was one of the great monarchs of the Nubian kingdom, with its capital at Napata. Many sculptures, including one executed by Esarhaddon at Senjirli, represent him with unmistakable negroid features. While he was acting in the Delta as regent for Shabaka, the Ethiopian king, he led forth the Egyptian army to check the advance of Sennacherib in 701 B.C. (II K 19 9; Is 37 9). In these passages the title 'king' is an anachronism. The two armies met at Altaqu, and Tirhakah was defeated. His regency probably continued under Shabataka, the successor of Shabaka, until 691 B.C., when he ascended the throne of Egypt as the third monarch of the 25th dynasty. Twice he met the Assyrian invaders under Esarhaddon; in the first engagement he was successful (673); in the second (670), he was completely routed and driven from Memphis, which he never recovered. After this defeat, Esarhaddon had scarcely withdrawn when the petty kings of the Delta began to plot the restoration of Tirhakah. On the march to restore order the Assyrian monarch died, but Assurbanipal, his son, led his forces as far south as Thebes, from which he expelled Tirhakah (668). The latter maintained himself in Upper Egypt until his death, in 663. He erected minor buildings at Tanis, Memphis, and Thebes. J. A. K.

TIRHANAH, tur-hē'na or tur'ha-na (תִּירְחָנָה, tīr'hānāh): A Calebite family (I Ch 2 48).

TIRIA, tir'i-a (תִּירִיָּה, tīr'yā): A son of Jehallelel, a Judahite (I Ch 4 16).

TIRSHATHA, tur-shē'cha (תִּירְשָׁתָה, tīrshāthā), always with the art.; a Persian loan-word—'his honor,' 'his excellency': The title occurs in its foreign form in Ezr 2 63; Neh 7 65, 70, 10 1 AV, but is rendered in these passages 'the governor' by AVng. and RV. The conjecture that it was attached to a specific office is not sufficiently supported. It was probably an honorific given to a special royal agent, who had a task to perform and whose official life closed with the performance of that task. In Neh 7 65 it is given to Sheshbazzar. A. C. Z.

TIRZAH, tur'za (תִּירְצָה, tīrṣāh), 'pleasure': 1. A town of Mt. Ephraim, captured by Joshua (Jos. 12 24), and subsequently the capital of the kings of Israel from Jeroboam to Omri (I K 14 17, 15 21, 33, 16 5, 8, 9, 15, 17, 23), and the basis of Menahem's revolt (II K 15 14, 16). Robinson, Van de Velde, and G. A. Smith identify with Talkāzā, a little N. of Mt. Ebal; Conder, with Teyāšīr, 11 m. N. of Shechem; and Buhl, with et-Tīreh. II. A 'daughter' of Zelophehad, one of the clans of Manasseh (Nu 26 33, 27 1; Jos 17 3, all from P), perhaps the same as I.

L. B. P.

TISHBITE, tish'bait (תִּשְׁבִּי, tishbī): Elijah is called 'the Tishbite, who was of the sojourners of Gilead' (I K 17 1). The place (Tishbi, probably) which gave rise to this name has been identified, with some probability, with the modern el-Isib also called Mar Elias, a little to the W. of Manhasaim.

E. E. N.

TITHE: The rendering of the Heb. ma'āsēr and the Gr. δεκάτη, 'the tenth.' That there was a very ancient practise of offering a tenth of one's gain to a sanctuary appears from Gn 14 20 and He 7 8. With agricultural peoples, this practise naturally tended to settle down to the giving of the tenth of the annual produce. Jacob, however, makes the conditional offer of the tenth of the increase of his flocks (Gn 28 22). In the Mosaic legislation, the law of tithes is given in successive forms. (1) Provision is made (Dt 14 22-29) for the paying of tithes to the sanctuary, there to be eaten by the offerer and the Levite. But for those who lived at a great distance from the sanctuary, the gift might be commuted into money to be spent in a sacrificial banquet. Every third year the tithe was to be distributed to Levites, strangers, and the fatherless. The difference between tithes and first-fruits is not clearly marked, except that the first-fruits were offered to the priests (Dt 26 11). (2) Tithes are prescribed as a means of support for Levites (in Nu 18 21 ff. [P]), i.e., apparently as remuneration for services, in lieu of a share in the land ('for an inheritance'). But the Levites themselves are required to give of this tithe to the priests (Nu 18 26-28). Both these forms are pure land taxes, and do not include a tithe from the flock or herd. (3) Hence such a tithe is introduced in a third form (Lv 27 32-33 and II Ch 31 5, 6). In later Judaism these forms were combined, yielding two tithes, or an aggregate of one-fifth (20 per cent.) of the product of soil and cattle (cf. II Ch 31 5; Neh 10 38; Mal 3 10. In time the tithe came to be viewed as one of the essential requirements, failure to observe which was disloyalty to J'' (cf. Mal 3 10; Lk 18 12). The Pharisees, with characteristic insistence on the literal observance of the Law, tithed even garden herbs (Mt 23 23).

TITLE ON THE CROSS. See SUPERScription.

TITTLE: This word (from the late Latin titulus, one of whose meanings was that of a pen-mark over a letter to distinguished it from another one similar in form) represents the Gr. κράτα, 'little horn,' applied by the Greek grammarians sometimes to the accents and other marks. Among the Hebrew scribes, the term signified the small points or lines of certain letters which serve to distinguish them from others of nearly the same form, as י and ך, כ and ך, ן and ן. Thus a 'jot' (i.e., yōdh, י), the smallest letter of the Heb. alphabet) and a 'tittle' indicate together the smallest requirements of the Law, which Jesus indicated must stand as valid 'till all be fulfilled (Mt 5 18; Lk 16 17); cf. Edersheim, LJM, I, p. 537 f. The place assigned to this saying is not the same in Mt and Lk, which leads to some suspicion as to its genuineness. Further the context in each case represents Jesus as actually controverting not mere 'tittles' but important statements or teachings of the Law (cf. Mt 5 31 f., 33 ff., 38 ff. with ver. 18; and Lk 16 18 with ver. 17). If genuine, the original context, which would throw light on its meaning, seems to have been forgotten.

TITUS, tai'tos (Τίτος); One of Paul's ablest assistants, of Greek parentage, but of otherwise unknown origin. A spiritual child of the Apostle (Tit 1 4), he was taken by Paul on his second and crucial visit to Jerusalem (Gal 2 1-5), probably as a typical Gentile convert, and the issue with the 'Pillar Apostles' was, for the time, largely, if not exclusively, on the basis of his concrete case. He seems to have been a man of much strength of character. He organized the collection in Achaia for the Church of Jerusalem (II Co 8 6 ff.); and when grave difficulties arose in the Church of Corinth, Paul sent him to handle the delicate situation, which he did with success (II Co 7 6 ff.). Except what may be inferred from the Epistle to Titus (q.v.) nothing more is known of him. He is not named in Ac, either because it does not deal with the episodes in which he was prominent (this tells so far against Gal 2 1 ff. being = Ac 15 1 ff.), or because he was too closely related to Luke himself for the latter to refer to him. R. A. F.—J. V. B.

TITUS, EPISTLE TO: One of the group of NT writings known as the Pastoral Epistles.

1. Analysis. The following is an analysis of its contents:

Greeting, based on the Gospel 1 1-4.

The character required in the elders to be appointed in Crete (vs. 5-9), especially in view of the false teachers who are described in vs. 10-15.

- (a) Within the Church there must be a well-regulated social order, springing from the saving grace of God revealed in Christ 2 1-15;
- (b) and to the outside world, both rulers and others, the regenerated Christian character must be displayed, 3 1-8.

Advice to Titus in his dealing with certain errors and with factious teachers, vs. 9-11.

Personal messages, etc., vs. 12-14.

Salutations, ver. 15.

2. Historical Situation and Purpose. Paul had been in Crete, and had left Titus to complete the organization of the churches (1 5, see CRETE). The only known occasion when Paul visited Crete was when he touched there on his voyage to Rome (Ac 27 8-13). The ship was held up by stress of weather at 'Fair Havens,' hard by the city of Lasea, and that for 'a considerable (ἄνευ) time.' This interval would allow him to come into touch with conditions in the region sufficiently to show the need of leaving one of his party behind, in order to 'set in order' the defects of such local Christianity as already existed; and it is quite likely that Titus would, in view of his success at Corinth (II Co 7 6 ff.), be the man chosen. If so, it is possible that a letter of instruction, written to him on Paul's arrival in Rome, should be among the earliest tasks to which the Apostle gave his attention, as soon at least as the season allowed for a letter going by sea and a messenger was available. This points to spring or early summer of 60, to which I Ti, with which it is closely related in style and thought, may also belong (see TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO).

In this letter, carried probably by Zenas the lawyer and Apollos (3 13), Paul announces his hope of soon relieving him by Artemas or Tychicus, and bids Titus prepare to join him, ere next winter, at Nicopolis (3 12: q.v.). Tho the letter is personal, its contents were probably communicated to the Cretan churches; for Titus would need all the Apostle's authority behind him in the difficult task of restraining false teachers and placing church life under the oversight of men of the highest moral character. What was required of 'elders' (bishops) was 'a hold on Christian principles of at least morality or religion, such as would enable them to give hortatory instruction of a salutary kind to all, and likewise to give competent answers to gain-sayers' (Hort). The religious dangers of the Cretan churches are very similar to those described in I and II Tim, with yet stronger emphasis on the Jewish character of the false teaching.

3. Authenticity. The same general characteristics as those of I and II Ti have cast like suspicion on the Pauline authorship of Titus. For a discussion of these, see TIMOTHY, EPISTLES TO, §§ 3-6. Even those who reject the Epistle as a whole have to accept the closing personalia (3 12-15; cf. P. N. Harrison, Prob. of the Past. Epp., pp. 115-118). But the affinity of 3 14 with 3 8 points to their original unity.

TITUS JUSTUS (Τίτος Ἰούστος): A Roman citizen of Corinth who, favorably impressed by Paul's preaching, offered his house as a place where Paul could preach and teach after his trouble with the Jewish synagog (Ac 18 7). His name is given variously in MSS. as 'Justus' only, or as 'Titus Justus,' or as 'Titus Justus.'

E. E. N.

TIZITE, tai'zait (צִיטִי, tīṣī): The designation of Joha, one of David's heroes (I Ch 11 45). The place which gave rise to the name is unknown.

TOAH, tō'a. See NAIATH.

TOB, teb or tōb (טוב, tōbh): A district of Syria. (II S 10 8, etc.). See ARAM, § 4 (8).

TOB-ADONIJAH, teb'-ad'-o-nai'ja (טוב־אֲדֹנִיָּה, tōbh 'ādōniyyāh), 'the Lord J' is good': One of the Levites appointed by Jehoshaphat to teach Israel (II Ch 17 8).

TOBIAH, to-bai'a, TOBIJAH, to-bai'ja (טוב־יהוֹאָחָא, tōbhīyāh[ā]): 1. One of the Levites sent by King Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (II Ch 17 8). 2. The name of a family which could not trace its descent, that went up with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62). 3. An Ammonite, half Jew, and an adherent of Sanballat in his attempt to hinder Nehemiah in repairing Jerusalem (Neh 2 10, 19). By marriage, he was connected with prominent families of Jerusalem (Neh 6 17 ff.). He was dispossessed by Nehemiah of a room in the Temple which had been prepared for him by Eliashib the priest (Neh 13 4 ff.). 4. One of a company of exiles who came to Jerusalem, bringing gold and silver, the offerings of exiles remaining in Babylon, from which Zechariah in a vision was instructed to make a crown (Heb. 'crowns') for Joshua, the high priest (Zec 6 10 ff.; so the text, but some moderns would substitute 'Zerubbabel,' the secular head of the community, for 'Joshua,' while others, because of the plural 'crowns' and the mention of two persons in ver. 13b, would add 'Zerubbabel'). TOBIT, tōbit, BOOK OF: One of the books of the O T Apocrypha, which takes its name from Tobit, the leading character of its story. It has come to us in a number of versions, Greek, Latin, Syriac, Aramaic, Hebrew, which, while bearing witness to its wide popularity, also complicate the question as to its original form.

1. The Narrative. The story opens in Nineveh, where T. is with his wife Anna and his son Tobias, in exile. Good fortune attended him there as long as Shalmaneser was king, but all changed when Sennacherib came to the throne. Because T. mercifully buried those of his countrymen whom the king had slain, he was compelled to flee the city, and his property was confiscated. Upon Esarhaddon's accession, T. was permitted to return only to meet another terrible affliction—blindness. In his despair he prayed that he might die. At the same time that T. was thus praying, far away in the city of Ecbatana one Sara, the daughter of Raguel, was making the same prayer. Seven times she had been married, and each time, on the wedding-night, an evil spirit, Asmodeus, had killed her husband. God had willed that both suppliants should know of His goodness, and the angel Raphael was sent to accomplish the Divine purpose. When T. was in favor at court, he had committed to Gabael in Rages, a Median city, ten talents of silver. To secure them for his son, he planned to send him to Rages. Raphael so managed that he was chosen as guide, and, as they came to the river Tigris, a fish was captured from which was taken, at Raphael's command, the heart, liver, and gall. When they were approaching Ecbatana, Raphael told Tobias that he should marry Sara, and gave him directions how he should drive away the evil spirit by burning the fish's heart and liver in its presence. Soon after their arrival Tobias told his desire to Raguel. The father warned the young man of his danger, yet granted his request. No one expected to see him come alive from the fatal room, but the charm had banished the evil spirit, and there was, therefore, great rejoicing during the days of the wedding-feast. Raphael, meanwhile, had gone on to Rages to secure the money, and upon his return all three set out upon the journey home. T. and Anna had become very anxious over the long absence of Tobias, when one day the glad news of his coming filled their hearts with joy. Upon reaching the city, Raphael bade Tobias put some of the fish's gall upon his father's blind eyes. Immediately sight was restored. Thus did God reward the piety of both T. and Sara, and T. wrote a prayer of rejoicing and thanksgiving. At last, after years of benevolence and sincere, reverent piety, he came to a ripe age, and urged his sons and grandsons to leave Nineveh for Media. They went after his death, and there Tobias lived to become an old man, hearing just before his death the glad news of the destruction of Nineveh.

2. The Aim of the Story. So many of the noble ways and teachings of true piety are set forth in this short story that it is not strange that opinion varies as to which is the controlling motive of the whole. Grätz and Neubauer see in it the inculcation of the duty of burying the dead; others the commendation of prayer or almsgiving. The lessons of the book center in the character of T. and Sara, whose piety, constant through suffering and misfortune, conquers, and is wonderfully blessed of God. God's signal care of those who are faithful to Him and His Law is prominently set forth.

3. Date and Place of Composition. Varying with the conceptions of the character of the book and the chief lessons it sets forth, have been the dates to which it has been assigned. Those who have looked upon the book as an authentic history have placed its date in the 7th cent. B.C. The evidence that T. is a romance is, however, so clear that this early date has found little acceptance among scholars. In seeking a time for it in later days, various conclusions have been reached. Grätz puts it in the time of Hadrian (130 A.D.), Kohut still later in the time of Ardeschir (250 A.D.). As has been repeatedly shown, the mention of the Book of Tobit by Clement of Alexandria and by Polycarp precludes such a late origin. The most probable date is that of the 2d cent. B.C. In II Mac 5:10 Antiochus Epiphanes is said to have 'cast out a multitude unburied.' This may have given ground for the teaching about burying the dead (chs. 1 ff.). The reference in 14:5 fits this time, as before the beginning of Herod's Temple; so do the general religious conceptions of the book regarding the future. There is no Messianic hope expressed. The author was a Jew, but it can not be definitely decided where the book was written or what was its original language. The latest commentator, Simpson in Charles' Ed., gives a long list of arguments to prove Egyptian origin, possibly in Aramaic, towards the end of the 3d cent. B.C. Influence on the language of a number of N. T. passages is also claimed, a point which can not be discussed here. There is good reason to believe that the story is composite. Elements originally quite distinct, like the story of Ahiqar, and also the interpolations of moral teachings, have been added to an older and simpler narrative concerning Tobit.

The used by the early Fathers, the book was not generally considered canonical. The Councils of Carthage (397 A.D.), of Florence (1439), and of Trent (1546) gave it canonical rank. The English Church has made use of it to a limited extent, but not as a part of the Canon. See also APOCRYPHA, § 4, and cf. Charles, Apoc. and Pseudepigr. of the O T, Vol. I (1913). J. S. R.—W. G. TOGARMAH, to-gār'mā. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

TOHU, tō'hiū (תֹּהוּ, tōhū): An ancestor o. Samuel

(I S 1:1), called also Nahath (I Ch 6:26), and Toah (I Ch 6:34).

TOI, tō'oi. See TOU.

TOKEN: (1) The rendering of 'ōth, 'sign' (Gn 9:12, 17, 17:11; Ex 3:12, etc.). (2) Of σημεῖον, 'sign' (II Th 3:17). (3) Of σύσημον, 'joint sign' or 'signal,' i.e., a sign agreed upon (Mk 14:44). (4) Of ἐνδειξις, 'indication' or 'proof' (Ph 1:28). That is, the opposition to the truth manifested by these 'adversaries' was conclusive evidence that they were destined to perdition. (5) Of ἐνδειγμα, 'evidence,' 'proof,' or 'indication' (II Th 1:5). See also WONDER.

TOKHATH, tok'hath. See TIKVAH.

TOLA, tō'lā (טֹלַא, tōlā), 'crimson-worm': 1. The ancestral head of the Tolaites, a clan of Issachar (Gn 46:13; Nu 26:23; I Ch 7:1 f.). A kindred clan was that of Puah. 2. One of the 'minor' judges (Jg 10:1 f.), designated as 'Tola, son of Puah, a man of Issachar.' It is remarkable (1) that the two names occur here as those of 'son' and 'father,' while in Gn 46:13, they are 'brothers,' and (2) that the name has reference to a valuable dye or color. Very little is said of Tola's 'judgeship.' Like the other 'judges,' he was probably little more than a local hero.

TONGUES, CONFUSION OF: The result of a primitive interference by J' with the human race whereby its unity was broken, its members failed to understand one another's speech, were 'scattered abroad upon the face of all the earth,' and, by implication, the one race was subdivided into the existing varieties of men speaking different languages (Gn 11:1-11). The story of the confusion of tongues is associated with that of the building of the Tower of Babel. In its main outline it assumes that the whole human species was at first a single tribe moving from place to place and that in the course of its nomadic wanderings it came to Babylonia (the 'land of Shinar'). Here a most suitable site for permanent residence was found. It was determined that the tribe should abandon its hitherto nomadic way of life and build a city and a tower. J' (anthropomorphically conceived) came down to view the structure, disapproved the audacity of the scheme, saw the possibility of indefinite development of arrogance on the part of mankind, and prevented the accomplishment of the plan of building by sending the spirit of confusion and misunderstanding into the midst of the builders. These, now finding further cooperation impossible, scattered and divided into groups and began to speak the several languages since known upon earth.

The aim of the story is manifestly to give an explanation of the origin of so many tongues and nations of men. Just how the legend originated it is not possible to ascertain. It has no parallels in Babylonian lore (against Stade, ZA TW, 1895, p. 137, and Gunkel, Schöpfung, p. 149). In fact, Babylonia seems to be treated in it as a strange country. Some gigantic towerlike building in it, either unfinished or disused and in partially ruined condition, possibly that near the temple of Bel-marduk [see TOWER OF BABEL], aroused by its unfamiliarity the sentiment of wonder, and questionings as to its origin. To this the question of how the languages arose was appended, and the legend was thus made to answer the twofold query. But in whatsoever way and wheresoever it may have originated, the story was, like all other folk-lore, when taken up by the Hebrew people, made the vehicle of religious and spiritual lessons. The chief one of these lies on the very surface. It is the sovereign supremacy of J" involving the irresistibility of His will and the impossibility of thwarting Him. The very disaster which the primitive tribe is represented as desiring to avert, i.e., that of being scattered and subdivided, is visited on its members as a result of Divine judgment for folly and arrogance. The anthropomorphisms of the story are patent. It is exaggerating them, however, to say (Cheyne, EB, art. 'Babel') that they include the elements of J"'s grudging man the strength which comes from union or of the fear of human ambition.

So far as the legend is a vehicle of historical teaching, its kernel consists in the fact of the original unity of the human race and its language. This is a fact reached independently as a scientific conclusion by comparative philologists. Both the stock of vocables (roots) and the aggregate of modes of grouping words together to form articulated sentences (linguistic morphology) are found by philological study to indicate an original unity from which they are deducible as variations. Yet to attempt to classify the multitudes of separate types of speech either actually used, or once used and now extinct, is regarded as a futile as well as an impossible task. That all language, however, must have had one primitive source is a view which may well have presented itself in the very earliest periods of human history, and could not have required more than a superficial study of a few dialects of the same general language with their characteristic similarities. TONGUES, SPEAKING WITH: An experience of Apostolic times resulting in the use of other forms of speech than those customary and familiar to the speaker. Two variant accounts of the phenomenon, or more probably two distinct types of it, are given, the one found in the Epistles of Paul (for which see CHURCH LIFE AND ORGANIZATION, § 7), the other in the record of Pentecost (Ac 2 3-13). Exactly what happened on the day of Pentecost seems difficult to ascertain. It has been alleged in explanation that the author of Ac, not being an eye-witness of the events, has misunderstood and misrepresented them (see McGiffert, Apostolic Age, 1897, p. 52, note). This is not entirely satisfactory. It seems necessary to compare the account with the gift of tongues as known to and spoken of by Paul and bring the two representations into some sort of relationship with each other. Much of the difficulty will be removed if the two representations are not assumed to be portraiture of the same thing. That the author of Ac had a knowledge of the gift of tongues in the Pauline sense is evident from 10 46, 19 6. He must therefore in 2 3 ff. have had in mind a phenomenon of the same class, but of different specific characteristics. This may have been nothing less than the supernatural endowment of the speakers at Pentecost with the power of expressing themselves in languages unknown before. But of such endowment no trace appears later, therefore if real, it was a transitory one. A better explanation is that the language spoken was one, but that each listener was enabled to understand what was said as if the speaker were using the listener's own native tongue. This could occur either by an endowment of the listener with the power to understand the speaker's language, or by an actual transformation of that language into the one he was familiar with from childhood. But these explanations also lack sufficient support in the text. The passage suggests a simpler process. The differences overcome by the extraordinary endowment depicted in the account were dialectic. They did not amount to differences of language in the strictest sense of the word. The list of countries from which the hearers were drawn (vs. 9-11) is long, but does not compel the assumption of as many different languages. Moreover, the word 'dialect' (διὰλεκτος) as distinguished from language (γλῶσσα) is introduced at the outset, and set over against the Galilean derivation of the speakers (ver. 8); and altho 'tongues' is later used instead of it (ver. 11), it is evidently as an absolute synonym of 'dialect' in order to avoid the repetition of the same term. Further, according to the plan of Ac, the preaching of the gospel to pure Gentiles ignorant of the generic language of the Jews (Aramaic) would be premature at this early stage in the history. The audience at the day of Pentecost must, therefore, be supposed to consist altogether of Jews from Jerusalem, Judea, and the Dispersion. If so, they all spoke the common Aramaic, but in dialects. A spiritual excitation, similar to that which resulted in the gift of tongues of the Pauline Epistles, empowered the speakers, on the one hand, to overcome the natural dialectic differences, and the listeners, on the other, to understand what was said by the Apostles. TOPAZ. See STONES, PRECIOUS, § 2 f.

TOPHEL, tōfel (תֹּפֶל, tōphēl): A station on the route of the wanderings of Israel (Dt 1 1). Site unknown.

TOPHETH, tō'fēth (תֹּפֶת, tōphēth, Tophet AV, except in II K 23 10): 1. The Name. The name of a place of torture. The etymology of the word is obscure. The most reasonable explanation is that the word is a loan-word from the Aramaic, meaning 'place of burning' used to designate the fireplace when human beings were sacrificed, a practise which was wide-spread in antiquity (cf. W. R. Smith, Rel. of Semites<sup>2</sup>, p. 377). This will explain the reference to T. in Is 30 33. Since the practise of human sacrifice was abominable to sincere worshippers of J", the vocalizations of the Aram. word was conformed to that of bōsheth, 'shame' (see BAAL I. 6) to express the horror or disgust felt regarding human sacrifice by fire. Places where such sacrifici-ces 'were offered were called 'topeths'. One such place, located in the Valley of Hinnom, was especially conspicuous in this respect (Jer. 7 31, 19 14; II K 23 10).

From the scattered allusions to Topheth, it is reasonable to infer that it was of the nature of a high place with an altar, constructed, perhaps, in a peculiar way, adapted to the slaughtering of human victims. Accordingly, Jeremiah predicts that the place where Topheth was located should in the future be called The Valley of Slaughter. The disrepute in which the Topheth in the Valley of Hinnom was held was intensified by Josiah's treatment of it. This king deliberately defiled the place by pulling down the altar, razing the knoll, and pouring all the filth of Jerusalem upon it. The word 'Topheth' does not occur in the N T. But in later Christian thought, the distinction between it and the Valley of Hinnom was lost sight of, and it became a most expressive emblem of eternal torment.

TORCH. The proper rendering of the Heb. lappidh (Jg 7 16, 20; Ezk 1 13; Dn 10 6, all 'lamp' AV; Neh 2 3; Zech 12 6). The construction of the ancient 'torch' is, however, obscure and no longer exactly known. In Mt 25 1-8 RVmg. needlessly confuses 'torch' with 'lamp' which is here the proper term.

TORMENT, PLACE OF. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 39.

TORTOISE. See PALESTINE, § 26.

TOU, tō'u (יִשְׁבָּן, tō'a): King of Hamath (q.v.), who by presents acknowledged David's suzerainty, and also congratulated him on his victories over Hadarezer (II S 8 9 f. Toi, יִשְׁבָּן, tō'a; I Ch 18 9 f.).

TOWER. See CITY, § 3.

TOWER OF BABEL: A huge ziggurat, or tower-temple, called Elemenaki ('house of the foundation of heaven and earth'), that stood near Esagila, the temple of Bel-Marduk at Babylon (Heb. Babel). It was begun by a prehistoric Sumerian king, whose name was unknown even to his Babylonian successors; but was left unfinished, probably on account of political disturbances incident to the entrance of the Semites into Babylonia. For thousands of years its ruins were one of the wonders of the world. Knowledge of it was carried to the Hebrews, and in the J narrative of Gn 11 1-9 we are told how the men of Shinar purposed to build a tower whose top might reach into heaven, but how J' frustrated them by confusing their tongues, i.e., by mixing the population of Babylonia. Sennacherib endeavored to obliterate it when he destroyed Babylon, but its massive foundations resisted his efforts. Esarhad-don and Assurbanipal attempted to complete it, but were unsuccessful. Nabopolassar continued the work, but died before he had finished it. Nebuchadrezzar had the glory of being the first king of Babylon to bring it to completion. In his inscriptions he gives an accurate account of its appearance. The bottom stage was 300 ft. in length and breadth, and about 120 ft. in height; and above this were six other stages that diminished continually in size. Since the decline of Babylon, its ruins have served for centuries as a brick quarry for all the surrounding country, so that now all that is left of the tower is a hole 300 ft. square where the foundations once stood. See plan of Babylon, p. 88.

TOWN CLERK (γραμματεὺς): An official of varied power and functions at different periods and in different parts of the Greek world, and recognized by the Romans in their colonial government. In imperial times, the Ephesian clerk ranked next to the highest native official, the boularch (president of the boulē, the city 'council,' or 'senate'), and was called, with apparent indifference, the city (town) clerk (γραμματεὺς τῆς πόλεως), the people's clerk (γραμματεὺς τοῦ δήμου), and the senate clerk (γραμματεὺς τῆς βουλῆς). He audited the accounts of the Bank of Ephesus in the Artemisium, and, in virtue of his important official position, tho a native, not a Roman, official, came into close contact with the proconsul of Asia, whose residence at that time was Ephesus. He is referred to but once in the N T, in connection with the riot in Ephesus brought about by Demetrius the silversmith (Ac 19 35). He succeeded in quieting the tumult, and, in a speech which shows a clear understanding of his own responsibility and the legal procedure possible for the complainants (vs. 35-40), dismissed the assembly. Since the clerk was accountable to the proconsul, it was to his regularly constituted court that he suggested recourse be had (ver. 38. The plural 'there are proconsuls' ['deputies AV] is purely general, referring to the officials as a class). J. R. S. S.*—S. A.

TRACHONITIS, trak'o-nai'tis (Τραχωνίτις, from τραχὺς, 'rough,' the rendering of the Arab. wa'ar, 'waste region' = Heb. ya'ar, 'thicket,' 'jungle'): A rugged and inaccessible region 370 sq. m. in extent, lying S. of Damascus and between the Anti-Lebanon range on the W. and the mountains of Batanæ on the E.—the modern Lejā, which is really the lava-field formed in prehistoric times from the craters of the mountains of Hauran on the S. and SE. TRADE AND COMMERCE: 1. Introductory. The Israelites were not, originally, a trading people. As nomads, they were able to provide, for the most part, for all their necessities, and were not dependent on other people. It is not likely that they carried on any extensive trading operations, until they had become welded into one nation in the Kingdom period. When Israel entered Canaan, it found there a people long accustomed to trade, and, as this naturally centered in the Canaanite cities, it was not until these cities had passed into Israelite control and their population had become absorbed into Israel that the Israelites themselves became interested in trade. By the time of the establishment of the Kingdom, this process was about completed.

In this period, however, several factors conspired to give trade a more important place in Israel's life. In the first place, city life now developed more rapidly. Jerusalem, and later Samaria, as capital cities, became centers of commercial activity. These and other cities, as they grew in population, became markets for the exchange of commodities. Cities containing sanctuaries were particularly likely to become markets. They were places where the countrymen could bring the products of their farms, their flocks, and their looms, and exchange these for articles manufactured in the cities or brought there for sale from other countries. An additional factor was the closer relations with other nations, especially Syria, Phœnicia, and the Assyrian Empire. From about 900 to 734 B.C. Damascus was the chief city of a large and flourishing Aramean kingdom which, with other Aramean states to the NW. and N., was largely interested in trade. Assyria attained to the height of her power in the 8th and 7th cents. B.C. These political consolidations gave a great impetus to trade all through SW Asia, and Israel was by no means unaffected by them. In the third place, kings interested themselves in trade, probably as much for their own personal gain as for any national advantage. Solomon seems to have given great attention to commerce. He equipped a trading fleet at Ezion-geber on the Red Sea, manned it with Phœnician sailors, loaded it, presumably, with suitable articles of exchange, and sent it once in three years to Ophir (q.v.), whence it brought back gold, alnug-trees, and precious stones (I K 9 26 ff., 10 11 f.), also silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks (10 22, navy of Tarshish = 'a fleet of large vessels, such as the Phœnicians used in their trade with Tarshish'). The visit of the queen of Sheba (SW. Arabia) was also probably not without commercial considerations. The reference (I K 10 15) to 'the traffic of the merchants' as a source of revenue implies the levying of toll on traveling traders. The traffic in horses and chariots (I K 10 28 f.) has reference to the importation of horses from Mutsri and Kue (Cappadocia and Cilicia, so Winkler in KAT<sup>3</sup>, p. 238 f.), probably for the king's own use, tho possibly also to sell to other countries, as Egypt. I K 10 28 should read 'and the export of horses for King Solomon was from Mutsri and Kue. The king's traders procured them from Kue at a price.' When Omri, the ablest of the kings of N. Israel, was compelled to give Syrian traders bazaar quarters in Samaria (I K 20 34), he probably sought to offset this disadvantage by cementing a marriage alliance with the royal house of Phœnicia, the great trading nation. This gave him an opportunity to market the immense tribute of wool he received from the subject Moabites (cf. II K 3 4). Ahab, the son of Omri, was quick to take advantage of a victory over Benhadad to secure trading quarters for Israelite merchants in Damascus (I K 20 34). Jehoshaphat made an (unsuccessful) attempt to reopen the trade on the Red Sea (I K 22 48). Such incidental references in the brief record in I and II K show that the kings of Israel took an active part in the commercial operations of their day. While the Jews were in exile, they lived in the midst of a flourishing commercial environment, and doubtless many became closely identified with it. At the Return the majority of these probably preferred to remain in the East, and the colony of returned exiles was made up mostly of agriculturists. Nevertheless, in the century between the Return (536) and Nehemiah (444) a considerable commercial life had developed in Jerusalem, as such passages as Neh 3 8, 11, 31, 5 1 ff., 13 15 ff. abundantly testify. The great system of roads constructed by the Persians was conducive to a further development of commerce throughout their empire, and the introduction of Greek civilization, with its many Greek cities or colonies, scattered here and there throughout SW. Asia, was most closely connected with the pursuit of trade. Under the Roman dominion the commerce of the East attained to vast proportions.

At the same time, Israel in Palestine, especially that part of it occupying Judea, never became distinctively a trading people. Down to the fall of the Jewish state they retained much of their early simple predominantly agricultural (or pastoral) type of life. The Canaanites and Arameans to a large extent, and the Phœnicians almost altogether, gained their living from trade; Israel did not. This is the reason, probably, why references to trade are, comparatively, so few and vague in the O T. Even the Law contains but a few enactments touching the subject, and these are of the simplest character. The prophets who lived so close to the life of their times, touch upon it only incidentally, tho such passages as Is 2 7, 3 16 ff., 5 8; Am 2 6, 4 1, 8 4 f.; Mic 2 1 f.; Hos 12 7, show that much of it was present before their eyes, while such descriptions of foreign commerce (see TYRE) as we find in Is ch. 23 and in Ezk ch. 26 f. show how wide-spread was the knowledge of this in Israel. While the prophets were, on the whole, in favor of the more simpler and less luxurious type of life, they did not condemn trade as such, but only the greed, selfishness, oppression, and dishonesty so often manifested in connection with it.

2. Trade-Routes. Palestine is so situated that the trade between Egypt and Arabia on the one hand, and Syria, Mesopotamia, and the farther East on the other, must touch its borders very closely, or cross it at some points, tho it need not pass directly through the country. The great trade-routes of antiquity, consequently, were vitally related to Israel. (1) From Damascus, where the routes from the East converged, a road led past Mt. Hermon and the sources of the Jordan to Tyre. Thence it ran S. along the coast to Acco, where it divided, one branch following the coast closely, the other crossing the E. part of Mt. Carmel and running along the E. edge of the coast plain. At Ashdod, these roads united, and continued along the coast via Gaza to Egypt. (2) Another route from Damascus crossed the Jordan S. of Lake Huleh, touched the NW. shore of the Sea of Galilee, thence passed SW. across Galilee via Nazareth and the Plain of Esdraelon, and on via Megiddo to its junction with route (1), at a point about 10 m. E. of Caesarea. (3) From Damascus toward W. Arabia a great road ran along the E. border of Palestine and Moab to Ma'an and Elath (on the Red Sea, Gulf of Akaba) and thence to the various cities of SW. Arabia. (4) From the E. Jordan regions (Gilead, etc.; cf. Gn 37 25) a route crossed the Jordan near Bethshan, and, passing through this city, led up the Valley of Jezreel and through the E. end of the Plain of Esdraelon and thence through the Plain of Dothan to its junction with the coast road to Egypt. (5) From SW. Arabia several routes (one via Elath, another via Ma'an and Petra) traversed the region S. of Palestine and converged at Gaza, where they met the great seacoast route between SW. Asia and Egypt. With the exception of routes (2) and (4), none of these roads traversed the territory actually occupied by the Israelites, who, dwelling for the most part on the highlands, were somewhat isolated. The more advantageous position of Zebulun and Issachar, who dwelt in the Plain of Esdraelon, where routes (2) and (4) were joined by several cross-country roads, is reflected in Dt 33 18 f. The main routes were, however, easily accessible from the highlands. An important road ran along the crest of the central range. From Hebron, where several roads from W., S. and E. converged, it ran N. to Jerusalem, Bethel, Shechem, and on to Bethshan, and from each of these places roads diverged E. and W. to the different parts of the land. Jericho also was a meeting-point of roads leading up and down and across the Jordan to the highlands on either side.

3. Terms for Trade in the O T. Altho Israel was not a trading nation, there was a great deal of traffic of the simpler sort carried on within the nation between city and country, between individuals, etc., and the terms connected with such traffic are quite numerous. Terms signifying buy are kārāh (Dt 2 6; Hos 3 2), lāqah, 'to get' or 'to take' (Neh 5 3, 10 31; Lv 25 13 ff., etc.), shābhar (Qal.), used especially of grain purchased (Gn 41 57, etc.), and in the NT, ἀγοράζειν (passim), ἀνίστασθαι (Ac 7 16), and ἐμπορεύεσθαι (Ja 4 13, 'trade' RV). For sell the common word is mākhār (Gn 25 31, etc.), while shābhar (Hēph.) is used of grain (Gn 42 6, etc.). In the N T ἀποδιδόναι, πωρᾶσκειν, and πωλεῖν occur. For trade and traffic we have nāthan, 'to give' (Ezk 27 12 ff.), shāhar (Gn 34 10, 21), ἐργάζεσθαι (Mt 25 16; Rev 18 17), and ἐμπορεύεσθαι (Ja 4 13). Shāhar, 'to go about here and there,' in the participle form shōhēr, is often rendered merchant, and its derivative noun, shāhar, merchandise, indicates that the 'merchant' was originally a peddler. The proper noun k'na'an and the adj. k'na'ānī meaning 'Canaanite' (including the Phenicians) is often used in the sense of merchant, or 'trader,' indicating that nearly everything outside of ordinary domestic barter was originally in the hands of the Canaanites and Phenicians (Job 41 6; Pr 31 24, etc.). In I K 10 16 and II Ch 9 14 we have 'anshē hattārīm, 'men who spy out,' like shōhēr, for itinerant traders (chapmen in II Ch 9 14 AV). Each of the Eng. words wealth, riches, goods, substance, merchandise, wares, and price has behind it a great variety of Heb. and Gr. terms, one of which, mignēh, from qānāh as (e.g., Job 1 3), means also 'cattle,' indicating that once cattle were the chief item of wealth. The terms for caravan, sometimes called company, are related to terms meaning 'path,' or 'to go,' or 'to wander' (Gn 37 25; Job 6 18 f.; Is 21 13). For tribute there are five different terms, none of which is especially significant. For both lending and borrowing, the most-used term was lāwāh (Ex 22 25; Dt 28 12; cf. esp. Neh. 5 4). Nāshā', and also nāshakh 'to bite,' whence neshekh (see below), were used especially of loaning on interest (mashshā' and mashshā'āh), which was not viewed favorably by many (Dt 24 11; Neh 5 3 ff., etc.). Neshekh, usury (Ps 15 5; Ex 22 25 f., etc.), which was perhaps originally not considered the same as interest (cf. Nowack, Arch. I, p. 354), was severely condemned (Lv 25 36; Dt 23 19, etc.). From the verb nāshā' we have nōsheh (ptcpl.), 'creditor' (II K 4 1), and from the same root come the words for debt. In the N T δανειστής is creditor (Lk 7 41), while δανειον (Mt 18 27), δειλὴ (Mt 18 32), δρεπόμενον (Mt 18 30) stand for debt, and χρεορρελότης (Lk 7 41, 18 5) for debtor. For mortgage (vb.) we have 'arabh, 'pledge' (Neh 5 3; cf. Eph 1 14, ἀρραβών), and for pledge or 'security' hābhal, hābhōl, and hābhōlāh (Ex 22 25; Ezk 33 15, 18 7). To pay is nāthan, 'to give' (Nu 20 19), shālam (in P'el, Ex 21 36), shāqal, 'to weigh' (Ex 22 17) and, in the N T, ἀποδιδόναι (Mt 5 26). In the N T for changer of money we have κολλυβιστής (Jn 2 15), from κόλλυβος, (1) 'a small coin,' and then (2), 'rate of exchange,' and κερματιστής (Jn 2 14), from κερματίζειν, 'to make small change' (cf. κέρμα, 'a small coin,' ver. 15), also τραπεζίτης (Mt 25 27, from τράπεζα, 'table'), a 'money broker,' or banker (ex-changer AV). The word τράπεζα is rendered bank in Lk 19 23. In Lk 16 6 f. we have γράμμα, 'writing,' rendered bond (RV), or bill (AV), meaning a note, or acknowledgement of debt, signed by the debtor (see Edersheim, LTM, II, p. 272 f.).

4. Articles for Trade. While in ordinary years, with careful cultivation, Palestine always yielded more than sufficient for home consumption, the surplus for export was never very great. In favorable years, grain and olive-oil could be exported (I K 5 11; cf. Ac 12 20). Balm (q.v.), tragacanth gum, myrrh, or ladanum, pistachio-nuts, and almonds (Gn 37 25, 43 11) were also exported, especially from Gilead. Wool and linen, and probably other products of the loom, could be marketed (cf. Pr 31 13 ff., 24). Pottery also was made in great quantities, and salt (from the Dead Sea) was an important item of trade. In N T times the export of cured fish from the Sea of Galilee was very large. Imports would be metals, precious stones, curiosities, and articles of luxury, such as incense, ointments, and perfumes, things made of ivory and precious woods, silks (cf. Am 3 12), and fine linen, such articles as are mentioned in Is 3 16 ff., dates from the desert, timber from Lebanon, weapons, horses, etc. Slaves also were bought and sold in great numbers (cf. Am 1 9, 9). For the trade of Tyre see Ezk ch. 27.

5. Business Methods. The earliest business methods of the Israelites were, doubtless, very simple, such as mere barter and exchange of commodities. With the increase in the use of money, methods became more complex. Goods were transported mainly by beasts of burden, the ass, the mule, and the camel. With ships and ship-commerce the Israelites had almost nothing to do. The only harbor on that part of the coast controlled by them, Joppa, did not come into their possession until the Maccabean period, and the Israelites never were a seafaring people.

The trader peddled his wares from house to house (cf. Pr 31 24), or hawked them through the streets (cf. Neh 13 16). In larger cities, such as Samaria, there were streets,—i.e., bazaar quarters,—where foreign merchants exhibited their goods (I K 20 34, etc.). In process of time, gilds and gild-quarters were to be found in the principal cities (cf. Neh 3 8, 11, 31; also I Ch 2 55, 4 21, where the same fact is evidenced.) On all foreign trade custom, or toll, was demanded, perhaps also for the use of the highways in crossing Palestine from one country to another. Loans, mortgages, and leases were common. Money was placed on deposit to draw interest (Lk 19 23). In ancient Babylon, interest rates were from 10 to 20 per cent., in Greece from 12 to 20 per cent.; in Roman times they were somewhat lower. These more highly developed commercial transactions were probably not common in Israel until after the Exile.

TRADITION (παράδοσις, 'a giving over'): This word signifies first the action of transmitting the account of an event, or the teaching of a matter, then the thing itself that is transmitted. All religions have their traditions. Judaism in the days of Jesus made much of tradition (Mt 15 2 f.; Mk 7 3 f.). The Sadducees denied its authority; but the Pharisees claimed that the only difference between the written body of the Law and the traditional precepts attached to it was one of form (Berakh. 5a). Some even went to the extent of claiming that oral tradition was of superior authority to written law, since the latter depended, after all, on the oral teachings of Moses. The earlier traditions were legal or prescriptive; they were called Hālākāh[-khōth] ('custom'). So far as they were narrative (legendary), they made up the Haggādāh ('narration'). As a reiteration of the Law, they were called Mishnāh ('repetition'). As a series of questionings or investigations into the meaning of the Law, they were called Midhrāsh ('search'), and as a means of teaching, or body of what is taught, they took the name of Talmud. Jesus and after Him, Paul especially, minimized the authority and value of these traditions, bringing them in every case to the ethical standards of a true love of God. A. C. Z.

TRAFFIC. See, in general, TRADE AND COMMERCE.

TRANCE. See REVELATION, § 9.

TRANSFIGURATION: The glorified manifestation of Jesus to His three most intimate disciples on a 'high mountain' (Mt 17 1-8 and ||; cf. II P 1 17 f.). The time of the event is fixed by its connection with the visit of Jesus to Cæsarea Philippi and the disciples' confession of Him there as the Messiah (Mt 16 13 ff.). The place has been made the subject of various conjectures. In ancient times some thought that the Transfiguration occurred on the Mt. of Olives. But nothing that precedes the account indicates a journey to Jerusalem by Jesus and His disciples so soon after the events of Cæsarea Philippi. Another ancient view supported by Jerome (Ep. xxvii, Epitaph. Paul.) identifies Mt. Tabor near Nazareth as the Mount of Transfiguration. This belief underlies also the annual celebration of the event by the Greek Church under the name of Thaborion (Θαβώριον); but the distance from Cæsarea Philippi and Jesus' appearance immediately after the Transfiguration in Capernaum (Mk 9 30) show this view to be improbable. And the fact that there was at the time a village on the summit of Tabor (Jos. BJ, IV, 1 8; II, 20 1), rendering impossible the solitude in search of which Jesus went upon the mountain, positively excludes its historicity. According to the general consensus of recent investigators the Mt. Hermon region in general is the place best corresponding to the conditions, tho this leaves undetermined the special summit of the range, which probably served as the scene of the occurrence.

Just what took place in the Transfiguration it is perhaps impossible to define in more precise terms than those given in the Gospel narrative. According to this the affair was a vision (ὄραμα), and undoubtedly an objective one. The physical appearance of Jesus was changed in such a way as to impress those with Him of a heavenly quality. He was further seen to converse with Moses and Elijah. The minds of the witnesses were so overwhelmed by the experience that Peter, as their representative and spokesman, uttered words which the narrator explicitly describes with the suggestion that they lacked in coherency and reason.

Of greater importance is the significance of the event both for Jesus and the disciples. For Him, it was in the nature of a preparation for the strenuous task which awaited Him. For them, it was a means of assurance that whatever might befall, their Master had a mission from God, and the events of His subsequent life must be interpreted consistently with this fact. This was further the general purport of a declaration through a voice which they recognized to be that of God Himself (Lk 9 35). A. C. Z.

TRANSGRESS: This word and its derivatives (transgressor, transgression) represent that aspect of sin according to which it is viewed either as: (1) 'Disloyalty' or 'treachery,' bāghadh (Ps 59 5; Pr 13 15; I S 14 33, 'dealt treacherously' RV; cf. Ps 25 3; Hab 2 5). (2) A trespass, or interference with the rights of J' in matters devoted to His service (mā'al, I Ch 27, 'trespass' RV; cf. I Ch 5 25, 26 16, 28 19, 36 14; Ezr 10 10; Neh 1 8; but Pr 16 10, 'transgress'). (3) A passing over a line and stepping upon forbidden ground (ābhar, Nu 14 41; Jg 2 20). This is exactly reproduced in the N T words παράβαλειν, παράβατης, and παράβασις (Mt 15 2 f.; Gal 2 18; Ja 2 9; Ro 4 15). (4) A 'rebellion,' or 'revolt' (pesha', I K 8 50; Ezr 10 13; applied by the Prophets in matters of religion, Is 43 27; Ezk 18 22 f., etc.). (5) A 'violation of law' (ἀνομία, I Jn 3 4; but 'lawlessness' RV; cf. the citation from the LXX. in the narrative of the Crucifixion, Mk 15 28 and ||). A. C. Z.

TRANSLATE: This term renders in the O T (AV) the Heb. word hā'ābhūr, Hiph. of ābhar (II S 3 10) in its primitive sense of transferring (so AV). In the N T it denotes (1) figuratively, the passage of the believer from the kingdom of darkness into that of light (μετέστημι, Col 1 13), and (2) specifically, the exceptional passage of Enoch from the earthly to the heavenly life without experiencing death (μετα-τεθῆμι, He 11 5). A. C. Z.

TREAD: In the phrase 'tread out the corn,' Gr. ἀλῶω, (I Co 9 9; I Ti 5 18) the word is used as the equivalent of 'thresh.' See AGRICULTURE and illustration on p. 29. See also VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1.

TREASURE, TREASURIES. (1) In the O T these terms usually render 'tsār, 'something laid up or away,' and is used for royal treasures, gold, silver, and similar things (I K 14 26, 15 18, etc.), of the treasures of the sanctuary (I K 7 51, 15 18, etc.), and of goods or wealth in general (Pr 8 21, 15 18, 21 6; Jer 49 4, etc.). It is also used somewhat figuratively of the resources of nature which are at the disposal of God (Dt 28 12; Job 38 22). (2) ginzān (Aram.) is used of the royal treasures of Persia (Ezr. 5 17, 6 1, 7 20). (3) hōsen (from hāsan, 'to preserve') is twice rendered 'treasure' (Pr 15 6; Ezk 22 25). (4) mafmōn, something 'hidden' (Gn 43 23; Job 3 21; Pr 2 4; Jer 41 8 AV). (5) mikhmannām (Dn 11 43). (6) mišk'nōth (pl.), from perhaps Assyr. šakānu, 'to place (goods); only in the combination 'ārē mišk'nōth, 'cities of storing,' i.e., magazine cities (Ex 1 11). (7) 'āthūdh (variant for 'āthādh, 'ready,' 'prepared'; Is 10 13; cf. Est. 8 13). (8) sāphūn (pass. ptclpl., 'hidden' things (Dt 33 19). (9) θησαυρός, θησαυρίζειν, the N T equivalent of (1), above (Mt 2 11, 6 19, etc.). (10) γάλα, a Persian word (Ac 8 27). E. E. N.

TREASURE CITY. See PITHOM.

TREASURER: This term, as used in the EVV, properly renders only the Heb. gizbār (from the Pers. ganjvar), the title of Mithredath, a Persian official (Ezr 1 8; cf. also 7 21 and the Aramaic variant gdhābherayyā, Dn 3 2 f.). In Is 22 15 the title given to Shebna is šōkhēn, of which 'treasurer' is a somewhat too specific rendering, since šōkhēn means 'steward' or 'caretaker' in general. In Neh 13 13, the expression 'I made treasurers' is the rendering of but one word, a verb, in the Heb. and is not of technical significance. Its meaning is explained at the end of the verse. The Gr. title of Erastus (Ro 16 23, 'chamberlain' AV) is οικονόμος, 'steward.' The duties of the οικονόμος of a city included the management of its finances, and 'treasure' RV is an adequate rendering. A. C. Z.

TREASURY. See TEMPLE, § 28.

TREE: This is the rendering of the Heb. ēts, and of the Gr. δένδρον or ξύλον. In the Arabian desert trees grew only in watered oases; consequently, they shared the sanctity of springs in the esteem of the Primitive Semites (see SEMITIC RELIGION, §§ 7, 9 (b), 11). Among the Canaanites and Hebrews, tree-worship lasted down to late times (Gn 12 6 f., 13 18, 21 33 23, 17 35 4, 8; Ex 3 2; Dt 12 2, 16 21; Jos 24 26; Jg 4 5, 6 11, 19, 24, 9 37; I S 14 2, 22 6, 31 13; II S 5 24; I K 6 29, 32, 35, 14 23; II K 16 4, 17 10; Ps 52 8, 92 13; Is 57 5, 65 3, 66 17; Jer 2 20, 3 6, 13, 17 2; Ezk 6 13, 20 28). Even when this cult was abolished a memory of it survived in poetry (Ps 104 16, 148 9; Is 44 23, 55 12). Trees were also cultivated for their fruit (Gn 1 11; Dt 6 11; Ec 2 5 f.), and one of the first efforts of an enemy was to cut them down (Dt 20 20; II K 3 19, 25; Jer 6 6). A blighting of the fruit crop was regarded as a sure sign of the anger of J' (Ex 9 25, 10 15; Lv 26 20; Dt 28 42; Jer 7 20; Jl 1 12, 19; Hag 1 11, 2 19; Rev 7 1, 3, 8 7), and, on the other hand, a plentiful harvest was a token of His favor (Lv 26 4; Ezk 34 27, 36 30, 47 7; Jl 2 22). To propitiate Him, the fruit of trees was not eaten for the first four years (Lv 19 23), and first-fruits were offered (Ex 22 20). For other uses of trees see Gn 18 4, 8; Ex 15 25; Jg 9 48; I K 5 10; Is 40 20, 44 14 f.; Jer 10 3. In Heb. the word ēts is used also for 'wood' or 'beam,' hence to 'hang on a tree' (Gn 40 19; Dt 21 22 f.; Jos 8 29, 10 26 f.; Est 2 23; Ac 5 30, 10 30, 13 20, etc.) means to suspend on a gallows or cross.

Trees were favorite subjects for parables among the Hebrews (Jg 9 8-15; I K 4 33; Mt 3 10, 7 17 f.; 12 33). In poetry they stand as a figure of longevity (Is 65 22), or of strength and pride. Their felling is a symbol of the sudden destruction that overtakes the arrogant (Is 2 13, 10 34 f.; Ezk 17 22 f., 31 3-14; Job 19 10, 24 20; Ec 11 3). The forest fire is also used frequently as a symbol of national disaster (Is 9 18, 10 17-19; Ezk 20 47). The righteous is compared to a fruitful, well-watered tree (Jer 17 8; Ps 1 3; Pr 3 18, 11 30, 13 12, 15 4; Mt 3 10, 7 17, 12 33), which, even when it is cut down, sends up new shoots from the roots (Is 4 2, 6 13, 11 1). For the different kinds of trees in the Bible see PALESTINE, § 21. L. B. P.

TRIAL OF JESUS. See JESUS CHRIST, § 17.

TRIBE, TRIBES: In the O T these terms are the translation of two Hebrew words, shēbhet and matteh; and in the N T they render φυλή. With two exceptions (Is 19 13, 'tribes'—'nomes' of Egypt, and Mt 24 30, in a general sense), these words are always applied to the twelve tribes of Israel. Until the monarchy effaced it, the tribal form of social organization prevailed in Israel. Even then the people clung to it as an ideal, and it still appears in the Apocalypse of the N T (Rev ch. 7).

1. Tribal Organization. Our knowledge of tribal customs and laws among the Hebrews is supplemented and confirmed by what has been learned of similar institutions in ancient Arabia. The fundamental unit was the clan, and a tribe was constituted by the union of several clans. In the O T there are two words for 'clan,' mishpāhāh, translated 'family,' and 'eleph, a community or association (EV 'thousand'). The clan was composed of 'brothers' (= kinsmen Gn 24 27, 29 15, I S 20 20), or more strictly kinsmen on the father's side; in the O T such associations are termed 'father's houses' or simply 'houses.' The leaders of the tribes are termed 'princes' or rulers (Ex 34 31), heads (Nu 1 16), or chiefs (Gn 36 15 ff., dukes AV), tho their common title is 'elders,' which corresponds exactly to the Arabic sheik. The council of the elders would answer to the divan among the Arabs. Tribal brotherhood was based upon blood relationship, real or assumed, and participation in a tribal cult. Traces of tribal religion in the form of totemism and ancestor-worship are supposed to be found in the O T. 'Simeon,' according to the etymology of Gn (29 33), is derived from shāma', 'to hear'; but many scholars consider it an animal name, synonymous with the Arabic sim'u, which denotes a cross between a wolf and a hyena. In addition Leah ('wild cow?'), Levi (as if gentile from Leah), and Rachel ('ewe') have been used as props for this theory. Philologically, this view has a shaky foundation. In support of the theory of primitive ancestor-worship, the mourning customs, the tombs of the patriarchs, and especially the pillar at Rachel's grave (Gn 35 20) have been advanced, but without sufficient reason. Gad is the name of an ancient Semitic god of fortune (Is 65 11; and cf. Aramaic inscriptions), but there is no adequate reason for asserting that he was the tribal deity of the Israelitic tribe of the same name. If the Hebrew clans ever had tribal cults, the religion of J'' effectually obliterated them. The forms of idolatry against which the prophets thundered were borrowed from their neighbors. See SEMITIC RELIGION, § 5.

2. The Genealogical System. According to the O T, the twelve sons of Jacob were the founders of the Israelitic tribes. The number twelve has caused some interpreters unnecessary difficulty; according to Cheyne, it is due to a priestly theory, Winckler prefers to refer the number to mythological influences deriving it from the signs of the Zodiac, while Stade thinks it is based upon the prefectures of Solomon. Rejecting these conjectures, we ask why could Jacob not have had twelve sons as well as any other number? The real problem lies in the general principles which are assumed by the interpreter. Without any adequate proof it has been laid down as an axiom that 'New nations never originate through the rapid increase of a tribe; new tribes never through derivation from a family propagating itself abundantly through several generations.' But the O T narrative, altho regarding the twelve sons of Jacob as tribal ancestors, does not imply that the tribes of Israel grew entirely by the propagation of a single family. There was the mixed multitude (Ex 12 38; Nu 11 4), there were accretions from without in the form of slaves, concubines, and above all natural growth was accelerated by the accession of foreign clans, e.g., the Kenites (Jg 1 16) and Calebites (Jg 1 12 ff.; cf. I Ch 2 9, 18, 42). The genealogy of the Hebrew tribes may be put in the form of a tree:

Thus the twelve tribes go back to one father, Jacob-Israel, and to four mothers, Leah and Rachel being full wives, while Bilhah and Zilpah were concubines.

Let us look at the modern hermeneutical principles laid down for the tribal interpretation of the patriarchal narratives. (1) The name of the father is really the designation of a tribe; (2) a wife or mother is a smaller tribe which is absorbed by a stronger, e.g., Leah by Jacob; (3) a marriage denotes the amalgamation of two different tribes, a concubine signifying a less important tribe; (4) the birth of a child denotes the origin of a new tribe. Such a theory of the patriarchal narratives, altho scientific, is extremely problematic. Even in a brief criticism several weak points in the theory may be noted. It disregards the personal elements of the narratives, which are exceedingly true to life, e.g., the strife and jealousy between Leah and Rachel, or the family life of Judah; it asserts or assumes many general principles without any real proof. If the genealogical grouping is a reflex of political and geographical conditions, the relation of the tribes as revealed in the later history ought to correspond to it. Here is where the theory completely breaks down, for certain tribes, closely connected in the genealogical scheme, are without close political relations, and are far removed from one another geographically, e.g., Gad and Asher; Judah, Issachar, and Naphtali; and, altho conjectural theories abound which from the nature of the case can not be established, yet it remains a fact that no positive proofs have been advanced against the accuracy in all essentials of the O T account of the origin of the Hebrew tribes. In Scripture the tribes are grouped in many different orders, according to various principles of arrangement: (1) According to their relationship to Jacob, his wives, and concubines (Gn chs. 29-35, 46 and 49;

Ex ch. 1; Nu chs. 1, 2, 7, 10, 13, and 26; I Ch chs. 2 and 27). (2) Geographical position (Nu ch. 34; Dt ch. 33; Jos. chs. 13 ff.; Jg ch. 5; I Ch ch. 12; Rev ch. 7). (3) Geography modified by tradition (the more important tribes blessing, and the lesser cursing, in Dt ch. 27). (4) An ideal grouping (Ezk ch. 48).

3. The Tribal Ancestors. Of the personal life of most of the sons of Jacob nothing is known; they are mere names. Of some, a few facts have been preserved. Simeon and Levi are associated together in a treacherous attack on the inhabitants of Shechem to avenge the rape of their sister Dinah (Gn ch. 34) after a settlement had been effected. For this crime both are severely rebuked in the Blessing of Jacob, and their posterity is destined to be scattered in Israel (Gn 49 5 ff.). Rachel died in giving birth to Benjamin near Ephratah; she named him Benoni ('son of my sorrow'), which Jacob changed to 'Benjamin' ('son of the right hand,' Gn 35 16-18). He is represented as the darling of his father, who reluctantly permitted him to go down to Egypt with his brethren (Gn chs. 42 ff.). Judah ('praised') was the fourth son of Jacob by Leah (Gn 29 35), but he acts as a leader among his brethren, and soon appears with the rights of the first-born. Reuben, the eldest, and Judah both act as representatives of the brothers in the history of Joseph. Judah is the leader in Gn 37 26, 43 3, 44 16, 46 28 (J), Reuben in Gn 37 22, 42 37 (E). Judah is not portrayed in a favorable light in Gn ch. 38. He married a Canaanitish wife who bore him three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. For Er his father took a wife Tamar by name, but when Er died childless, Onan refused to perform his duty according to the law of levirate marriage. Then in order to secure redress for her wrong Tamar, disguising herself as a Temple prostitute (q'dhēshāh), enticed Judah, who by her became the father of Perez and Zerah. Judah's actions are not to be judged exclusively by the standards of our day; in general, he acted honorably according to the ideals of his time. Many modern writers interpret this story as a naïve method of stating tribal relations. Tamar was thus a Canaanitish clan which united with the Israelite tribe of Judah. If such were really the case, the narrative could scarcely have taken on such a form, throwing serious reflections on the character of the founder of the tribe to which David belonged (ch. 38 is assigned to J, the Judaic document). Reuben ('behold a son') is the first-born of Jacob and Leah (Gn 29 32). As a boy of seven or eight, he gathers mandrakes for his mother (Gn 30 14). His character has both a darker and a brighter side. He commits incest with his father's concubine Bilhah (35 22); and in the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49 3, 4) he is said to have lost his rights as first-born in consequence of this crime (cf. I Ch 5 1). On the other hand, in the story of Joseph he appears as a noble character, above the little and mean jealousies of his brothers; he saves Joseph's life (Gn 37 21, 22, 29), acts as spokesman for the others (Gn 42 22 ff.), and pledges his two sons to Jacob as surety for the return of Benjamin from Egypt (42 37).

4. Tribal History. In this article the history of the separate tribes will not be followed later than the era of the Judges. For subsequent conditions, see ISRAEL. During the desert march the tribes, according to P, were divided into four groups. Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun encamped on the E. of the sanctuary and formed the van in the march; they were followed by Reuben, Simeon, and Gad to the S. of the Tabernacle. After them came, in two divisions, Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, followed by Dan, Asher, and Naphtali, the former pitching their tents to the W. and the latter to the N. of the tent of meeting (Nu ch. 2). A list of the clans of the various tribes may be found in Gn ch. 46 and Nu ch. 26. We have also a detailed census both at the Exodus (Nu chs. 1, 2) and thirty-eight years later, at the close of the wanderings (Nu ch. 26). The tribes of Judah and Ephraim played the most important part in the history of the nation, and there was a constant duel between the two for the hegemony of Israel.

Judah's position in the van of the desert march indicated the preeminence of this tribe, which numbered 76,500 at the second census (Nu 26 22). By the admission of a Kenite element (Jg 1 16) and two Kenizzite clans, Caleb and Othniel (Jg 1 12-16, 20; Jos 14 6-15, 15 13-19), this tribe was materially increased. Judah absorbed Simeon also, which had dwindled during the desert wanderings from 59,300 (Nu 1 23) to 22,200 (Nu 26 12 ff.). Simeon is mentioned neither in the Blessing of Moses (Dt ch. 33) nor in the Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5). These omissions clearly indicate that as early as the period of the Judges this tribe had lost its identity, and there is ample evidence for its absorption by Judah. In the conquest it acted with Judah (Jg 1 3). The territory allotted to Simeon (Jos 19 1-9) really belonged to Judah (cf. Jos 15 28-32, 42), and after the Exile only Judahites are mentioned as inhabiting these cities (Neh 11 23 ff.). The territory of Judah naturally falls into four parts: (1) The hill-country (Jos 15 48 ff.); (2) the wilderness, running from the central range to the shores of the Dead Sea (Jos 15 61 ff.); (3) the Shephelah, lying between the Maritime plain and the higher hills (Jos 15 33 ff.); (4) the Negeb or 'South' on the extreme south (Jos 15 21 ff.). The S. boundary of Judah ran from the lower end of the Dead Sea by way of Kadesh-barnea to Wādy el-'Arīsh; the N. border extended in an irregular line from Kiriath-jearim, in the Shephelah, to En-rogel, in the vicinity of Jerusalem, and then passed on to the Jordan (Jos 18 11-20). Judah is not mentioned in the Song of Deborah (Jg ch. 5), and was evidently at that early period working out its own destiny, quite independently of the other tribes.

Immediately to the N., separating Judah from its chief rival, lay the territory of the small but heroic tribe of Benjamin. History verifies the poetic oracle 'Benjamin is a wolf that raveneth' (Gn 49 27); for the tribe was martial, being famous for its archers and slingers (Jg 20 16; I Ch 8 40, 12 2), and among its warriors it numbered Ehud, Saul, and Jonathan. It took part with the Northern tribes in the campaign against Sisera (Jg 5 14). The line separating its territory from that of Ephraim ran from the Jordan near Jericho by the way of Bethel (counted to Benjamin in Jos 18 13, to Ephraim in I Ch 7 28) to Beth-horon the lower. Ephraim occupied the middle portion of the land north of Benjamin and, ideally at least, its territory extended from the Jordan down to the seacoast (Jos 16 6 ff., 17 7 ff.). In two poetic oracles (Gn 49 22-26; Dt 33 13-17) the closely related tribes Ephraim and Manasseh are promised a fertile soil and indomitable military courage. The former was unable fully to conquer its allotment, for Gezer remained in the hands of the Canaanites until the reign of Solomon; but is said to have captured Aijalon and Shaalvim, both originally Danite territory (Jg 13 5 ff.). Ephraim absorbed Canaanitish elements, especially at Shechem (Jg 9 1 ff.). In consequence of haughty demeanor as chief tribe, there was considerable friction between it and leaders from other parts of Israel, e.g., Gideon and Jephthah. Among its tribal heroes we find Joshua, Samuel, and Jeroboam I. After the disruption of the monarchy, Ephraim became a designation of the Northern Kingdom.

Before proceeding further N. let us turn to the valleys of Aijalon and Sorek, which lie to the NW. of Jerusalem. In the original allotment of the land, these fell to Dan (Jos 19 40-48). The taunt of Deborah (Jg 5 17), 'And Dan, why did he remain in ships?' indicates that at one time its territory extended down to the seacoast. It may have occupied Joppa (Jg 1 34 ff.). A majority of this tribe, unable to maintain their position and hemmed in by Amorites and Philistines, were forced to migrate to the extreme N., and conquered the city Laish (Jg 18 7, 27 ff.). Samson belonged to the portion of the tribe that remained behind in their original quarters. In the Blessing of Jacob, Dan is likened to 'a serpent in the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels' (Gn 49 16, 17); in the Blessing of Moses, to a 'lion's whelp, that leapeth forth from Bashan' (Dt 33 22). Both similes characterize the tribe as lurking in ambush and suddenly darting forth to attack the foe. This poetic description agrees with the narrative of Jg ch. 18, which tells of the sudden descent of 600 warriors of this tribe upon the peaceful and defenseless inhabitants of Laish (thereafter named Dan).

Directly N. of Ephraim lay the territory of the western branch of the tribe Manasseh. Its allotment stretched westward to the brook Kanah and included cities along the southern edge of the plain of Esdraelon. Here also the conquest was only partial and important points such as Bethshan, Dor, Endor, Taanach, and Megiddo (Jg 1 27 ff.; cf. Jos 17 11 ff.) remained in the possession of the Canaanites. In the story of Deborah (Jg 5 14) Manasseh is referred to as Machir, the name of one of its principal clans. Of Israel's early heroes, Gideon belonged to this tribe. The southern and eastern part of the plain of Esdraelon and the range of Gilboa fell to the lot of Issachar (Jos 19 17-23). The famous Via Maris passed through this territory and was a source of great wealth (Dt 33 19). The poetic characterization of Gn 49 14-15 makes Issachar a strong tribe which succumbed to the enticements of a favorable situation, and was subjugated by the Canaanites. The men of Issachar ardently espoused the cause of the tribes in the campaign against Sisera (Jg 5 15). In the age of the Judges Naphtali was a brave and patriotic tribe, producing Barak (Jg 5 18), and taking part in Gideon's war of liberation from the Midianites (Jg 7 23). Its territory lay to the E. of Asher and Zebulun, and directly W. of the Sea of Galilee, stretching northward to the waters of Merom and the sources of the Jordan. The fertility of this region is proverbial; Josephus spoke of it as a terrestrial paradise, and modern travelers have vied with one another in exhausting their vocabularies to describe the richness and the productivity of the soil—qualities which were noted by ancient Hebrew poets (Gn 49 21; Dt 33 23). The region of which Naphtali's territory was a part later bore the name Galilee, and has been hallowed as no other portion of Palestine, except Jerusalem, by the footsteps of our Lord in His earthly life and ministry. Another tribe which threw itself energetically into the struggle with Sisera was Zebulun (Jg 5 18), but in later periods it played a very unimportant part in the history of Israel. The situation of this territory was especially favorable. According to the limits as given in Jos 19 10-16, it was entirely inland, being bounded on the S. by Issachar, on the W. by Asher, and on the E. and N. by Naphtali. These boundaries included the plain of Asochis. The Blessing of Joseph (Gn 49 13) speaks of this territory in terms which imply an outlet to the sea: 'Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea; And he shall be for a haven of ships; And his border shall be upon Zidon.' It is possible that the boundaries of the tribe varied at different periods of history, and at one time it had an outlet to the sea, as Josephus states. Zebulun was associated with Issachar as growing rich from maritime commerce: 'For they shall suck the abundance of the seas' (Dt 33 19). Zebulun's territory was also a part of that larger section later known as Galilee, and the landscape was 'richly diversified with sylvan vale, fruitful plain, and breezy height.' Asher received as its portion a strip of coastland, stretching from Mt. Carmel to Phenicia (Jos 19 24-31). It was very fertile and especially adapted to the culture of the olive (Dt 33 24). From this section food was exported for the royal table (Gn 49 20). This tribe only partially conquered its territory, for among the cities allotted to it were Acco, Tyre, and Sidon, which never became Israelitic; it was gradually amalgamated with the Canaanites (Jg 1 31), and did not join the tribes to throw off the yoke of Sisera (Jg 5 17). In the inscriptions of Seti I and Rameses II, Asher ('a-ru') is the designation of the Phœnician interior highland, and hence some maintain that originally Asher was a geographical term.

Moses gave permission to Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh to settle E. of the Jordan, provided that they took part in the conquest of the territory assigned to the other tribes (Nu ch. 32). Poetry and history agree in representing Gad as a brave and martial tribe: 'Gad, a troop shall press upon him; but he shall press upon their heel' (Gn 49 19; cf. Dt 33 20). Its environment induced such a character, for the Ammonites, Moabites, and other desert tribes frequently raided its territory (Jg ch. 11). Some of David's bravest warriors, 'whose faces were like the faces of lions, and they were as swift as the roes upon the mountains,' were Gadites (1 Ch 12 8). According to Nu 32 34-36, the territory of Gad lay E. and NE. of the Dead Sea. The cities of this list were situated between the Jabbok and the Arnon. The allotment of Joshua (13 24-28) assigned territory to Gad which stretched from the Sea of Galilee southward to the land of the Ammonites. No doubt the fortunes of war made the boundaries vary at different periods. The inscription of Mesha (q.v.) corroborates the statements of Scripture: 'and the men of Gad dwelt in the land of Ataroth from old' (line 10), and several other Gadite cities are mentioned in the inscription. Reuben was an important tribe in the age of the Judges, for it is severely upbraided for not taking any part in the common defense during the great crisis when the Northern tribes defeated Sisera (Jg 5 15-17). The Reubenites must have suffered greatly at the hands of the Moabites, whose territory adjoined, for their numbers dwindle and they are not heard of in later history. The list of their towns is given in Jos 13 15-23, and they were so situated as to form an enclave within the territory of Gad (Nu 32 37, 38). As Judah absorbed Simeon, so Gad swallowed up Reuben. The character of the land and its effect on tribal history are put in his inimitable style by G. A. Smith: 'These high, fresh moors, the dust of whose paths still bear no footmark save those of sheep and cattle, had attracted two tribes, which, not crossing the Jordan, failed, like the others, to rise from the pastoral to the agricultural stage of life.' Reuben produced no great national hero. After the defeat of Og, the trans-Jordanic portion of the tribe of Manasseh occupied the land E. of the Jordan as far S. as the Jabbok. Their territory extended northward to the lower slopes of Hermon, and to the NE., including a large portion of the Hauran. The villages of Jair were allotted to Manasseh (Dt 3 14). The eastern clans of this tribe held to their pastoral mode of life, and had difficulty in maintaining their position against the nomads of the desert and the Ammonites. On this section cf. also PALESTINE § 29.

Of Levi as a secular tribe little is known. The meaning of the name is uncertain; the view that 'Levi' is not a tribal name, but a professional title (cf. lawi'u, 'priest,' on Minean Inscriptions), is only a conjecture. The fact that Moses was a member of this tribe, as well as its devotion to the cause of Jehovah (Ex 32 25 ff.), gained it the privileges of priestly rank. Early in the history of Israel the Levites became custodians of the sanctuary and its furniture (Nu 3 5 ff.). As the priestly tribe, it had no definite territory, but forty-eight cities were allotted to it (Nu 35 1-8); cf. also PRIESTHOOD, §§ 2 (c), 4, 9.

TRIBUTE. See TAX.

TROAS, trō'as. See ALEXANDRIA TROAS.

TROGYLLIUM, tro-jil'i-um (Τρωγύλιον): The promontory at the foot of Mt. Mycale, in the province of Caria, nearly opposite the island of Samos and not far to the NW. of Miletus. It was here, according to the AV of Ac 20 15, that Paul's ship tarried for part of a day on its voyage along the Asian coast, being detained, probably, by contrary winds. The place of anchorage is still called St. Paul's port. In the channel between Trogyllium and Samos the Greeks destroyed the Persian fleet in 479 B.C.

J. R. S. S.—S. A.

TROOP: Apart from its strict military sense, this term appears in AV for: (1) gadh, the name for the god of 'fortune' (Gn 30 11, 'fortunate' RV=Heb. 'with fortune'). In Is 65 11 (RV 'fortune'), it is the name of the Phœnician and Aramaic god. See FORTUNE and SEMITIC RELIGION, § 22. (2) 'ōrah (Job 6 19, 'caravan' RV).

C. S. T.

TROPHIMUS, trōf'i-mus (Τρόφιμος): A native of Ephesus (Ac 20 4, 21 29) who, with Tychicus, represented the churches of the province of Asia in the presentation of the Gentile gifts to the church in Jerusalem. The Gentile origin of T. is further attested by the tumult occasioned by the suspicion that Paul had taken him into the Temple (Ac 21 29). In II Ti 4 20 T. is said to have been left behind at Miletus, on the occasion of Paul's final journey to Rome.

J. M. T.

TRUCE-BREAKERS: The AV rendering of the Gr. ἀσπονδοί, found only in II Ti 3 3 ('implacable' RV). The original term means, literally, 'without a libation,' i.e., 'without treaty,' the sealing of which was signified by a libation of (cf. Thuc. 1, 37). It was thus used to denote unwillingness to enter into a covenant, i.e., in the sense of 'implacable.'

J. M. T.

TRUMPET. Besides its use as an instrument of music the trumpet-sound was the alarm of war (cf. Am 3 6; Hos 8 1; Is 18 3; Zeph 1 16), a signal for battle or for rallying for war (Jg 3 27, 6 34, 7 18, etc.), and a signal for many other occasions when a public notice of some kind was to be given (I K 1 30; II K 9 13, etc.). See also MUSIC AND MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, § 3 (2).

TRUMPETS, FEAST OF. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2.

TRUTH: 1. O T Terms. The rendering of two Heb. words, 'ēmeth, 'ēmūnāh, whose primary idea is that of stability or firmness. From this sense to that of constancy, the transition is imperceptible. That which is stable is to be depended upon; consequently, even to running water is ascribed the property of truth (Is 33 18, 'sure,' EV). In the next stage, the idea is developed into conscious fidelity (loyalty, honesty) to that which is known to be good, and the conception of truth as a moral quality in a person comes into view. Truth in this sense is primarily the attribute of God Himself—perfect consistency with Himself (Ex 34 6; Ps 25 5, 43 3, etc.).

2. God's Truth. God's truth, however, is most of all emphasized in His relation to His covenant people. It is this quality in Him which encourages His own to trust Him. Therefore, it becomes the ground of their hope that their prayers to Him are heard, and that their taking refuge in Him in time of trouble is effective. His truth is, therefore, pre-eminently combined with His mercy (Ps 25 10, 26 3, 40 10, 85 10, 89 14). But it is also combined with His righteousness (Ps 45 4, 111 8). God's truth is the ground of His righteous judgment (Neh 9 33). This leads to the definition of truth as the truthfulness of God, in the sense that what He says corresponds to His own being and, therefore, to reality in all particulars. All that proceeds from His mouth is truth (Is 45 23)—the uncorrupted, unadulterated expression of His own being and will. (For the N T reproduction of this general idea, i.e., of 'truth' and 'faithfulness' or reliability, cf. such passages as Ro 3 7 [ἀλήθεια], 3 3 [πίστις]; I Co 1 9; I Th 5 24; He 10 23; I P 4 19; I Jn 1 9 [πιστός] as applied to Christ; cf. He 2 17 [ἐλεήμων καὶ πιστός]; Rev 3 14, 19 11 [πιστός καὶ ἀληθινός]; also § 4, below.)

3. Truth in Man. What is an excellence in God is viewed as equally an excellence in man. The king, as exercising prerogatives of sovereignty, must be especially characterized by the same truth which distinguishes God (Ps 45 4; Pr 20 28). As constancy is to be measured, first of all, by conformity to outward reality in man, the characteristic of always conforming to fact comes to be recognized as truth; so that veracity in speech is, above all other things, truth. The man of truth is he whose words can be trusted, because his utterances are exact representations of outward realities. And this sort of truth, or truthfulness, is an accompaniment of the fear of God (Ex 18 21; Ps 15 2). The duty of truthfulness in social relations thus becomes one of the most important obligations, and its opposite is a grievous evil (Ps 101 7; Pr 12 17). A philosophical conception of truth does not appear in the O T. Expressions like 'buy the truth' (Pr 23 23) refer, not to truth in the abstract or, in general, objectively viewed, but to truth as an inner equipment of character.

4. N T Conception. The content of the N T term (ἀλήθεια) is partly derived from the O T through the mediation of the LXX. and the Apocrypha. In the LXX. the O T conception is frequently rendered by 'faithfulness' (πίστις and derivatives; cf., e.g., as regards the Divine character and conduct Ro 3 3; I Co 1 9, 10 13; I Th 5 24; II Th 3 3; He 10 23, 11 11; I P 4 19; I Jn 1 9; He 2 17; Rev 1 5, 3 14), see § 2 above; but it is also rendered by the more classical term ἀλήθεια (as in the N T), with the emphasis on the objective side of reality and consistency with reality. This combination of the two notions is carried through the Apocrypha (cf. To 3 2; Sir 27 9 and To 7 10; Jth 5 5; IV Mac 5 10). Accordingly, the progress of the N T thought is from the original etymological conception of ἀλήθεια, as reality, to that of conformity to reality; then to the expression of that conformity, i.e., veracity, and, lastly, to moral or spiritual reality, especially as embodied in the words and person of Jesus Christ.

5. Special N T Developments. In the individual portions of N T the following shades of meaning appear: (1) In the Synoptic Gospels and Acts the truth is plain reality. In the phrase 'of a truth' (Lk 22 59; Ac 4 27) there is a manifest effort to lay emphasis on the actuality of what is asserted, tho it might appear unexpected or surprising. Otherwise, truth is correspondence to the reality in speech or representation (Mk 5 33). (2) In Ja, I and II P, and He, the truth is the body of Christian teaching which believers accept and present to the world (Ja 1 18, 3 14; I P 1 22; II P 2 2; He 10 26). (3) In the Pauline writings, there is an occasional reversion to the O T sense of the Divine faithfulness (Ro 3 7 [cf. also 3 3, πίστις], 15 8), and occasional equivalency with human veracity (I Co 5 8; II Co 7 14); but, in the main, the truth is the body of thought which God has revealed to men for the purpose of drawing them out of sin to the love of Himself. It is not exactly identical, but generally synonymous, with Paul's favorite term, 'the gospel' (Eph 1 13; cf. also Gal 2 5, 14, 5 7; I Ti 3 15; Ro 2 8). (4) In the Johannine literature the primary conception of simple reality emerges occasionally (I Jn 3 13; II Jn ver. 1, III Jn ver. 1), and with it the sense of accord with reality, as in the phrase 'to speak the truth' (Jn 8 46, 16 7); but predominantly, the truth is a view of eternal moral and spiritual reality hypostatically conceived. Consequently, we find such terms as 'to witness to the truth' (Jn 5 33, 18 37), 'the truth makes free' (Jn 8 32), it 'sanctifies' (Jn 17 19). In its highest and most significant sense, it is embodied in the person of the Incarnate Logos (Jn 14 6).

TRYPHÆNA, trai-fi'næ, AND TRYPHOSA, trai-fō'sæ (Τρύφαινα, Τρυφώσα): Two Christian women mentioned in Ro 16 12, possibly twin sisters (see J. R. Harris, The Dioscuri in the Ch. Legends, 1903). For the story concerning 'Queen Tryphæna' see Acts of Paul and Thecla. Whether she is to be identified with the queen of Pontus mentioned on coins is uncertain. See Ramsay, The Church and the Roman Empire, p. 382.

TUBAL, tū'bal. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

TUBAL-CAIN, tū'bal-ken' (תּוֹבַל־קַיִן, tūbal-qayin): The son of Lamech and Zillah, and the 'forger of every cutting instrument of brass and iron' (Gn 4 22, 'the instructor of every artificer in brass and iron' AV). The word qayin is understood by some to mean 'of Cain' (the tribe); while others think it should probably be translated 'smith,' and not be taken as part of a double name. He was perhaps the eponymous ancestor of Tubal (=the Tibarenians) SE. of the Black Sea (Gn 10 2; Ezk 27 13; Is 66 19).

TWIN BROTHERS (Δίδυμοι, i.e., Castor and Pollux): These were two deities, regarded as the tutelary gods of sailors (Ac 28 11). The ship on which the Apostle Paul sailed either had an inscription indicating that it was dedicated to these deities or figures of them ornamented its prow. See also SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2. E. E. N.

TYCHICUS, tik'i-kos (Τυχιζός): A disciple of Paul, and the bearer of the Colossian letter, who in addition conveyed oral information concerning Paul's state (Col 4 7 f.). Almost exactly the same words are found in Eph 6 21 f., which, on the assumption of the independence of the passages, shows T. to have been also the bearer of the circular letter known as Ephesians. In the Pastorals T. is represented as sent to Ephesus (II Ti 4 12) and to Crete (Tit 3 12). His constant association with churches in the province of Asia confirms the designation of T. in Ac 20 4 as an Ἀσιατός, 'a native of Asia.'

J. M. T.

TYPE: This word does not occur in EVV. The Gr. τύπος means, primarily, 'the mark made by a blow,' 'the print left on a substance by the impact of another,' and so 'the impression of a seal on wax.' The original in such a case is the antitype. But usage is not perfectly consistent and uniform, the original being also called the type, of which the copy is an imitation, or antitype (I Th 1 7; Tit 2 7; I P 5 3). In Biblical interpretation a type is usually understood to be a person, or thing, prefiguring a future person, or thing. Adam was a type of Christ (Ro 5 14). The idea has been elaborated in great detail, involving especially the discovery of correspondences between the different rites of the sacrificial ritual and the parts of Christ's work. The great mass of these correspondences are artificial and imaginary; and the place and value of typology as the science which treats of the principles and results of such correlation (cf. Fairbairn's Typology), are very questionable.

TYRANNUS, tai-ran'us (Τύραννος): The head of a certain 'school' in Ephesus, where Paul carried on his work after his withdrawal from the Synagog (Ac 19 9). The word τυραννος (AV 'one' Tyrannus) is omitted in the best MSS. (N AB), which would indicate that T. was not altogether unknown. That his school was one of considerable influence is implied by the fact that from it the entire province was reached with the gospel. According to D (also Syr. P. marg.), Paul discoursed regularly in this place, ἀπὸ ὥρας ἑ[ξ] (= ἑξαπτετης) ἕως δεκάτης, 'from the fifth to the tenth hour,' after the fashion of the philosophers of the time. It is probable, therefore, that T. was a regular teacher of some sort, with a following more or less large. He may have been also an adherent of the synagog, where he was favorably affected by Paul's preaching. The use of his influence in securing an opening for the gospel would not be contrary to Paul's method (cf. Ac 17 16 f.).

J. M. T.

TYRE, tair (צֵר, tsör, 'rock' = Assyr. tsurru): The best known and most famous of the ancient cities of Phœnicia (q.v.), located on the E. coast of the Mediterranean, not far from the territory of Israel, about 20 m. S. of Sidon. Many extra-Biblical references define the city's limits. Assurbanipal, King of Assyria (668-626 B.C.), says: 'In my third campaign I marched against Baal, King of Tyre, who dwelt in the midst of the sea.' In the Anastasi I Papyrus, T. is spoken of as a city in the sea, to which water is brought in ships, where fish are more plentiful than sand (Müller, Asien und Europa, p. 185). This is paralleled by the Biblical references in Ezk 26 17 ('in the sea') and 27 32 ('in the midst of the sea'). This city 'in the sea' was located on an island—a coral reef—containing about 142 acres. The island was about 1,800 ft. from the mainland, on which stood, on the testimony of ancient authors, a much larger and, in fact, a much older, city called Old Tyre.

The beginnings of T. were very ancient (Is. 23 1-7). Herodotus tells us (II, 44) that the priests of Melkarth told him that it was founded 2,300 years before his visit, that is, about 2750 B.C. Traditions unite to locate the first city on the mainland. Safety from siege, facility in dealing with shipping, and, probably, monopoly of trade, led to the building of the city on the island. Early in Israel's history, it appears to have been a place of importance (Jos 19 29), and to have been well fortified (II S 24 7). In the Tell el-Amarna period (14th cent. B.C.), King Abimelech of Tyre professes his fidelity to the Pharaoh of Egypt. It established numerous manufacturing, both within its own walls, and on the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea, where it produced world-famed goods, such as purple dyes, metal-work, and glassware. It established trade relations with the known world, not only with the countries of the Mediterranean, but with those of every water adjacent thereto, including Egypt, the Black Sea region, and even Great Britain (Ezk ch. 27). Tradition says its sailors rounded the Cape of Good Hope. It established colonies in N. Africa and in Spain, and was so powerful in the world of his day that Isaiah (23 8) designates it as 'the bestower of crowns, whose merchants are princes, whose traffickers are the honorable of the earth.'

T. was in its prime in the days of David and Solomon, and played an important part in the material, commercial, political and religious history of Israel. The friendship established between Hiram of Tyre (II S 5 11; I K 5 1 ff.) and David and Solomon became of mutual advantage to the two kingdoms, especially in the matter of the construction of Solomon's temple, and of long sea voyages to Ophir and to Tarshish. Doubtless Israel's close relations with T. continued for several centuries, as may be inferred from the marriage of Ahab and Jezebel (I K 16 31). To the earlier Assyrian invaders of Syria T. is said to have paid tribute. But a change came about and it asserted its independence, just when, we do not know. But Shalmaneser V (727-722 B.C.) included T. in the same category with Samaria in 724, for he simultaneously laid siege to both of them. He died, however, in 722, and the siege of T. was raised. But Sennacherib, according to Josephus (Ant. IX, 14 2), endeavored, from 701 to 696, to reduce it; however, after plundering the coast-towns, he gave up the task, as also Esarhaddon and Assurbanipal were compelled to do. Nebuchadrezzar likewise besieged it for thirteen years, but, finally, left it uncaptured. Ezekiel draws a graphic picture of this important city and its relation to the trade of his day (chs. 26-28). While its activity was much checked by the numerous attacks of jealous neighbors and nations, and its wealth and glory declined, it did not cease to be an important commercial center (Neh 13 16). Its first fateful humiliating capture was that by Alexander the Great in 332. In seven months, he built from the mainland a causeway 1,800 ft. long and wide enough to assault and capture the city, and put its inhabitants to the sword, or enroll them as slaves. The city was repeopled and newly built. In the Greek period, it had a checkered fate, and in 198 came under the sway of the Seleucidae. Pompey allowed it full autonomy in 65, which Augustus very much delimited. At the time of Christ the territory belonging to it reached down into Palestine as far as Carmel (Mt 15 21-31; Mk 7 24-31). It became a Christian center (Ac 21 3-6), and was influential in the early Church. The Crusaders captured it June 27, 1124 A.D., but lost it again to the Saracens in March, 1291 A.D. Since that day it has been an unimportant Mohammedan town. It is no longer on an island. The mole, built by Alexander, has become so enlarged by accretions of sand on both sides that the original island is at present merely a promontory of the mainland. The modern city contains about 6,000 inhabitants, and has none of the marine commercial importance of Biblical times.

UCAL, yū'kal (לְכָל, 'ākhāl): An obscure word in Pr 30 1, taken as a proper noun by many interpreters. Others regard it as a verb, and would render it '[and] I am faint,' or similarly. E. E. N.

UEL, yū'el (לְאֵל, 'u'el): One of those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 34).

ULAI, yū'lai (לַי, 'ūlay): A river near Susa (Shushan) in Persia (Dn 8 2, 16), called 'Ulai' also in the Assyr. inscriptions, and known to classical writers as Eulaeus. Herodotus and Strabo place Susa on the Choaspes (=modern Kercha); Pliny locates it on the Eulaeus (=modern Karūn), also called the Pasitigris. According to Nöldeke, the two names are for the same river, as similar statements are made about both names. Delitzsch places the Ulai E. of Susa, and locates the city on the Choaspes. The rivers have so changed their channels that it is difficult to make any sure identifications. C. S. T.

ULAM, yū'lām (אֱלָם, 'ūlām): 1. The son of Sheresh, a Manassite (I Ch 7 16 f.). 2. A Benjamite, father of a family of noted archers (I Ch 8 39 f.).

ULLA, ul'a (אֱלָא, 'ulla'): The ancestor of a family of Asher (I Ch 7 39).

UMMAH, um'a (אֲמָה, 'ummāh): A city of Asner (Jos 19 30). Probably a scribal mistake for 'Acco.'

UNCLEAN SPIRIT. The term ἀκάθαρτος 'unclean,' commonly used in the Gospels as a designation of demoniacs (those 'with unclean spirits,' Mk 5 2, 7 25, etc.) has a ceremonial rather than a moral significance. These unfortunates (who would be termed deranged to-day) were viewed, not as wicked, but as under some sort of control by a spirit or in some peculiar relation to deity. This placed them in a class by themselves, 'separate,' and contact with any such persons brought ceremonial defilement. Just as the 'holy' scriptures were said to 'defile the hands' of those who touched them, so such persons 'defiled' those who came in contact with them. See

UNDERTAKE: This word as used in Is 38 14 AV means to 'be surety for,' so RV.

UNGODLY: This term is the translation of: (1) βέβηλα, 'worthlessness' in AV in II S 22 5; Ps 18 4 ('ungodliness' RV) and in Pr 16 27, 19 28 ('worthless' RV). (2) τὸ ἡσίδη, 'unkind' (Ps 43 1). (3) ἀνί, 'unjust.' (4) ῥαῖα, 'wicked' (II Ch 19 2; Job 34 18; Ps 1 1, 4, 5, 6, 3 7, 73 12). In the NT it is used as a translation of ἀσεβής, 'impious' (Ro 4 5, 5 6; I Ti 1 9; I P 4 18; II P 2 5, 3 7; Jude vs. 4, 15).

UNICORN. See PALESTINE, § 24.

UNKNOWN GOD: Because of the multitude of gods, the Greeks always feared that some god might be offended by unintentional neglect in prayer or sacrifice; so that altars to anonymous gods were not uncommon (cf. Pausanias, Philostratus), to appease deities that might otherwise have been overlooked. On an altar in Athens was the inscription, ΑΓΝΩΣΤΩ ΘΕΩ, 'To an [not the] unknown god.' This was noticed by Paul and used by him as a significant, as well as convenient, text with which to begin the defense of himself before the Areopagus (Ac 17 23). The phrase 'too superstitious' (ver. 22 AV) should read 'somewhat religious,' or 'religious beyond others' ('very religious' RV). See also RELIGION.

J. R. S. S.—S. A.

UNLEARNED: This word is used to render (1) ἀγράμματος in the sense of 'totally illiterate' (Ac 4 13); (2) ἀμαθής, an 'ignorant' or 'uninstructed' person (II P 3 16, 'ignorant' RV); (3) ἀπαιδευτος, an 'uneducated' person (II Ti 2 23, 'ignorant' RV); (4) ιδιωτης, 'one in private life,' 'non-professional,' 'inexpert,' or 'uninformed' (I Co 14 16, 23 f.).

UNLEAVENED. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 13; and FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2 (2), and 7.

UNNI, un'ai (נִינְיָ, 'unnî): 1. One of those appointed by direction of David to be one of the musicians of the sanctuary (I Ch 15 18, 20). 2. See UNNO.

UNNO, un'ō (נִנְוָה, 'unnō): A Levite of the days of Zerubbabel (Neh 12 9). Unni AV.

UNQUENCHABLE FIRE. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 39.

UNSHOD: This term renders the adj. yūhēph, 'barefoot,' the usual translation (II S 15 30; Is 20 2 ff.). In Jer 2 25 Judah is warned lest she wear out her shoes in running after foreign gods and allies. Hitzig, ad loc., finds a reference to certain acts connected with Baal-worship. C. S. T.

UNWALLED TOWN, VILLAGE. See CITY, § 3.

UNWASHEN. See PURE, PURITY, PURIFICATION, § 7.

UPHARSIN, yu-fār'sin. See MENE, MENE, etc.

UPHAZ, yū'faz (אֶפְחָז, 'aphāz): This term occurs only in Jer 10 9 and Dn 10 5. In case a proper n. is intended, the Heb. spelling is probably an error for אֶפְחָר, 'ōphār, Ophir (so Targum and Syr. Hexapla). It is possible, but not probable, that the original reading was mōphāz, 'pure,' as in I K 10 18; cf. Giesebrecht in Handkommentar z. A T (1907), ad loc. E. E. N.

UPPER ROOM. See JERUSALEM, § 42; see also HOUSE, § 6 (d) and (e).

UPRIGHT: This is the rendering of yāshār, in all cases in which the word has an ethical meaning. It denotes primarily 'even,' 'level,' and is used of roads in a number of passages. Then it is applied figuratively to persons and to actions in the sense of 'impartial,' 'equitable,' 'just,' much as we use the adjectives 'straight' and 'square.' L. B. P.

UR, ūr (אֱרֵר, 'ūr; Assy. urā, 'fire'): 1. The designation of an ancient Babylonian city, commonly called 'Ur of the Chaldees.' Its importance is enhanced by the fact that it is regarded in the O T as the birthplace of Abraham (Gn 11 28, 31, 15 7; Neh 9 7), and the place from which he migrated to 'Haran' in Mesopotamia, and thence to Canaan. Its site has been identified at the modern Tell Mugheir (or, el-Mukajjar) (= 'bitumened'), on the right or W. bank of the Euphrates, about 140 m. SE. of the site of old Babylon, and about 150 m. NW. of the present Persian Gulf, near the junction of the Shatt-el-Hai with the Euphrates. It was one of the seats of worship of the moon-god Sin, as was also Harran, to which Abraham migrated. Its proximity to the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf (for at that day the latter reached more than 100 m. further inland than it does to-day) made this city an important commercial and political center. Located, as it was, in a group of strong religious and commercial cities, it occupied a pre-eminent place in the culture and commerce of its day. The second part of the phrase, 'of the Chaldees,' seems to have been due to the fact that the region in which Ur was located was in later days designated as the land of the Chaldees or Chaldeans (Assyr. māt Kaldū). The ruins of Ur at the present time cover something more than 150 acres, and are somewhat oblong in form, consisting mainly of a group of low mounds, with the remains of the usual tower or ziggurat in the northern portion of the area. Excavations in the spring of 1919 revealed the palace of King Dungi (c. 2500 B.C.), and many other ancient buildings. Tablets of 8th to 7th cent. B.C. give information regarding the worship of the moon-god Sin, patron deity of Ur. More recent discoveries by the University of Pennsylvania—British Museum Expedition (winter of 1924-5) have brought to light many interesting facts, among others ancient business records of the old temple of the moon-god, in which all receipts and expenditures were carefully tabulated (cf. N. Y. Times, Jan. 14, 1925).

II. The father of Eliphaz, one of David's mighty men (I Ch 11 35). I. M. P.

URBANUS, ur-bē'nus (Οὐρβανός, URBANE AV): A Christian in Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation, calling him 'our fellow worker' (Ro 16 9). Nothing more is known of him.

URI, yū'rai (אֲרִי, 'ārī), probably the abbreviated form of 'Urijah': 1. The father of Bezalel (Ex 31 2, etc.). 2. The father of Geber, one of Solomon's stewards (I K 4 19). 3. One of the porters who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 24).

URIAH, yu-rai'a (אֲרִיָּה, 'ariyyāh[ū], 'flame of J'' or 'J' is light': 1. A Hittite warrior (Mt 1 6, Urias AV) enlisted in David's army, whom the king made a victim to his sinful infatuation for his wife Bath-sheba (II S 11 2 ff.). 2. Urijah, the chief priest of the Temple in the days of Ahaz, chosen by Isaiah as one of the two witnesses to attest the prophecy concerning Maher-shalal-hash-baz (Uriah, Is 8 2); at the king's command he built a new altar after a Syrian or Assyrian model, and in other ways acquiesced in the innovations introduced by the king (II K 16 10-16). 3. The father of Meremoth, a priest in the days of Nehemiah (Ezr 8 33; Neh 3 4, 21). 4. A priest who stood by Ezra when he read the Book of the Law before the people (Neh 8 4), possibly the same as 3. 5. Son of Shemaiah, a prophet of Kiriath-jearim (Jer 26 20-23), put to death by King Jehoiakim. A. C. Z.

URIAS, yu-rai'as. See URIAH, 1.

URIEL, yū'ri-el (אֲרִיֵּל, 'ārī'el), 'my light is El': 1. A Levite, chief of the Kohathites, who assisted in bringing up the ark from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (I Ch 6 24 [9], 15 5, 11). 2. According to II Ch 13 2, a man of Gibeah; and the maternal grandfather of Abijah. C. S. T.

URIJAH, yu-rai'ja. See URIAH.

URIM, yū'rim, AND THUMMIM, thum'im (אֲרִיִּם וְתֻמִּיִּם, 'ārīm w' thummīm), 'lights and perfections' (RVmg.).

1. A Method of Divination. A method of inquiring of God (I S 28 6), involving the use of certain stones in connection with the breastplate of judgment (Ex 28 30). Upon this breastplate were attached twelve gems, each representing one of the tribes of Israel. Josephus (Ant. III, 89) and some of the rabbis were of the opinion that these gems were identical with the Urim and Thummim. Following this opinion, some, in modern times, have conjectured that the method of divination by Urim and Thummim was the one used by the high priest when, in propounding an inquiry before God, he read the Divine answer by spelling it out in the successive flashings of light on the letters inscribed on the gems. Such an explanation would, of course, require the assumption that all the letters of the alphabet were represented on these gems. Of this there is no evidence whatever.

2. Assyrian Tablets of Destiny. The Urim and Thummim stones must then be distinguished from the gems of the 'breastplate of judgment.' They were two (possibly three) stones worn in a pouch attached to the breastplate, and so arranged as to be near the heart of the wearer. Analogs to such stones are found in the Assyrian 'Tablets of Destiny' (cf. Muss.-Arnolt, Urim and Thummim, in Am. Jour. of Theol. July, 1900, pp. 193 ff.), and the headless and featherless arrowshafts 'of command and prohibition' among the Arabs (cf. G. F. Moore, EB, s.v.). These stones were small, and probably inscribed with distinctive signs, by which one was known as the affirmative and the other as the negative, and the third (if a third were used) non-committal or blank. Regarding their construction, no directions of any kind are given. It has been alleged that they were shaped somewhat like the teraphim (Spencer, De Legibus, III, 3); but this is nothing more than a conjecture.

3. Method of Use. The manner of the use of the Urim and Thummim is also involved in obscurity. But the theory that there was a connection with, or analogy to, the breastplate, which the Egyptian high priest wore during legal trials (Wilkinson, Anc. Egyptians, III, 183), is generally discountenanced as based upon very superficial resemblances. Another theory assumes that the Urim and Thummim were emblems (Kalisch, Exod. p. 544) identical with the twelve gems of the breastplate and that they symbolized the sanctification of the priest; that they were worn in order to represent to him the self-sacrifice involved in his office; but that inasmuch as they suggested his mediatorial office, they drew his mind away from self and environment and fixed it on the Divine will, stimulating supernatural insight and securing exact knowledge of that will. This view which assumes the use of hypnotism, is out of analogy with the general conditions under which the Urim and Thummim were used, and amounts to a practical abandonment of any explanation of the institution. The facts (Dt 33 8; I S 14 41; Lv 8 7 f.; Nu 27 21) point rather to the use of the Urim and Thummim as lots. If, in answer to an inquiry, the one designated as the affirmative fell out of the pouch, the inquirer would know that God approved; if the other or negative stone fell out, he would know that God disapproved his plan. Or, in case a third anonymous or non-committal stone were used and fell out, he would know that God declined to answer (I S 28 6).

4. History of Urim and Thummim. The Urim and Thummim were used in the preexilic period. At the time of the Exile, they fell into disuse. Ezr 2 63 and Neh 7 65 show that they were regarded as a matter of the past. This probably accounts for the fact that the description of them in P throws so little light on them; since, when P was written, they had become only a memory. Josephus asserts that this mode of divination had ceased 200 years before his own day. Cf. McNeile in Westminster Com. on Ex 28 30. A. C. Z.

USURY. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

UTHAI, yū'chai, yū'chē, or yū'cha-ai (יֹחַי, 'ūhay). 1. The son of Ammihud, a Judahite (I Ch 9 4). 2. One of the 'sons of Bigvai,' who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezr 8 14).

UZ, uz (יֹז, 'ūs): I. 1. One of the 'sons' of Aram (Gn 10 23), perhaps the eldest, and consequently a grandson of Shem (Gn 10 22), tho I Ch 1 17 makes him a son of Shem. 2. The first-born 'son' of Nahor by Milcah (Gn 22 21, Huz AV), probably settlers or a tribe in the upper Euphrates Valley. 3. One of the 'sons' of Dishan of the Edomites (Gn 36 28), perhaps a tribe which bore that name.

II. The land which is designated as the home of Job (1). According to Job 1 3 it would seem to have been E. of Palestine, and according to 1 13-19, it was located on the edge of the desert and within raiding distance of the Sabeans and Chaldeans. Now, is it possible to combine all the foregoing cases of Uz, as is done by Glaser (II 414 ff.)? He thinks them to be identical with a section of the northwestern Arabian territory called Tihama. In Jer 25 20, it lies between Egypt and Philistia. The Assyrian inscriptions frequently mention Uṣṣai as a land of Syria or on the edge of Syria, hence Delitzsch locates it at or near Palmyra. But at best this is only a conjecture. The evident meaning of the first chapter, confirmed by the location of the homes of some of Job's so called friends—viz.: Eliphaz of Teman (2 1), Bildad the Shuhite (of Shuah; cf. Gn 25 2), Elihu the Buzite (Gn 22 21)—is that Uz was a section of country bordering on the eastern Arabian desert (from a Palestinian viewpoint), either in the Hauran or slightly farther N., tho not so far as Palmyra.

UZAI, yū'zai, yū'zē, or yū'ze-ai (יֹזַי, 'ūzay): One of those who repaired the walls under Nehemiah (Neh 3 25).

UZAL, yū'zel (יֹזָל, 'ūzāl): One of the thirteen Arabian tribes descended from Joktan (Gn 10 27). Arabic tradition looks upon it as the ancient name of San'a, the capital of Yemen in southern Arabia. It was after the Abyssinian occupation that the name 'Uzal' was changed to San'a. According to one reading of Ezk 27 19, the Tyrians imported iron and spices from Uzal. San'a is situated on a stream in the center of a beautiful and fertile region, which produces two crops a year. It has played an important part in the history of Islam; in the 7th cent. it was the capital of the Zaidite Imams. Glaser, the explorer, rejects this site and advocates a position near Medina, but on subjective and inadequate grounds.

J. A. K.

UZZAH, uz'a, UZZA, uz'a (יֹזָז, 'ūzāh) (AV): 1. A son of Abinadab. When David was transferring the ark to Jerusalem, Uzzah, one of the drivers, was smitten by J" because he sacrilegiously steadied the ark (II S 6 6 π.). 2. One from whom a garden in or near Jerusalem was named. It was here that the kings Manasseh and Amon were buried (II K 21 18, 26). 3. A Levite (I Ch 6 29). 4. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 7). 5. Ancestral head of a group of Nethinim (Ezr 2 49, Neh 7 51). J. A. K.

UZZEN-SHERAH, uz'en-shē'ra, UZZEN-SHEERAH, -shēr'a. See SHEERAH.

UZZI, uz'ai (וִּזִּי, 'uzzi), abbreviated from 'Uzziah' (q.v.): 1. A priest in the main line of descent from Aaron (I Ch 6 5, etc.). 2. The ancestor of a clan of Issachar (I Ch 7 2, 3). 3. The ancestor of a clan of Benjamin (I Ch 7 7). 4. The ancestral head of a Benjamite family in postexilic Jerusalem (I Ch 9 8). 5. An overseer of Levites in Jerusalem (Neh 11 22). 6. The ancestor of a family of priests (Neh 12 19, 42).

UZZIA, uz-zai'a (וִּזְיָא, 'uzziyā'), An Ashterathite enumerated among the valiant men of David (I Ch 11 44).

UZZIAH, uz-zai'a (וִּזְיָה, 'uzziyāh'), 'my strength is J': 1. Another name of Azariah, son of Amaziah, King of Judah, whom he succeeded at the age of sixteen (II K 15 1, 13, etc.; II Ch 26 3 π.; Mt 1 8 f. Ozias AV). His reign was signalized by successful wars against the Philistines, the Arabians, the Meunim, and the Ammonites. He strengthened the fortifications of Jerusalem, which were somewhat out of repair in consequence of the siege by Jehoash of Israel (II Ch 26 6-9). He also fortified the harbor city Elath, on the Red Sea, and colonized it with Jews (II K 14 22). How large a maritime enterprise he thus secured for the kingdom of Judah is not clear. The size of his army is given by the Chronicler as 307,500. But this is very improbable; such large figures are quite liable to be due to confusion and misreading. Toward the end of his reign, Uzziah became leprous, and his son Jotham assumed the reins of government (II K 15 5). His leprosy is interpreted by the Chronicler as the penalty for usurping the function of the priesthood by burning incense in the Temple (II Ch 26 16-21). Uzziah's reign was also noted for a great earthquake (Zec 14 5), which was used as a chronological datum in later times.

In the famous inscription of Tiglath-pileser III, the name Azriyau of Yaudi appears on the list of the kings paying tribute. This suggests Uzziah, but the identification, which at first met with strong support, is now generally given up. Yaudi was an Aramean district to the N. of Palestine. 2. A Kohathite in the genealogy of Heman (I Ch 6 24). 3. The father of Jonathan, an overseer of David (I Ch 27 25). 4. A priest who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 21). 5. The father of Athiah of a Judahite family of the postexilic period (Neh 11 4). 6. See UZZIA. A. C. Z.

UZZIEL, u-zai'el or uz'i-el (וִּזְזִיֵּל, 'uzzi'el), 'God is strong': 1. The ancestral head of one of the great divisions of Kohathite Levites (Ex 6 18, etc.), the Uzzielites (Nu 3 27). 2. One of the leaders of a band of Simonites against the Amalekites in Seir (in post-exilic days?) (I Ch 4 42). 3. The ancestor of a Benjamite clan (I Ch 7 7). 4. A chief musician (I Ch 25 4, called Azarel in ver. 18). 5. A Levite in the days of Hezekiah (II Ch 29 14). 6. One of those who repaired the wall with Nehemiah (Neh 3 8).

V

VAGABOND: This term renders in the AV (1) the ptpl. of nādh, 'to wander' aimlessly as a fugitive (Gn 4 12, 14, 'wanderer' RV). (2) nāa, 'totter' about as beggars (Ps 109 10). (3) περιερχομαι, 'to go about' (Ac 19 13, 'strolling' RV). C. S. T.

VĀHEB, vē'heb (וָהֶב, wāhēbh), a place named in the poetic fragment quoted in Nu 21 14. Except that it must have been somewhere near the Arnon, its location is unknown. See SUPHĀH. E. E. N.

VAIL. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8; and TEMPLE, § 29.

VAIN, VANITY: The basal conception in the word 'vain' (from Lat. vanus, 'empty') is that of 'emptiness.' It conveys the idea of something that may have a certain appearance or pretense of being or possessing substance, value, etc., but is in reality of no significance. Of the following numerous Heb. and Gr. terms rendered by 'vain' or 'vanity' in EV, the first four express this same general idea of 'emptiness,' 'lightness,' 'transitoriness,' 'without real substance,' especially in the moral or religious sphere: (1) hebbel, 'breath,' i.e., mere breath, illusion, fancy. (a) In a more general sense in the wisdom literature (Job 7 16, 9 29, etc.; Pr 31 30; Ec 1 2, 14, and often; Is 30 7, etc.). (b) Applied to wicked practises, especially idolatry (Dt 32 21; I K 16 13, 26; Jer 2 5, etc.). (2) rīg, rēg, 'to empty,' 'empty.' (a) Generally (Lv 26 16, 20; Dt 32 47; Ps 2 1; Is 49 4, etc.). (b) In a moral sense (Jg 9 4, 11 3; II S 6 20, etc.). (3) shāw, 'nothingness,' also 'deceit,' 'falsehood,' and so rendered frequently in RV (Job 7 3, 'misery' RV, 11 11, 15 31, 31 5; Ps 12 2, 24 4, 26 4, 41 6, 60 11, 144 8, etc.; Is 1 13; Ezk 13 6 π., etc.). It is this word that is used in the Third Commandment (Ex 20 7; Dt 5 11). The common interpretation, taking the name of J' 'in vain' (i.e., lightly, irreverently, or in false oaths, etc.) is disputed by some, who would interpret shāw here as equivalent to 'with empty hands' (cf. Ex 23 15, where, however, a different Heb. word is used), and make the command a prohibition to worship J' without sacrifices. But this seems very improbable. The significance attached to the Divine name Yahweh was very great, and that the Decalog should emphasize the necessity of duly reverencing this name is only what would be expected. Cf. Kautzsch in HDB, extra vol., p. 640 f., and McNeile, Westminster Com. (1908), ad loc. (4) *xebo*s (and derivatives), 'empty,' the exact N T equivalent of (2) above, but used more comprehensively (Ac 4 25; I Co 15 10; II Co 6 1; Eph 5 6, etc.). In I Ti 6 20 and II Ti 2 16 the Gr. xeboōn means lit. 'empty sound' ('babblings' RV).

Other terms rendered more or less consistently by 'vain' or 'vanity' are: (5) 'āwen, which is not 'vanity' but something positively wrong or troublesome (Job 15 35; Ps 10 7, both 'iniquity' RV; Pr 22 8, 'calamity' RV; Is 41 28, 58 9, 'wickedly' RV; Jer 4 14, 'evil' RV). (6) hinnām, 'gratis,' 'for naught' (Pr 1 17 Ezk 6 10). (7) nābhābh, 'hollow' (Job 11 12). (8) rūah, 'wind' (Job 15 2, 16 3; cf. RVmg.). (9) sheger, 'lie,' 'deceit' (Ex 5 9, 'lying' RV; I S 25 21; Ps 33 17; Jer 3 23, 8 8 twice, 'false' and 'falsely' RV). (10) tōhū, 'barren,' 'waste,' 'empty' (I S 12 21; Is 40 17, 23, 44 9, 45 18, 'waste' RV, 19, 59 4). (11) sāphāh in Is 36 5 means 'lip' and the lit. expression is 'word of lips'; 'vain' is not in the original. (12) μάταιος, ματαιότης, μάρτυς, all having the general idea of 'futility,' 'uselessness' (Mt 15 9; Ac 14 15; Ro 8 20; I Co 3 20; Ja 1 28, etc.). (13) etxā, the N T equivalent of (6) above (Ro 13 4; I Co 15 2; Gal 3 4, 4 11; Col 2 18). (14) δωρεάν, 'freely,' 'as a gift' (Gal 2 21, but here in the sense 'to no purpose'). E. E. N.

VAIZATHA, vai'zə-thə (וַיִּזְתָּה, wayzāthā, Vajez-atha, və-jəz'ə-thə AV): A son of Haman (Est 9 9).

VALE, VALLEY: The term 'vale' is the rendering in both versions of 'ēmeq (Gn 14 3, 8, 10, 37 14; also in RV Gn 14 17; Jos 8 13, 15 8, 18 18; I S 17 2, 19, 21 9; cf. also 'king's dale,' Gn 14 17; II S 18 18). This term 'ēmeq, 'deepening,' is (1) 'a highlander's word for valley, as he looks down into it,' and is commonly used of broad valleys running up into the mountains, as the Vale of Elah (I S 17 19, etc.), of Aijalon (Jos 10 12), of Jezreel (Jos 17 16; Jg 6 33), etc. It seems to be used also of the maritime plain (Jg 1 19, 34; cf. Jer 47 5). It occurs also as opposed to mountains or hill-country (q.v.) (Mic 1 4; Jg 1 19, 34, 5 15; I K 20 28, etc.); an 'ēmeq was broad enough for chariots (Jos (Jos 17 16; Job 39 21); was cultivated (I S 6 13; Ps 65 13 [14]; Job 39 10; Song 2 1, etc.), and was suitable for herding (I Ch 27 29). Other words rendered by 'valley' are (2) biq'āh, a 'cleft,' i.e., a broad opening in the midst of hills, and in some passages rendered 'plain' (q.v.). It is the opposite of hār, 'mountain' (Dt 8 7, 11 11; Is 41 18, 63 14; Ps 104 8). The term biq'āh is used for Valley of Jericho (Dt 34 3), of Mizpeh (Jos 11 8), of Lebanon (Jos 11 17, 12 7), of Megiddo (II Ch 35 22; Zec 12 11). The RV has 'valley' for 'plain' AV in Ezk 37 1, 2 and Am 1 5. (3) gay, gay, ge' (Is 40 4), gē (Zec 14 4), a 'depression,' 'gorge,' or 'ravine.' It is always rendered 'valley' and was narrower than the 'ēmeq. It is the opposite of mountain and hill (Jos 8 11; Mic 1 6; I S 17 3; II K 2 16; Is 40 4, etc.). It is used with names for specific valleys. The RV reads 'Ge-harashim' (I Ch 4 14), and 'Gai' (I S 17 52, 'Gath' RVmg.). (4) nahal, 'torrent,' 'torrent-valley,' 'wādy.' It is often used for the bed of a 'torrent' or 'brook,' even when there is no water (Nu 21 12, 32 9; Dt 1 24, 3 16, 21 4, 6; Jg 16 4; I S 15 5; II S 24 5, 'river' AV; II Ch 33 14; Job 21 33, 30 6; Ps 104 10; Pr 30 17; Song 6 11; Is 7 19, 57 5, 6, 'stream' AV; Jl 3 [4] 18; also for 'brook' AV, Nu 13 23 f.; II Ch 20 16). A nahal was a suitable place for digging wells (Gn 26 17, 19; cf. II K 3 16, 17). The RV always has 'valley of the Arnon' river (Dt 2 24, 36, etc.). For the similitude see Nu 24 8. Oxf. Heb. Lex. with other authorities suggests 'palm-trees' for 'valleys.' (5) shephēlāh, 'lowlands,' the Shephelah (q.v.) of Judah, see PALESTINE, § 7 (b).

The RV always has 'lowlands' for 'valley' and 'plain' AV (Dt 1 7; Ob ver. 19; Zec 7 7). (6) εὐφραγῆ, 'valley' (Lk 3 5) for ge' (Is 40 4); see (3) above. On the usage of the foregoing words, cf. also G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 384. C. S. T.

VALIANT MAN, MAN OF VALOR: These expressions are often used of men, characterizing them as 'men of war,' or 'warlike.' They render: (1) gibbōr, 'strong,' 'mighty,' always in this sense (I Ch 7 2, 5, 11 20, 'mighty' RV; II Ch 13 3; Song 3 7, 'mighty' RV). (2) 'ish- ('man of'), ben- ('son of'), or gibbōr- ('mighty man of'), hayil, 'strength,' 'efficiency,' 'wealth.' These latter Heb. expressions denote also personal qualities of courage, prowess (Jg 18 2; I S 18 17; II S 27, 13 28, 17 10; II K 5 1; II Ch 26 17, etc.); skill or ability (I K 11 28; cf. Gn 47 6; Ex 18 21; Pr 31 10); virtue or worth (I K 1 42; I S 10 26, the opposite of 'worthless,' ver. 27). The meaning 'man of substance' ('wealth' AV) is also found (Ru 2 1 RVmg.; I S 9 1 RV; cf. II K 15 20). C. S. T.

VALLEY (or VALE) OF ACHOR, AIJALON, BACA, BERACHA, ELAH, ESCHOL, GERAR, GIBEON, HAMON GOG, HEBRON, IPHTAEL, JEHOSEPHAT, JERICHO, JEZREEL, JIPH-THAH, LEBANON, MEGIDDO, MIZPEH, SALT, SHITTIM, SIDDIM, SOREK, SUCCOTH, ZARED, ZEBOIM, ZEPHATHAH, Etc. See ACHOR; AIJALON; BACA, etc.

VALLEY (or VALE) OF CHARASHIM and of CRAFTSMEN. See GE-HARASHIM.

VALLEY OF DECISION. See JERUSALEM, § 5.

VALLEY (or VALE) OF HINNOM, REPHAIM, SHAVEH, SON OF HINNOM. See JERUSALEM, §§ 6-8; also SHAVEH.

VALLEY OF KEZIZ. See EMEK-KEZIZ.

VALLEY OF SLAUGHTER: A symbolic name for the Valley of Hinnom (Jer 7 32, 19 6).

VALLEY OF VISION: A part of the title (probably affixed by an editor) of one of Isaiah's threatening prophecies against Jerusalem (Is 22 1). It is difficult to see just what suggested the caption—possibly ver. 5. The LXX. reads 'Valley of Zion.' E. E. N.

VANIAH, vā-nai'a (וַנְיָהּ, wanyāh): One of the 'sons of Bani' (Ezr 10 36).

VAPOR: This word renders: (1) 'ēdh, a term of doubtful meaning, probably related to the Assyr. edā, 'flood,' 'overflowing water' (Gn 2 6 'mist,' LXX. 'spring,' Job 36 27 'vapor,' LXX. 'clouds'). (2) nāsē, 'that which is lifted up,' always associated with 'ascending' (Ps 135 7; Jer 10 13 = 51 16). (3) ālāh, 'that which goes up' (Job 36 33 AV, but '[the storm] that cometh up' RV). (4) qūṣṣār, 'smoke'; cf. Gn 19 28 (Ps 148 8 AV, but 'stormy wind' RV), and (5) āṭmā, 'breath' (Ja 4 14; Ac 2 19, 'vapor of smoke' [from the LXX. of Jl 2 30, where the Heb. is correctly rendered by AV and RV 'pillars of smoke']). A. C. Z.

VASHNI, vash'nai (וַשְׁנִי, washni): The oldest son of Samuel, according to the Heb. text of I Ch 6 28. But the word 'Joel' (cf. I S 8 2) should be inserted and 'Vashni' would then be read 'and the second' as in RV. E. E. N.

VASHTI, vash'tai (װשתי, washtā): Queen of Ahasuerus (Est 1:9, etc.). See ESTHER, BOOK OF, §§ 2, 6.

VAT (FAT AV) and WINE-VAT (WINE-FAT AV). See VINES AND VINTAGE, § 1.

VEDAN, vi'dan (װדן, w'dhān): One of the commercial feeders of Tyre (Ezk 27:19 RV), a place unknown. Several other readings have been suggested. (AV reads 'Dan also'). The text of the entire verse is very uncertain, the LXX. omitting the first part altogether.

A. S. C.*—O. R. S.

VEGETABLES. See PALESTINE, §§ 21, 22, 23; and FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 3.

VEHEMENT: This term in the AV of Jon 4:8, 'sultry' RV, renders a Heb. word, hārīshīth, apparently from a root meaning 'to cut'; hence, strictly, 'cutting [distressing] wind'; but as the wind in question is also said to have been an east wind, what is meant is the hot, blasting wind from the desert.

A. C. Z.

VEIL. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS, § 8; and TEMPLE, § 29.

VEIN. See MINE, MINING.

VENGEANCE: This term renders (1) nāqām, nāqāmāh, from nāqam, 'to avenge.' It is predominantly of God that vengeance is asserted (Jg 11:36; Is 34:8; Gn 4:15). (2) δίκη, 'justice' (so in RV of Ac 28:4; but in RV of Jude ver. 7, 'punishment'). (3) ὀργή, 'wrath' (so in RV of Ro 3:5). (4) ἐκδίκησις, 'the full meting out of just retribution' (Lk 21:22; Ro 12:19; II Th 1:8; He 10:30). See also BLOOD, AVENGER OF; and GOD, § 2.

A. C. Z.

VENISON. See FOOD, § 10; and HUNTING.

VERMILION (װשׁ, shāshar): This word denotes primarily the red ocher used in painting wood, and then the color itself (Jer 22:14; Ezk 23:14). A. C. Z.

VERSIONS.

I. GREEK VERSIONS OF THE O T.

1. Introductory. The victories of Philip of Macedon and of his son Alexander had a profound effect upon the intellectual life of Greece proper. One of their dreams was the unification of Hellas which led to the leveling down and partial merging of numerous dialects that heretofore had held their own in this much-divided little country.

At the same time, as a result of the wider conquests of Alexander in Western Asia and Egypt, there arose necessity for a new speech medium by means of which peoples of different nationality might intermingle and do business together.

Out of these conditions and necessities in the century following the conquests of Philip and Alexander emerged a colloquial language known as the κοινή (from κοινός, common). In the empires of Alexander and of his successors, the Ptolemies, the Seleucid kings, etc., this colloquial was in practically universal use. In this language as it appears written down in papyri, inscriptions, in the original portions of the LXX. such as Wisdom and II Maccabees, in Philo, the N T and elsewhere, there are comparatively few dialectical variations except minor matters of pronunciation and orthography, and these are such as would arise naturally from differences in the writers' education, their degree of familiarity with the older literary language, and the influence of foreign idioms and models.

Comparison of the κοινή with writings of the classical period to the great disadvantage of the latter leaves out of account the fact that while language lives it changes. Because it is different it is not necessarily greatly inferior. Increasing knowledge of the Hellenistic age reveals it to have been one of the most important periods in the development of human culture, all of which reflects itself in the language that became the medium of this culture. (See also GREEK LANGUAGE and the literature there referred to).

2. Alexandria the Center of the New Culture. Alexandria became an important center of Hellenistic learning and culture. Here it was that scientific institutes were founded by the first Ptolemy, Ptolemæus Lagi, satrap from 323, king from 304-285 B.C. Acting on the advice of Demetrius Phalereus, he began to make a great collection of books and to erect buildings to house them. His successors continued his policy, and thus there arose two libraries in Alexandria, the Museum and the Serapeum, and kings and scholars vied with one another in filling them with books. Among other things, the Alexandrian libraries were active in causing the sacred books of the Egyptians, Jews, and Babylonians to be translated into Greek. Alexandria was situated at what was then the meeting-place of the nations, and a general interchange of thought was natural.

3. The Jews of Alexandria. Alexandria had been a favorite home of the Jews from its founding, and under the Ptolemies they were highly esteemed, because of their consistent loyalty during the incessant wars between Egypt and Syria. They were loyal because they enjoyed full citizenship; they occupied a quarter of the city near the palace; they were governed by their own ethnarch, and, as at Ephesus, belonged to a special tribe, a fact which permitted them to follow without hindrance their own religion and customs. About the time of the birth of Christ there were 1,000,000 Jews in Egypt. And there is evidence that due to their number and influence some Semitic phrases and idioms passed into general Hellenistic usage in Egypt and elsewhere. These appear here and there in papyrus texts. (See the list compiled by Thumb, Gr. Sprache im Z. d. Hell., and cf. R. L. Ottley, Handbook to the Septuagint, p. 163 ff.) Jews in Alexandria remained faithful to national traditions and made pilgrimages to Jerusalem to pay the Temple tribute. But Jews living outside of Palestine tended to become more and more Hellenized. As the N T itself shows (cf. Ac 11:20 where some Mss. [N<sup>o</sup> AD] read 'Greeks' while others [BEH] 'Hellenists'). 'Greeks' and 'Hellenists' were not always easily distinguished. In Alexandria a special effort was made to harmonize Jewish and Greek ideas. Thus we have the case of one Aristobulus, a Jewish peripatetic philosopher (about 120 B.C.), who wrote in Greek a commentary on the books of Moses, or the Mosaic Law, in which he introduced as tho from Orpheus, Linus, and Hesiod many verses written by himself. In it he claimed also that Pythagoras and Plato got their first inklings of philosophy and law from Moses.

1. The Septuagint.

4. Its Origin. Some scholars infer from these statements of Aristobulus that a Greek translation of the Pentateuch was in existence prior to 400 B.C. But the first translation of which we have positive knowledge was made by Greek-speaking Jews of Alexandria. In his letter to Philocrates, a person claiming to be Aristeas (who was surely a Jew, and not a pagan) says that Demetrius Phalereus suggested to Ptolemæus Philadelphus (285-247 B.C.) that a translation of the books of the Law should be made into Greek; that an embassy consisting of Aristeas and Andreas was sent by Ptolemæus Philadelphus to Jerusalem to request the high priest Eleazar to send to Alexandria six scholars from each of the ten tribes of Israel to translate the Pentateuch into Greek. Aristeas gives the correspondence between Ptolemæus and Eleazar and also the names of the seventy-two elders chosen by Eleazar to do the work. Arrived in Alexandria, these elders, Aristeas continues, were quartered on the island of Pharos, where in seventy-two days they completed the translation of the Pentateuch from the Hebrew rolls brought with them from Jerusalem, which means that the MS. from which the translation was made had the approval of the priestly authorities of Jerusalem. Aristobulus (150 B.C.), Philo Judæus (30-50 A.D.), and Josephus (born 37 A.D.) are in practical agreement with this account of Aristeas, that is to say, the story of Aristeas was believed by the Jews of Alexandria, from two centuries before Christ, and it was believed by the Church Fathers also, with the exception of Jerome. Modern scholars regard Aristeas' story as a romance, but with a basis in fact, and the fact is this: That during the reign of Ptolemæus Philadelphus a translation of the Pentateuch into Greek was really made from a MS. brought from Jerusalem for the purpose; that this translation was made probably by the aid of a stipend given by Ptolemæus; that it was not made, however, by Palestinian Jews, as Aristeas asserts, but by Alexandrian Jews, to meet the needs of the Greek-speaking Jews of Egypt, both in public worship and in private life. This version, because of the prevalent story that it had been made by seventy-two (or, in round numbers, seventy) Jewish elders, was known as ἡ ἑβδομήκοντα κατὰ τοὺς ἑβδομήκοντα = interpretatio septuaginta virorum, or seniorum, abbreviated to οἱ Ὅ or οἱ δβ—the LXX. or Septuagint.

5. Its Character. This translation, intolerable as it was to Atticists, because of its sometimes barbarous style and the slavish copying of Semitic idioms, came into general use among Alexandrian Jews who welcomed it warmly (as did also the high priest in Jerusalem, according to the express testimony of Aristeas). It was at first limited to the Pentateuch, and it is not known when the other books of the Bible were translated; but we do know that the early Christian writers speak of the whole Greek Bible as the Septuagint, and we know also that most of the writings included in our Bible had been translated into Greek by Alexandrian Jews before 132 B.C., and that all the Hebrew Scriptures, including the Apocrypha, had been turned into Greek before the birth of Christ. Taken as a whole, the Septuagint exhibits several varieties of Greek, corresponding to the antecedents and general culture of the different translators. Books originally written in Greek (as Wisdom, II-IV Maccabees) compare favorably in style with the works of Jewish historians and philosophers. The translation of the Pentateuch is characterized by much literalness, due to the fact that it was intended to take the place of the sacred text in synagogues where Hebrew was not understood. In other cases, as in the translation of Isaiah and some of the Psalms, there are clear signs of incompetence (cf. Swete, Introduction to the O T in Greek, revision by Ottley (1914), especially, pages 289-314). Paul quotes from this version, which during the Apostolic Age was held high in honor everywhere, except in Palestine. There it was discredited, because it did not follow the official Hebrew text of the Scribes, which by that time had become standard. There was no standard Heb. text when the LXX. was made, since the canon of the Prophets had not then been completed, the Hebrew text being revised and sanctioned by the priestly authorities in Jerusalem after the appearance of the Septuagint translation. This Septuagint version was regarded as sacred (i.e., inspired) Scripture by the Christians, who used it in their controversies with the Jews as equal in authority with the Hebrew original. On their part, however, the Jews claimed that, as it did not represent the official Hebrew text it could not be used as a basis for theological controversy.

2. Other Greek Versions.

6. Of Aquila. The result was that no less than six new translations, based on the official standard Hebrew text, were made, namely, those by Aquila Theodotion, Symmachus, and those by three anonymous writers whose versions were designated by Origen as Quinta, Sexta, and Septima. Aquila was a Gentile, born in Sinope in Pontus, on the Black Sea. He was a Roman, a kinsman of the Emperor Hadrian (117-138 A.D.), who commissioned him to rebuild Jerusalem under the name of Ælia Capitolina (128-129 A.D.). In Jerusalem Aquila was converted to Christianity, but was excommunicated because he believed in astrology. He was then converted to Judaism, was circumcised, and studied for a series of years under the leading Jewish Rabbis. The result of his Hebrew studies was a new translation of the Scriptures into Greek. It was made from the official standard Hebrew text, which it followed faithfully, literally, slavishly, in utter disregard of Greek syntax, grammar, and idiom, his sole object being to supplant the Septuagint. His translation was approved by the priestly authorities in Jerusalem, and was therefore hailed with delight by the Jews, but with disfavor by the Christians. Probably, because of this very excessive fidelity to the Hebrew text and idiom, it failed in its purpose to supplant the Septuagint, tho its painful accuracy makes it of very great value for textual criticism.

Portions of Aquila's translation of I K 20 9-17 and II K 23 11-27 were discovered by S. Schechter in the Genizah of the Cairo synagog in 1897-8. Other portions from the same storehouse, comprising many fragments of A.'s translation of the Psalms have been published by C. Taylor, Hebrew-Greek Cairo Genizah Palimpsests (1900). Cf. Schürer, GVI (1909), Vol. III, p. 438.

7. Of Theodotion. Theodotion, according to Irenæus, was a native of Ephesus, tho Epiphanius contends that he, too, like Aquila, was a native of Sinope and a convert to Judaism. He was, probably, a Jew from Ephesus, and, according to Jerome, an Ebionite, that is, one who recognized Christ as the Messiah, but denied His Divinity, maintained the binding force of the Mosaic Law, and rejected Paul and his writings. Epiphanius assigns Theodotion to the reign of Commodus (180-192), but he wrote, probably, during the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161-180). His translation was more a revision of the Septuagint than a version of his own. His object was both to avoid the pedantry and absurd fidelity of Aquila and to present an idiomatic translation from the official standard Hebrew text, one that would not offend the literary susceptibilities of cultured Hellenists. The fragments of his translation show that he succeeded fairly well; his style is simple, dignified, and withal faithful to the original.

The work of Theodotion is known chiefly from fragments of Jeremiah quoted by Origen and preserved in the margin of the codex Marchalianus. Cf. Swete, op. cit., p. 44 ff.

8. Of Symmachus. Symmachus was an Ebionite by religion, according to Eusebius and Jerome, a Samaritan by birth, and, according to Epiphanius, a convert to Judaism. The last-named assigns him to the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161-180), tho it is more probable that he wrote during the reign of Commodus (180-192). In his translation his aim was essentially the modern one, to give a liberal, idiomatic rendering of the Hebrew, not a crude literal translation—that is, he tried really to translate Hebrew thoughts into the current Greek literary style, and the fragments of his version show that he did not fail of success. Cf. fragments quoted by Swete, op. cit., p. 51.

9. The Quinta, Sexta, and Septima. Origen (185-253 A.D.) mentions three other translations. From their relative positions in Origen's Hexapla (see below), these were known as Quinta (ε), Sexta (ς), and Septima (ζ). Origen found the MS. of Quinta at Nicopolis (near Actium) about 231 A.D., while the MS. of Sexta (or Septima; it is uncertain which) was found in a buried earthen jar in Jericho, about 217 A.D. Eusebius says that the MS. of Septima was found during the reign of Caracalla. We know nothing further about it, nor do we know whether or not Quinta, Sexta, and Septima each embraced the whole O T. Numerous fragments of Quinta (II Kings, Job, Psalms) and of Sexta (Psalms, Canticles) are extant; they show that the writer of Quinta had an elegant Greek style, while the writer of Sexta was fond of paraphrases. The fragments of Septima are very scant, being practically confined to the Psalter.

10. Later Versions. In the 14th cent. a Jew, possibly to be identified with Elissæus, who lived at the court of Murad I, translated most of the O T into Greek. His version is known as Codex Græcus Venetus, and is preserved in St. Mark's Library in Venice. The translator produced a faithful, but infelicitous, version in what he thought was Attic Greek tho, curiously enough, he used the Doric dialect in rendering the Aramaic portions of Daniel.

The first Modern Greek translation of the Psalms was made from the Septuagint in Crete by Agapion (1543); in 1547 a Jew of Epirus made a Modern Greek version of the Pentateuch; in 1576 Moses Phobian published in the Polyglot Pentateuch a version of Job in Modern Greek.

3. The Work of Origen and Others.

11. The Hexapla. Origen, born 185 A.D., revised the translation of the O T on the basis of the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus. He studied Hebrew in Egypt, whence he was exiled to Casarea in Palestine (216-219), where he perfected his knowledge of Hebrew. He first wrote commentaries on the O T, which made a study of the standard Hebrew text necessary. Origen contended that Christians should know that the Septuagint version, regarded by them as inspired, did not represent the official Hebrew text, and that in many respects the versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus were much more accurate than that of the Septuagint. Origen, therefore, arranged the Hebrew text, the existing Greek versions, and the Septuagint version, as emended by himself, in parallel columns, whose arrangement we understand clearly from a fragment of his work discovered at Milan in 1896, and from another fragment containing all the six columns, found in 1898.<sup>1</sup>

i.	ii.	iii.	iv.	v.	vi.
Hebrew text.	Transliteration of the Hebrew text into Greek letters.	Version of Aquila.	Version of Symmachus.	Alexandrian version as revised by Origen.	Version of Theodotion.

Aquila's version stands next to the Hebrew text, because it was slavishly faithful to the Hebrew. The version of Symmachus comes in the fourth column because it is practically a revision of that of Aquila. The version of Theodotion occupies the sixth column, because it was practically a revision of the version of the Seventy, Origen's revision of which occupied the fifth column. The Hebrew column contained in each line one word, or at most two, and each line of the corresponding Greek translations contained one word, or at most four. Origen's great work was called the Hexapla, or Sixfold Edition. He published also a smaller edition, called the Tetrapla, or Fourfold Edition, because it omitted the first two columns of the Hexapla. Occasionally, in the Hexapla (in the poetical and prophetic books) the versions of Quinta and the Sexta were added in separate columns, thus creating for those books an Octopla, or Eightfold Edition. We hear also of a Heptapla, or Sevenfold Edition, in which either Quinta or Sexta was omitted.

12. Relation of Origen's Text to the Massoretic. The fifth column of the Hexapla did not contain the Septuagint version, but that version revised by Origen, on the basis of the Hebrew text and the other Greek versions. The Septuagint version contained parts of sentences not to be found in the official Hebrew text, and, on the other hand, it did not contain parts of sentences that were in the official Hebrew text, and, again, it gave a sense not supported by the official Hebrew text. Occasionally, matter, sometimes extending to several chapters, was displaced in the Septuagint version (all of which came about, because the Septuagint version was made before an official standard Hebrew text had been promulgated by the priesthood of Jerusalem). The object of Origen's revised Hexapla text was to make the Septuagint version the exact equivalent of the official standard Hebrew text. Consequently, he changed the Greek order, making it correspond with the Hebrew order, and corrected the corruptions of the Septuagint version, supplying what was missing, but without altering the Greek. However, interpolations had also crept into the Septuagint, or Alexandrian, version, and presented difficulties to Origen, as did the matter found in the Septuagint version, but not in the official Hebrew, and the matter found in the official Hebrew text, but not in the Septuagint version. Origen tells us that he solved these problems by the inspiration of God. He adapted to his use some of the critical signs employed originally by Aristarchus in his editions of the Homeric poems. This apparatus consisted of the obelus sign, —, or ÷, placed before words or lines which were not found in the official Hebrew text, and were, therefore, unauthorized. The asterisk, *, was placed before words or lines found in the official Hebrew text, but not in the Septuagint version. The metobolus, †, was placed at the end of the words or of the clause challenged by the obelus or the asterisk. When the words or the clause challenged by the obelus or by the asterisk overpassed the limits of the line, the obelus or the asterisk was repeated at the beginning of each line, until the presence of the metobolus notified the reader that the end of the challenged passage had been reached. The absence of critical marks in the fragments of the Hexapla discovered in 1896 and 1898 at Milan and Cairo has led some scholars to question whether these critical marks actually appeared in the text of Origen's Hexapla as they are now found in Jerome's Gallican Psalter and in the great Hexaplaric MS. known as G.

13. Editions of Hexapla. Origen's Hexapla edition was finished about 240 A.D., and his Tetrapla edition appeared toward the end of his life. Eusebius says that in preparing his version Origen employed 'more than seven tachygraphers [fast writers = stenographers], who relieved one another at fixed intervals, and that he employed an equal number of bibliographers [copyists of the text] and female calligraphers' ('experts in penmanship'). The completed Hexapla edition covered at least 3,250 leaves, or 6,500 pages, exclusive of the Quinta and the Sexta. The Tetrapla edition covered at least 2,000 leaves, or 4,000 pages. Neither of these editions was published, that is, they were not put upon the book-market, but were deposited in the library of Pamphilus in Caesarea, where they were consulted by Jerome in the 4th cent. It is known that they were still in existence in the 6th cent. They perished, probably, in 638, at the time of the capture of Caesarea by the Saracens. The fifth column of the Hexapla edition, containing Origen's version of the Septuagint version, was published separately and placed upon the Palestine book-market by Pamphilus (martyred within the period from 307 to 309) and Eusebius, who completed it after the death of Pamphilus. This edition was known as Eusebius' edition, or as the Palestine edition, or as Origen's edition of the Septuagint. It was a grave error of judgment to publish Origen's Hexapla revision by itself, for it intensified difficulties, in that the Aristarchian signs had no meaning whatever in the separate publication, and the version itself, when taken out of connection with the Hebrew text and the other versions, was wholly misleading.

14. Hesychius and Lucian. When Pamphilus and Eusebius were publishing the fifth column of Origen's Hexapla edition in Palestine, Hesychius in Alexandria, with the aid of Phileas and others, was revising and editing the old Septuagint version. This edition has disappeared, except as it may have been the basis of some of the old Latin and other versions made in Egypt from which it can be reconstructed partially. We do not even know positively who this Hesychius was, tho he was probably the martyr of that name. In Antioch, at about the same time, Lucian (martyred Jan. 7, 312), with the aid of Dorotheus, was making what was practically a new version of the Hebrew Bible. It has been ascertained that Lucian's version was the archetype of several codices of the O T, and Lagarde has reconstructed much of the text of Lucian's version. It is smooth and full; it is near to the Hebrew, and yet the Greek is idiomatic. It often gives double renderings, and sometimes Lucian's rendering appears to be based on a better text than the Massoretic.

II. OTHER VERSIONS OF THE O T.

15. The Latin. The Septuagint version was in common use throughout the Roman Empire from Gaul to Egypt and Cyrenaica, with the sole exception of Carthage, where Greek did not occupy a preferred position. It was, perhaps, at Carthage in the 2d cent. A.D. that the Septuagint version was first translated into Latin, the Old Latin Bible (Vetus Itala), frequently and accurately quoted by Cyprian (middle of 3d cent.). Jerome (Eusebius Hieronymus, 329-420) of Pannonia, at the request of Pope Damasus, undertook a revision of the O T on the basis of the Septuagint (383). He began his work with the Old Latin Psalter (Psalterium Romanum). A few years later (389), he published another revision of the Psalter, made from the Septuagint on the basis of the fifth column of Origen's Hexapla (Psalterium Gallicanum). About 390 he translated the Psalter from the Hebrew (Psalterium Hebraicum), which, however, failed to displace his other two versions in the Church service. These versions were followed from time to time by versions of other books of the O T. The Latin Bible was revised in the 6th and again in the 9th cent., but the Latin Bible of to-day still re-echoes the Septuagint. This revised version was called the Vulgate, first by Roger Bacon, tho Jerome applied the term Vulgata to the Old Latin Bible. For a list of extant Old Latin fragments of the O T cf. Swete, op. cit., pp. 93-100.

16. The Egyptian (Coptic). Before the close of the 2d cent. A.D., at least two translations of the Bible into the Egyptian (Coptic, a corruption of Αἰγύπτιος) dialects (the Bohairic and the Sahidic) had been made from the Septuagint version. We have also fragments of later translations into other Egyptian dialects—the Middle Egyptian, the Fayumic, and the Akhmimic, all from the Septuagint version.

17. The Ethiopic. In the 4th cent. missionaries from Tyre evangelized Ethiopia, and in the 5th or 6th cent. the Bible was translated into Ethiopic, on the basis of the Greek Septuagint, tho Lagarde holds that the extant Ethiopic version was made from the mediæval Arabic version in the 14th cent.

18. The Arabic. The earliest Arabic version was made partly from the Hebrew, partly from the Syriac Peshitto, partly from the Septuagint, and, possibly, partly from the Coptic. The first important translation was made by Saadia Gaon (872-942), and it is still used by Arabic-speaking Jews. Other Arabic versions are the Karaite version and the Samaritan version of Saadia (11th cent.).

19. The Syriac. There were two Syriac versions of the O T. (1) The Peshitto or 'the simple,' made probably at Edessa by Jews, from the Hebrew, at the time of King Abgar (9-45 A.D.). A free revision of this version, on the basis of the Septuagint, was made by Philoxenus about 508 A.D., the fragments of which are in the British Museum (the Philoxenian Syriac). (2) The version of Paul, Bishop of Tella in Mesopotamia, made from the Hexapla revision of Origen about 616 A.D., called the Syro-Hexapla. Besides these two, there are fragments of several other Syriac versions, as follows:

(1) A version in the Palestinian dialect containing the whole O T and made from the Septuagint version.

(2) A version by Mar Abbas (552 A.D.).

(3) Two Jacobite versions: (a) By Polycarp (5th cent.), (b) by Jacob of Edessa (704 A.D.).

(4) A version by a Syrian interpreter, called ὁ Σύρος.

20. Persian, Gothic, Armenian, Georgian, Slavonic, Etc. Maimonides says that the Pentateuch was translated into Persian long before Mohammed, but the first Persian version of which we have knowledge was made by Jacob Tawus, and appeared in the Polyglot Pentateuch (Constantinople, 1546). About 350 A.D. Ulfilas translated the Bible into Gothic, the long fragments of which version (Gospels and Pauline Epistles), unfortunately only few in number, are most precious to the student of language, because they are the oldest specimens of Teutonic literature. The translation of the Bible into Armenian falls between 354-441. It was begun at Edessa by Mesrop and continued by his nephew Moses of Khoren. It was based on the Septuagint version.

Mesrop also inaugurated the Georgian, or Iberian, version, on the basis of the Septuagint version.

In the 9th cent. the brothers Cyril and Methodius translated the Septuagint version into Slavonic. Most of this version perished during the Tartar invasion in the 13th cent., and the present Slavonic version is not based wholly on the Septuagint, some of it having been translated from the Hebrew and some from the Latin Vulgate. The Western versions into Anglo-Saxon, Frankish, etc., were made from the Latin Vulgate, and not from the Hebrew or Greek. See also ARAMAIC LANGUAGE; and TARGUM.

VESSELS: The words so rendered have the very general meaning of 'utensil,' 'weapon,' etc., except nebel in Is 30 14, which means an 'earthen jar,' or 'pitcher.' In I S 21 5 the interpretation is somewhat difficult. The probable meaning is that as David and his men were on a military expedition, they and all their accouterments were ceremonially 'holy,' so that they could touch the 'holy' bread without risk. See PURE, PURITY, PURIFICATION, §§ 6, 7. On vessels of papyrus (Is 18 2, 'bulrushes' AV), see SHIPS AND NAVIGATION, § 2. E. E. N.

VESTMENTS. See, in general, DRESS AND ORNAMENTS.

VESTURE. See DRESS AND ORNAMENTS.

VIAL: This is the rendering of: (1) pakh, a 'flask,' 'vial' for holding oil. A vial of oil was used in anointing Saul (I S 10 1) and Jehu (II K 9 1, 3, box AV). (2) φάλη, a broad, shallow 'bowl' (so RV in all passages), used for presenting incense (Rev 5 8) and drink-offerings. It was probably of saucer shape, so that the contents could be poured out at once and suddenly. In Rev (15 7, 16 1 ff., 17 1, 21 9) they are spoken of figuratively as filled with the wine 'of the wrath of God.' C. S. T.

VILLAGE: (1) The ordinary O T word hātsēr, 'enclosure' (cf. HAZOR, HAZAR-SUSAN, etc.), originally meant a settlement of nomads (cf. Gn 25 16; Is 42 11). (2) kāphār, 'village' (cf. Arab. kefr), is of later origin and not frequent in Biblical use (I Ch 27 25; Song 7 11), except in proper names such as Chephar-ammoni, Chephirah, Capernaum. It apparently denoted a regular village, and not a mere collection of tents or huts like hātsēr. See also HAVVOTH-JAIR and PERIZZITES. (3) In the N T the common Gr. term κώμη is applied specifically to Bethlehem (Jn 7 42), Bethsaida (Mk 8 22 f.), Bethphage (Mt 21 1 f.), Bethany (Jn 11 1), and Emmaus (Lk 24 13).

The O T never mentions villages singly or by name. They are usually grouped as mere dependencies of some fortified place (cf. Jos 13 23; Neh 11 36; cf. Mk 8 27), of which they are often called the bānōth, 'daughters' (Nu 32 42; II Ch 28 18; cf. II S 20 19), altho in many cases (e.g., Jos 15 21-32) the protecting 'city' must itself have been very small. The same idea of villages dependent on a city is represented in the N T term κωμόπολις, properly a 'village-city' (cf. Mk 1 38).

The original distinction between a city and a village was that the former had walls (Lv 25 29-31; I S 6 18). Later on, the city became noted for its size and wealth; according to the Talmudists it must have a synagog, and in the Greek period a certain political organization was demanded. Varying standards, as well as the growth and decay of communities (cf. Zec 2 4), led to a certain latitude in the use of terms. Thus Bethlehem is called both a 'city' (Lk 2 4) and a 'village' (Jn 7 42). The same is true of Bethsaida (Lk 9 10; Mk 8 22 f.). Capernaum (see above) was called a 'city' because much more important than its first part (Caper = kefr, 'village') would indicate. See also CITY, § 3.

VINE. See VINES AND VINTAGE.

VINEGAR: The word hōmets, rendered 'vinegar' in the O T, is usually wine in which the alcohol has been changed into acetic acid, as in the vinegar of modern times. Once 'vinegar of strong drink' is mentioned (Nu 6 3). Undiluted vinegar was too strong to be a satisfying drink (Ps 69 21) and irritating to the teeth (Pr 10 26); but diluted with water was used as a relish (Ru 2 14), tho it was forbidden to the Nazirite (Nu 6 3). The 'vinegar' of the Crucifixion narratives (ξύος, Mt 27 48 and ||s) was apparently the posca, or sour wine ordinarily served out to the Roman soldiers, and seems to have been offered as an act of mercy. VINE OF SODOM. See SODOM, VINE OF.

VINES AND VINTAGE: The fact that the common name for 'banquet' among the Hebrews was mishleh ('drinking') shows the significance which attached to wine. Its use was presupposed as a necessary part of every meal (Gn 27 25), while 'wine and grain' in common speech represented the most important part of the produce of the land.

1. Culture of the Vine Among the Hebrews. In Gn 9 20 the culture of the vine is traced back to Noah, its origin being attributed to a mythical ancestor, just as other phases of civilized life are traced to ancient heroes in the Cainite genealogical table in Gn 4 16 ff. A dim recollection of the fact that Israel learned the art of vine-culture from the Canaanites is to be found, not only in the story of the spies (Nu 13 24), but also in the hostile attitude of the Rechabites, who rejected the use of wine probably because of its Canaanite origin (cf. Jer ch. 35). As a matter of fact, vineyards were to be found everywhere in the land, especially on mountain slopes and hills (Is 5 1; Jer 31 5), but also in the valleys (e.g., in that of Jezreel, Jg 9 27; I K 21 1 ff.). The vines from the neighborhood of Hebron were famous (Nu 13 24), also those from the Lebanon region (Hos 14 8). The care bestowed upon vine-culture is revealed in not a few passages of the O T. The hillside, where a plow could not be used, was worked with a mattock and the stones removed (Is ch. 5). It was protected by terrace-walls, gādhēr, in order to prevent the washing away of the soil by water (cf. Nu 22 24), and surrounded with a thorn hedge, m'gūkkah, or wall, or even with both (Is 5 2, 5, 17 10 f.), as a protection against grazing herds (Is 7 25; Jer 12 10), or wild animals (Ps 80 14; Song 2 16). Huts or booths, šukkōth (cf. Is 1 8 cottage AV), or watch-towers, mighdāl (Is 5 2), were erected, in which the vine-dresser, kōrēm (II Ch 26 10), or the keeper, nōtār, lived (Job 27 18; Song 1 8, 8 11 f.). Every vineyard had its wine-press, a stone tub or vat (fat AV) (gath or pārāh), in which, with shouts of joy, hēdhādāh, the grapes were trodden, dārakh, to must (tārōsh, new wine, i.e., unfermented juice with its sediment); cf. Is 16 10; Jer 25 30, 48 33. If the soil was rocky, the press was hewn out in the rock. Connected with it, but on a lower level, was a receiving-vat, yegebh, into which the must flowed to be clarified. From this it was drawn off into jars (Jer 48 11), or skins (Job 32 10). The work of pruning, zamar, the branches with the pruning-hook, mazmērāh (Lv 25 3; Is 2 4; Jn 15 3; etc.), was of great importance. In general, the vines were trained as separate stocks, tho also, at times, they were allowed to run and develop into a number of connected vines. As to-day, so in older times, a vine with its wide outspreading branches furnished of itself a substantial foliage (cf. Mic 4 4). It was forbidden to plant anything else in a vineyard (Dt 22 9), and it was required that a vineyard should be left uncultivated every seventh year (Ex 23 11; Lv 25 3 ff.). The wood of old and useless vines was burned (Ezk 15 2 ff.; Jn 15 6). As to the varieties of grapes raised in ancient Palestine, it is possible to draw some inferences from O T expressions. From the designation of the juice of the grapes as their 'blood' (Gn 49 11; Dt 32 14), it may be concluded that red grapes were most highly prized. This is confirmed by the use of the term sōrēq ('red,' Is 5 2; Jer 2 21) for the vines of best quality ('the choicest vine'), which indicates that they were so called from their red grapes. In later times, however, the culture of other varieties must have supplanted that of the red grapes, for the wine exported from Palestine at the beginning of the Middle Ages was white, and it is the white grape that is grown most extensively there to-day.

2. The Manufacture of Wine. The time of the ripening of the grapes varied according to the location of the vineyards. On the plain along the coast there are ripe grapes as early as July, in the highlands not for a month later, while those destined for the wine-press are not gleaned until September and October. This was the custom also in the older times, since the festival which specially celebrated the vintage—the Feast of Booths (Tabernacles)—came in Tishri (September-October). It was a feast of unrestrained joy. Song and dancing were the order of the day (Jg 9 27; Is 16 10; Jer 25 30; 48 33). The must was drunk, either sweet or half fermented. It was generally allowed to ferment in jars or skins (the new wine of Mk 2 22 and ||s), and to stand a while upon its lees (Is 48 11; Zeph 1 12). Sometimes, it was kept over a year, until the second fermentation took place, and then poured from one vessel into another (Is 48 11). Before drinking, wine was filtered or strained (sh'mārīm m'zuggāqīm Is 25 6; Jer 48 11). Among the Israelites, it was not usual to mix the wine with water; this was a Greek custom. But it was often mixed with various sorts of spices (Song 8 2; Is 5 22). It can not be asserted with certainty that the Hebrews were accustomed to boil down the must to grape honey (Arab. dibs), tho this may well have been the case (cf. d'bhāsh, Gn 43 11; I K 14 3; Ezr 27 17). Grapes were often dried, tsim-māqim (I S 25 18), and pressed into cakes, 'āshīshāh (Hos 3 1; II S 6 19). At the present day, raisins form a chief article of export in Syria. The b'āshīm mentioned in the O T (Is 5 2, wild grapes) were imperfect grapes that did not mature, but should be distinguished from the bōsher (Is 18 5, 'ripening grape'; Jer 31 29 f., 'sour grape'), which were grapes used while still green or unripe. What kind of injury to the vine was inflicted by the tōla'ath (Dt 28 39, 'worm') is not certain.

VIPER. See PALESTINE, § 26.

VIRGIN: This word renders the Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) b'thālāh, 'separated,' which conveys definitely the idea of virginity, and is used either, literally, of a young unmarried woman (Gn 24 16; Ex 22 16 f.; II S 13 2), or, figuratively, in poetic passages, in the personification of a social body—a city, or state, e.g., 'virgin daughter of Zion' (Is 23 12); 'virgin daughter of Babylon' (Is 47 1); 'virgin of Israel' (Am 5 2). (2) 'almāh, 'mature,' used simply of a young woman of marriageable age, without reference to her being married or not (Gn 24 43; Song 1 3, 6 8; Is 7 14, etc.). See IMMANUEL. (3) παρθένος, used in the LXX. mainly as the rendering of b'thālāh (of 'almāh in Gn 24 43 and Is 7 14); in the N T it retains its LXX. sense, with the single exception of Rev 14 4, where it is used of men, with the emphasis on the idea of chastity. VIRTUE, VIRTUOUS: This is the translation of hayil, 'strength,' 'ability' (Ru 3 11; Pr 12 4, 31 10, 29, in the phrase 'a virtuous woman,' lit. 'a woman of ability'). The word is used in its Old Eng. sense of 'power' (cf. Mk 5 30). When the same expression is used of men it is commonly translated 'a man of valor.' L. B. P.

VOPHSI, vof'sai (װפּזי, wophzē): One of the twelve spies sent by Moses to investigate the land of promise (Nu 13 14).

VOW: A promise to God—either formally expressed or tacitly implied—to perform some service or do things pleasing to Him, generally on condition of receiving in return a specific favor. Vows are known in all religions, and belong to all ages. Jacob vowed that, if God would be with him and bless him, he would take Him as his God, build Him a sanctuary and pay Him tithes (Gn 28 20-22). Jephthah's vow to sacrifice the object that would first meet him as he returned victorious from battle is familiar (Jg 11 30-40). Other vows mentioned are Hannah's (I S 1 11 f.) and Absalom's (II S 15 7 f.). Just before the battle of Michmash Saul led the people to vow that they would eat nothing until evening (I S 14 24 f., 30 f.). The law of vows assumes that they are voluntary. No one is required to make a vow. Vows are classed with free-will offerings (Dt 12 6); but a vow once made constitutes a solemn obligation, from which nothing can absolve one. So far as a vow involved a sacrifice, such sacrifices were regulated by a prescribed ritual—the ceremony being designated 'to accomplish a vow' (Lv 22 18-23, 27 1-13; Nu 15 3 ff.; cf. also Ac 21 23 ff.). In such a case the Law fixed on a minimum of offerings, i.e., for a man 50 shekels of the sanctuary, for a woman 30, for a male child 5, and for a female child 3 shekels (Nu 30 2 f.). The performance of vows was one of the tests which the prophets applied in exposing the transgressions of the people (cf. Is 19 21; Nah 1 15; Jon 1 16, 2 9; Job 22 27; Pr 20 25; Ps 22 25, 50 14, 56 12). The foregoing applies to the ordinary, later known as the 'minor,' vow. On the 'major,' better known as the 'Nazirite,' vow, see NAZIRITE. A. C. Z.

VULTURE. See PALESTINE, § 25.

WAFER: This is the rendering of two Heb. words: (1) rāqīq (Ex 29 2, 23; Lv 2 4, 7 12, 8 26; Nu 6 15, 19; I Ch 23 29 'cakes' AV), on which see FOOD AND FOOD UTENSILS, § 2. (2) tsappīhūth (from tsāphāh, 'to spread out'), a flat cake. The word occurs but once (Ex 16 31) and is used in this place as a sweetmeat: 'wafers made with honey.' E. E. N.

WAGES: This word is used to render a number of Heb. and Gr. terms: sākhār and maskōreth, 'hire' (Gn 30 28, 29 15, etc.); ʿmullāh, 'work' (Lv 19 13); μισθός, 'reward' (Jn 4 38); and δοῶνιον, 'rations' (Lk 3 14; Ro 6 23; II Co 11 8). In Jer 22 13 'without wages' renders the Heb. hinnām, 'gratis,' 'without return.' Almost nothing is said specifically as to the conditions and payments of hired service in the Bible. The actual amounts paid, e.g., a 'shilling' ('penny' AV), i.e., a denarius a day for vintage labor (Mt 20 2), or ten shekels and a suit of apparel a year, plus food, as a priest's salary (Jg 17 10), were small in comparison with modern wages, but, of course, the purchasing power of money was then much greater than it is now. The O T law regarding wages was concerned mainly with guaranteeing to the wage-earner the prompt payment of the amounts due him (Lv 19 13; cf. Mal 3 5). E. E. N.

WAIL, WAILING. See MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5; and ESCHATOLOGY, § 39.

WALL. See CITY, § 3.

WALLET (Scrip AV): The term renders Heb. and Gr. words as follows: (1) yālqūt (from a verb meaning 'to gather together'). The bag in which shepherds and others put stones for slinging (I S 17 40). (2) πῆρα, a small bag in which to carry provisions, etc., while traveling (Mt 10 10, etc.). E. E. N.

WAR, WAR-CRY. See WARFARE, § 4.

WARD. See PRISON.

WARDROBE: This term renders the Heb. b'ghādhīm, literally 'garments,' or 'clothes.' It is used only in the title 'keeper of the wardrobe' (II K 22 14; II Ch 34 22) given to Hasrah ('Harhas' AV).

A. C. Z.

WARES. See TRADE AND COMMERCE, § 3.

carried on only in the dry season. When the rainy weather of autumn came, operations were suspended, to be resumed in the spring. This is the meaning of the expression in II S 11 1, 'the return of the year, at the time when kings go out,' i.e., on campaigns, when the long-continued fair weather of spring and early summer was favorable to military operations. While preliminary parleys frequently preceded a conflict (Jg 11 12 ff.; I S 11 1 ff.; I K 20 1 ff.), a formal declaration of war was by no means necessary (cf. I S 15 5 ff.).

2. Religious Aspects of Warfare. Before war was begun, sacrifices were offered, so that the expression qāddēsh milhāmāh ('to sanctify war,' Jer 6 4; Mic 3 5; Jl 3 9; cf. RVmg.) meant to initiate a war with sacrifices. In like manner, care was taken at the opening of a campaign, or in critical situations, not to omit seeking to know J''s will by means of the sacred lot (Jg 1 1 ff.; I S 14 37, 23 2 ff., 28 6, 30 7 ff.; II S 19 23), or through prophets (I K 22 5 ff.; II K 19 2 ff.). In other

ARCHERS IN BATTLE SCENE FROM ASSHURNASIRPAL'S PALACE.

WARFARE: The early historical sources—especially those of the period of the Judges—show that early Palestinian wars were more like the expeditions of the Bedawin than like the campaigns of a great people. It was for the sake of plunder, or to repel a sudden attack, or to avenge the death of those killed in such an attack that the men of a clan or tribe rallied around the chief or the bravest one in the midst of them.

1. Character of Early Warfare. In times of great danger heralds were despatched to the friendly or neighboring tribes to ask their aid. If the enemy was beaten, each warrior returned to his own home with his share of the spoil. Thus Gideon at the head of 300 men of his clan sought to avenge the death of his brothers who had been slain by the Midianites (Jg 7 16 ff., 8 18 ff.). The tribe of Dan put 600 warriors into the field to make conquest of new places of abode (Jg 18 11 ff.).

Only on one occasion did any large number of tribes unite in a campaign. This was when, in the days of Barak and Deborah, the Israelites to the N. and S. of the Plain of Esdraelon were engaged in a life-and-death struggle against Sisera (Jg ch. 4 ff.; cf. also I S 11 6-8; Jg 20 1-3). Generally, wars were cases, a knowledge of the Divine will was sought by means of all kinds of omens (I S 14 8 ff.; Jg 6 36 ff.), and for this purpose, not that they might offer sacrifices, priests accompanied the army, since the sacred lot was in their keeping. In ancient times, in order to make J''s help in battle more certain, the Ark, in which He was thought to be present, was carried with the army into war. This explains why Uriah was careful not to render himself ceremonially unclean through intercourse with his wife (II S 11 11), also the requirement that the camp be kept free from all defilement lest J'' should withdraw Himself from Israel (Dt 23 10 ff.; cf. Nu 5 1 ff.).

3. Details of Camp and March. The detailed arrangement of a military camp is no longer known. The name ma'gāl (I S 17 26, 26 5, 7, 'place of wagons' RV, trench AV) indicates that it was circular in form, with the force camping under tents (cf. II S 11 11). The sustenance for the army was generally secured as occasion offered (cf. I S 17 17 ff.; II S 17 27 ff.), which could be managed without great difficulty, since the number of troops was generally quite small. Sentries, who were changed three times in a night, watched the camp (Jg 7 19; I Mac 12 27). When the force marched out to battle, a detachment remained with the camp (I S 30 24). On the march the enemy sought to harass the rear-guard (Dt 25 18; Jos 10 10).

4. The Ordering of a Battle. Military science was simple. It was an old custom of the Bedawin to divide a force into two attacking divisions or bands. The rear one (lies in wait, 'aqēbh, Jos 8 13) served, if necessary, also as a reserve, or guaranteed to the chief and those with him a chance of escape (Gn 32 7 f.). Sometimes, in order to divert the attention of the enemy, and also to conceal the attack itself, three divisions were formed (Jg 7 16 ff.; I S 11 11; II S 18 2; I Mac 5 33). Night attacks were often resorted to (Jg 7 16 ff.; II S 17 1 ff.), as well as ambushments and pretended flight (Jos 8 2, 12; Jg 20 29 ff.; I S 15 5; cf. II K 7 12 ff.), and circumvention of an enemy preparatory to an attack from the rear (II S 5 22). David availed himself of the rustling of the mulberry-trees in order to come upon his enemy unawares (II S 5 24); Joab disposed his men within a wooded tract to render the overthrow of Absalom's followers more complete (II S 18 6 ff.). A trumpet-signal by the commander opened each battle (Jg 7 18) as well as the war itself, and in the same way the forces were called away from the fight (II S 2 28, 18 16, 20 22), or summoned to break camp and go home (II S 20 22). As to the disposition of the battle array, ma'ārākhāh (I Ch 12 38, rank AV), information is lacking. Probably, spearmen formed the first line, bowmen or archers the second, and slingers the third. Horsemen, or more accurately, horses and chariots, as a distinct element of the fighting force were not used by Israel until quite late—as in the Assyrian era—owing largely to the broken character of the ground, which was specially unfavorable for the movement of chariots. The bulk of the fighting was done by footmen. Before the beginning of a battle, it was usual to offer sacrifices (I S 7 9 f., 13 9 f. See above, § 1), then with a loud battle-cry, or alarm, trū'āh, the host rushed against the foe (cf. Am. 1 14; Jer 49 2, etc.). On some occasions there were special battle-cries (Jg 7 18, 20). In the conflict men fought hand to hand with the bare arm, as the upper garment had to be thrown back and tucked under the girdle, as it was also while on the march. In such contests personal bravery and skill, physical strength and agility decided the issue. The latter qualities were important not only for the attack itself, but for gaining advantageous positions. Sometimes, the battle was preceded by duels, which not seldom had a decisive effect on the outcome of the fray (I S 17 3 ff., 41 ff., 51 f.; II S 2 14 ff.; cf. 21 18 ff., 23 21).

5. After the Battle. To bury the slain countrymen was a sacred duty (I K 11 15), and over fallen heroes and captains a general lamentation was held (II S 3 31). The bodies of the enemy also were buried (cf. Ezk 39 11 ff.) or burned (Is 30 33). It was only on special occasions that the head of an enemy was taken for a trophy (I S 17 51 ff., 31 9; II S 20 22). On the other hand, it seems to have been an early custom to cut off the foreskins of fallen enemies (I S 18 25, 27). This was also customary in the wars of the Egyptians, as appears in a picture in the Ramesseum at Medinet Habu. Prisoners of war were often treated with great severity. Kings and leaders were usually put to death, sometimes after the victor had placed his foot on their necks (Jos 10 24); often large numbers of captives were slain (II Ch 25 12); in other cases they were mutilated (Jg 1 6 f.; cf. II S 12 31), frequently they were sold into slavery (Am 1 6, 9, etc.).

Such a passage as I K 20 30 ff., in its display of the mercy of Ahab toward Ben-hadad, shows how little inclined were the people of antiquity in general to be considerate in their treatment of a captured enemy. Even Deuteronomy justified on theological grounds the wholesale extirpation of the conquered inhabitants of the holy land (20 16 ff.; cf. Nu 31 17). Horses taken as spoil were lamed (hocked) in the earliest times when Israel as yet had neither chariots nor horses (II S 8 4; Jos 11 6, 9). The country of a conquered enemy was often laid waste by cutting down the trees, stopping up the springs, and burning the cities and villages (II K 3 19; Jg 6 4). A yearly tribute was laid upon a defeated people or, in many cases, a larger sum of money was demanded at once (II K 18 14; Is 33 18). Hostages were also taken to prevent violation of agreements (II K 14 14), while garrisons were frequently placed in the captured cities (II S 8 6, 14). The booty (plunder, spoil) was shared equally between those who participated in the fight and those who guarded the camp (I S 30 24 f.). Gold and silver were dedicated to the Temple of J' (II S 8 11), and costly trophies were hung up in the sanctuary (I S 21 10; II K 11 10; cf. I S 31 10).

The warriors returning from a victorious battle, while under necessity, according to the Priestly Code, of submitting to the purification ceremony prescribed for those defiled by contact with the dead (Nu 31 19 ff.), were greeted with songs and dances and the noise of drums (Jg 11 34; I S 18 6 ff.). Victorious kings often set up memorials of their victory (I S 15 12; cf. 7 12). In later times, there are accounts of thanksgiving festivals in honor of J', who gave the victory (II Ch 20 26 ff.; I Mac 4 24).

WARS OF JEHOVAH, BOOK OF THE: A lost work quoted in Nu 21 14. It seems to have contained a collection of poems celebrating the victories of Israel over her enemies. The existence of such a book has been doubted by Professor Sayce (Acad. 1892, Oct. 22). On the other hand, it has been conjectured that it was a source for Nu 21 17 f. and 27b-30; and, further, that it was identical with the Book of Jashar (q.v.). Assuming the existence of such a collection, it was evidently so called because J' was held up in all its songs as the leader of Israel's armies and the cause of their successes (Ex 15 2). The wars of Israel were the wars of J', Israel's God (cf. I S 18 17, 25 22). A. C. Z.

WARS OF THE LORD, BOOK OF THE. See WARS OF JEHOVAH, BOOK OF THE.

WASH, WASHINGS. See BURIAL AND BURIAL CUSTOMS, § 1; and PURE, PURITY, PURIFICATION, § 2.

WATCH: In the O T the words 'watch,' watchman are used of two kinds of duty: (1) that of guarding, shāmar and its derivatives, and (2) that of being on the lookout to discern from a vantage-point—such as a watch-tower, which seems to have been very common—things that took place at a distance, in order to report them in time, tsāphāh and its derivatives (e.g., 'mizpah' [mitspāh], 'watch-tower'). On (1) cf. Jg 7 19; II K 11 5; Neh 4 9, etc. On (2) cf. I S 14 16; II S 13 34, 18 24; II K 9 17; Is 21 8, etc. Another word, nātsar, 'to guard,' or 'to keep,' is used in the sense of 'watch' only in II K 17 9, 18 8; Jer 4 16, 31 6; cf. Nah 2 1. In the N T κρουστωδία, 'watch,' AV means a 'guard' (Mt 27 65, 28 11). In the O T 'ashmārāh (Ex 14 24, etc.), and in the N T φυλακή (Mt 14 25, 24 43, etc.) are used for designating time (see TIME, § 1), the both terms get this sense from their more primary reference to the military custom of dividing the night into three (Heb.) or four (Roman) periods, during each of which a detachment of men kept watch or guard. E. E. N.

WATCHER. See ANGELOLOGY, §§ 2, 4.

WATCHMAN, WATCH-TOWER: The walled cities of Palestine had watch-towers (mighdāl) on the walls (e.g., Jezreel, II K 9 17-20, 17 9; Gaza, 18 8), or an additional story above the gates, which served the same purpose (II S 18 24 ff.). There were also watch-towers to guard the roads (cf. II Ch 20 24). A watchman was called: (1) nātsār (II K 17 9, 18 8; Jer 31 6, 4 16, 'blockaders'). (2) shōmēr (Jer 51 12; figuratively Is 21 11, 12, 62 6; cf. Song 3 3, 5 7 = 'city police?'). (3) tsōphēh (I S 14 16, 'sentinels'; II S 13 34, 18 24 ff.; II K 9 17-20; figuratively Is 52 8, 56 10 [= 'prophet'], 21 6; Ezk 3 17, 32 2, 6, 7; Mic 7 4). See also TOWER and WATCH. C. S. T.

WATER: Water was appreciated by the ancient Semites more highly than by most other races on account of its scarcity in the lands that they inhabited. In the Arabian desert, their original home, it was obtainable only from the scanty springs that here and there broke through the arid ground. In Canaan and the other lands adjacent to the desert there was rainfall, but it was so slight and uncertain as to be a constant source of anxiety. It is not surprising, therefore, that water is mentioned in the Bible more frequently than any other substance. In Is 31, 33 16; Sir 29 21, 39 26, it is regarded as one of the chief supports of life. The finding of water was a matter of the utmost importance (Gn 16 7, 21 19, 26 19, 32; Ex 15 22, 17 2; Nu 21 5, 33 14), and when a well was discovered this event was celebrated with song (Nu 21 16-18). When springs could not be found, or when a person was passing through foreign territory, water had to be bought (Dt 2 6, 28). Failure of the water-supply was the greatest of national calamities, and was regarded as a direct judgment of God (Lv 26 19; Dt 28 23 f.; I K 17 1; Is 5 6; Am 4 7 f.); and, on the other hand, the Prophets look for a supernatural increase of the streams of Palestine as one of the chief blessings of the Messianic Age (Is 30 25, 35 6 f., 41 18, 49 10; Jer 31 9; Zec 14 8; Ezk ch. 47). On account of its needfulness and its scarcity, water becomes in the Bible a figure of speech for all kinds of blessings, e.g., good news (Pr 25 25), wisdom (Sir 15 2), a wife (Song 4 15), and particularly for the Divine grace (Ps 23 2; Is 32 2, 55 1, 58 11; Jn 7 38; Rev 7 17, 21 6, 22 1, 17).

By the primitive Hebrews, as by the other Semites, water in all its forms was revered as Divine (see SEMITIC RELIGION, § 8). In later times, springs became the favorite sanctuaries of J'' (see FOUNTAIN; SPRING; WELL). In the narratives of the Hexateuch one of the functions of J'' is miraculously to provide water for Israel (Ex 15 25, 17 6; Nu 20 8, 21 16; Dt 8 15). Even so late a writer as Jeremiah (Jer 14 22) regards it as the chief difference between J'' and the 'vanities of the nations' that He can cause rain. See also PALESTINE, §§ 17-20.

Water is often mentioned as used for cleansing purposes (Gn 24 32, 43 24; Ex 30 18-21, 40 7, 30-32; Lv 11 32, 14 8 f., 15 5, 13, 16 4, 24, 28; Nu 19 17; II K 13 1; Jth 10 3, 12 7; Lk 7 44; Jn 13 5). Hence it becomes a symbol of the cleansing of the soul from sin (Ezk 16 4, 9, 36 25; Jn 3 5; Eph 5 26; He 10 22; I Jn 5 6, 8). See also BAPTISM. L. B. P.

WATERCOURSE: This term renders in the AV: (1) yābhāl, lit. 'conduit' (q.v.) (Is 44 4; cf. 30 25). (2) mōtsā, 'springs' (q.v.) as RV (II Ch 32 30). (3) tālāh, 'trench,' 'conduit' (q.v.); RV has 'channel' (poetical, Job 38 25; cf. II K 18 17 = Is 7 3, etc.). The RV renders also (4) tsinnōr (II S 5 8, 'gutter' AV) by 'watercourse' in this difficult passage, but the real meaning of tsinnōr here is unknown. C. S. T.

WATER OF BITTERNESS. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 12.

WATER-POT: (ὕδρα). A vessel in which water was kept, either for drinking (Jn 4 28) or for purifying purposes (Jn 2 6 f.). See POTTERY.

WATERS OF MEROM. See MEROM.

WATERS OF STRIFE. See MERIBAH.

WATERSPOUT (צנור, tsinnōr): The Eng. word is found only in Ps 42 7 (waterfall ARV), and means strictly 'canal' or 'watercourse' (cf. II S 5 8), but is used of a rush of water of large proportions and of Divine origin. Briggs (ICC) thinks the Jordan rapids are meant, but great floods of rain seem to suit the context better (so Baethgen, Handkom.). E. E. N.

WAVE-OFFERING. See SACRIFICE AND OFFERINGS, § 11.

WAX: This word, the rendering of dōnagh, 'beeswax,' is found in the O T in Ps 22 14, 68 2, 97 5; Mic 1 4, always in a simile. See also BOOKS AND WRITING.

WAY: Literally used, this term denoted either (1) a 'trodden path' or 'road' (derekh, Gn 38 16, etc.; 38 6, Mt 2 12, etc.; and 'ōrah, Is 30 11, 41 3), or (2) a 'journey' or 'trip' comprehensively viewed (Gn 28 20, etc.; Ac 8 36). But by a favorite Hebrew mode of thought, it is figuratively used also of the 'habit,' 'conduct,' or 'attitude,' whether of God or of man (Ex 32 8; Dt 5 33; Job 16 22; Ps 119 9; Pr 12 28, etc.). Especially is this metaphorical sense attached to the term when employed in the plural (Jos 24 17; Ps 51 13, etc.; cf. Mt 7 13 f.). In the N T the plan of God for the salvation of man as outlined by the Prophets and realized in the gospel is called 'the way of the Lord' (Mt 3 3, etc.). From this meaning the term easily passed to the broader sense in which it meant Christianity or Judaism (Ac 9 2, 19 9, 22 4), and came to include the whole system of thought and life that the Christian accepts and practises (II P 2 2, 15).

A. C. Z.

The term highway is usually the rendering of m'sillāh, 'that which is thrown up,' evidently referring to the labor of making the road, perhaps also to the fact that the great thoroughfares of Ephraim and Judah ran along the crest of the highland. In I Ch 26 16-18 the same term is rendered causeway, explained in ICC, ad loc., as 'a street which led up to the western side of the Temple from the Tyropœon Valley and from the Western Hill.' In Jg 5 6 the better reading may be 'caravans' (see Moore, ICC, ad loc.). In Dt 2 27 the Heb. is derekh (badderekh, badderekh, 'in the way, in the way' will I go) derekh evidently meaning the main road; cf. RVmg. In Am 5 16 RV 'streets' is substituted for 'highways' AV, as a rendering of hāts. In Mt 22 10, Lk 14 23 ὁδὸς is rendered 'highway,' but 'way' in Mk 10 46 RV. On Mt 22 9, cf. RV. Byways (Jg 5 6) means 'crooked paths' as in RVmg.

pleasure (Ps 66 12; 'abundance' RVmg.). (7) εὐπορία 'abundance of means' (Ac 19 25). A. C. Z.

WEAN: This word renders gāmal, 'to complete' or 'finish,' and in every passage is used concerning a child which has been weaned (cf. I S 1 22 ff., etc.). Hebrew mothers usually nursed their children two or three years (cf. II Mac 7 28), as is the custom in Palestine to-day. The weaning of a child was accompanied by a feast (Gn 21 8) with an offering (I S 1 24). C. S. T.

WEAPON. See ARMS AND ARMOR.

WEASEL. See PALESTINE, § 24.

WEAVE, WEAVING. See ARTIZAN LIFE, § 12.

WEB: In Is 59 5 f. the word rendered 'webs' is qūr (in pl. form), which means a 'fine thread,' and hence a spider's 'web.' In Jg 16 13 f. the term maš-šeketh is the 'web' or fabric which was being woven in the loom by Delilah. According to Moore (ICC, ad loc.), on the basis of the LXX. we should read thus: 'If thou weave the seven braids of my head

SECTIONAL VIEW OF A ROMAN ROAD.

E. E. N.

WAYFARING MAN: This term in the sense of 'traveler' renders: (1) 'ōrēah (ptpl. used as a substantive) (Jg 19 17; II S 12 4 || to 'traveler'; Jer 9 2 [1,] 14 8 || to 'sojourner'). (2) hōlēkh derekh, 'one going a way' (Is 35 8). (3) 'ōbhēr 'ōrah, 'one traveling a road' (Is 33 8). C. S. T.

WAYMARK: This word, which renders tsiyyūn, 'something set up' in Jer 31 21, is the same Heb. term rendered 'sign' in Ezk 39 15 and 'monument' ('title' AV) in II K 23 17. E. E. N.

WEALTH: This word is used to render the following Heb. and Gr. terms: (1) n'khāšīm ('possessions,' II Ch 1 11 f.; Ec 5 10). The conception here is primarily that of property in abundance, worldly goods. (2) hōn, 'things possessed' (Ps 112 3; Pr 10 15, etc.), conveying the same general sense as (1). (3) hayīl, 'strength' (Gn 34 29; Job 31 25), emphasizing the thought of power and social standing belonging to the possessor of wealth. (4) kōah, 'strength' (Pr 5 10 AV; cf. RV). (5) tōbh, 'good' (Job 21 13; Ezr 9 12; 'prosperity' RV, and Est 10 3, 'good' RV), bringing into view the desirableness of wealth. (6) shālēm, 'ease' (Jer 49 31, 'at ease' RV), pointing to the comfort and luxury made possible by wealth, or, in a broader sense, to the freedom to do one's along with the web, and beat up with the pin [i.e., so as to make the texture as firm as possible], my strength will fail me,' etc. Thus Delilah is represented as actually weaving Samson's locks into the fabric, and, having 'beaten' this as firm as possible, as calling to him that the Philistines were upon him. Samson arose, fastened to the web, and pulled up the loom to which the web was secured. In Job 8 14 the word rendered 'web' means simply 'house.'

WED, WEDDING, WEDDING-GARMENT. See MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE, § 2; also FAMILY AND FAMILY LAW, § 3.

WEDGE: This term renders lāshōn, 'tongue' (Jos 7 21, 24), in the expression 'tongue of gold,' i.e., gold bullion in the shape of a tongue. C. S. T.

WEEK. See TIME, § 2.

WEEKS, FEAST OF. See FASTS AND FEASTS, § 2, I (3) and 7.

WEEP, WEeping. See MOURNING AND MOURNING CUSTOMS, § 5.

WEIGH. See MONEY; and WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, § 4.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES: 1. Introductory. The most ancient systems of weights and measures were of Babylonian and Egyptian origin. The Babylonian sexagesimal system was thoroughly scientific, being based probably on a unit of length, possibly astronomically ascertained, the cube of which gave the unit for measures of capacity, the weight of water contained in this cube giving the

Many of these terms are obscured in our EV by the indefinite rendering measure(s) often given to them. The ephah (=the liquid bath) seems to have been the measure most generally used. The omer or 'tenth' (of an ephah) was probably a late measure obtained by the application of the decimal system. Apart from the omer, all the measures of the table are the result of multiples or divisions in sexagesimal system. The 'measures' referred to in I K 18 32 are 'seahs,' and the statement means, probably, that the trench was long enough to encircle a piece of ground of the size that two seahs of grain would sow. In the NT the term bushel (μῶδος, Mt 5 15, etc.) was the O T seah, and 'measure' (χοῦξ, chamix, Rev 6 6) was a small Gr. dry measure of 2 sextarii or pints.

2. Liquid Measures. For these we have the following table:

1 log (Lv 14 <sup>10</sup> , etc.).
4 logs = 1 cab.
12 " = 3 cabs = 1 hin, hin (Ex 29 <sup>40</sup> , etc.).
72 " = 18 " = 6 hins = 1 bath, bath (= 'ephah') (I K 7 <sup>20</sup> ; II Ch 2 <sup>10</sup> ; Ezk 45 <sup>14</sup> , etc.).
720 " = 180 " = 60 " = 10 baths = 1 kor, kôr (= homer) (I K 4 <sup>22</sup> ; II Ch 27 <sup>14</sup> ; Ezk 45 <sup>10</sup> ).

Or,

1 log = 1 pt. (approximately).	1 bath = 9 gals.
1 cab = 2 qts.	1 kor = 90 gals.
1 hin = 1½ gals.

In the N T we find βᾶρος = 'bath' (Lk 16 6, 'measure' EV), and κέρπος = 'cor' (Lk 16 7, 'measure' EV, here used as a dry measure). In Mt 13 33 the Gr. is σάρον = 'seah.' The firkin (μετρητής) referred to in Jn 2 6 was a Gr. measure about equivalent to the Heb. bath.

4. Weights. The Hebrew system of weights was Babylonian in its arrangement, altho the actual values of the several weights was not at all times identical with those of Babylonia. (a) The Babylonian table was the following:

60 shekels = 1 mina.
60 minas = 1 talent (3,600 shekels).

It is remarkable that there was a double system in vogue, the weights in one being exactly double those in the other. Several very ancient inscribed stone weights (½, ⅓, ¼, and ⅕ mina) show that the (light) mina weight was approximately 490 grams or 7,580 grains Troy.

This would give the following results:

Light.
1 shekel = 126 gr. Troy = about .36 oz. avoirdupois.
1 mina = 7,580 " " = " 1½ lbs. "
1 talent = 454,800 " " = " 65 lbs. "
Heavy.
1 shekel = 252 gr. Troy = about .72 oz. avoirdupois.
1 mina = 15,160 " " = " 2½ lbs. "
1 talent = 909,600 " " = " 130 lbs. "

This double (light and heavy) system seems to have been the one in general use in Babylonia, whence it spread, tho with some changes in the exact weight of the different measures, throughout the ancient civilized world. Alongside of these weights another and heavier scale often called the Assyrian was also used in Babylonia and Assyria in which the (light) mina weighed about 505 grams, giving a light shekel of about 130 gr. Troy, and a heavy shekel of about 260 gr. Troy, as over against those of 126 gr. and 252 gr. in common use. This heavier Babylonian scale is frequently called the 'royal' standard to distinguish it from the common.

(b) In addition to the Babylonian common system in which the shekels were of 126 and 252 grains, the Phenicians and the Greeks also quite generally used a scale in which the (heavy) shekel weighed 218-224 gr. (with a corresponding light shekel of about 112 gr.). In this system 50 (instead of 60) shekels (or staters) were reckoned to a mina, giving 3,000 (instead of 3,600) shekels to a talent. This division of the mina into 50 (instead of 60) shekels was perhaps due to the influence of the Egyptian decimal system, and probably was first applied to money-weights. Through the Phenician traders it was known not only to the Hebrews, but in addition spread into the Persian, Greek, and Roman world, where, however, it became much modified by combination with other modes of subdivision.

(c) Still a third system of weights appears to have been once current in Western Asia. Evidence of it is found in the record of tribute paid to Thothmes III by Syrian states as early as 1500 B.C. and also in a few weights recently discovered in middle and Southern Palestine belonging to an early period. In this system the (heavy) shekel weighed 320 gr. and the light 160 gr. Kennedy considers that this heavier Syrian standard was obtained by raising the common Babylonian mina by 5 per cent., giving a light mina of about 8,000 gr. and a heavy one of 16,000 gr., and then dividing this result by 50 (instead of 60), giving shekels of 160 gr. and 320 gr. respectively. See also MONEY.

(d) Still another system, the Aeginetan, due to the wide-spread influence of the Greek merchants of Aegina, was in use in the E. Mediterranean region. In this system the shekel weighed about 194 gr.

(e) Turning now to the weights mentioned in the Bible, it may be remarked in passing that money-weights and merchandise-weights were probably originally identical, the former being only conveniently differentiated from the latter. The weights themselves were of stone (like those discovered in Babylonia and Palestine) of various shapes, inscribed with such statements as '½ mina, true weight,' or 'netseph' (נֶטֶפֶף), i.e., 'half' (sometimes a half-shekel) or, as in one case, '1 netseph,' or they might be of bronze or other metal, properly inscribed. The weights ('ebhen, 'stone') were carried by the merchants in a bag, kîs (Dt 25 13; Mic 6 11). Balances, or scales mō'zayim or peles (Lv 19 36; Pr 16 11; Is 40 12, etc.), were used in weighing, the bar of which was sometimes called the 'reed' (Is 46 6) or the 'yoke' (Rev 6 5); cf. also Gn 23 16. It seems to have been a common practise for traders to buy with one set of weights or measures and sell with another, to their own advantage, of course (cf. Am 8 5).

The smallest division of the shekel mentioned in the O T is the gerah, gērāh = 1/20 shekel (Ex 30 13, probably here a money-weight). The quarter-shekel is mentioned in I S 9 8, one-third of a shekel in Neh 10 32, and the beka, beqa' (bekah AV), or half-shekel in Ex 38 28. These were all small silver money-weights (not coins; see MONEY, § 2 f.). The shekel, sheqel, as a weight is frequently mentioned in the O T (Ex 30 23 ff.; Nu 7 13 ff.; Jos 7 21; I S 17 5, 7; II S 14 26, etc.). It is not easy to decide just what shekel is referred to in each case. The shekel of the sanctuary referred to in the 'priestly' writings (Ex, Lv, Nu, I Ch) was probably the Aeginetan shekel of 194 gr. which had come to be widely used in the E. Med. region in the time the 'priestly' writings were composed (cf. E. J. Pilcher in PEFQ (1913), pp.

186 ff.). Absalom's hair weighed 200 shekels 'after the king's weight' (II S 14 26). If this passage is a postexilic gloss, the king referred to is the Persian monarch, and the shekel is to be taken as the light Persian shekel of 130 gr. (126 gr. raised about 5 per cent.). But this is uncertain. In other (older) references either the Phœnician (224/112 gr.) or the Syrian (320/160 gr.) shekel is meant.

The mina or maneh (māneh, Ezk 45 12, rendered pound in I K 10 17; Ezr 2 69; Neh 7 71 f.) is counted in the later books of the O T on the Phœnician system as containing 50 shekels (the correct reading in Ezk 45 12 is that of the LXX. [Cod. A], 'five shekels shall be five, and ten shekels ten, and fifty shekels shall be your maneh'). In the earlier records (e.g., II K 10 17) the Babylonian mina of 50 (heavy) shekels is probably meant, tho the Chronicler seems to have understood it as a mina of 100 (light) shekels (II Ch 9 16).

The talent, kikkār, is frequently mentioned both as a money measure and as a weight proper (Ex 37 24, 38 24 f., etc.). In regard to this, as is the case with the shekel and mina, the talent of the later literature (the P elements of the Pent., Ch, Ezr, Neh) is the Phœnician talent of 3,000 shekels of 224 (112) gr. each, i.e., 672,000 gr. (heavy) or 336,000 gr. (light). In the earlier notices either the heavier Babylonian or Syrian talent is meant.

During the Greco-Roman age the Jews appear to have worked out a syncretistic money and weight system by combining the Phœnician and Attic-Roman systems. According to Kennedy, this was as follows (for both money and weights):

6 mā'ā (1 mā'ā = 1 obol)	= 1 zūz or denarius (drachm),	52½ gr.
2 zūz	= 1 shekel (light),	105 "
4 "	= 1 " (heavy) or tetradrachm,	210 "
50 "	= ½ minas or perēs ,	2,625 "
100 "	= 1 mina (= 4 tetradrachms),	5,250 "
6,000 " (3,000 shekels)	= 1 talent,	315,000 "

Here we get light on the statements in Dn 5 25 ff.: 'mene' = mina, 'tekel' is the Aramaic form of shekel, and 'u-pharsin' = ū-p'rās, i.e., 'and a peras.' Thus the enigmatic writing was: 'a mina, a mina, a shekel, and a half-mina.' The Gr. word μνᾶ, rendered pound in Lk 19 35, is the money mina of this later table. The other Gr. word λίτρα, rendered pound in Jn 12 3, 19 39, was the same as the mina and the equivalent of the Rom. libra or 'pound.'

WELL<sup>1</sup>: The word commonly rendered 'well' is b'er; of other words so rendered, ayin, mā'yān, māqōr, and πηγή, all mean 'spring,' or 'fountain' and are so rendered by ARV (except in Is 12 3; Neh 2 13; Jn 4 6, 14); b'or is translated 'cistern' (except in IIS 23 15 f. = I Ch 11 17 f.; Jer 6 7), to which φρέαρ corresponds in the N T (Lk 14 5; Jn 4 11 f.). On account of the long, dry summer, wells are of supreme importance to the inhabitants of Palestine (cf. the rites in Gn 21 27 ff.), and are still sources of frequent strife, especially among the Bedawin (cf. Gn 26 20 f.). Abundance of water is a type of the highest beauty and happiness (Song 4 15; Is 12 3; Jn 4 14; cf. Is 41 18), and the Oriental taste can readily distinguish between water from different sources (cf. II S 23 15). The water for household use is usually drawn and carried by women (cf. Gn 24 11; Jn 4 15). The male drawer of water (Dt 29 11; Jos 9 21) is engaged in one of the most menial, fatiguing, and poorly paid occupations. See FOOD, § 12; also CISTERN; FOUNTAIN; PIT; SPRING; WATER.

WELL<sup>2</sup>: This word occurs a few times as the transl. of shālōm, 'peace,' in the common salutation or greeting, in which one asks after the welfare of another (Gn 29 6, 37 14, 43 27; II S 18 28; II K 4 23, 26, 5 21, 22, 9 11; also RV, II S 20 9, 'art thou in health' AV; II S 18 29, 32, 'safe' AV). The Heb. idiom 'to ask one of his welfare' (Jer 15 5) is often rendered by 'salute,' 'greet,' etc. (cf. Jg 18 15; I S 10 4, 17 22; I Ch 18 10, etc.). See SALUTATION.

WHEEL: This term renders: (1) 'ōphān (Ex 14 25; I K 7 30-33; Ezk 1 15-21, 3 13, 10 6-19, 11 22; Nah 3 2). (2) galgal (Ec 12 6; Is 5 28; Jer 47 3; Ezk 10 2, 6, 13, 23 24, 26 10; Dn 7 9). Wheels of chariots or of carts were probably made like the Egyptian and Assyrian wheels with six spokes, hishshūqim, set in the hub, hishshūr, and the rim, gabh (I K 7 33). The tire was fastened with thongs passed through holes and bound around the rim. From the circumstance that cart-wheels were employed to thresh out grain, the wheel is used as a symbol of calamity in Pr 20 26 and Is 28 27. In Ezekiel's vision the wheels are animate beings that form part of the chariot-throne of J', hence in Eth. En., 61 10, 70 7, 'wheels' become a special class of angels along with cherubim and seraphim. See also CART; and ARTIZAN LIFE, § 8.

WHIRLWIND: A frequent translation of šūphāh, 'storm-wind,' ša'ar and š'ārā, 'storm,' 'tempest.' In other passages the same words are often translated 'storm' or 'tempest.' This is a more accurate rendering, since there is nothing in any of these forms that suggests the idea of whirling. The proper word for 'whirlwind' is galgal, lit. 'wheel' (Ps 83 14 [13], 'wheel' AV, 77 19 [18]; 'heaven' AV; Is 17 13; 'wind' EV). All these words are used figuratively of a swift and terrible destruction (Pr 1 27, 10 25; Is 5 28, 17 13, 21 1, 40 24, 41 16, 66 15; Jer 4 13, 23 10, 30 23; Hos 8 7; Am 1 14; Nah 1 3; Zec 9 14). L. WHITE OF AN EGG: The rendering of the Heb. phrase rîr hallâmûth (in Job 6 6, 'the juice of purslain' RVmg.). But rîr means 'slime,' or 'spittle' (cf. I S 21 14), and hallâmûth is of quite uncertain meaning, tho some on the basis of the Syriac word, similar to the Heb., meaning purslain, take it to be the name of an insipid herb. However, the Rabbinic interpretation 'yolk of an egg' is just as probable a rendering tho pronounced 'artificial' by Driver and Gray in ICC. 'The slime of the yolk' would indeed be an apt illustration of a tasteless, uninviting article of food.

WHORE, WHOREDOME: In a figurative sense, these words are often used in the O T to designate disloyalty to J" on the part of Israel, either through the worship of other deities, or through the practise of gross materialism and sensuality in their (nominal) worship of Him. The conception leading to the use of such a figure was that the relation between J" and Israel was like a marriage-covenant, in which Israel the spouse was pledged to exclusive loyalty to J", her husband (cf. Hosea's teaching on this). The prevalence of gross sensualism in the common Semitic religion (q.v.) also easily led to the use of such a figure. See also CRIMES AND PUNISHMENTS, § 2 (c); and HARLOT.

WICKED, WICKEDNESS, WICKEDLY: These terms render the following Heb. and Gr. words: (1) 'āwen, 'one who causes needless pain or trouble for another,' hence 'needless,' 'false,' etc. (Job 11 11, 'false' RV, 22 15; Pr 30 20, etc.). (2) brîyyā'a, 'useless,' 'profitless' (Dt 15 9, 'base' RV; Job 34 18, 'vile' RV; Ps 101 3, 'base' RV; Nah 1 11, 'wickedness' RV, 15). (3) Derivatives of 'āwal, 'to yield' or 'bend,' i.e., 'crooked,' 'perverse' (Job 18 21, 29 17, 31 3, all 'unrighteous' RV; II S 3 34, 'iniquity' RV, 7 10, etc.). (4) 'āmāl, 'tired,' 'in painful work,' 'trouble' (Job 4 8, 'trouble' RV, 20 22, 'misery' RV). (5) 'ōtsebh, 'pain' (Ps 139 24). (6) hawwāh (from hāwāh, 'to fall'), that which 'befalls,' i.e., 'misfortune,' 'evil,' etc. (Ps 5 9, 52 7, 55 11). (7) Derivatives of zāmam, 'to think' or 'plan,' but generally in an evil sense (Lv 18 17; Ps 37 7, 140 8, 'evil' RV; Pr 21 27, etc.). (8) rā'a and its derivative ra', a general term for 'bad' or 'evil' (Gn 6 5, 13 13 and often). (9) rāsha', resha', primarily 'loose,' 'looseness,' and then used almost entirely in a moral sense; the most common terms for 'wicked,' 'wickedness,' often contrasted with 'righteous,' 'righteousness' (Gn 18 23; I S 24 13, etc.). (10) hesedh, 'shameful' (Lv 20 17; cf. RV). (11) 'ānash, 'to be weak,' or 'sick' (Jer 17 9, 'corrupt' RV). In the N T the most common term is (12) πονηρός, πονηρός, corresponding to (9) above (Mt 12 45, 22 18, etc.). (13) κακός, κακός, corresponding to (8) above (Mt 21 41; Ac 8 22). (14) ἀνομος, 'not lawful' (II P 2 7, 3 17). (15) ἀνομος, 'lawless' (Ac 2 23). (16) ἄτοπος, 'out of place' (Ac 25 5, 'amiss' RV).

WILDERNESS: In general, this term signifies, not a sterile sandy desert like the Sahara without water and vegetation—since the Hebrews were unacquainted with any such place—but an uncultivated region, devoted to pasturage, thinly peopled, and occupied by nomads. (1) The most common word translated 'wilderness' is midhbār, literally 'a place for the driving of cattle.' It is referred to as the abode of pelicans (Ps 102 6), wild asses (Job 24 5), ostriches (La 4 3), and jackals (Mal 1 3). Chief among such places were the wilderness of the wanderings (Nu 14 33), the wilderness of Judah (Jg 1 16), and the wilderness of Moab (Dt 2 8). (2) A stronger term, expressive of greater barrenness, is y'shīmōn, a 'dry' or 'riverless' region (Is 43 10). When accompanied by the definite article, it is the geographical description of that part of Judah immediately W. of the Dead Sea (Nu 21 20; I S 23 24). (3) A third term is 'ārābhāh, meaning 'arid' and 'barren' (Is 33 9, 51 3). With the article, it is the geographical proper name of the great depression N. and S. of the Dead Sea (Dt 1 7, etc.). See also ARABIA. (4) A fourth term is tsiyyāh, signifying land of 'drought' (Hos 2 3). (5) A fifth is tōhā, conveying the double notion of 'waste' and 'confusion' (Dt 32 10). (6) The N T term is ἐρημος, which is used with considerable latitude (Mt 14 13; He 11 38). John the Baptist preached in the wilderness of Judea (Mt 3 1), and here also, probably, Jesus was tempted (Mt 4 1).

WILL: There is no word used in Scripture for the will as a distinct power or faculty (1) In the O T various Heb. words occur, generally in verbal forms, which are translated by the English words 'would,' 'will,' or 'willing.' One of these ('ābhāh) is almost never used without a negative (Lv 26 21; Dt 10 10; Jos 24 10; II S 3 16, 17); even where the negative is not used it seems to be suggested (Pr 1 10; Is 1 19). Another (rātsōn) is formed from a verb meaning 'to be kind' or 'favorable toward.' When used of J", therefore, it means His 'will' in the sense of His good pleasure, the thing He wishes to see done (Ps 40 6, 8, 143 10). The remaining important word (hāphēts) likewise rests on the idea of inclination, desire, delight (I S 2 25; I K 13 33; I Ch 28 9). In Ps 40 6, 8 it is translated by the LXX. (39 7, 9) into both θέλειν and βούλεσθαι. Probably, the means by which the mind of the people came to think more definitely of the will of God was the canonization of the Law. That represented a permanent character as opposed to a passing impulse, a will which is more than desire or pleasure, because it contains an element of absolute or objective worth. (2) In the N T the idea of will is expressed by two words, βούλεσθαι (whence βουλή) and θέλειν (whence θέλημα). The nouns occur in much larger proportion than in the O T. While the words are often apparently equivalent (cf. Mt 11 27 and Jn 5 21), there is yet a range of meaning peculiar to both. In general, it may be said that βουλή lies behind θέλημα as its source. The former means plan or design, the will which is prior to the specific volition; the latter is the projection of purpose in a definite act or word (Ac 4 28; I Co 4 5; Eph 1 11). This vital tho subtle difference appears in two other passages of pathetic import. In Mt 1 19 Joseph had the will (θέλω) not to act in one way and planned (ἐβουλήθη) to act in another. In Lk 22 42 our Lord appeals to the βουλή of the Father as if it were the source of alternative θελήματα; but He submits His own will absolutely to the conclusive will (θέλημα) of the Father. Thus in the life of Jesus there came to view in startling light that profound problem, the relation of the human will to the Divine, and from His awful experience arose the one supreme task, agony, and hope of man for all time. The will of God is ever spoken of as something at last fully known (Mt 6 10, 7 21; Lk 12 47; Ac 22 14; Ro 2 18, 12 2; Col 1 9, 4 12). It is now confronting every man through the Gospel, and the will of every man is confronting it (Jn 6 39, 40, 7 17, 9 31). Here the climax of human experience is reached. For, on the one hand, salvation is just the will of God (both βουλή and θέλημα) taking full effect on a man (Eph 1 3-11), and, on the other hand, the will of man recognizing and doing that will (Mt 23 37; Jn 5 40; I Jn 2 17), conscious of warfare in its own inner life (Ro 7 15-21, but succored even there by the grace Divine (He 13 20 f.; Ph 2 13). WISDOM, WISE MEN: 1. The Wise Men of Ancient Israel. In Jer 18 18 the intellectual classes of ancient Israel are spoken of as consisting of priests, prophets, and 'the wise.' It was the function of the priests to give the 'torah' or instruction, of the prophets to give the 'word,' and of the wise to give 'counsel.' This reference to conditions as they existed in later preexilic days doubtless holds true for a long period preceding. It can hardly be doubted that, from a very early period, 'the wise' formed a class of no small importance in ancient Hebrew society, altho references to them in the extant early literature are few and somewhat unsatisfactory.

The earliest reference to 'the wise' as such is in II S 14 2, to the wise woman of Tekoa, whom Joab made use of to persuade David to recall Absalom from exile. Another wise woman is mentioned in II S 20 16 ff., who delivered the city of Abel, a center of ancient wisdom (cf. ver. 18), by her wise advice. Solomon is viewed not simply as wise in the ordinary sense, but as a prominent 'wise man.' With Solomon are mentioned others, some by name, as 'Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman and Calcol and Darda'; still others more indefinitely characterized as 'children of the east,' all of whom Solomon surpassed in wisdom. Such references, together with the presuppositions in the earlier portions of Pr (q.v.), and the development necessary to be assumed before such literature as we have in the wisdom books of the O T could be produced, make it necessary to posit the existence of numerous and influential wisdom schools or circles throughout the whole kingdom period, as well as during the exilic and postexilic periods.

2. The Work of the Ancient Wisdom Schools. The beginnings of the wisdom development in Israel were, naturally, simple and informal. It was not the great problems of life that occupied their attention, but something much less abstruse. From the evidence we possess it would seem that they gave their attention mainly to the formulation of brief, epigrammatic sayings containing keen observations on life or nature, or to the construction of riddles or parables. In all this there was little or no science or unity, except as to the literary form in which the observations were embodied. This at last came to be fixed, at least in its fundamental form, as the māshāl (see PROVERB AND PROVERBS, BOOK OF, § 3). The fable of Jotham (Jg 9 7-15) and of Jehoshaphat (II K 14 9), the clever story of the wise woman of Tekoa (II S 14 5 f.), the parable of Nathan (II S 12 1-6), the riddle of Samson (Jg 14 14) and his ready retort when it was solved (ver. 18) are examples of what was likely to be produced in the early wisdom circles. Solomon is said to have composed 1,005 songs and 3,000 proverbs, and to have spoken of 'trees, from the cedar that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; he spake also of beasts, and of birds, and of creeping things, and of fishes' (II K 4 32 f.).

A complete statement of the final aim of the early wisdom schools is given in Pr 1 2-6. This may be taken as expressing what finally resulted from the earlier efforts. More and more the practical and moral aim predominated. Observations on beasts and birds, etc., became of secondary importance. Attention was concentrated on life, and the wise man sought to show how the every-day life could be and ought to be lived in order to insure the greatest success and happiness. The deeper problems were left untouched. It was reserved for a few chosen spirits among the wise men of a later day to struggle with these (see § 3, below). Proficiency in such knowledge was designated hokhmāh, 'wisdom,' and he who was a master of it was hākhām, 'wise' (from a root signifying primarily 'to be fixed' or 'solid'). In addition to hokhmāh, other terms occur less frequently, such as 'ormāh, 'shrewdness' or 'prudence' (q.v.) (Pr 1 4), bīnāh and 'bbhūnāh, 'understanding,' m'zimmāh, 'cleverness' or 'discretion' (Pr 1 4), and tāshkīyyāh, the ability to succeed, to help oneself. These, however, may belong to the later periods of the wisdom development.

What degree of organization these wisdom schools or circles possessed is unknown, as are also their methods. In ancient times age and wisdom were closely associated and it was the aged men, the ancients, in whom wisdom was supposed to have its abode (I S 24 13; Job 12 12, 15 10). The gate of an ancient city was a place of public concourse where the elders assembled, public questions were discussed, cases tried, etc. (cf. Gn 19 1, 23 10 f.; Dt 21 18 f., 22 15, 24; II S 19 8 f., etc.), and it may well have been the case that here in ancient Israel the wise men were wont to meet, to try one another's skill with hard questions or riddles, to make observations on manners and customs, and to formulate rules of conduct (cf. Pr. 1 20 f., 31 23). Here the younger men learned the wisdom of their elders, and thus the wisdom of one generation was passed on to another. It would thus be easy for one locality to become famous for its wisdom school, and through visits of members of other wisdom circles to impart its knowledge to and receive new wisdom from other schools (cf. Job, a wise man, and his three friends from other localities).

3. The Historical Development After the Exile.

All the wisdom books of the O T belong to the post-exilic age, most of them even as late as the Greek period. We are not concerned here with the details of the date, composition, and specific teachings of each of these (see separate articles PROVERBS, BOOK OF; JOB; ECCLESIASTES; ECCLESIASTICUS; and WISDOM OF SOLOMON). Taken together, these books show the several main lines along which Jewish 'wisdom' found its development. (a) The problem of practical morality, the conduct best suited for every-day life, is that with which Pr and Sir are mainly concerned. This is the simplest of the problems of the Hebrew wisdom. It was handled also in the simplest manner, almost altogether by the formulation of short rules of conduct in the form of m'shālīm or 'proverbs.' Extended discursive treatment of only one theme was not necessary. Positions such as the existence of God, His goodness, His judgments, the free will of man, etc., could be taken for granted without debate. It is true that in the latest portion of Pr (17-9 18; see PROVERBS, BOOK OF) there are discursive sections, and in one of these (ch. 8) a poetic description of wisdom is given in which the main theme of practical morality appears to be lost sight of. But even here there is no serious attempt to discuss any new problem, and at the end 'wisdom' is resolved into the governing principle of right conduct (8 31 f.). The same is true of the later wisdom of Ben Sira; for, while in his hands the problem of right conduct takes on a broader scope involving more of the national aspects (wisdom has its seat in Israel, as the Law, ch. 24) and occasionally comes close to the problem of sin (as in ch. 17), and also is more discursive than Pr, the book as a whole deals with no other subject at length than that of practical morality (except, of course, in the 'hymn to the fathers,' chs. 44-50), in which religion and ethics are, as in Pr, treated as one. (b) It is a problem of a very different sort that is discussed in Job and Ec. In these all the positions of the ancient wisdom are not taken for granted, except the one most fundamental—that God is, and that He is essentially just. But the world God has made gives occasion for troublesome questionings. In Job it is the moral problem of the Divine government, especially the apparent injustice of the sufferings of the righteous, which seems to destroy all confidence in God's care for His servants and to annihilate the (supposed) difference between the righteous and the wicked. The problem is discussed and the negative side presented in masterly fashion, but no positive solution is reached. In Ec a more pessimistic note is struck. Everything seems involved in one ceaseless round, no definite aim or end ever being reached. 'All is vanity.' In neither book is the doctrine of a future life, with its ethical significance, made use of as helping to solve the problem. Both books show the need of a fuller revelation of God and immortality than had yet been given. (c) In the Wisdom of Solomon (Wis) we have Jewish wisdom in conflict with Epicurean tendencies due to contact with Greek life and philosophy. And it is a noble and beautiful reply that is made to the shallow philosophy in this book. Wisdom is the path not only of rectitude but of life, which death can not destroy, for beyond the grave the righteous find their reward. 'Hades hath not a royal dominion on earth for righteousness is immortal' (1 14 f.), 'and wisdom passing from generation to generation into holy souls, she maketh men friends of God. . . . Against wisdom evil doth not prevail. . . she reacheth from one end [onward] . . . and ordereth all things graciously' (7 27-30). It is a wholesome, optimistic philosophy that is taught in this, the last important product of the Jewish wisdom schools. (d) One phase of the problem of the Divine government, untouched in Job and Ec, the problem of Israel, God's Chosen People, maltreated, oppressed, and held under the sway of the heathen, was left to be handled by the apocalyptic writers, who thus became, in a measure, the successors of the wisdom school (see DANIEL and ENOCH, BOOKS OF). The Maccabean war and the resulting changes in Palestinian life brought new interests to the front and diverted the attention of learned Jews to new subjects. 'Wisdom' ceased to be a special object of study.

4. Wisdom in the New Testament. The story that wise men, μαγοι (Mt 2 1 ff.), came from the East to Judea to find a new-born king is not at all improbable. There was then a general, wide-spread expectancy of some such event, and it is quite likely that certain devout astrologers of Babylonia should have been led by some unusual heavenly phenomena to make such a journey. 'Wise men' is used here as the equivalent of magician or astrologer, as in a few passages of the O T (Gn 41 8; Dn 2 12 ff.; cf. Allen in ICC, on Matthew). In a sense, Jesus should be counted as one of the 'wise men' of Israel. In His use of the parable and in the epigrammatic form of much of His teaching He followed the earlier wisdom methods. He was also well acquainted with the Book of Proverbs (see Kent, pp. 176-201).

In Lk 11 49 the words 'therefore also said the wisdom of God' may be merely equivalent to 'therefore God in His wisdom hath said.' No known wisdom book contains the following words, which seem to be a quotation, and it is possible that here Jesus speaks, like one of the prophets of old, a Divine word on His own initiative (cf. Plummer in ICC, ad loc.) In Paul 'wisdom,' so far as it is condemned or made the opposite of the higher wisdom revealed in the Gospel, is the current philosophy of Greece, which Paul felt was apt to prove a dangerous rival to the truth of God as revealed in Christ (cf. I Co 1 19 ff., 2 5 ff., etc.). See also ASTROLOGY AND ASTRONOMY, § 9, and MAGIC AND DIVINATION, § 7.

WISDOM OF JESUS, SON OF SIRACH. See ECCLESIASTICUS.

WISDOM OF SOLOMON: 1. Title and General Characteristics. One of the books of the O T Apocrypha, entitled in full, 'The Wisdom of Solomon,' but generally known as the Book of Wisdom. It was a product of Alexandrian Judaism. It was written in Greek, and has been preserved for us in several of the great MSS. (A<sup>b</sup>BC), also in several versions. Because of its exalted teaching, its devout spirit, and its fine diction, it has always been held in the highest esteem. Indeed, no other non-canonical book, except perhaps Ecclesiasticus, can rival it in the honor and reverence of the Church.

2. Contents. As to the analysis and the unity of the book there has been great difference of opinion among scholars; it has been called 'the well-arranged product of a single author,' the two parts (1-11 1 and 11 2-19) have, on the other hand, on account of difference in language, substance and style, been assigned to different authors; but with great diversity among specialists the question can not be regarded as settled. Neither, in view of the dependence of the text on the LXX., can the attempt that has been made to prove that the book was originally written in Hebrew be regarded as successful. The contents may be divided into three sections: (1) 1 1-6 8. This has been called 'the book of eschatology,' because it brings out so clearly the different destinies which await the righteous sufferers and the ungodly oppressors. It has been regarded as a polemic against the words of Eccl 7 15. Cf. 5 14 ff. 'For the hope of the ungodly is like dust that is blown away by the wind, and like thin froth that is driven away by the storm, and as smoke dispersed by the wind, and passeth away as the remembrance of a guest that tarrieth but a day. But the righteous live forevermore; their reward also is in the Lord, etc.' The writer distinctly rejects the ancient ideas that suffering presupposes sin and that early death is a calamity. (2) 6 9-11 1. The characteristic feature of this section is the praise of wisdom which has given the name to the book. Here Solomon speaks and testifies that wisdom is given to mankind in answer to prayer, 'For she is a breath of the power of God, and a pure effluence from the glory of the Almighty, therefore no defiled thing falls into her. For she is a reflection of the everlasting light and an unspotted mirror of the efficiency of God, and image of his goodness' (7 25). She was given not only to Solomon but also to all the great leaders of the past. (3) 11 2-19 22. To connect these chapters with what has gone before we must regard this section as containing 'a series of illustrations of the power of wisdom in history;' another view is that 'We have no longer a poem extolling goodness and celebrating Wisdom, but a Midrash in glorification of the Jews'. Into the historical retrospect of Israel in Egypt and in the wilderness there is 'inserted a discussion of the origin and evils of idolatry (chs. 13-15). Men were foolish 'who deemed either fire, or wind, or swift air, or circuit of stars, or violence of water, or lights of heaven to be gods which govern the world' (13 1). Throughout their history the goodness of God was seen in rendering to their enemies punishment similar to their offenses; and the final conclusion is reached, 'O Lord; thou didst magnify thy people, and glorify them, and didst not overlook them, but didst stand by them, in every time and place (19 22).

3. The Aim, Unity, and Authorship. The work has a double purpose—to comfort and to warn. The warning comes first, and is directed against faithless Jews—those who had succumbed to heathen philosophy and adopted heathen customs (chs. 1-5). It sets forth also the deadly peril of idolatry (chs. 13-15). On the other hand, it seeks to comfort the faithful amid their sufferings. If they will but hold to wisdom, they shall be blessed amid trial, and enter at last upon a glorious immortality. The problems of inequality and suffering for the righteous are solved in the issues which wisdom shall bring. Wisdom secures a complete theodicy. Once and again the unity of the book has been denied, and there are still those who believe it to be a composite work (see art. in JE). This, however, is not the generally accepted view. While there is a complete change of treatment in the second part, the style is the same as in the first part; so too is the language. It is all from one hand. Whose that hand was will probably never be known. Only this much is clear, that the author was an Alexandrian Jew who had a knowledge of Greek thought and life. The name of Solomon is given to the book as a transparent pseudonym—a sort of 'collective name,' as one says of it, 'for all sapiential Hebrew literature.'

4. Date. The date can not be fixed within narrow limits. It is later than the Septuagint Version, for the book uses it. It is earlier than the Apostolic Age, for it contains no trace of Christian doctrine. It may probably be assigned to the 1st cent. B.C.

WITHERS, WITHS (AV): The rendering of the pl. of yether in Jg 167-9, a word usually translated 'cord,' or 'string.' 'Green cords' may be new bowstrings, usually made of intestines of animals, but some other variety of cord may be meant.

WOMAN: The Heb. and Gr. words which designate 'woman' are: (1) 'ishshāh, 'wife'; (2) n'qēbhāh, 'female'; (3) nāshīm, pl. (short for 'ānāshīm); (4) ḡuvā, 'wife,' and (5) ḡāleia, 'female.' In general, the Biblical view of woman is included in that of man (q.v.). It differs from those of other Oriental and ancient nations mainly by its placing the sexes more nearly on an equal footing in general, and in particular, in the fact that in religious matters they stand altogether on a par. So far as woman is distinguished from man, her frailty and dependence upon him are noted (Gn ch. 3; Ec 7 26, 28; I Ti ch. 2, passim). Yet in many beautiful passages the virtues of ideal womanhood are portrayed (cf. Pr ch. 31; Is 49 15 and the Book of Ruth and Song of Solomon).

WONDER, WONDERFUL: The Heb. and Gr. words most frequently thus rendered are: (1) mōphēth (etymol. uncertain), the term used along with 'ōth, 'sign,' for the miraculous events of the Exodus narrative (Ex 4 21, 7 3, etc.). It is twice rendered 'miracle' in AV (Ex 7 9; Dt 29 3) and several times 'sign' (I K 13 3, 5; II Ch 32 24; Ezk 12 6, 11, 24 24, 27; in these passages it seems to be used as a synonym of 'ōth). (2) pālā (and derivatives), which seems to express the idea of the unusual, hence wonder, mystery, the marvelous. This is the most frequently used term and like (1) above is often joined with 'ōth, 'sign' (Ex 3 20, 15 11; Jos 3 5; II S

1 26; Pr 30 18, etc.). It is the word pele' that is used to indicate one of the four great characteristics of the Messianic King in Is 9 6. (3) ṭmah, a term indicative of astonishment (Dn 4 2 f., 6 27; cf. the Heb. vb. in Is 29 9; Jer 4 9; Hab 1 5). (4) ṭēpaç, a 'wonder,' generally in the sense of 'miracle,' but rendered 'wonder' (Mt 24 24; Mk 13 22; Jn 4 48; Ac 2 19, 22, etc.). The words usually rendered sign sometimes have the sense of 'wonder' or 'miracle.' Of these 'ōth is used in a variety of other meanings (cf. Gn 1 14, the heavenly bodies as 'signs'; Jos 4 6, a memorial; I S 2 34, an event indicating the Divine will; also I S 14 10; Ps 74 4; Ezk 14 8, etc.). In the N T σημεῖον is used much in the same way as 'ōth is in the O T (Mt 12 38 f., 24 24, 30; Mk 16 17; Jn 20 30; Ro 4 11, etc.). Of other terms rendered 'sign,' νῆς (Nu 26 10) means 'banner'; mas'ēth (Jer 6 1, 'signal' RV), something 'set up' as a monument. The Gr. term δύναμις 'power' rendered mighty work is often used in the N T (Mt 11 20 ff.; Mk 6 2, 5; etc.) for the miracles of Jesus and the Apostles, the emphasis being on the Divine power behind the deeds rather than on the element of 'wonder' associated with them. See also MIRACLES and TOKEN. E. E. N.

WOOD: In the sense of 'forest' this word translates: (1) hōresh, 'wooded height' (I S 23 15, 16, 18, 19). Many, however, find here a place-name ('Hores' RVmg., or 'Horesha'). Conder discovered a Kho-reisa SE. of Ziph. See G. A. Smith, HGHL, p. 307. The RV has 'wood' (Is 17 9); the LXX. reads 'of the Amorites and Hivites,' as ERVmg., and the text should probably be thus emended. (2) ya'ar, 'forest,' 'thicket' (Dt 19 5 and often). When denoting pieces or articles of wood, it renders (3) ēts, lit. 'tree' (q.v.). From the many references to wood, it is evident that Palestine must have been more abundantly wooded than it is to-day, but the fact that wood was not often used in the building of houses shows that there were few trees from which long beams or boards could be obtained. The branches of trees and brushwood were gathered for fires (Nu 15 32; Jos 9 21 f.; I K 17 10; Jer 7 18, etc.), and were especially used in connection with offerings (Neh 13 31; Gn 22 3; Lv 1 7, etc.; I K 18 23). For Solomon's buildings timbers of cedar and fir were sent to Jerusalem from the Lebanon; the forests of Palestine itself, however, must have furnished most of the wood used in building operations (cf. Neh 2 8) and manufactured articles. Wood was used for timbers (Zec 5 4; I K 15 22), floors, and windows, and in fine houses walls and floors were covered with wood (I K 6 15). Wood was also used for the furniture of the Tabernacle (Dt 10 3) and the Temple (Dt 10 1); I Ch 29 2). Wood was also employed for wagons (I S 6 14), for all sorts of agricultural implements, and for musical instruments (II S 6 5). Idols of wood are often mentioned (Dt 29 17; II K 19 18, etc.). (4) In the N T we find ξύλον, 'wood' (I Co 3 12; Rev 18 12), ξύλινος, 'wooden' (II Ti 2 20; Rev 9 20). See also TREE. C. S. T.

WOOL: Among the Israelites, the most important material for clothing was tsemer (Aram. 'āmar, Dn 7 9), ἐρίον (LXX.) 'wool' (Lv 13 47, 59; Ezk 44 17). The wool commonly used was secured by shearing the fleece of sheep. It was washed, combed, dyed, spun appears that the Hebrew conception of God was, on the whole, more practical than theoretic; so that the manifestation of this conception by the prophets and psalmists of the O T constantly takes literary forms that are not so much objective speculation or description as subjective worship (see PRAISE and PRAYER). Many of these expressions have acquired a classical value, affecting all Christian thought and especially all Christian devotional and liturgical literature. In this respect the O T stands somewhat in contrast with the N T; for in the latter there appear constantly the more abstract or philosophical qualities of the Greek mind. At least, the purpose of the N T writers and the literary methods they were impelled to use lead in other directions; so that the obvious and direct implications of the N T regarding the sentiments and practise of worship are less than those of the O T, tho, at the same time, when scrutinized and interpreted, they prove to be, after all, infinitely richer and deeper. The revelation of God in Christ so far changes the emphasis of thought that Christ, as God Incarnate and in His office as Savior, becomes the One to whom worship is addressed or, at least, by the contemplation of whom worshipful sentiments are especially aroused. This transfer of emphasis unites with the Greek mental habit above mentioned to make the N T suggestions of worship, in the narrowest sense, notably different in quality from those of the O T. As the conception of God takes on new forms, so the tone and substance or worship change correspondingly.

3. Biblical Idea of Worship. Both the O T and the N T supply many illustrations of the larger sense of worship, in which more elements appear than merely the somewhat distant reverence due to an imperial and transcendent divinity. The reason why the Psalter seems to stand so close to Christian feeling in many ways is that in it, more than elsewhere in the O T, intercourse with God assumes a wide range and a more intimate and free manner. In the N T the visible presence of Christ among the first disciples, followed by the vivid consciousness of His continued fellowship among the members of the early Christian fraternities, in spite of His removal from their bodily sight, wrought inevitably a change in the worshipful attitude in which they regarded not only Him, but the Divinity which He embodied. God was now not a far-off being of a nature so distinct from man that He could be approached only as an Oriental came to some great king. What may be called the despotic or autocratic view of God's relation to men is replaced by a domestic or friendly view. Worship thus becomes more familiar and many-sided. It broadens out so as to include more than distant reverence and merely servile thankfulness. No doubt the O T exhibits those sides of worship termed 'confession,' 'supplication,' 'profession,' and similar ideas, especially in the Psalms; but the N T implications regarding these show a closer fellowship, a stronger faith, a clearer perception of how it is the aim of God's grace to bring man and God into substantial harmony and union. The center of this novel sphere of thought is the personality of the Savior, at once bringing God down to man and raising man up to God. To Him goes out an affection, a loyalty, an aspiration, a confidence, that were not possible at the stage or religion reached in the O T dispensation. The Christian practise of worship, therefore, when developed to its conclusions, rises above the characteristically Hebrew practise. Consequently, Christian devotion, tho it adopted and assimilated nearly all the older practise, at once took on a new color and energy. Christian prayers and hymns, for instance, tended from the very first to contain a broader and a more free expression of human personality in close and confident intercourse with the Divine.

4. Public Worship: First Stage. In the Bible we find data regarding public worship at not less than four stages of development. The first of these, the primitive, is but slightly described, references to it being mostly confined to such books of the O T as Gn and Jg. The line between private and public worship is not sharply drawn, and the methods used are not always clearly differentiated from those of the heathen world generally. But it is fairly evident that, if we could recover all the facts, we could trace in them a gradually unfolding conception of the true God as the supreme object of worship, and a slow settling of custom and tradition regarding the form and mechanism of communal and national sacrifice, prayer, etc. It is likely that the influence of primitive notions continued long after somewhat highly organized practises were instituted.

5. Second Stage. The second stage, really the first that was an organized system, is that which ultimately came to its fullest development in the Temple. The accepted Jewish view of the historic origin of this system was that it was derived from the divinely appointed Tabernacle set up in the Arabian desert. The modern interpretation of the narratives makes the Tabernacle a more or less fanciful projection into early times of ideas belonging to much later days. In either case, the Tabernacle and the Temple (as regarded in the time just before the Exile, and again after the Exile) present a conception of public worship that may be considered as a single conception. It seems probable that this stage was reached through a long period of experimentation, a time when there were many local sanctuaries or places of sacrifice. We know comparatively little of the details of ritual during this connecting period. But regarding the system as finally made supreme toward the end of the 7th cent. B.C., we have abundant data, and it is this system that acquired for the whole course of later Judaism and, through it, for all subsequent times a peculiar significance and value. With this characteristic system was associated the powerful priestly class, and its headquarters, theoretically unique, was the sanctuary at Jerusalem. Under this system, Church and State were conceived of as but two faces of the one nationality of the Holy People. Concerning its nature as a system, some further remarks are made below.

6. Third Stage. A third stage, which also developed into a highly organized system, tho at a somewhat later period, was that of the Synagog. This is supposed to have had some sort of a beginning during the Exile, and to have gradually developed afterward, but almost all that we know of it definitely is in the time of Christ, or a little earlier. The Synagog was then a well-developed institution, substantially the same as it has since continued to be wherever devout Jews have gone throughout the world. The striking contrasts between the Temple and the Synagog are suggested below.

7. Fourth Stage. The fourth stage, or system, was that of the early Christian churches, as casually mentioned in certain of the N T books. Were it not for an amount of data from other sources, gradually increasing as the centuries go on, we should be much in the dark as to the early practise of social worship among Christians. It is clear that in many cases, perhaps in most, the pattern followed was that of the Synagog. But the divergencies ultimately became notable, especially as the progress of Christianity was affected more and more by Greek and Roman influences.

8. Temple Worship. Of the four systems thus briefly distinguished, that of the Temple is by far the one most fully described. Because emphasized in the O T under claims of unique authority, this system has had a profound influence upon Christian thought and practise. Yet at the outset of Christianity it is likely that the system of the Synagog, as has just been said, had the greater practical influence. Subsequent Christian usage sought to mingle characteristics derived from both, but, with the growth of hierarchical notions and the consolidation of the papal theory of the Church, the tendency was to assimilate Christian public worship to the ideal exemplified in the Temple. As the radical differences between the Temple and the Synagog systems are not always clearly noted, they may well be briefly stated. The liturgical system of the Temple was not only strongly ecclesiastical, but essentially national. It became the religious system of the Holy People as a whole and in its corporate capacity. The individual came to be merged in this corporate whole. Indispensable at every point were the priests, who not only stood for the people, but were necessary mediators on their behalf. The great feature in public worship was the scheme of sacrifices which, at least after the 7th cent. B.C., could properly be offered only at Jerusalem and in accordance with an authoritative ritual. Thus was thrown into extreme prominence the sacramental aspect of public worship, since the sacrifices were not only symbols of propitiation, but the efficient means by which it was secured. 'Apart from shedding of blood there is no remission' (He 9 22) indicates the conviction that stood at the center; so that the accent of the system fell upon worship (man's approach to God) rather than upon instruction (God's approach to man). There was hardly any provision in the ritual for the stated application of teaching or preaching, tho, of course, important doctrines regarding the relations between God and man were assumed and implied, as well as symbolically suggested. It is even difficult to maintain that the Temple system, as such, had any adequate place for Scriptures—the authoritative documents whereby revelation is preserved and ministered to the needs of many ages. Thus came the antagonism between the priestly and the prophetic classes, and the actual degeneration of religion, as it grew out of the Temple system, into mere ceremonial ritualism.

9. Synagog Worship. The system of the Synagog was radically different. It was essentially decentralized, since synagogs were encouraged everywhere. It was intensely democratic, instead of autocratic. Its main purpose was ethical and practical—intended to dominate all common life. It exalted the function of the prophet rather than that of the priest; and so it magnified the idea of Scriptures, which were the records of prophetic teaching and interpretation, as well as the action of preachers and interpreters of its own day. It became the home of what there was of popular education, dimly pre-figuring many modern institutions, both secular and sacred. Its accent fell upon instruction rather than upon worship, tho the latter was not neglected in the rather elaborate scheme of prayers. When it degenerated, it resulted in rabbinism, with its excessive and foolish attention to 'the letter.'

In Hebrew religious life, as it stood, for example, in the time of Christ, it would seem as if these two systems were instinctively regarded not only as important, but as somehow to be maintained in harmony. From a theoretic point of view, it may be urged that the two ideals of public worship which they represent are in truth complementary. But in the course of all liturgical history, it has proved difficult to keep the balance and the unity between them. In the early development of Christian customs, it is likely that both were preserved; for in the formation of the medieval liturgical system, when comprehensively studied, the derivatives of both appear. But, as time went on, the medieval Church steadily minimized the constituents that came from the Synagog side. Here was one of the conditions that lay at the root of the Reformation, and thus many of the more zealous of the reformers advocated a liturgical revolution that should not only reassert Synagog ideas, but banish Temple ideas. In many Protestant bodies to-day the same reactionary spirit appears. Probably to-day, as in Biblical times, there is a call for some fusion of the two systems, or, rather, of the fundamental ideas about public worship which the two represent.

WRATH: The terms 'wrath,' 'to be wroth,' render a variety of Heb. and Gr. terms. (1) 'aph,' the 'nostrils,' the heavy breathing through the nose and the dilated nostrils being indicative of wrath. Anthropomorphically, the term is often used of God as well as of man (Gn 39 19; Ex 22 24, 32 10 f., etc.). (2) hēmāh, 'heat' (Nu 25 11; Dt 29 23, 28; II S 11 20, etc.). (3) hārāh, 'to glow' or 'burn' (but in the O T no longer used in that sense), and its derivative hārōn, both used exclusively in the sense of strong emotion or anger (Gn 4 5, 31 36; Ex 15 7; I S 18 8, etc.). (4) kā'as, vb., 'discontented,' especially because of grief or other feelings, and ka'as, n. (II Ch 16 10; Job 5 2, 'vexation' RV). (5) 'ebhrāh, from

'ābhar, 'to pass by,' that which causes or manifests the 'passing by' of God, especially in His punitive visitations (Gn 49 7; Dt 3 26; Is 9 19, etc.). (6) qātsaph and qetseph, the simplest term for 'wrath' or 'anger' (Nu 1 53, 16 46; Dt 9 7 f., etc.). (7) rāghaz, 'to be restless,' 'agitated' (Hab 3 2; Is 28 21). (8) zā'aph and za'aph, a 'weighty' emotion (II Ch 26 19; Pr 19 12). (9) θυμῆς and θυμῶσθαι, from θεῖν, 'to rush along,' 'be in a heat' (Mt 2 10; Lk 4 28; Ac 19 28, etc.). (10) ἐργή (from ἐργάζω, 'to teem' or 'swell'), the more usual N T term to represent God's wrath against sin or those who persist in sin (Mt 3 7; Jn 3 36; Ro 1 18, etc.).

While in the ancient Semitic religion the anger or wrath of deity was viewed as inexplicable, arbitrary, or capricious, so that it could be appeased by means unrelated to morality or righteousness, in Israel the emphasis was increasingly laid upon the ethical aspect of God's character and, therefore, on the moral character of His wrath as due to His abhorrence of sin, and it is this view that is set forth almost exclusively in the Bible. E. E. N.

WREATH, WREATHEN WORK. See TEMPLE, § 14; and PRIESTHOOD, § 9 (b).

WRESTLE: The words 'ābhaq (Gn 32 24 f.) possibly and pāthal (Gn 30 8) certainly mean to 'twist' or entangle, and may have been used of 'wrestling' in a technical sense (which was well known to the ancient Egyptians), altho no more than simple struggling seems to be intended in the passages where the words occur. In Eph 6 12, παλῶ is the technical term for the scientific wrestling in the games so common in Greek cities. E. E. N.

WRITE, WRITING. See BOOKS AND WRITING.

Y

YARN: The term renders two Heb. words: (1) ēfān (Pr 7 16, 'fine linen' AV). This, however, is of uncertain meaning. (2) m'āzzāl (Ezk 27 19), which should probably be rendered 'from Uzal' (cf. Gn 10 27), a place in S. Arabia. In Ezk 27 19 the AV 'going to and fro' is wrong and the RV 'yarn' very improbable. The text may be corrupt. On I K 10 28 see RV. E. E. N.

YEAR. See TIME, § 4.

YELLOW. See COLORS, § 3.

YOKE: The proper word for 'yoke' in Heb. is 'āl'. This was a strong bar, not necessarily shaped to fit the neck as are Western yokes. The yoke was held in its place on the necks of the cattle by pins called 'bars' (Lv 26 13; Ezk 34 27, 'bands' AV) (see illustration on p. 125) which passed through it while their free ends were often connected by thongs or chains.

The yoke was fastened to the pole of the plow or cart by a wooden pin, or a ring, and leather thongs. For lighter work a simple bar, mōfāh, was used which dispensed with the neck-pins, being held in place by thongs fastened to the animals' horns (see illus. of Agricultural Implements, Fig. 11, op. p. 16). The term tsemedh means the pair of oxen yoked together (I S 11 7, 14 14; I K 19 19, 21; Job 1 3, 42 12; Jer 51 23; cf. in the N T, ζεύγεσ Lk 14 19).

Figuratively, the yoke is used as a symbol of oppression or overlordship, exercised by one nation over another, or by a sovereign over his people (Gn 27 40; Lv 26 13; I K 12 4 f., etc.); also of authority in general (La 3 27; I Ti 6 1); of the 'yoke' of sin (La 1 14); of religious forms and ceremonies (Ac 15 10); and, by Jesus, in a good sense of His standard of life and personal authority (Mt 11 29 f.). On 'yoke-fellow' see CHURCH LIFE, § 9. E. E. N.

Z

ZAANAIM, zē'ā-nā'im. See ZAANANNIM.

ZAANAN, zē'ā-nan (זַאנָן, זַאנָן, ts'ānān, tsa'ānān), probably the same as Zenan (Mic 1 11; Jos 15 37): A town in SW. Judah. Site unknown.

ZAANANNIM, zē'ā-nan'im (זַאנָנִים, tsa'ānannīm; Zaanaim AV): A landmark from which the boundary of the lot of Naphtali was drawn on the W. side of the Jordan (Jos 19 33, 'Allon to Z.' AV). There was a famous terebinth ('oak' RV) at this place, which is again mentioned as the extreme point reached by the tribe of Heber the Kenite in its nomadic movements (Jg 4 11). The Heb. text is uncertain. The best variant appears to be rendered in RV ('oak' ['terebinth' RVmg.] in Zaanannim). A. C. Z.

ZAAVAN, zē'ā-van (זַאבָּן, za'āwān): A Horite clan (Gn 36 27; I Ch 1 42, Zavan AV).

ZABAD, zē'bad (זַבָּד, zābhādh), 'he has bestowed': A form abbreviated from Zabariah, 'J' has bestowed': 1. A son of Nathan, who was the Egyptian servant of Sheshan, of the family of Jerahmeel, tribe of Judah (I Ch 2 35). He figures also among the heroes of David, as if a son of Ahlai (I Ch 11 41). 2. A descendant of Ephraim, of the family of Shuthelah (I Ch 7 21). 3. A son of Shimeath and leader of the conspiracy against Joash which avenged the murder of Zechariah the son of Jehoiada (II Ch 24 26, called Jozacar in II K 12 21, Jozachar AV). 4, 5, 6. One of the 'sons of Zattu,' one of the 'sons of Hashum,' and one of the 'sons of Nebo,' all three of whom married foreign wives and were obliged to put them away (Ezr 10 27, 33, 43).

ZABBAL, zab'ai (זַבַּי, zabbay): 1. One of the 'sons of Bebai' who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 28). 2. The father of Baruch, who repaired a portion of the wall (Neh 3 20). The Q<sup>o</sup>r reads, probably correctly, 'זַי, zakkay (cf. Ezr 2 9 = Neh 7 14). C. S. T.

ZABBUD, zab'ud (זַבִּיד, zabbūdh), 'given': One of the 'sons of Bigvai' who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezr 8 14).

ZABDI, zab'dai (זָבְדִּי, zabhdī), abbreviated from Zabdiel or Zebadiah: 1. The head of a clan or family of Judah (Jos 7 1, 17 f.), Zimri in I Ch 2 6. 2. One of the sons of Shimei, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 19). 3. The overseer of David's vineyards (I Ch 27 27). 4. A son of Asaph, the head of a family of singers (Neh 11 17, called Zichri in I Ch 9 15).

ZABDIEL, zab'di-el (זָבְדִּי־עֵל, zabhdī'ēl), 'gift of God': 1. One of David's officers (I Ch 27 2). 2. A Temple overseer (Neh 11 14).

ZABUD, zē'būd (זָבֻד, zābhūd), 'given': An officer under Solomon (I K 4 5). The text is uncertain; the LXX. omits 'priests.' His designation as the 'king's friend' may indicate that he was his confidential adviser. Such an office seems to have been common in the ancient East. E. E. N.

ZABULON, zab'yu-len. See TRIBE, TRIBES, §§ 2, 4, on Zebulun.

ZACCAI, zak'a-ai or zak'ē (זָכַי, zakkay): The ancestral head of a postexilic family (Ezr 2 9; Neh 7 14).

ZACCHÆUS, za-ki'us or zak'i-us (Ζακχαῖος, perhaps another form of Ζαχαρίας; but probably equivalent to the O T (zakkay, 'pure,' LXX. Ζακχού, II Es 2 9): A chief tax-collector, who sought to see Jesus on His approach to Jericho (Lk 19 2-10). He was a Jew of benevolent disposition and habits (ver. 8 f.; cf. Lk 15 29; also Blass, Gram.<sup>2</sup>, p. 184), whom the Lukan narrative represents as ostracized simply because of his occupation (cf. ver. 7). J. M. T.

ZACCUR, zak'ūr, ZACCHUR (זַכְּכֻר, zakkūr): 1. A Reubenite, father of Shammua, one of the spies sent by Moses into Canaan (Nu 13 4). 2. A Simeonite, father of Shimei, who had sixteen sons and six daughters (I Ch 4 25 f.). 3. A Levite, of the family of Merari (I Ch 24 27). 4. An Asaphite, set over the service of song by David (I Ch 25 2, 10; Neh 12 35). 5. A 'son' of Imri, and helper in rebuilding the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3 2). 6. A Levite, who sealed the covenant (Neh 10 12 (13)), perhaps the same as 7. (Neh 13 13). 8. A 'son' of Bigvai, who came up from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr 8 14, K'thūb; as RVmg.). C. S. T.

ZACHARIAH, ZACHARIAS, zak'a-rai'a (זְכַרְיָה, zakharyāh, Gr. Ζαχαρίας, zacharias): 'J' remembers': 1. The father of Abi or Abijah, the mother of King Hezekiah (II K 18 2; II Ch 29 1, Zechariah RV). 2. See ZECHARIAH, 2. 3. A priest, the father of John the Baptist. He belonged to the course of Abijah (I Ch 24 10), and served in the Temple only as was demanded by the term allotted to his course. Each course served twice a year for about a week (I Ch 23 6, 28 13; I Es 1 2, 16). Besides what is related in Lk 1 5 ff., nothing more is known of this priest. It may be inferred from the story in Lk that he had little sympathy with the worldly aristocratic Sadducee priesthood in Jerusalem. 4. A priest of the O T period referred to by Jesus (Mt 23 35; Lk 11 51). He was probably the same as the one mentioned in II Ch 24 20 ff., and if so, the reference would indicate that the Books of Chronicles were even then placed last in the list of O T books. E. E. N.

ZACHER, zē'ker. See ZECHER.

ZADOK, zē'dek (זָדֹק, tsādhōq), 'righteous': 1. One of the two chief priests of the Davidic sanctuary in Jerusalem. The first reference to Z. is in II S 8 17, where the text is certainly corrupt (cf. the brief form of the original text in II S 20 25) and we should read as the correct text 'and Abiathar the son of Abimelech, the son of Ahitub, and Zadok were priests' (cf. I S 14 3, 22 9 ff., 20). Consequently, in this earliest notice of Z. nothing is said of his lineage. If his ancestor was Ahitub (I Ch 6 8) this must have been some other Ahitub than Abiathar's grandfather if the story in I S 2 22-36 has any real value. He was associated with Abiathar, probably in the latter half of David's reign, as his younger but equally privileged colleague (II S 15 24 ff., 17 15, 18 19, 27, 19 11, 20 25). In I Ch 12 23, late and artificial as the statement is, there may be preserved an element of true history as to how Z. came to be one of David's intimate friends (see ICC. ad loc.).

Near the close of David's reign Z. took the side of Solomon against Adonijah, whose cause was favored by Abiathar. The result was that it was Z. who crowned Solomon and was appointed by him chief priest at Jerusalem, Abiathar being banished to his patrimony at Anathoth. Z. thus became the head of the Jerusalem priesthood, which, after the Temple was built, and especially after the fall of the Northern Kingdom, became the most important family of priests in Israel. The centralization of all legitimate worship in Jerusalem through the reform of Josiah (621 B.C.) only added to the importance of the priesthood there. Protests were probably made by representatives of other equally ancient priestly families, but these were, at best, but partially successful. Ezekiel (40 46, 43 19, 44 15, 48 11) pronounced positively in favor of the exclusive rights of the Zadok priests (of whom he was one). The passage in I S 2 27-36 probably reflects some stage of the conflict over the priesthood and attempts to show how it was God's purpose to depose the line of Abiathar (in this story it is the whole line of Eli that is to be deprived of the priesthood, which could have a meaning only on the assumption that Z. was of some other line than Abiathar Eli's descendant). For further details see PRIESTHOOD, §§2a, 6, 9a. 2. The father of Jerusha, the mother of Jotham, King of Judah (II K 15 33; II Ch 27 1). 3. A late descendent of 1 (I Ch 6 12; Neh 11 11). 4. One of the 'sons of Baana,' who helped on the wall of Jerusalem and signed the covenant (Neh 3 4, 10 21). 5. A priest, of the family of Immer (Neh 3 29 and 13 13?). 6. A priest, perhaps identical with 3 (I Ch 9 11). 7. A scribe (Neh 13 13). E. E. N.

ZAHAM, ze'ham (זָחַם, zāham): A son of Rehoboam (II Ch 11 19).

ZAIR, zē'ir (צִיר, tsā'ir): A city (of Edom?) where Joram conquered the Edonites (II K 8 21). Site unknown.

ZALAPH, zē'laf (זָלַף, tsalāph): The father of Hanun who repaired the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3 30).

ZALMON, zal'men (זלמן, tsalmōn), 'dark-colored': I. 1. A hill near Shechem (Jg 9 48), possibly the southern peak of Gerizim. 2. An unknown locality (Ps 68 14; AV Salmon), perhaps the same as 1, but more probably E. of the Jordan. Jebel Haurān would satisfy the context.

II. One of David's chiefs (II S 23 28); in I Ch 11 29 called Ilai (q.v.) L. G. L.—L. B. P.

ZALMONAH, zəl-mō'na (זלמנא, tsalmōnāh): A station of the Israelites between Mt. Hor and Punon (Nu 33 41 f.). It has not been identified. C. S. T.

ZALMUNNA, zəl-mun'nā (זלמנא, tsalmunnā): One of the two Midianite kings mentioned in the second version of the story of Gideon's victory over the Midianites (Jg 8 5 ff.). He was captured and slain by Gideon (ver. 21). See GIDEON. E. E. N.

ZAMZUMMIM, zam-zum'im (זמזומים, zamzumīm): A race of giants inhabiting the territory later occupied by the Ammonites, and called also Rephaim (q.v.) (Dt 2 20 = Zuzim [q.v.], Gn 14 5). C. S. T.

ZANOAH, zə-nō'a (זנוא, zānōah): 1. A town of Judah, in the Shephelah (Jos 15 34; Neh 3 13, 11 30), said to have been founded by the Calebite Jekuthiel (I Ch 4 18). Map II, D 1. 2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Jos 15 56). Map II, D 3 (but identification uncertain).

ZAPHENATH-PANEAH, zaf''i-nāh-pā-nī'a (זפנתפנא, tsāphēnāth pa'nēah), Zaphnath-paaneah AV (Gn 41 45): An Egyptian name, given by Pharaoh to Joseph when he appointed him vice-regent of Egypt. The more generally accepted meaning is 'the god speaks, and he [the bearer of the name] lives.' C. S. T.

ZAPHON, zē'fan (זפון, tsāphōn): A city of Gad, on the E. bank of the Jordan in the valley near Succoth (Jos 13 27). In Jg 12 1 'to Zaphon' (RV margin) should be read for 'northward.' The Jerusalem Talmud identifies it with the later Amathō, probably the Amathus of Josephus, and also of Eusebius and Jerome, which was 21 m. S. of Pella. It is the modern Amath just N. of the Jabbok at the mouth of the Wādī-er-Rugeih. C. S. T.

ZARA, zē'rā, ZARAH, zē'rā. See ZERAH.

ZAREAH, zē'rī-ā, See ZORAH.

ZAREATHITE, zē'rī-āth-ait. See ZORATHITE.

ZARED, zē'red. See ZERED.

ZAREPHATH, zar'i-fāth (זרפא, tsārēphath): A city of Phénicia near Sidon, where Elijah was entertained by a poor widow, whose son he afterward brought to life (I K 17 9 ff.). It is mentioned (Ob ver. 2c) as the future boundary of Israel. It is the Σαρεπτα of the N T (Lk 4 28 Sarepta AV) and the modern Arab. town Šarafend, near the seacoast on the road from Tyre to Sidon and 8 m. S. of Sidon. Map IV, C 3. The ruins of the older city lie nearer the sea on a promontory, and in the midst of them is the Crusaders' church on the traditional site of the widow's guest-room. C. S. T.

ZARETHAN, zar'i-fhan (זרתא, tsārēthān): A place probably in the Jordan Valley, W. of the river, near Adam (q.v.) (Jos 3 16 Zaretan AV). If we accept Moore's emendation of I K 7 46 ('at the ford of Adamah' for 'in the clay ground'), a road joined it with Succoth (q.v.) E. of the Jordan. Solomon had his brass foundries near Z. (I K 7 46 [Zarthan AV] זרתא, ts'ērdhāhāh, II Ch 4 17). Zerah (זרה, ts'rērāh, Jg 7 22) is supposed to be Zeredah (זרדה, ts'rēdhāh, I K 11 26), and identical with Zarethan. The Z. of I K 4 12 [Zartanah AV] is assumed to be the same place, tho it seems to be located too far north. C. S. T.

ZARETH-SHAHAR, zē'reth-shē'hār. See ZERETH-SHAHAR.

ZARHITE, zār'hait. See ZERAH.

ZARTANAH, zār'tā-na. See ZARETHAN.

ZARTHAN, zār'chān. See ZARETHAN.

ZATTHU, zat'chu. See ZATTU.

ZATTU, zat'u (זטו, zattu): The ancestral head of a prominent postexilic family (Ezr 2 8, 10 27; Neh 7 13, 10 14 [Zatthu AV]).

ZAVAN, zē'vān. See ZAAVAN.

ZAHA, zē'zā (זח, zāzā): The son of Jonathan, a Jerahmeelite (I Ch 2 33).

ZEAL, ZEALOUS: (1) In the O T these terms render Heb. qānā, qān'āh (the root idea of which is 'to become red,' as in the face through strong emotion). The same words are frequently translated 'jealous' or 'envy.' The term is used of both God and man, and is indicative of intense regard for one's honor or rights, or of ardent devotion to a given cause (cf. Nu 25 11 f.; II K 10 16; Is 9 7, etc.). (2) In the N T, ζήλος, 'zeal' (Jn 2 17; II Co 7 11; Ph 3 6; etc.), ζηλωτής, 'a zealot' (Ac 21 20, 22 3; I Co 14 12, etc.) and the verb ζηλοῦν (Gal 4 17 f.) reflect the O T usage and have the same range of meaning. E. E. N.

ZEALOT. See CANANÆAN.

ZEBADIAH, zeb''ā-dai'a (זבדיא, zēbadhyāh, זבדיא, zēbadhyāhā), 'J' has bestowed': 1. One of the sons of Elpaal, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 15). 2. Another, named as son of Elpaal (I Ch 8 17). 3. One of the Benjamites who attached himself to David at Ziklag (I Ch 12 7). 4. The third son of Meshelemiah, one of the doorkeepers of the Temple (I Ch 26 2). 5. One of David's captains 'of the host' (I Ch 27 7). 6. One of the Levites who accompanied the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (II Ch 17 8). 7. The son of Ishmael, appointed by Jehoshaphat to be 'the ruler of the king's matters' (II Ch 19 11). 8. One of those who returned with Ezra from the Exile (Ezr 8 8). 9. One of 'the sons of the priests' who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 20).

ZEBAH, zī'ba (זב, zēbah): A king of Midian, who with Zalmonna was pursued by Gideon as far as Karkor, E. of the Jordan. Gideon defeated their hosts and afterward captured the two kings. After he had taken vengeance on Succoth and Peniel, because they had refused to give him bread, he slew the kings, as his son feared to draw his sword against them (Jg 8 5 ff.; cf. Ps 83 11 (12). C. S. T.

ZEBAIM, zī-bē'im. See POCHERETH-HAZZEBAIM.

ZEBEDEE, zeb'ī-dī (Ζεβεδαιοῦς), abbreviated from 'Zebediah' (זְבִידִיָּהּ, zēbhadyāh, 'J' gives, or else an Aramaic name; cf. the Palmyrene זבדא, also 'Zabdi,' I Ch 27 27): A fisherman, the father of two Apostles, James and John (Mt 4 21; Mk 1 20), husband of Salome (Mk 15 40; Mt 27 56). Nothing more is known of him.

J. M. T.

ZEBIDAH, zeb'ī-da (זְבִידָה, zēbhīdhāh, Zebudah AV), 'endowed': The mother of King Jehoiakim (II K 23 36).

ZEBINA, zī-bai'nā (זִיבִינָה, zēbhīnā'): One of those who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 43).

ZEBOIM, zī-bē'im, ZEBOIM, zī-bō'im or zī-bo-im (זִיבְוִיִּם, tsēbhōyīm, זִיבְוִיִּם, tsēbhōyīm, זִיבְוִיִּם, tsēbhōyīm): One of the ancient cities of the plain that joined in the revolt against Chedorlaomer (Gn 10 19; 14 2, 8) and was overthrown with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gn 19 25; Dt 29 23; Hos 11 8). Site unknown.

ZEBOIM (זִיבְוִיִּם, tsēbhōyīm), 'hyenas': 1. A valley mentioned in I S 13 18, probably the same as the Valley of Achor (Map III, G 5), or one of its lower tributaries, as the name survives in the neighborhood to-day. 2. A town of Benjamin, probably in the same region as 1 (Neh 11 34).

E. E. N.

ZEBUDAH, zī-bū'da. See ZEBIDAH.

ZEBUL, zī'būl (זִיבּוּל, zēbhul): The ruler of Shechem under Abimelech. He was loyal to his master when Gaal and others plotted revolt, and succeeded in holding the city until Abimelech came and conquered Gaal (Jg 9 28-45).

E. E. N.

ZEBULUN, zeb'yu-lən, ZEBULUNITE, zeb'yu-lən-ait. See TRIBE, TRIBES, §§ 2, 4.

ZACHARIAH, zek'ā-rai'a (זַכְרְיָהּ, zēkharyāh), 'J' remembers': 1. The son of Berechiah, son of Iddo, the prophet (Zec 1 1; Ezr 5 1; Neh 12 16). See ZACHARIAH, BOOK OF. 2. The son of Jeroboam II, King of Israel (745-744 B.C., Zachariah AV; II K 14 23, 15 8, 11), and the last of the dynasty of Jehu. His reign lasted but six months, ending with his assassination by Shal-lum. 3. Grandfather of King Hezekiah on his mother's side (II K 18 2, Zachariah AV; II Chr 29 1). 4. A Reubenite chief (I Ch 5 7). 5. A son of Meshele-miah, a Levite serving as porter at the door of the tent of meeting (I Ch 9 21, 26 2, 14). 6. A son of Jehiel, a Benjamite, also called Zacher (I Ch 9 37, Zecher RV). 7. A Levite Temple musician (I Ch 15 18, 20, 16 5). 8. A priest of the time of David (I Ch 15 24). 9. A son of Issiah, a Kohathite priest, probably the same as 7 (I Ch 24 25). 10. A son of Hosah, a Merarite Levite (I Ch 26 11). 11. The father of Iddo, a Manassite (I Ch 27 21). 12. One of the deputies of Jehoshaphat in his work of reform (II Ch 17 7). 13. A son of Benaiah, an Asaphite Levite (II Ch 20 14), who encouraged Jehoshaphat in the war with Moab. 14. A son of Jehoshaphat (II Ch 21 2). 15. A priest, the son of Jehoiada, whose efforts at reformation were requited with violent death in the Temple by order of the king, Joash (II Ch 24 20-22). The peculiar sacrilegious nature of this crime caused it long to remain a type of the worst form of impiety, and as such is probably referred to in Mt 23 35; Lk 11 51 (cf. ZACHARIAS). 16. A prophetic adviser of King Uzziah, who had

'understandings' in the visions of God ('instruction in the seeing' RVmg.); possibly the 'fear' of God is the right reading (II Ch 26 6). 17. An Asaphite Levite (II Ch 29 13). 18. A Kohathite Levite, an overseer of the repairs in the Temple in the days of Josiah (II Ch 34 12). 19. A ruler of the house of God in the days of Josiah (II Ch 35 8). 20. One of the 'sons of Parosh,' who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 3). 21. One of the 'sons of Bebai,' who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 11). 22. A chief sent by Ezra to get servants for the Temple (Ezr 8 16). 23. One of the 'sons of Elam' (Ezr 10 26). 24. One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the Law (Neh 8 4). 25. A son of Amariah, a Judahite (Neh 11 4). 26. Another Judahite, the son of Shiloni (Neh 11 5). 27. A son of Pashhur, a priest (Neh 11 12). 28. A son of Jonathan, an Asaphite priest (Neh 12 35, 41). 29. A son of Jeberechiah, a contemporary of Isaiah (Is 8 2), identified by some as the author of Zec (chs. 12-14). (Cf. ZACHARIAH, BOOK OF, § 4.)

A. C. Z.

ZACHARIAH, BOOK OF: 1. Contents. The eleventh of the twelve books of the so called Minor Prophets. It opens with the designation of the author as the son of Berechiah (1 1; cf. Neh 12 16) and, of the time of the prophet with the second year of Darius, 520 B.C. It consists of two sections, different both in style and subject-matter. Of these, the first (chs. 1-8) contains messages dated with precision ('in the eighth month of the year,' 1 1-6; 'on the twenty-fourth day of the fourth month,' 1 7-6 15; and 'the fourth day of the ninth month of the fourth year of Darius,' 7 1). The first message urges the returned exiles to give their allegiance to 'J'; the second, which is the longest of the three, consists of eight symbolic representations: (1) the chariots (1 7-17); (2) the four horns (1 18-21); (3) the measuring-line (2 1-13); (4) the vindication and purification of Jeshua the priest (3 1-10); (5) the golden candlestick (4 1-14); (6) the flying roll (5 1-4); (7) the woman in the ephah measure (5 5-11); (8) the chariots and horses (6 1-8). The third message (chs. 7, 8) is an inquiry as to the observance of the fast-days and a reassuring message of the favor of God.

2. General Characteristics. The outlook of this division of the book is Messianic. Z. urged that nothing should stop the work of rebuilding the Temple and sought to show that all obstacles in the way of the realizing of Israel's hopes are to be removed. The style of the prophecy is markedly different from that of the preexilic prophets. The apocalyptic form of revelation takes a conspicuous place in it, and angelic mediation becomes necessary for the interpretation of the symbolism. The interest of religion is further concentrated largely in the Temple service; but a strongly ethical tone pervades it throughout, and the principle of righteousness is always kept in view. See also HAGGAI.

3. Integrity of Zechariah. The question raised with reference to the second part of the book (chs. 9-14) is whether this is the work of Zechariah, son of Iddo. Upon the grounds of the style of the two parts and the historical presuppositions implied in each, this question must be answered clearly in the negative. But the unity of chs. 9-14 is again called into question. Ch. 9 begins with a title: 'The burden of the word of Jehovah upon the land of Hadrach'; ch. 12 also begins with a title: 'The burden of the word of Jehovah concerning Israel.' This would indicate a difference of address and subject-matter only, but there are also differences in style and type of thought between the sections thus introduced, and these seem to necessitate the ascription of the two sections to different authors.

4. Date of chs. 9-14. Assuming that the two parts of chs. 9-14 issue from the same general age, the whole section has been assigned to different pre-exilic dates by some even to the days of Isaiah, the son of Amoz. Those who assign this early date to it ascribe the work to Zechariah, the son of Jeberechiah (cf. Is 8 2). Others find a very late date for the work (or works), perhaps the 3d cent. B.C.). (Marti dates it as late as 160 B.C.). The chief ground for the postexilic dating is the mention of the Greeks (9 13). This could not have been done before the days of Alexander the Great (Driver, Stade); but, on the other side, the mention of Ephraim in combination with Judah (9 13, 10 7), of Egypt and of Assyria in the same terms as in Hosea and Isaiah (10 10, 11, 9 11) have led many (Baudissin, Strack) to favor the preexilic dating. If this view be accepted, the reference to Greece in 9 13 is a corruption of the text.

ZECHER, zek'ir (זֶכֶרִי, zekher, Zacher AV): The ancestor of a Gibeonite family (I Ch 8 31, called Zechariah in I Ch 9 37).

ZEDAD, zī'dad (זֶדָד, ts'adhād): A place on the ideal N. border of Canaan (Nu 34 8; Ezk 47 15). Site unknown.

ZEDEKIAH, zed'ī-kai'a (זִדְקִיָּהוּ, tsidhqiyyāhū), 'J' is righteous: 1. King of Judah from 597 to 586 B.C. He was the youngest son of Josiah, and was raised to the throne by Nebuchadrezzar, who deposed Jehoiachin. The king of Babylon caused Z. to take a solemn oath to be subject to Babylon (Ezk 17 13), and also changed his name from Mathaniah to that by which he is commonly known (II K 24 17), tho for what reason does not appear. Zedekiah was twenty-one years of age on his accession and very much lacking in courage and energy. Soon after his accession, messengers came from Moab, Ammon, and Tyre urging him to join a coalition against Babylon (Jer 27 3). The king's irresolute attitude made this the occasion of a controversy between the party of which the prophet Jeremiah was the leading exponent, and the anti-Babylonian faction, consisting mainly of the priests and the nobles or princes. The latter had also its prophets, among them one Hananiah, who predicted that in two full years the yoke of Nebuchadrezzar should be broken (Jer 28 3). Despite the earnest words of Jeremiah, the anti-Babylonian side steadily gained ground, and in 588 Zedekiah was persuaded to undertake an open revolt. He was promptly joined by Ammon and Tyre, and an appeal was made to Egypt for horses and an auxiliary army (Ezk 17 15). The king of Babylon lost no time in meeting the rebels. He inaugurated a campaign, and laid siege to Jerusalem in 587. Meanwhile, Pharaoh-hophra was reported to be advancing with an Egyptian army. Upon hearing this, Nebuchadrezzar raised the siege—a step which was taken as the sign of assured success for the rebellion of Judah. Jeremiah was seized and, on the charge of treason, cast into a vile dungeon, with the consent of the king (Jer 38 6). Thence Zedekiah summoned him into his presence, asking for a prophetic utterance as to the will of J'. The prophet fearlessly declared to him that the only condition upon which a personal and national catastrophe could be averted was to submit to Babylon. But the king was too weak to adopt and carry out the advice of the prophet in the face of the opposition of his nobles. The policy of resistance was adhered to, Nebuchadrezzar returned to the siege with greater vigor, and the city fell into his hands in 586. Zedekiah attempted to flee to the wilderness of Judea toward the Jordan. He left the city under cover of the night through the southern gate, with a few followers. He was, however, overtaken and captured, and carried to Babylon. As a captive, he was subjected to the cruelty of having his sons put to death in his presence and then having his own eyes blinded. He passed the remainder of his days a prisoner in Babylon (II K 25 3-7). 2. A son of Chenaanah, one of the 400 prophets of Ahab (I K 22 11 f.) who encouraged the king to undertake the campaign against Syria. He was rebuked by the prophet Michaiah, son of Imlah, for false prophesying, but prevailed with the king. 3. A son of Maaseiah, a prophet in the days of Jehoiachin, whom Jeremiah denounced for false prophecy and immorality, predicting his summary punishment at the hands of Nebuchadrezzar (Jer 29 21-23). 4. A son of Hananiah, one of the princes in the days of Jehoiakim (Jer 36 12). 5. A son of Coniah (I Ch 3 16), probably the same as 1, but called the son of Jehoiakim as his successor. 6. One of those who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 1, Zidkijah AV). A. C. Z.

ZEEB, zī'eb or zīb (זֵבִי, zēbh), 'wolf': A 'prince' of Midian. According to the first version of the story, Z. was one of the leaders of the Midianite invasion of Israel in the days of Gideon, and was slain by the Ephraimites at the wine-press of Zeeb (Jg 7 24 f.). Site unknown. See GIDEON.

ZELA, zī'la ZELAH, zī'la, (זֵלָה, tsēla'): A town of Benjamin, where the family sepulcher of Kish, father of Saul, was located (Jos 18 23; II S 21 14). Site unknown.

ZELEK, zī'lek (זֶלֶק, tseleg): An Ammonite officer in David's army (II S 23 37; I Ch 11 39).

ZELOPHEHAD, zi-lō'fi-had (זֶלּוּפְהָד, tsēlophād): A Manassite who died leaving only daughters, which was the occasion of legislature regarding heiresses (Nu 26 33, 27 1 ff., 36 2 ff.; Jos 17 3; I Ch 7 15).

ZELOTES, zi-lō'tiz. See CANANÆAN.

ZELZAH, zel'za (זֶלְזָה, tselzāh): A town, according to I S 10 2, on the border of Benjamin and Ephraim, near Rachel's tomb. C. S. T.

ZEMARAIM, zem'ā-rā'im (זְמַרַיִם, ts'marayim):

1. A city of Benjamin (Jos 18 22). Map III, G 5.
2. A mountain in Ephraim (II Ch 13 4). Site unknown, perhaps near 1.

ZEMARITE, zem'ā-rai't. See ETHNOGRAPHY AND ETHNOLOGY, § 13.

ZEMIRAH, zi-mai'ra (זְמִירָה, z'mirāh, Zemira AV): The ancestral head of a family of Benjamites (I Ch 7 8).

ZENAN, zi'nān. See ZAAANAN.

ZENAS, zi'nās (Ζηνάς): A Christian lawyer in Crete whom, with Apollos, Paul requests Titus to send on to him, being careful to see that they lacked nothing for their journey. It is uncertain whether he was a Jewish lawyer or a Roman advocate (Tit 3 12 f.). E. E. N.

ZEPHANIAH, zef'ā-nai'ā (זְפַנְיָהּ, ts'phanyāhū) 'J' hides,' or 'J' is hidden': 1. A son of Cushi, a prophet in the days of Josiah (cf. ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF). 2. A son of Maaseiah, the second priest under Zedekiah (II K 25 18; Jer 52 24). He occupied the office of arbiter of true and of false prophets (Jer 29 25), and was commissioned by the king with other important tasks (21 1, 37 3). After the capture of Jerusalem, he was taken to Riblah (Jer 52 24 f.). 3. A son of Tahath, a Kohathite (I Ch 6 36). 4. The father of Josiah, a contemporary of Zerubbabel (Zec 6 10, 14). A. C. Z.

ZEPHANIAH, APOCALYPSE OF: An apocryphal writing mentioned and quoted by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. V, 11 27), also named in the old lists of O T Apocrypha (e.g., that of Nicephorus). Fragments of a Coptic translation of the work have been recovered and published, from which it appears that it was allied to the Apocalypse of Elias, and contained descriptions of heaven and of hell, and predictions of the Messiah (cf. Steindorff in Texte u. Untersuch. Neue Folge, II, 3a). A. C. Z.

ZEPHANIAH, BOOK OF: 1. Author. The ninth book in the collection of the Minor Prophets. The author names himself the son of Cushi, and traces his genealogy back to Hezekiah in the fourth remove. Why he should trace it as far and no farther, unless Hezekiah were a well-known person, is not explainable. But about the time to which the fourth generation would reach, the only noted Hezekiah was the well-known king of Judah. It has been quite convincingly argued, therefore, that Zephaniah was not only a prophet by vocation, but a prince of the royal blood. He could thus all the more impressively denounce the sins of the princes (1 8).

2. Contents. The book begins with an impressive announcement of the speedy coming of the Day of J'', which will, at the same time, be the signal for the destruction of idolatry (1 2-8), a period of judgment for the leaders of Judah (1 7-13), and an awe-inspiring time for all (1 14-18). It may be averted by an earnest effort to know J'', and to do His will (2 1-3); but it will certainly come upon the Philistine country (2 4-7); it will sweep over Moab and Ammon (2 8-11), and turn northward to Assyria (resulting in the complete destruction of its capital, Nineveh, 2 12-14). Returning to Jerusalem, the prophet denounces the sins of the city and its leaders (3 1-8), and proclaims a judgment which will bring desolation upon evil-doers, but will leave the humble and God-fearing (the Remnant, q.v.) unscathed (3 9-13). The book ends with a comforting vision of the latter days, when the scattered children of Judah shall be restored to their home-land, and enjoy the favor of their God (3 14-20).

3. Critical Questions. There is no reason to doubt the genuineness of the book. Its date is fixed by the author himself as 'the days of Josiah, the son of Ammon' or 638-608 B.C. (1 1). But the severe words spoken with reference to the character of the leaders make it probable that the prophecy was given before the reformation inaugurated by King Josiah (621). It is a mere conjecture that the special occasion of the prophet's coming forward in the name of J'' was furnished by the approach of the Scythians (628). The unity of the book is also generally unimpeached, with the exception of 3 14-20, which, on account of its form, is by many regarded as a production of the latter part of the Exile.

ZEPHATH, zi'fath (זֶפְתָּה, ts'phath): A town to the extreme S. of Judah, conquered by Judah and Simeon and called Hormah (q.v.) (Jg 1 17). The site is uncertain.

ZEPHATHAH, zef'ā-thā (זְפַתָּה, ts'phāthāh): A 'valley' near Mareslah, according to the common text of II Ch 14 10. But the more probable reading (according to the LXX.) is 'to the north of.'

E. E. N.

ZEPHI, zi'foi, ZEPHO, zi'fo (זֶפְחִי, ts'phō, 'פִּי, ts'phī): A clan-chieftain (and a clan) of Edom (Gn 36 11, 15; I Ch 1 36).

ZEPHON, zi'fan (זֶפְחֹן, ts'phōn, and ZIPHION, zi'fī-on, זִיפְחֹן, ts'iphōn): The ancestral head of the Zephonites, a clan of Gad (Gn 46 16, Nu 26 15; See also ZAPHON).

ZER, zor (זֶר, tsēr): A city of Naphtali. Site unknown (Jos 19 36).

ZERAH, zi'ra (זֶרַח, zeraḥ): 1. A descendant of Esau and one of the 'dukes' of Edom (Gn 36 13, 17; I Ch 1 37). 2. The father of Jobal, King of Edom (Gn 36 33; I Ch 1 44), perhaps identical with 1. 3. A descendant of Judah and ancestor of the Zeraphites, Zarhites AV (Gn 38 30; Nu 26 20; Jos 7 1, etc., Zarah AV). 4. The ancestral head of a family or clan of Simeon, the Zerahites, Zarhites AV (Nu 26 13; I Ch 4 24). 5, 6. The name of two Levites (I Ch 6 21, 41). 7. Z. the 'Ethiopian' (Heb. kūshī, i.e., 'Cushite'), who invaded Judah in the days of Asa with an immense army, but was defeated (II Ch 14 9 ff.). The late record in Ch is the only authority for this event, and many scholars doubt its historicity. Some Egyptologists have identified Z. with Osorkon I or II of Egypt (22d dynasty); others think the Heb. kūshī refers to an Arabian chieftain. E. E. N.

ZERAHIAH, zer'ā-hai'ā (זְרַחְיָהּ, z'rahyāh), 'J' hath dawned': 1. A descendant of Aaron and, therefore, in the main line of the high-priestly succession (I Ch 6 6, 51; Ezr 7 4). 2. One of the 'sons of Pahath-moab,' who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezr 8 4).

ZERED, zî'řed (זֶרֶד, zeredh): A torrent-brook of Moab, probably one of the upper tributaries of the Wady Kerak that flows past Kerak. Map I, F 11. (Nu 21 12, Zared AV; Dt 2 13 f.)

ZEREDAH, zer'-da, ZEREDA, zer'-da (זֶרֶדָּה, ts'ērēdhāh): The birthplace of Jeroboam, and the place where the metal-work for the Temple was cast (I K 11 26; II Ch 4 17, Zeredathah AV). See also ZARETHAN. It lay somewhere in the Jordan Valley. A new identification, a few miles NW. of Ramathaim, recently proposed by W. F. Albright (Bul. ASOR, Oct., 1923) awaits confirmation. E. E. N.

ZEREDATHAH, zer'-i-da th'a or zi-red'a-tha. See ZEREDAH.

ZERERAH, zer'-ra (זֶרֶרָה, ts'ērērāhāh, i.e., 'to Ts'ērērāh') Zererath AV. A place mentioned in Jg 7 22. Probably the same as Zeredah (q.v.).

ZERESH, zî'resh (זֶרֶשׁ, zeresh): The wife of Haman (Est 5 10, etc.). See ESTHER, § 6.

ZERETH, zî'reth (זֶרֶת, ts'ereth): The ancestor of a Tekoahite family (I Ch 4 7).

ZERETH-SHAHAR, -shē'hār (זֶרֶת־שָׁהָר, ts'ereth-hashshahār, Zareth-sharar AV): A city of Reuben (Jos 13 19). Map II, H 2.

ZERI, zî'rai. See IZRI.

ZEROR, zî'rōr (זֶרֶר, ts'ērōr): An ancestor of Saul (I S 9 1, Zur in I Ch 8 30, 9 36).

ZERUAH, zi-rū'a (זֶרְיָה, ts'ērū'āh): The widowed mother of Jeroboam I (I K 11 26).

ZERUBBABEL, zi-rob'a-bel (זֶרֻבָּבֶל, ts'rubbābhel, Zorobabel in Mt 1 12 AV), 'offspring of Babel' (Assyr. zēr-Bābīlī), or 'grief for Babel' (zurub-Bābīlī): One of the leaders of the Exile who returned to Palestine. Under him the altar was set upon its base in the second year of Darius (circa 520 B.C.), and the building of the Temple itself progressed through several years (Ezr 5 2, 6 15).

1. Connection with Sheshbazzar. In Ezr 1 8, 11, 5 14, 16, it is stated that Sheshbazzar was entrusted with the task of bringing back the sacred vessels to Jerusalem. This must have preceded by quite an interval the arrival of Zerubbabel and his company (Ezr 2 2), and the both may have been of Davidic lineage and, therefore, logically governors of Judah, they are not to be identified, there being no reason why two names for the same individual should be used in nearly the same context (see SHESHBAZZAR).

2. Lineage of Zerubbabel. In Hag, Ezr, Neh, Z. is called the son of Shealtiel, who, according to Mt 1 12, was the son of Jeconiah, but whom Lk 3 27 styles the son of Neri, a descendant of Nathan, Solomon's brother. I Ch 3 19 makes him the son of Pedaiah, the son of Jeconiah. Some of the LXX. manuscripts in this passage read 'Shealtiel' instead of 'Pedaiah'; but this is hardly satisfactory. Probably, there were independent genealogical traditions, all which, however, agreed in making Z. of royal descent—two records calling him the grandson of Jeconiah, while a third traces his descent through a collateral royal branch.

3. The References in Zechariah. Z. is mentioned by name in Zec 4 6 f., 9 f., and is given Divine encouragement and recognized as the rebuilder of the ruined city. Enigmatical, however, are the allusions to the 'Branch' (3 8, 6 12). Logically, they should refer to Z., but the high priest Joshua is mentioned in the immediate context, and the strange utterance occurs, 'he shall be a priest upon his throne.' Probably, the original reference was to the Messianic expectations which clustered around Z., the reinstated Davidic prince (cf. Hag 2 23), but later the overshadowing influence of the priest resulted in an editorial reworking of the material, which left the Messianic element, but pointed it in a different direction. See also SERVANT OF JEHOVAH.

ZERUIAH, zer'-yu-ai'a (זֶרְיָה, ts'ērūyāh): The mother of Joab, Abishai, and Asahel (I S 26 6; II S 2 13, 18, etc.; I K 1 7, etc.; I Ch 2 16, etc.), and according to II S 17 25, the daughter of Nahash, which is probably to be corrected to 'Jesse,' as in I Ch 2 16. She was, therefore, David's sister. C. S. T.

ZETHAM, zî'tham (זֶתָם, zēthām). A Gershonite Levite (I Ch 23 8).

ZETHAN, zî'thān (זֶתָן, zēthān): A son of Jediahel, a Benjamite (I Ch 7 10).

ZETHAR, zî'thār. See CHAMBERLAINS, THE SEVEN.

ZIA, zai'a (זִיָּא, zīā'): A family of Gadites (I Ch 5 13).

ZIBA, zai'ba (זִיבָּה, tsībāhā'): A servant of the house of Saul (II S 9 2, 16 4). Upon the death of Saul, he must naturally have given his allegiance to Mephibosheth, but the confusion into which his master's household fell led him to act for a time independently. David attached Ziba to Mephibosheth. But, during the rebellion of Absalom, he again became independent, and was even given Mephibosheth's estate, on the ground that his master had forfeited it by his treachery (II S 16 1-4). When David came back to Jerusalem, he divided the estate between Ziba and Mephibosheth (II S 19 24 ff.).

A. C. Z.

ZIBEON, zib'-on (זִיבְעֹן, tsībē'ōn), 'hyena': Apparently the name of an ancient Horite clan in Edom, later connected with the genealogy of Esau (Gn 36 2 [read 'Horite,' not 'Hivite'; cf. ver. 20], 14, 20, etc.).

E. E. N.

ZIBIA, zib'-a (זִיבְיָה, tsībhyā'). The head of a Benjamite family (I Ch 8 9).

ZIBIAH, zib'-a (זִיבְיָה, tsībhyāh), 'gazelle': The mother of Joash, King of Judah (II K 12 1; II Ch 24 1).

ZICHRI, zik'-roi (זִכְרִי, zikhri, abbreviated from 'Zechariah'): 1. The son of Izhar, a Levite (Ex 6 21). 2. A Benjamite (I Ch 8 10). 3. Another Benjamite (I Ch 8 23). 4. The son of Jeroboam, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 27). 5. A son of Asaph, a Levite (I Ch 9 15, Zabdi in Neh 11 17). 6. A descendant of Eliezer, a Levite (I Ch 26 25). 7. The father of Eliezer, a Reubenite (I Ch 27 16). 8. The father of Amasiah, a Judahite (II Ch 17 16). 9. The father of Elishaphat, who was one of the conspirators with Jehoiada against Athaliah (II Ch 23 1). 10. A 'mighty man of Ephraim' (II Ch 28 7). 11. A Benjamite, the father of Joel who was the overseer of a band left in Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh 11 9). 12. The head of a priestly family in the days of Jehoiakim (Neh 12 17).

ZIDDIM, zid'im (צִידִים, hatsiddim), 'the sides': A city of Naphtali; perhaps the same as Hattim, a little NW. of Tiberias (Jos 19 35). E. E. N.

ZIDKIJAH, zid-kai'ja. See ZEDEKIAH.

ZIDON or SIDON, zai'den or sai'den (צִידֹן, tsi-dhōn); Assy. tsi-du-un-ni, tsi-du-nu; modern Ṣaydā: Z. was the most influential ancient city of Phenicia, for its importance through long centuries gave the name Zidonians (Sidonians) to all Phenicians. It was located on the narrow Phenician coast about 20 m. N. of Tyre and the same distance S. of Beirūt, on a small promontory jutting out into the sea, which gave protection for shipping on both sides of it. The earliest reference to it of value is that found in the Tell el-Amarna letters of 1400-1350 B.C. Its governor, Zimrida, herein notifies the Egyptian king that the Amorite ruler, Aziri, is threatening Egypt's sovereignty over the Phenician city. Some time thereafter, at least before Solomon's day, Tyre outstripped Zidon in national importance. In the partition of Canaan among the tribes of Israel, Z. stood at the northern limits of Zebulun (Gn 49 13), and of Asher (Jos 19 28; here and in ||s it is called great Zidon). The reference in Jg (1 31) leads us to infer that it was assigned to Asher. At least, some of the Israelites fell into the meshes of Baal-worship (Jg 10 6) and consequently, under the authority and oppression of the Zidonians (Jg 10 12). In the times of David and Solomon, Tyre occupied the place of pre-eminence politically and commercially, at least while the influence of the Zidonian religion permeated all too generally the life of the Israelites (cf. I K 11 5, 33). The marriage of Ahab and Jezebel, daughter of Ethbaal, King of the Zidonians, was a disastrous event for Israel (cf. I K 16 31-33, 18 18 f., 25-28, 40), for through it the paralyzing worship of Baal and Ashtoreth was officially installed in Israel. Zidon was subordinate to Tyre for some centuries, but the appearance on this coast of the great Assyrian rulers of the 9th cent. encouraged and supported her independence, in order thereby to weaken Tyre, safe and secure on its island fortress. In 701 B.C. Sennacherib received Zidon's submission and set on its throne Tubal, but was obliged to leave the island city Tyre unconquered. Zidon's later rebellion against Assyrian authority led Esarhaddon, King of Assyria (681-668 B.C.) to destroy it with frightful carnage about 678 B.C. It was, however, rebuilt and called 'Esarhaddonsburg,' but the old name could not be eradicated, and throughout the period of the new Babylonian Empire Zidon occupied a prominent place among Phenician cities. It fell under the condemnation of the prophet Joel for having participated in the sale of Hebrew captives as slaves (Jl 3 4-6). For the rebuilding of the Second Temple, the Zidonians sold cedar wood to the exiles (Ezr 3 7). Z. was burned to the ground in 351 B.C. by Artaxerxes Ochus of Persia because of its rebellious spirit. Following the battle of Issus (333 B.C.) it, with other coast-land Phenician cities, welcomed Alexander the Great as its lord. It became a subject of Rome in 64 B.C. and with its neighboring city, Tyre, enjoyed the rights of a free city. Z. and its people figure both in the activity of Christ (Mk 3 8; Lk 6 17; Mt 11 21, 22; Mk 7 24-30, etc.) and of the Apostles (Ac 12 20, 27 3). Since the days of the Early Church Z. has seen some troublous times, for in the 12th and 13th cents. it was a battleground between the crusaders and the Saracens. The modern Ṣaydā has about 11,500 inhabitants and lies on the shore of the north harbor. Fishing, gardening and orange raising are their principal occupations to-day. I. M. P.

ZIDONIAN, zai-dō'nī-an or zī-. See ZIDON.

ZIF, zif: The ancient, or earlier, name of the second month of the old Hebrew year. See TIME, § 3.

ZIHA, zai'hā (צִיחָא, tsihā): 1. The ancestral head of one of the divisions of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 43; Neh 7 46). 2. An individual, overseer of the division of the Nethinim of the same name (Neh 11 21).

ZIKLAG, zik'lag (צִקְלָג, tsiqlagh) (צִקְלָג, I Ch 21 1, 20): A city of Simeon (Jos 19 5; I Ch 4 30), later probably in the S. of Judah (Jos 15 31). At one time a Philistine city, it was given to David (I S 27 6), and was his residence until the death of Saul (I S 30 1, 14, 26; II S 1 1, 4 10; I Ch 12 1, 20). It is mentioned as a postexilic town of Judah (Neh 11 28). It is usually identified with Zuheikah, 11 m. ESE. of Gaza. C. S. T.

ZILLAH, zil'a (צִילָה, tsillah), 'shadow': One of Lamech's wives (Gn 4 19 ff.). See LAMECH.

ZILLETHAI, zil'i-thai (צִילְתָּי, tsil'thay, Zilthai AV): §1. A son of Elpaal, a Benjamite (I Ch 8 20). 2. A Manassite chief (I Ch 12 20).

ZILPAH, zil'pa (צִלְפָּה, zilpāh): A maid of Leah, given as a concubine to Joseph, and the mother of Gad and Asher (Gn 29 24, 30 9 ff., etc.). There are many reasons why these marriages and births should be taken as referring to the union of tribes, or clans, rather than individuals. But there is as yet no generally accepted theory. See TRIBE, TRIBES, § 4. E. E. N.

ZILTHAI, zil'thai or -thē. See ZILLETHAI.

ZIMMAH, zim'a (צִמְחָה, zimmāh): The ancestral head of a family of Gershonite Levites (I Ch 6 20, 42; II Ch 29 12).

ZIMRAN, zim'ran (צִמְרָן, zimirān): The ancestral head of an Arabian clan (Gn 25 2; I Ch 1 32).

ZIMRI, zim'rai (צִמְרִי, zimirī), 'mountain-sheep': I. 1. King of Israel, about 890 B.C. (I K 16 9-20), after Elah, under whom he had been general. He found his master in a drunken condition, murdered him, and assumed the reins of government. His rule, however, lasted only seven days, and his crime was execrated in later days as one of peculiar atrocity (II K 9 31). He was attacked by Omri and died in the ruins of his own palace, which he had set on fire. 2. A son of Salu of the tribe of Simeon (Nu 25 14). 3. A son of Zerah and ancestor of Achan (I Ch 2 6). 4. A descendant of Saul (I Ch 8 36, 9 42).

II. A locality whose kings are named (Jer 25 25) with those of Babylon and Elam. The name is, however, changed by some to 'Nimri.' A. C. Z.

ZIN, zin (יֵז, tsin): Mentioned only by P. Possibly a place (Nu 34 4; Jos 15 3) that gave its name to the surrounding district, the wilderness of Zin, which was a region of somewhat uncertain location and extent. It formed part of the southern boundary of Judah (Nu 34 3; Jos 15 1) and contained Kadesh Nu 20 1), which, however, was so near its border as sometimes to be regarded as in the neighboring wilderness of Paran (Nu 13 26). The wilderness of Zin thus seems to have lain south of a line drawn from Kadesh to the Arabah. See also PARAN.

L. G. L.—L. B. P.

ZINA, zai'nə (נִינָה, zīnā): A Gershonite Levite (I Ch 23 10, called Zizah in ver. 11).

ZION, zai'an. See JERUSALEM, § 16.

ZIOR, zai'er (צִיֹּר, tsī'ōr): A city of Judah (Jos 15 54). Map II, E 2.

ZIPH, zif, ZIPHITE, zif'ait (צִיִּף, zīph, צִיִּי, zīphī): I. 1. A son of Jehallelel of Judah (I Ch 4 16). 2. A Calebite family name (I Ch 2 42), connected with II, 1, below. II. 1. A city in the fertile plateau SE. of Hebron, the modern Tell Zif (Jos 15 55). Map II, E 3. David took refuge there when fleeing from Saul (I S 23 14, 15, 24, 26 2), and the Ziphites, inhabitants of the city, sent word to Saul about David's place of concealment (I S 23 19, 26 1; cf. Ps 54, title [2]). 2. A city of S. Judah (Jos 15 24), not yet identified, possibly connected with I, 1, above.

ZIPHAH, zai'fa (צִיפָה, zīphāh): A son of Jehaleel, a Judahite (I Ch 4 16).

ZIPHITES. See ZIPH.

ZIPHION, zif'i-on. See ZEPHON.

ZIPHRON, zif'rōn (צִיִּרֹן, zīphrōn): A point on the ideal N. border of Canaan (Nu 34 9). Site uncertain.

ZIPPOR, zip'ōr (צִיפּוֹר, tsippōr), 'bird' (sparrow?): The father of Balak, King of Moab (Nu 22 2, etc.).

ZIPPORAH, zi-pō'ra or zip'o-ra (צִיפּוֹרָה, tsippō-rāh), 'bird': The daughter of Jethro (or Hobab) and wife of Moses (Ex 2 21, 4 25 f., 18 2). The tradition concerning her was not uniform (e.g., what is said in 18 2 is not in exact harmony with 4 20 ff.). That the 'Cushite' woman whom Moses married (Nu 12 1 f.) was the same as Z. is possible, but not certain.

ZITHRI, zith'rai. See SITHRI.

ZIV, ziv. See TIME, § 3.

ZIZ, ziz (צִיץ, tsīts): The name of an ascent (II Ch 20 16), on the way from Engedi (ver. 2) to the wilderness of Tekoa (ver. 20), which the Moabites and Ammonites had traversed in their attack on Judah and King Jehoshaphat. The letter ז, of the text, may be part of the name, and not the article, as there is a Wādī Ḥaṣāṣa and plateau of the same name N. of Engedi.

ZIZA, zai'zə (צִיזָה, zīzā): 1. A Simeonite 'prince' (I Ch 4 37). 2. A son of Rehoboam and Maacah, the daughter of Absalom (II Ch 11 20). 3. See ZINA.

ZIZAH, zai'za. See ZINA.

ZOAN, zō'an (צֹאן, tsō'an; better known by its Gr. name, Tanis): A very ancient and important Egyptian city (Nu 13 22; Ps 78 12; Is 19 11, 30 4; Ezk 30 14) in the NE. of the Delta, the extensive ruins of which lie near the modern fishing-village of Ṣān (i. e., Zoan). See Petrie, Tanis, in EPP, for notices of recent excavations. The kings of the 6th dynasty (2625-2475 B.C.) built a great temple at Tanis, which was enlarged under subsequent rulers and finally completed by Rameses II, who chose the city as his residence and adorned it with many beautiful buildings. Under the 21st dynasty Tanis was the capital of Egypt, and continued to be one of the chief commercial centers until it was finally superseded by the new city of Alexandria. In the Ass. records it is mentioned as Tsi'innu (Delitzsch, Paradies, p. 315).

ZOAR, zō'ar (צֹאֵר, tsō'ar), 'small': One of the cities of the kikkār, or Dead Sea basin (Gn 13 10). It is also called Bela (14 2, 8). Lot and his daughters fled to Z. when Sodom was overthrown (19 20-23). The evidence that these 'cities of the Plain' were located at the S. rather than at the N. end of the Dead Sea is overwhelming: (1) From Is 15 5 and Jer 48 34, it is reasonable to infer that Z. was a city of Moab, so that it was probably at the SE. corner of the Dead Sea (cf. Gn 19 37). (2) The victory of Chedorlaomer and his allies over the five kings of the plain in the Vale of Siddim, which was 'full of slime pits' (Gn 14 10), is more easily explained on the assumption that these cities were at the S. end of the Dead Sea. (3) Ezekiel describes Sodom as on the 'right,' i. e., the S. of Jerusalem (16 46) (4) On the other hand, Gn 13 10 does not require one to suppose that Lot, standing at Bethel (ver. 3), saw literally 'all' that particular portion of the Dead Sea basin in which Z. was located; even 'all' the Jordan Valley N. of the Dead Sea is not visible from Bethel. (5) Likewise, Dt 34 3 must not be urged literally, for no one has ever seen 'Dan' from Mt. Nebo (cf. ver. 1). Post-Biblical writers and modern commentators are generally agreed that Z. was situated S. or SE. of the Dead Sea. Josephus placed 'Zoara' in Arabia (BJ, iv, 8 4); Eusebius located the Dead Sea between 'Zoara' and Jericho (Onom. 261); the recently discovered mosaic map of Medebah (near Mt. Nebo in Moab), dating from about 500 A.D., places Zoar at the SE. corner of the Dead Sea; Abulfeda, the Arab geographer of Hamath, described it as the capital of Edom; and Dimashki (c. 1300 A.D.), another Arab authority, placed it in the Wādī el-Aḥsā at the SE. corner of the Dead Sea. In short, this location is accepted by the great majority of recent authorities, including Delitzsch, Dillmann, Driver, G. A. Smith, Buhl, and many others.

ZOBABH, zō'ba, ZOBA, zō'ba (צֹבָא, tsōbhāh, also spelled צֹבָא and צֹבָא): An Aramean principality, first mentioned in I S 14 47 as one of the enemies of Israel with whom Saul waged war. The Ammonites hired the Arameans of Zobah to aid them against David, but the allied forces were defeated (II S 10 6, 8). Later, Hadadezer, King of Zobah, was routed by David at Helam, and the kingdom was made tributary (II S 8 3 ff.). Igal, one of David's captains, was from Zobah (II S 23 38). Winckler identifies it with the Aramean principality known as Subitē in the Assyrian inscriptions which lay to the S. of Damascus. Others advocate an identification with Chalkis, situated on the slopes of Lebanon. The chief argument for the latter theory is the mention of Zobah as a source of copper (II S 8 8). See also METALS, § 1; and ARAM § 4 (9). J. A. K.

ZOBEBAH, zo-bī'ba (צֹבְבָא, hatsōbhēbhāh); Either a place- or a clan-name (I Ch 4 8).

ZOHAR, zōhār (צֹהָר, tsōhār): 1. The ancestral head of a clan of Simeon (Gn 46 10; Ex 6 15). See also ZERAH. 2. The father of Ephron the Hittite (Gn 23 8, 25 8 f.).

ZOHELETH, zō'hī-leth (צֹהֶלֶת, zōheleth), 'serpent': The name of a stone beside En-rogel (I K 1 9, a spring S. of Jerusalem, probably the modern Bīr-Eiyāb (Job's Well) at the mouth of Hinnom (so Paton, Jerusalem in Bible Times, 35 f., and G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, I, 109 f.). When Adonijah planned to make himself king, he sacrificed on the 'serpent's stone,' which may have been an ancient Jebusite place of worship and sacrifice. Others identify En-rogel with Gihon, the Virgin's Spring, and Z. with a rocky ascent (Zehweileh) opposite the spring, which leads to the village of Silwān. Smith, however, loc. cit., states that the name Zehweileh seems to be applied to a stratum of rock running as far S. as Bīr-Eiyāb. C. S. T.

ZOHETH, zō'hefth (צֹהֶת, zōhēth): A son of Ishi a Judahite (I Ch 4 20).

ZOPHAH, zō'fa (צֹפָא, tsōphāh): The ancestor of an Asherite family (I Ch 7 35).

ZOPHAI, zō'fai or -fē. See ZUPH.

ZOPHAR, zō'fār (צֹפָר, tsōphār): A Naamathite, and one of Job's friends (Job 2 11, 11 1, etc.). The Naamah here alluded to was probably not the one in Judah, but some other locality E. of the Jordan, or in Arabia. See also JOB. E. E. N.

ZOPHIM, zō'fīm (צֹפִים, tsōphīm), 'watchmen': 1. A 'field of watchmen' on Mt. Pisgah (Nu 23 14). The exact site is unknown. 2. See RAMATHAIM.

ZORAH, zō'ra, ZOREAH, zō'ri-a (צֹרָא, tsor'āh, Zoreah, Jos 15 33 AV, and Zarech, Neh 11 29 AV): A town in the Shephelah of Judah, mentioned with Eshtaol (Jos 15 33). Before the migration of the Danites to the north (Jg 18 2, 8, 11), it had belonged to the tribe of Dan. It was the home of Manoah, Samson's father (Jg 13 2, 25), and Samson was buried between Z. and Eshtaol (Jg 16 31). It was fortified by Rehoboam (II Ch 11 10), and was resettled after the Exile (Neh 11 29). Z. is the modern Sur'ah, 15 m. W. of Jerusalem on a hill 800 ft. above the Wādī es-Sur'āh ('valley of Sorek,' Jg 16 4), through which runs the railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem. Map II, D 1. Across the wādī to the S. lies 'Ain Shems (Beth-shemesh). The Wādī es-Sur'āh offered easy access from the maritime plain to the hills about Jerusalem, and, therefore, Zorah, overlooking and commanding the valley, was an important place.

ZORATHITE, zō'rāth-ait, ZORITE, zō'rait (צֹרָתִי, tsor'āthī, I Ch 2 53, Zareathite AV 4 2, צֹרָתִי, tsor'ē, I Ch 2 54): A Calebite family, which migrated from the S. of Judah to Zorah (q.v.), or descendants of the family which resettled Z. after the Exile.

ZOROBABEL, zō-reb'a-bel. See ZERUBBABEL.

ZUAR, zū'ar (צֹאֵר, tsū'ār): A 'prince' of Issachar (Nu 1 8, 2 5, etc.).

ZUPH, zūf (צֹפִי, tsūph): I. An ancestor of Samuel the prophet (I S 1 1; I Ch 6 35, called Zophai in 6 26). II. The land of Zuph (I S 9 5), a region in central Israel, probably connected with I as the place where the Zuphites lived. Location unknown. E. E. N.

ZUR, zūr (צֹר, tsūr), 'rock': 1. A Midianite chief-tain, slain by Israel (Nu 25 15, 31 8; Jos 13 21). 2. See ZEROR.

ZURIEL, ziū'ri-el (צֹרִיאֵל, tsūri'āl), 'God is my rock': The son of Abihail (Nu 3 35).

ZURISHADDAI, ziū'ri-shad'ai, -sha'da-ai, or -sha'dē (צֹרִישַׁדַּי, tsūrishadday), 'my rock is Shad-dai' (the Almighty): A 'prince' of Simeon (Nu 1 6).

ZUZIM, ziū'zim (צֹזִים, zūzīm): A people of Ham, a district E. of the Jordan conquered by Chedor-laomer (Gn 14 5). They are mentioned between the Rephaim of Ashteroth-karnaim (in Bashan) and the Emim of Shaveh-kiriathaim (in Moab). Ham seems to have been a city of the country inhabited by Ammon, of which Rabbath-ammon (modern Amman) was the chief city. In Dt 2 20 'Zamzumim' occurs as the Ammonite name of the original inhabitants of the territory N. of Moab, and these were probably the same as the Zuzim. Sayce (Modern Crit. and the Monuments) claims that the variations in the names can be accounted for by the cuneiform originals, and that the form in Dt gives the pronunciation, while that in Gn gives the name as it appeared on some Babyl. tablet. He is also of the opinion that Ham is another form of Amman, which is explained in a similar way. If we can give credence to the archaeological notes of Dt 2 10-20, the Zuzim were a part of the Rephaim (q.v.), as were also the Emim (a Moabite name). Possibly, the name has some connection with the ghosts of dead giants (see REPHAIM) as 'whisperers,' 'murmurers' (cf. Is 8 19). Some find in Ziza, a ruin 20 m. S. of Rabbath-ammon, a trace of the name Zuzim. C. S. T. ja
